Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and upon his appeal attacks the declarations of the court contained in the so-called conclusions of law Nos. 1 and 3, above quoted. Respondent makes answer that the appeal is without merit, because conclusions of law, no matter how erroneous, constitute no ground of reversal, if the judgment be in fact supported by the findings. Spencer v. Duncan, 107 Cal. 423, 40 Pac. 549. This proposition of respondents is sound; but the gist of appellant's attack is, not that the conclusions of law are erroneous, but that the conclusions of law are essentially misplaced findings of fact (see Sav. & L. Soc'y v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514-538, 39 Pac. 922), and that, treating them as findings of fact, the judgment based upon them is erroneous. To the better understanding of this proposition it becomes pertinent to set forth such part of the contract as it will be necessary to consider in the discussion to follow. The contract admittedly was somewhat inartificially drawn by the parties to it, who were not learned in the law. Agreeing to sell a tract containing 20 acres, sufficiently described in the contract, the agreement continues: "I reserve all improvements and one acre of ground, inclusive of streets and five-foot alley on the south where the house now stands; but he is to have the engine and pump, with the shed, with me, the privilege of using it until arrangements can be made for water." This, it is to be remembered, is a contract for the sale of land, and not a deed of grant of the land, and much greater liberality is allowed in construing the descriptions contained in such contracts. The certainty required in deeds is not essential, where even by parol evidence the property in contemplation of the parties to be conveyed can be definitely ascertained. Lick v. O'Donnell, 3 Cal. 63, 58 Am. Dec. 383; Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 162; Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. 386. And even in the case of deeds the ancient strictness of the rule is not adhered to. Fudickar v. East Riverside Irr. Dist., 109 Cal. 29, 41 Pac. 1024. It would seem that in a contract such as this, where the so-called "reservation" which, of course, is in strictness an exception, is not a floating acre, but is located and anchored as being an acre "on the south where the house now stands," and is further bounded with some certainty as fronting on the streets and a five-foot alley, the land could with the aid of parol evidence, be located with sufficient definiteness.

But as against this it must be conceded, since this finding is not attacked, and since it declares that the exception is too indefinite for location, that the court, after taking all appropriate evidence, was unable to delimit the excepted 1 acre. Here, then, the so-called conclusions of law of the court are, as we have said, but findings of fact. The court in the first so-called conclusion of law finds as a fact that the description of the excepted 1 acre is uncertain. It finds further as a fact that, because of the uncertainty of the description of the excepted 1 acre, the contract is made uncertain as to the 19 acres agreed to be conveyed. The second fact is drawn as a deduction from the fact first found, namely, the uncertainty of the description of the excepted 1 acre. The court concludes that by reason of this uncertainty and the consequences which flow from it, as expressed in the finding of the second fact, and for no other reason, plaintiff must fail. If, in declaring the second fact that the 19 acres to be conveyed became uncertain because of the uncertainty of the description of the excepted 1 acre, the court misconstrued and misapplied the law—if, in other words, it did not follow that it was a fact that the description of the 19 acres sought to be conveyed must fail because of the indefiniteness of the description of the excepted 1 acre—then the judgment is not supported by the findings and must be reversed. The legal proposition is precisely this: Under the circumstances above indicated, where the exception in a grant or contract of sale is void for uncertainty, does the grant fall with the exception, or is it the exception alone which is invalid and void? If it be the former, then the judgment of the court was clearly right. If it be the latter, it was clearly wrong.

By the terms of the contract there was to be conveyed, as the court finds, "lots (12) twelve and (13) thirteen, in block (21) twenty-one, of California Co-operative Colony Tract as per map recorded in Book 21, pages 15-16, Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles County, California," containing 20 acres. From the conveyance of this whole tract there was to be excepted 1 acre of land, the location of which was incompletely described. That, while termed a "reservation," this acre of land was in fact an exception, is, of course, beyond dispute. "An exception is always a part of a thing granted and of a thing in being; and a reservation is a thing not in being, but is newly created out of lands and tenements devised, though the terms are often used promiscuously, and a reservation is construed an exception if it will fall within that definition and if such was the design of the parties." State v. Wilson, 42 Me. 9; Barnes v. Burt, 38 Conn. 541; Washington Mills, etc., v. Commercial Fire Ins. Co. (C. C.) 13 Fed. 646; Spencer v. Wabash R. Co., 132 Iowa, 129, 109 N. W. 453; Edwards v. Brusha, 18 Okl. 234, 90 Pac. 727. An exception in a private conveyance is to be construed strictly against the grantor. Duryea v. City of New York, 62 N. Y. 592; Klaer v. Ridgway, 86 Pa. 529. Clearly, under this contract and the findings of the court, the description of the land to be conveyed by the contract is in no way uncertain as it is the whole of the 20-acre tract. The excepted acre alone, the court finds, is insufficiently described. What legal result follows therefrom? The cases are numerous in answer. In accordance with the doctrine that an exception in such a deed is to be construed strictly against the grantor, the exception will fail, and not the grant. So we find it declared that "the invalidity of an attempted reservation for uncertainty does not necessarily vitiate the grant." Baldwin v. Winslow, 2 Minn. 213 (Gil. 174). "Ambiguity of description of land excepted from a conveyance does not make the conveyance void for uncertainty." McAllister v. Honea, 71 Miss. 256, 14 South. 264. "Where there is a description in a deed, followed by an exception which is uncertain, the exception may be void for uncertainty, but the description will stand." Torrey v. Thayer, 37 N. J. Law, 339. "The granting part of a deed is not avoided by a defect in the exception; but the exception itself becomes ineffectual thereby, and the grant remains in force." Waugh v. Richardson, 30 N. C. 470. To like effect may be cited Welch v. Str. Genevieve, 1 Dill. 130, Fed. Cas. No. 17,372; Mooney v. Cooledge, 30 Ark. 640; Winslow v. Patten, 34 Me. 25; Loyd v. Oates, 143 Ala. 231, 38 South. 1022, 111 Am. St. Rep. 39; Bromberg v. Smee, 130 Ala. 601, 30 South. 483; Nunnery v. Ford (Miss.) 45 South. 722; Darling v. Crowell, 6 N. H. 421. Thus, in Darling v. Crowell, supra, where in a grant of land there was an exception of an acre and a half reserved for the use of flowing water for a mill, without location of the land, the exception was held void for uncertainty. And in Mooney v. Coolidge, supra, where there was excepted out of the conveyance one acre of land, and there was nothing in the exception or evidence to locate it upon any particular part of the tract, the exception was held void for uncertainty, and the grantee took the entire tract.

Respondents' brief upon appeal combats none of these legal propositions, but rests entirely upon the technical objection, heretofore discussed and disposed of, that appellant is attacking the sufficiency of the conclusions of law to support the judgment, and not the sufficiency of the findings of fact. In this, as has been shown, respondents are in error.

Upon the findings, the judgment is reversed with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff in the amount which the court found would have been due saving for the indefiniteness of the contract.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the complaint for death of a passenger alleged as the direct and only cause of the accident the starting backwards of defendant's car after it had stopped and while deceased was alighting, and plaintiffs' proof was directed only to showing that cause, and the defendant attempted to rebut this only by evidence that deceased got off the car before it stopped and while it was still going forward, and defendant admitted that, if the accident occurred as claimed by plaintiffs, such backing of the car was negligence, and defendant was liable, and plaintiffs admitted, if the accident occurred as defendant claimed, they had no rights, and the court without objection submitted such issue only, with direction to find for plaintiffs or defendant according as they found thereon, refusal of an instruction as to presumption of negligence from the accident happening to deceased from operation of the car while she was a passenger on it, and the giving of an instruction excluding from consideration of the jury any other act of negligence of defendant, was immaterial.

3. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

Mere injury to a passenger while aboard a car or while alighting from it creates no presumption that it was caused by negligence of the carrier operating the car; but it must be first shown the injury came from the movement of the car by those in charge of it, or from something connected therewith, or in control of the carrier, and then it is presumed that the thing causing the injury was due to the carrier's negligence, throwing on it the burden of disproving the prima facie case.

4. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

If the alleged negligence in an action for injury to a passenger while alighting is denied, plaintiff must prove it "by a preponderance of the whole evidence."

5. CARRIERS (§ 321*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—EQUALLY BALANCED EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the only issue on which depended the liability of a carrier for death of a passenger was whether the car stopped and then started backward as the passenger was attempting to alight, or whether she voluntarily stepped from it while it was still going forward, an instruction to find for defendant if the evidence was equally balanced as between such theories was proper.

6. TRIAL (§ 62*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Josephine C. Wyatt and others against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. C. Hester and Hester, Merrill & Craig, for appellants. Bicknell, Gibson & Trask (Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the heirs at law of Catherine Gray, deceased, to recover damages for her death, which it is alleged was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The verdict was in favor of the defendant. The plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The defendant was operating a line of street railroad cars in the city of Pasadena. The complaint alleges that the deceased was a passenger on defendant's car; that the car stopped, and she was in the act of stepping from the rear of the car to the street, when it was started backwards by the employes of the defendant with a sudden jerk, whereby she was thrown violently from the car to the ground and suffered injuries which caused her death. The errors assigned relate to the rejection of certain evidence and the giving and refusing of instructions. It is also alleged that the cars usually stopped at Green street; that she supposed the car she was on would stop there; that she told the conductor she wished to alight there; that it went beyond the crossing and stopped at an unusual place; that the conductor was not in his proper place at the rear and did not assist her to alight. It is important to note, however, that these acts are stated merely by way of inducement, and that it is not alleged or claimed that they caused the fall whereby she was injured. The act of starting the car backward, after it had stopped and while she was in the act of alighting, is alleged as the direct and only cause of the injury. Upon the trial, the plaintiffs' evidence was directed to proof of that act as the cause, and no attempt was made by them to show that the injury was caused in any other manner, or by reason of any other act of negligence. The defendant attempted to rebut this proof solely by evidence to prove that she got off the car before it had stopped and while it was in motion. The defendant then admitted that if the fall occurred, as claimed by plaintiffs, from the sudden backward motion of the car, such act would be negligence, and that the defendant would be liable. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, admitted that if she fell by attempting to get off the car before it had stopped, and while it was in motion, they had no right to recover. In accordance with these admissions, and upon these averments and proofs, the court, in instruction 8, asked by the defendant and not assigned as error by the plaintiffs, said to the jury: "I charge you that there is but one issue for you to consider, viz.: Did the car stop, and then, as Catherine Gray was attempting to alight therefrom, start backward? If so, the defendant is liable. * * * If, on the other hand, said Catherine Gray voluntarily stepped from the said car before the same had stopped and while it was in motion, the plaintiffs cannot recover." This was a direction to the jury that the act alleged as the cause of the injury, if proven, was a negligent act of itself, and sufficient in that respect to justify a recovery. This state of the issues, these admissions of the parties, and this instruction render the errors complained of for the most part unimportant and practically immaterial, as will appear from a mere statement of the points.

Certain rules of the company for the government of the employes operating its cars were not allowed in evidence. The most that could be said in regard to them is that they might tend to prove the admitted proposition that the particular act of starting the car backward, as the deceased was alighting, was negligent.

Instruction 6, asked by the plaintiffs and refused, purported to direct the jury that a presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant would arise from the fact that the accident happened to the deceased by the operation of its car while she was a passenger thereon. Instruction 9 and others given by the court are criticised on the ground that they excluded from the consideration of the jury any act of negligence on the part of the defendant, other than that which, as above stated, is alleged to have caused the deceased to be thrown from the car, and also upon the ground that they put upon the plaintiffs the burden of proving the negligence of defendant, without aid from the presumption of negligence arising from the happening of the accident to a passenger on its car. All these matters are made immaterial by the allegations, admissions, and instruction above mentioned, limiting the jury to the single act alleged, and directing them that that act was in itself negligent.

It is proper to say, in this connection, that the instructions given as aforesaid were not erroneous as claimed. The criticism of them is based upon what appears to be a misapprehension as to the effect of the maxim, "res ipsa loquitur." It is not the law, as the argument of the plaintiffs implies, that the mere fact that a passenger is injured while aboard a car, or while alighting therefrom, creates a presumption that the injury was caused by want of care on the part of the defendant operating such car. It must first be shown that the injury came from the movement of the car by those in charge of it, or from something connected therewith, or in control of the defendant. When this is done, the law then presumes, prima facie, that the particular thing thus shown to have caused the injury was due to the defendant's negligence, and the burden is thrown upon the defendant to disprove the prima facie case thus made. Such negligence is presumed, because such accidents do not ordinarily happen if due care is used, and because the defendant is usually better able than the plaintiff to show the actual truth of the matter. In Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 193, 59 N. E. 925 (52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630), the court, referring to this maxim, says: "It is not the injury, but the manner and circumstances of the injury, that justifies the application of the maxim and the inference of negligence. If a passenger in a car is injured by striking the seat in front of him, that of itself authorizes no inference of negligence. If it be shown, however, that he was precipitated against the seat by reason of the train coming in collision with another train, or in consequence of the car being derailed, the presumption of negligence arises." So here the fact that the deceased was injured by falling to the ground creates no presumption of negligence; but, if it is also shown that the fall came about from the sudden start of the car as she was stepping off the same, then it will be presumed that the sudden start was caused by the defendant's negligence. But the proof of the injury—that is, the bruise or hurt—or the proof that she fell to the ground, without proof as to why she fell, raises no presumption either that she was made to fall by the sudden starting of a car at rest, or by a careless attempt to get off while it was in motion and before it had stopped. Lincoln Tr. Co. v. Shepherd, 74 Neb. 372, 104 N. W. 882, 107 N. W. 764; Saunders v. Chicago, etc., Co., 6 S. D. 40, 60 N. W. 148.

Instruction 4a, given by the court, was approved in Patterson v. San Mateo, etc., Co., 147 Cal. 183, 81 Pac. 531, and the principle therein stated, that in a case like the present, if the alleged negligence of the defendant is denied, the plaintiff must prove it "by a preponderance of the whole evidence," was fully discussed in that case and in Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Co., 139 Cal. 345, 73 Pac. 164, and Valente v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 538, 91 Pac. 481, and declared to be correct.

Instruction 9 also stated: "If the evidence is equally balanced, as to whether the car stopped and then started backwards, as said Catherine Gray was attempting to alight therefrom, or as to whether Catherine Gray voluntarily stepped from the said car while it was in motion, then your verdict must be for the defendant." In view of the narrow issue upon which the case was presented and the admissions of the respective counsel aforesaid, this cannot be declared erroneous. Each theory was advanced as the opposite of the other, and it was not suggested by either party that any other explanation of the fall of the deceased was possible under the evidence. It is clear that the evidence tending to show that she got off the car before it stopped and while it was in motion, even if not weighty enough to prove the fact affirmatively in support of the defense of contributory negligence, upon which the defendant had the burden of proof, might nevertheless be sufficient to balance the proof of the plaintiffs that she was caused to fall by the sudden movement backward when she was properly alighting; and if it would avail for that purpose, the plaintiff, who was required to prove the latter fact by a preponderance, must fail. The instruction was not erroneous in this particular. Lincoln Tr. Co. v. Shepherd, supra. It did not purport to instruct the jury upon the subject of the burden of proof of contributory negligence, and it could not fairly have been understood by them as a direction that the defendant could establish that defense without proving it by a preponderance of the evidence. The circumstance that the fact that she alighted voluntarily while the car was moving, if proven, would constitute contributory negligence on her part, does not exclude the evidence of that fact from the consideration of the jury in rebuttal of the contrary theory that the car was at rest and suddenly started while she was alighting. No instruction as to the burden of proof of contributory negligence appears in the record, nor does it show that it contains all the instructions, or that any instruction on that subject was asked. In the absence of such request, the plaintiffs cannot complain that none was given.

It is further claimed that the verdict was not justified by the evidence. It is sufficient to say that the evidence is conflicting, and that the jury were the judges of the credibility of the witnesses. If they believed the testimony favorable to the defendant, they could not have properly returned a different verdict.

The order is affirmed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 293*)—STREET IMPROVEMENT—RESOLUTION—REQUISITES.

Under Street Improvement Act, § 3 (Gen. Laws 1906, p. 1280), providing that a city council's resolution of intention to improve a street shall contain a description of the work, a resolution reciting that it was the intention of the council "to sidewalk and curb Date street" was fatally defective for failure to specify the character of materials to be used in the sidewalk and the materials for the curb.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 567*)—STREET ASSESSMENT—FORECLOSURE—COMPLAINT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 456, declaring that in pleading a determination of an officer or board it shall be sufficient to allege that the determination has been "duly given or made," did not sustain a complaint to foreclose a street assessment for constructing a sidewalk and curb, alleging that the city duly passed and adopted a resolution of intention to order the following street work to be done, to wit, "to sidewalk and curb Date street on both sides thereof, in the city of San Diego, California," between certain specified streets, as such allegation attempted to set out the resolution, and not its legal effect, and the resolution alleged was wholly insufficient.

Action by Warren M. Crouse against H. L. Barrows and others. From a judgment foreclosing a street assessment lien, defendants appeal. Reversed, with instructions.

Luce, Sloane & Luce, for appellants.
Stearns & Sweet, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment foreclosing a street assessment on their property. The only point to be considered is whether the general demurrer interposed by defendants to the complaint should have been sustained; the trial court having overruled it. The complaint alleged "that on the 14th day of August, 1905, at the city of San Diego, state of California, the common council of said city duly passed and adopted a resolution of intention, in writing, wherein and whereby said common council duly resolved and determined that it was the intention of said council to order the following described street work to be done in said city, to wit: 'To sidewalk and curb Date street, on both sides thereof, in the city of San Diego, California, from the east line of Front street to the west line of Fifth street.'" Immediately following it is alleged: "That thereafter, to wit, on the 2d day of October, 1905, at said city of San Diego, said common council, deeming that the public interest and convenience required it, duly passed and adopted a resolution, in writing, wherein and whereby said common council duly gave and made its order and determination in writing, ordering said work to be done."

It is insisted by appellants that the complaint is radically defective, because the description of the work to be done, set forth in the resolution of intention referred to in the first-quoted allegation, is not such a description of the work as is required by section 3 of the street improvement act (Gen. Laws 1906, p. 1280). This point is well taken. The act requires that the resolution of intention shall contain a description of the work, and all that appears in the resolution of intention is that it is the intention of the common council "to sidewalk and curb Date street" on both sides between certain streets. There is no specification of the character of the materials to be used in laying the sidewalks, nor of what materials the curb shall be constructed, and a resolution which fails to make specifications of that character is void, and a complaint which sets forth a resolution of intention which is deficient in those particulars states no cause of action. San Jose v. Auzeiras, 106 Cal. 499, 39 Pac. 859; Schwiesau v. Mahon, 128 Cal. 114, 60 Pac. 683; Williamson v. Joyce, 137 Cal. 107, 69 Pac. 854. It is conceded by respondent that, in order to acquire jurisdiction to order street work done under the act, a resolution prescribing the work to be done—embracing a specification of the materials of which it is to be constructed—must in fact be passed; but he contends that the question here is one of pleading solely, and that it is not necessary, in a complaint to foreclose a street assessment, to set forth in full the resolution of intention, in order to show that the common council acquired jurisdiction to proceed with the improvements, but that it was necessary only to plead, in the method provided for by section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the determination of the common council ordering the street improvement work to be done.

The section of the Code referred to provides "that in pleading a judgment or other determination of a court, officer or board it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment or determination may be stated to have been duly given or made"; and it is insisted, as the complaint alleged that the common council "duly passed and adopted a resolution of intention," accompanied by the subsequent allegation that the council "duly passed and adopted and duly gave and made its order ordering said work to be done," that this constituted a sufficient pleading under the Code section, and was in legal effect a sufficient allegation that everything necessary to be done—including the passage of a requisite resolution of intention—was done in order to give the council jurisdiction to make the subsequent order providing for the doing of the work. There would be ground for this claim of respondent, if there were no allegation in the complaint showing the resolution of intention that the council did in fact pass, and the pleader was relying for the sufficiency of the complaint upon the allegation solely that the common council "duly passed and adopted a resolution * * * whereby said common council duly gave and made its order and determination in writing, ordering said work to be done." This was the condition of the complaint in Pacific Paving Company v. Bolton, 97 Cal. 8, 31 Pac. 625. In that case there was no allegation that before ordering the work done a resolution of intention so to do was passed, but it was alleged that the common council "duly gave and made its determination to order the work done." It was held that this allegation, pleaded in the language provided for in section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was in legal effect a statement that the common council had taken all the requisite, preliminary, statutory steps, including the passage of a sufficient resolution of intention to give the order for doing the work validity, and that it was not necessary to plead the passage of a resolution of intention.

But in the complaint here under consideration the pleader did not content himself with an allegation that the common council "duly gave and made an order" ordering the work to be done, from which, under the section of the Code, the legal implication would follow that the council had acquired jurisdiction to proceed in the matter by the preliminary passage of a resolution of intention which sufficiently described the work; but he has set forth the resolution of intention which the common council did in fact pass. As to such allegation of the terms of the resolution of intention it may not be said that it is simply an allegation that it described the work generally, and does not pretend to contain all the matters with reference to such work which were contained in the resolution of intention. On the contrary, it is alleged that the common council determined to order "the following described street work," specifying it and placing it in quotation marks in the allegation, as indicating it to be a literal statement of the description of the work as contained in the resolution of intention, and it is the work so described in said resolution of intention that it is further alleged the common council subsequently "duly gave and made its order * * * ordering said work to be done." So that whatever legal intendment might follow, had the complaint merely alleged that the common council "duly gave and made" its order and resolution ordering "said work to be done," is rendered ineffectual in the face of the resolution of intention which it is pleaded was in fact actually passed, and which shows that the common council, on account of a failure to state the nature of the materials to be used in the proposed work, never acquired jurisdiction to make the subsequent order for the work to be done or to take any proceedings in the matter of the street improvement in contemplation. In Buckman v. Hatch, 139 Cal 53, 72 Pac. 445, which was an action to foreclose a street assessment lien, a complaint similar in its allegations to the one here in question was under review. There it was alleged that the common council "duly made and passed" a resolution of intention describing the work, followed by a further allegation that the board subsequently "duly gave, made, and * * * passed its order and resolution ordering said work to be done," and there, as here, the resolution of intention, which was actually passed and was set forth in the complaint, contained no description of the materials to be used in the proposed improvement. In that case the same reliance was placed on section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure to sustain the complaint, on account of the allegations made under the terms of the section, as is now urged; but it was held that, as it affirmatively appeared in the resolution of intention which was pleaded that the common council had acquired no jurisdiction at all to proceed in the matter of the improvement on account of the radical insufficiency of the resolution, the complaint stated no cause of action. On the authority of that decision it must be held that the complaint at bar likewise stated no cause of action, and that the trial court should have sustained the demurrer to the complaint on that ground.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to plaintiff to amend if he should so desire.

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 214*)—ASSIGNEES OF CONTRACT OF PURCHASE.

M., being in possession of land under an executory contract of purchase, assigned the contract by a separate instrument to defendant, retaining the original contract unindorsed and possession of the land; defendant not making any payment under the contract, nor recording his assignment, nor otherwise giving notice that M. was not the owner of the contract and in possession under it. Plaintiff afterwards bought of M. his interest for a fair consideration, took the original contract, indorsed to him, made payments, delinquent and current, on the original contract, went into possession, and received no notice of defendant's claim till two months later. Held, that though the assignee of an executory contract of purchase is not within the protection of the rule of bona fide purchaser, and even admitting defendant to be equally innocent with plaintiff, plaintiff's title would prevail over defendant's, under Civ. Code, § 3543, providing that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer.

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 73*)—BY CONDUCT.

Where defendant, having taken an assignment from M. of his contract to purchase land, left M. in possession "to handle the property," he made M. his agent, and on the principle of estoppel by conduct cannot assert superiority of his equity over that of plaintiff, who bought of M., supposing M. to be the owner of the contract; there being no notice to the contrary.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by M. H. Mills against H. B. Rossiter and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant J. H. Whitney appeals. Affirmed.

Kendrick, Knott & Ardis, for appellant. Alfonso Moore, Moore & Evans, and J. H. Coverley, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The action was to quiet title. Defendant Whitney alleged an interest in the land growing out of an assignment to him of a certain contract for its sale. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendant Whitney appeals.

The undisputed facts are that one E. M. Morton went into possession of the land in controversy on the 21st day of July, 1906, under a duly executed executory contract to pay for the land at the rate of $10 a month for 40 consecutive months. While so in possession he entered into a contract with defendant Whitney to the effect that he would sell to Whitney his equity in the land for the sum of $250, and that, in the event that Whitney did not sell the property within 6 months from date, then Morton agreed to pay to Whitney a premium of $100 above and in excess of the amount that Whitney "has in said property at the end of the said 6 months." Whitney, in identical language, agreed to pay $250 for Morton's interest, and further agreed that, in the event that he failed to sell the property within six months from the date, he would deliver it to the party of the first part "in consideration of a premium of one hundred dollars ($100) above and in excess of the amount that the said second party has in said property." This contract was never recorded, Whitney never took possession under it, and Morton remained in possession of the land and of the original executory contract for the sale thereof. Morton made improvements upon the land at his own cost and expense; these improvements consisting of a two-story frame store building and a dwelling house. Morton and plaintiff came into negotiation while the former was so in possession of the land. The negotiation ended in plaintiff paying to Morton for his interest in the land about $4,000, a full and fair equivalent. Morton was delinquent upon the monthly payments, and plaintiff also made these. Morton surrendered to plaintiff possession of the property, and likewise made written assignment of the original contract by indorsement thereon, and surrendered this contract to plaintiff. Upon January 22d of the following year plaintiff first became advised of defendant's claim by a note from the latter which declared that he would like to meet plaintiff "in regard to a lot in Redondo of which Mr. E. M. Morton has sold his equity to me, and I understand has since sold same to you, and has since skipped." At the time this intimation was received, plaintiff had been in possession of the property for about two months, had made all payments, delinquent and current, under the contract, and had added substantial improvements. He fulfilled the contract according to its terms, received the deed from the vendors, and began this action.

Upon appeal, appellant invokes the familiar equitable maxim that between two equities, otherwise equal, the prior must prevail, and the further principle, recognized with proper limitations growing out of the circumstances of each case, that the assignee of an executory contract of purchase is the holder of a mere equity, and not within the rule which protects a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of the real or apparent legal title. Dupont v. Wertheman, 10 Cal. 369; Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 538, 20 Pac. 62. It is not necessary here to consider any modification of this rule touching the holder of an equity under an executory contract which may have been worked by the recordation acts. Civ. Code, §§ 1214, 1215. It is sufficient in this case to point out the very obvious fact that the equities of plaintiff and defendant were not equal, and that the rule as to the priority which applies in such cases has no application here. Appellant in a separate instrument took what purported to be an assignment of Morton's equity. He did not record this assignment. He did not even procure an indorsement and delivery to him of the original contract. He did not enter into possession. He did not make payments under the contract. He held out no notice to the world that Morton was other than what he represented himself to be, the owner of the executory contract and in possession under the rights conferred by that contract. By his conduct he suffered plaintiff to purchase from Morton, to pay full value for the purchase without notice of any intervening right and enter into possession, and to remain in possession for two months before he first asserted this claim. If appellant, under these circumstances, be regarded as equally innocent, though it is somewhat difficult so to regard him, then must be submit to the equitable maxim expressed in section 3543 of the Civil Code that, "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer." Or, again, appellant's own testimony is to the effect that he permitted Morton to remain in possession, with right "to handle the property," meaning thereby to sell it. Morton thus, by appellant's own statement, became his agent, and upon the plainest principles of estoppel by conduct Whitney will not be heard now to assert that his equity is superior to that of Morton's vendee. Dolbeer v. Livingston, 100 Cal. 617, 35 Pac. 328.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by F. A. Elliott, as administrator, against Jeannette W. Bunce, as administratrix. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. F. Mogan and Mastick & Partridge, for appellant. M. C. Hassett, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The facts of the case are stated by respondent substantially as follows: On December 21, 1853, Ada M. Hudson and George Hudson were married in the city and county of San Francisco, and lived together as husband and wife until she died, May 17, 1897. He died March 12, 1898. On June 24, 1898, F. A. Elliott was appointed administrator of the estate of said Ada M. Hudson, deceased, and on June 16, 1898, Charlotte K. Clark was appointed special administratrix of the estate of said George Hudson, deceased. This action of Elliott v. Clark was begun on June 16, 1899, and on May 17, 1904, a judgment was rendered for plaintiff, decreeing that a trust existed, and that the defendant held the whole property for the plaintiff, as the administrator of the said estate of Ada M. Hudson, deceased. An appeal from the judgment was taken to the Supreme Court. The cause was transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the First District for hearing, and the special administratrix having died during the appeal, the present defendant was substituted. On February 8, 1907, said Court of Appeal rendered its decision reversing the judgment of the lower court and directing that an order be made sustaining the demurrer to the complaint on the ground that no cause of action was stated. The lower court acted accordingly, but permitted the plaintiff to file an amended complaint. A demurrer to this was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend further, judgment was entered for the defendant, from which this appeal is taken by plaintiff.

It is not disputed that the ruling of an appellate court upon a point distinctly made upon a previous appeal becomes the law of the case, and is conclusive between the same parties upon a subsequent appeal, from which the court cannot depart, nor the parties relieve themselves; or, as stated in Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 421, 90 Pac. 1050: "Where the Supreme Court, in deciding the appeal, states in its opinion a principle or rule of law necessary to the decision, that principle or rule becomes the law of the case, and must be adhered to throughout its subsequent progress, both in the lower court and upon a subsequent appeal, and in any subsequent suit for the same cause of action; and this, although in its subsequent consideration this court may be clearly of the opinion that the former decision is erroneous in that particular. * * * It is a necessary corollary of this doctrine that the former rule is not binding upon the second hearing, except as to questions which involve and are controlled by the same principle." There can be no doubt as to what rule or principle of law was determined by the former decision in this cause. The court declares it as follows: "We think the facts set forth in the complaint bring the case within the rule laid down in Kleinclauss v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 Pac. 516, where the defense of laches raised by demurrer to a complaint to enforce an alleged trust growing out of a transaction 35 years old was sustained. * * * From the whole complaint it is apparent that the court could only arrive at the respective rights of the parties by going into an investigation of the particulars of purchases and sales of property covering a period of over 40 years. Both parties to the original transaction, out of which plaintiff's alleged claim arose, being dead, it is manifest that it would be practically impossible for a court at this late day to do complete justice. This is a ground for a court of equity to refuse relief. We think the complaint upon its face shows such laches as to bar any right of action in plaintiff, and the demurrer should have been sustained."

Appellant seeks to escape the operation of the rule by virtue of the contention that "the decision of the District Court of Appeal could only be justified upon the ground that it appeared from the complaint that the original purchase was made partly with the funds of Hudson and partly with the funds of Mrs. Hudson. * * * But we make it apparent in the amended complaint that Mr. Hudson had no interest in this original property, but that it was purchased entirely with Mrs. Hudson's funds. Moreover, the original complaint left it a matter of speculation as to how the original funds were transmuted into the property sued for. The amended complaint, on the other hand, traces the funds through every piece of property until the death of Mr. Hudson. There is no difficulty whatever in doing exact justice, if the allegations of the amended complaint are true." But it is clear that the cause of action is the same, and no additional fact is alleged to excuse or justify the delay in instituting the proceeding in question. There is no difference in principle between an action to recover the whole interest in property which is claimed to be the product of a trust fund and an action which seeks to charge said property pro tanto with a trust. In either case the purpose of the suit is to recover the proceeds of the money actually invested for the beneficiary. It is difficult, also, to understand how the more elaborate exposition in the complaint of the chain of title, or, in other words, the averment of unnecessary and evidentiary matter, affects in the slightest degree the question of laches.

It is manifest that in view of the rule, as declared in the Kleinclaus Case, supra, "that only conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence can call a court of equity into activity, and that entirely independent of any statutory period of limitation stale demands will not be aided, where the claimant has slept upon his rights for so long a time and under such circumstances as to make it inequitable to enter upon an inquiry as to the validity thereof," the appellate court in the former decision of this cause determined that it would be inequitable to even enter upon an inquiry as to whether the purchase of certain property in 1853 by one George Hudson created a trust. Would it be any less inequitable because claimant demands the whole of the property, instead of only a part, or because he sets out in the complaint gratuitously some of the evidence by which he seeks to support his claim? Indeed, the argument of appellant seems to proceed upon the theory that equity declines to entertain such demands because of the difficulty encountered by claimants in tracing, to their own satisfaction, trust funds, or in consequence of their reluctance in testifying to facts in support of their claims. The truth is, however, that equity looks with disfavor upon suits like the one before us, for the reason that testimony in support of the claim is so easily obtained and can be fabricated with such facility, and the circumstances afford such strong inducement to commit perjury and involve such peril of doing injustice to those whose lips are sealed by death, that it is deemed against sound public policy to even investigate the cause.

Again, while the court in the former opinion went no further than to determine that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, it really had before it in the record the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses disclosing substantially the additional matters set out in the amended complaint. As this testimony was admitted without objection, and treated by the parties as within the allegations of the complaint, and as the trial court found that all the property was charged with the trust, no doubt, the appellate court, if it deemed them material, would have considered these additional matters as though constituting a part of the complaint. If appellant, instead of amending his complaint by inserting the evidence received at the trial, had added some fact extenuating or justifying his delay, a different question, of course, would be presented. We feel entirely satisfied that the said decision of the appellate court is not only the law of the case, but that it is just, and, furthermore, that there is added reason for holding now, after 55 years since the original transaction.

that no trial should be had of plaintiff's stale demand.

The judgment is affirmed.

July 12, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 927*)—REVIEW—SCOPE—NONSUIT.

In determining, on appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, whether the evidence suffices to sustain findings for plaintiff, the evidence must not only be considered as absolutely true, but all reasonable inferences that may be drawn must be resolved in plaintiff's favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3748; Dec. Dig. § 927.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 70*)—FRAUD—FAILURE TO READ—ESTOPPEL.

Defendant contracted to convey land to plaintiff and two others, and subsequently conveyed the whole of the land to plaintiff for a good consideration. Thereafter, representing that the other two vendees had abandoned the contract, defendant showed plaintiff a copy of a release of the contract, asking him to make a copy thereof, that he could show to the other vendees as evidence that plaintiff was willing to sign such release. After making the copy plaintiff was tendered an instrument by defendant, who stated that it was the release, and, believing it to be a release, and the one of which he had made a copy, plaintiff signed it, not knowing that an additional clause, conveying all the interest of the vendees to defendant, had been added. Held, that plaintiff's failure to read the paper before signing it did not constitute such negligence as precluded him from having the deed set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action by C. Togni against Pio Taminelli and wife. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Will M. Beggs and C. H. Herrington, for appellant. W. P. Veuve, Hiram D. Tuttle, and R. R. Syer, for respondents.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought for the purpose of having a certain deed made to defendant Pio Taminelli to lands described in the complaint, situate in Santa Barbara county, set aside as being fraudulently obtained from plaintiff without consideration, and to have plaintiff's title restored, or, in case that cannot be done, for the recovery of $10,700, the amount which it is alleged said Pio Taminelli received by reason of the sale of such lands. At the close of plaintiff's testimony the court granted the motion of defendants for a nonsuit, and judgment was accordingly entered. This appeal is from the judgment, and is accompanied by a bill of exceptions.

It becomes our duty to examine the evidence, and if it is sufficient to sustain findings or a verdict for the plaintiff, in case the court or a jury had found for plaintiff, it is our duty under well-settled rules to reverse the judgment. In determining such question we must consider all the evidence in the record as absolutely true. Not only this, but it is our duty to resolve all reasonable inferences that may be drawn in favor of the plaintiff. The questions, therefore, for our consideration, are as to whether or not the plaintiff was the owner of the land, whether the deed was obtained from him by fraud and without consideration, and whether the money received by Pio Taminelli for the land is in equity and good conscience the money of plaintiff. The evidence in brief shows the following facts:

Plaintiff first met defendant Pio Taminelli (who will hereinafter be referred to as the defendant) about June, 1900. Defendant represented to plaintiff that he owned the tract of land described in the complaint, and that it was very valuable for asphaltum, and perhaps oil. After some negotiations, and on June 11, 1900, the defendant, as party of the first part, entered into an agreement with plaintiff, F. E. Allyn, and C. H. Herrington, as parties of the second part, by the terms of which agreement defendant was to convey the land to the parties of the second part for the consideration of certain payments, amounting to, in round figures, $6,000. The second payment, $1,400, was to be made within one year, $2,000 within two years, $1,000 within three years, and the final payment was to be 1,000 shares of the capital stock of a corporation, which the parties of the second part contemplated organizing for the purpose of operating and exploring the lands for oil and asphalt and other mineral substances. This contract gave the parties of the second part the right to the immediate possession of the said lands, together with the tools, tracks, and cars then upon the same, and will be referred to herein as the "Herrington contract." In May, 1901, the plaintiff sold to defendant an undivided one-half interest in a grocery store which plaintiff had been conducting in San José, and gave to defendant a bill of sale of such undivided one-half interest in such store. The consideration for the sale was $3,500, of which $1,500 was paid by defendant in cash, and the balance, $2,000, by a conveyance of an undivided one-half interest in the lands herein described. The plaintiff and defendant were thus partners in the grocery business from May 2 to June 17, 1901. On this last-named date the plaintiff sold to defendant his remaining one-half of the grocery store for $3,500; the consideration paid by defendant being $1,500 cash or its equivalent, and a conveyance by defendant of his remaining undivided half of the lands at the price of $2,000. The deed was delivered to plaintiff, and a bill of sale made by plaintiff to defendant of the store and merchandise. Defendant thus became the sole owner of the grocery store and appurtenances, and plaintiff became the sole owner of the lands. The deed was delivered to the plaintiff, and he placed it in the safe at the store, to which defendant had access. Plaintiff, at defendant's request, continued to conduct the store until about the 7th of July following the sale, at which time he went away on a vacation for about a month, and when he returned he was informed by defendant that he had overdrawn his account and that defendant had taken the deed as security. Plaintiff made no objection at the time to the deed being held as security, although it does not appear that he consented that it should be so held. On December 11, 1901, defendant gave to plaintiff a statement of his account, showing a balance due of $50.04; but among the credits given to the plaintiff were two promissory notes given by plaintiff to defendant, one for $400 and the other for $273. This statement of account was receipted by defendant as a statement and settlement in full. Some time during the year 1902 the plaintiff turned over to defendant some accounts and a half interest in a house and lot in East San José; but it does not appear clearly what was the value of the accounts or of the half interest in the house and lot. Defendant never surrendered or delivered up the $400 note or the $273 note to plaintiff.

It seems that the contract or agreement made on June 11, 1900, by defendant to plaintiff, Allyn, and Herrington, had not been complied with, or at least had been abandoned. Some time prior to August, 1902, defendant stated to plaintiff that Herrington and Allyn had not complied with their contract, and had failed to make the payments as therein provided, and showed to plaintiff a copy of a release of the Herrington contract, and asked plaintiff to make a copy of such release in his own handwriting, so that he could show such copy to Herrington and Allyn as evidence of the fact that plaintiff was willing to sign such release. Thereupon plaintiff made in his own handwriting a copy of the paper or release which defendant had given him, and which is as follows: "Know all men by these presents that for and in consideration of one dollar to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, that certain lease dated June 11, 1900, and recorded in Book 71 of Deeds, page 221, the 18th day of July, 1900, in the county records of Santa Barbara county, California, and executed by and between Pio Taminelli of the county of Santa Barbara, party of the first part therein, and C. Togni, C. H. Herrington, and Frank E. Allyn, of the county of Santa Clara, state of California, the parties of the second part therein, is hereby canceled, annulled, and made void, and is of no further effect whatever, and we do hereby sell, assign, and transfer to said Pio Taminelli all our rights, title, and interest in and to said above lease

In witness whereof we have signed our names. C. Togni." Some time after this copy had been made by plaintiff, the defendant asked plaintiff to come up and "sign the release." Plaintiff went up to Herrington's office, where were present Herrington, Allyn, and defendant. Defendant said to plaintiff, "There is the release ready," and plaintiff, believing it to be a release, and the one of which he had made a copy, signed a paper, which contained the substance of the paper which had been previously copied by him, together with an additional clause at the end thereof as follows: "And the said parties of the first part herein do, for a good and sufficient consideration, grant, bargain, and sell unto the said party of the second part herein all of their and each of their right, title, and interest in and to all the property described and mentioned in the said agreement of June 11, 1900; it being the intent of this instrument to vest in the said party of the second part herein the same title in the premises in said indenture of June 11, 1900, described as said party of the second part herein, had and held before the execution and delivery of said agreement of June 11, 1900." The above release and conveyance was duly acknowledged by plaintiff, Herrington, and Allyn, and, being delivered to defendant, he placed it on record.

Plaintiff had never had any conversation with defendant about making a deed of the lands to defendant. He received no consideration for the execution of the instrument. He had heard nothing said, except as to getting a release of the Herrington contract. Allyn testified that defendant referred to the paper as a "release," and that they were all ready to release the Herrington contract. Herrington testified that defendant said to plaintiff when he came in, "Here is the release," and that they all signed it; that plaintiff did not read it. There is not a word of evidence tending to show that defendant ever mentioned "deed" to plaintiff, or to Herrington or to Allyn. Plaintiff was not in good health after he sold the grocery business, and had a stroke of apoplexy some time afterwards. He appears to have placed implicit confidence in defendant, who had been his partner, and who told him that he was holding the deed as security for a small balance. After getting the deed signed by plaintiff and placing it of record, defendant sold the land for $60 an acre, as testified to by himself. Defendant also testified that he destroyed the deed that he had executed to plaintiff. It clearly appears that after this deed was duly executed and acknowledged and delivered to plaintiff, defendant took possession of it without plaintiff's consent, claiming to hold it as security, and that he afterwards destroyed it without plaintiff's consent or knowledge. Defendant thus, from this testimony, has the store and business, valued at $7,000, which he paid for by a conveyance of the lands; and he also has the proceeds of the sale of the very same lands, amounting to more than $10,000; and plaintiff has nothing. Defendant executed and delivered a deed to plaintiff, and afterwards, while a partner of plaintiff, took the deed from the safe into his own possession. The deed he not only destroyed, but to make assurance doubly sure he obtained a reconveyance by calling the paper a "release." These matters all appear by the evidence and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from such evidence. It may be that defendant can show the facts to be different; but the court should carefully look into and examine every fact and circumstance in order to arrive at the truth. If defendant paid any consideration for a reconveyance of the land, he will be allowed to show it. If he legally held the title to the land as security, the court can determine the amount of indebtedness due him by plaintiff. Surely the defendant should not be allowed to keep the proceeds of the sale of the lands if the above facts are true; and, as before stated, we must here consider them true.

It is said that the plaintiff cannot complain because he was guilty of negligence in not reading the paper before he signed it. If such were the rule, it would indeed be a harsh one, and one that would work injustice upon many unsuspecting persons. When the plaintiff had been asked to copy the release, and had done so, when he had heard nothing else spoken of but a release, and was asked to sign the release with Allyn and Herrington, who were parties to the contract which was released, it is not surprising that he did not read it through to see if hidden within there was a deed of conveyance. He appears to have had confidence in defendant, and relied upon the statements made by defendant to him. It would hardly be presumed that defendant would call the paper a release in the presence of Allyn and Herrington, unless he intended thereby to get it signed as a release. The authorities fully sustain the proposition that relief will be granted under such circumstances.

In Higgins v. Parsons, 65 Cal. 280, 3 Pac. 881, the contract was that a certain note secured by mortgage should bear interest at the rate of "1 per cent. per month," but by mistake the note was made to read "1 per cent. per annum." The trial court held that the mistake could not be corrected in a court of equity on account of defendant's negligence in not reading the note. The Supreme Court held otherwise, and reversed the case, and in the opinion said: "The finding that plaintiff might have discovered the mistake which he seeks to have rectified is an immaterial one. The right to have an instrument revised so as to have it truly express the intention of the parties is not made to depend upon the fact whether the party seeking to have it so revised might have discovered the mistake before signing such instrument." In Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 639, 76 Pac. 488, it appeared that the agent of plaintiff, in negotiating for the purchase of certain lands for $11,500, falsely represented to plaintiff that the vendor of the land insisted upon a deed of a lot belonging to plaintiff, and presented a deed as a part of the consideration, representing that it was a deed to the party from whom plaintiff was purchasing, when in fact it was a deed to the agent, and the party selling to plaintiff had not heard of such deed, and only received the $11,500. Plaintiff, relying upon the representations of such agent, did not read the deed, but signed it. The court gave relief, and in the opinion said: "The proposition of the appellant that inasmuch as the contents of the instrument were open to the plaintiff equally as to Garnier, and that as they signed it without reading it or having it read to them they are bound by its terms, is without merit. * * * Even when contracting parties are adverse to each other, either has the right to rely upon an express statement made by the other of an existing fact, of which the truth is known to the other and not to him. Mead v. Bunn, 32 N. Y. 275; Bank of Woodland v. Hiatt, 58 Cal. 234."

In Resh v. First National Bank, 93 Pa. 397, where a suit was brought upon a promissory note, the defendant was allowed to prove that he signed the note believing it to be a receipt for moneys that had been paid to him, and that he relied upon a statement that it was a receipt for the money that he had so received. No suggestion was even made that defendant should have read the paper which was falsely represented to him to be a receipt. In Pomeroy's Eq. Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) § 896, note "d," the author quotes the language of Jessel, M. R., from Redgrave v. Hurd, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 1, as follows: "Nothing can be plainer, I take it, on the authorities in equity, than that the effect of false representation is not got rid of on the ground that the person to whom it was made has been guilty of negligence."

In our opinion the above-quoted authorities lay down the correct rule which should govern courts of equity in such matters. Nothing is more common than for a party who has agreed to give a deed or other contract relating to some specific subject to sign it upon being told that it is the deed or contract which had been orally agreed to. The party who so signs has not exercised the greatest degree of care; but that will not excuse the party who intentionally misleads him. No one has a right, either in law or in morals, to complain because another has placed too great reliance upon the truth of what he himself has stated. In this case it comes with poor grace from defendant to say that plaintiff had no right to rely upon the statements made by himself to the effect that the instrument was a release.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

1. ATTACHMENT (§ 1*)—NATURE OF PROCEEDING.

An "attachment" is merely a proceeding ancillary to the action by which a party may acquire a lien for the security of his demand, and is a provisional, independent proceeding, initiated by affidavit forming the basis for the writ, and can only be made available through a judgment, which neither changes the nature nor determines the validity of the attachment.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 616-620.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 445*)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—JURISDICTION OF TRIAL COURT.

The trial court, if a court of record, retains jurisdiction of the proceedings designated by the Code as provisional remedies, notwithstanding an appeal is taken from its judgment, and may take such steps as may be necessary to preserve the rights of parties interested therein.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 181*)—APPEAL—JURISDICTION OF THE SUPERIOR COURT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 976, 977, 980, providing that on an appeal on questions of law and fact the justice must transmit the papers in the cause, and the action is tried anew in the superior court, etc., the superior court, on appeal on questions of both law and fact, has no jurisdiction to review an order of the justice denying a motion to dissolve a provisional attachment, executed when the action was begun, though the transmission of all the papers in the cause vests the superior court with jurisdiction of the attachment proceeding, incidental to the execution of the judgment which may be rendered in the principal action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 704; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

Application for a writ of mandate by Mrs. Samuel Nail against the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles and another. Writ denied.

William Lewis, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court, on an appeal from a justice's court taken on questions of both law and fact, to review an order of the justice denying petitioner's motion to dissolve a provisional attachment issued at the time the action was begun.

Waiving consideration of two matters which suggest themselves as having a probable bearing on the right of petitioner to the writ, but which are presented on the application, we think the petition should be denied on the points and authorities presented. The first of the two matters referred to as not considered in what is here said is the possibility that a showing upon all the record might disclose that the attachment had become merged in the execution, and thus rendered the question involved in the ruling upon the motion to dissolve the attachment a moot question, since, if the personal property attached were now held by the sheriff under an execution regularly entered, it might be urged that this court should not issue its extraordinary writ, when it would be idle and ineffective to accomplish the purpose stated on its face, even though it would enable one of the parties to gain some advantage in moving to tax costs. The second matter is that the refusal of the superior court to review the order dissolving the attachment should, for the purpose of sustaining the court's action, be regarded simply as a denial of the motion to dissolve.

Taking up the application as presented, and we find that petitioner, in support of her contention that the order of the justice may be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, even after final judgment in the appellate court, cites the cases of Griswold v. Sharpe, 2 Cal. 17, and Taafe v. Rosenthal, 7 Cal. 515. These cases, as well as that of Reiss v. Brady, 2 Cal. 132, to the same effect, were overruled in Allender v. Fritts, 24 Cal. 447. From the latter case it appears that the practice act, as then in force, contained no provision for an appeal from an order of the district court dissolving or refusing to dissolve an attachment, and it was sought to secure a review of such an order by the Supreme Court upon an appeal from the judgment, as well as to appeal from the order itself. Sawyer, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "This is not an appealable order within the meaning of those sections (Prac. Act, §§ 347, 336), and an appeal, therefore, cannot be taken from it directly as an order; and it is not an order 'involving the merits and necessarily affecting the judgment,' within the meaning of section 344. The attachment is merely a proceeding ancillary to the action, by which a party is enabled to acquire a lien for the security of his demand by a levy made before, instead of after, the entry of a judgment. * * * Neither the action nor the judgment, under our law, in any manner depends upon the attachment, although the attachment depends upon the action. The judgment in the case is precisely the same, whether the attachment is dissolved or not." It "is not in any respect affected by the attachment. We could neither reverse nor modify the final judgment in any particular in consequence of any error in the attachment proceedings. * * * It is a case for which the practice act has made no provision." The Allender Case is recognized as authority in Myers v. Mott, 29 Cal. 360, 363, 89 Am. Dec. 49, and Herman v. Paris, 81 Cal. 625, 22 Pac. 971; it being said in the latter case:

"The attachment papers in no way affected the validity of the judgment or order denying a new trial, and the questions in relation to them cannot be considered on the appeals taken." There was an appeal from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial in that case.

In line with this same distinction, Chief Justice Parker observes in Kittredge v. Warren, 14 N. H. 510, 530: "It [the attachment] is originated by the suit, and sustained by the suit, but is not part of it. It can only be made available through a judgment, but the judgment neither changes its nature nor determines its validity; nor does it operate to perfect the attachment. The judgment establishes the existence of the demand upon which the attachment is predicated, and the security taken; whereas, it was before only alleged, and presupposed for the purpose of the security." Notwithstanding an appeal be taken from its judgment, the trial court (if a court of record) has been held to still retain jurisdiction of the proceedings designated by our Code as provisional remedies, with power to take such steps therein as may be necessary to preserve the rights of the parties interested therein. Baughman v. Superior Ct., 72 Cal. 572, 14 Pac. 207; Havemeyer v. Superior Ct., 84 Cal. 382, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 289, 53 Pac. 797. So it is said in Elliott on Appellate Procedure that, while a general appeal brings up the whole case, the appellant is not necessarily entitled to have all the questions which the papers present reviewed. There is a clear and important distinction between bringing up questions, and presenting questions for review. A general appeal removes from the jurisdiction of the trial court all questions concluded by its judgment (section 544), but nothing else.

While we recognize the force of the reasoning upon which the decisions in Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 359, 33 Pac. 193, 35 Am. St. Rep. 176, Rossi v. Superior Court, 114 Cal. 371, 374, 46 Pac. 177, and Maxson v. Superior Court, 124 Cal. 468, 57 Pac. 379, are based, we are of opinion that the rule as to review of merely ancillary proceedings is the same on the appeal before us as if the appeal were from a judgment of the superior court. This appears to be borne out by the provisions of the Code in relation to appeals on questions of fact or law and fact. When an appeal is taken on questions of both law and fact, no statement is or need be prepared (Code Civ. Proc. § 976); but the justice certifies and transmits all the papers in the cause, including a copy of his docket, to the superior court (Code Civ. Proc. § 977), and the action is tried anew in that court. Section 980 provides, when this is done, the trial must be conducted in all respects as other trials in the superior court, and all the provisions as to trials in the superior court are made applicable.

and the judgment rendered on appeal has the same effect and is enforced in the same manner as if the action had been commenced in the superior court. Where the appeal is heard on a statement, the court is given power to review certain enumerated orders; but, where the statute provides for a new trial as a matter of right, no provisions are made for the review of either intermediate or subsequent orders or rulings. The principal action is, by the appeal, restored to the same position it occupied before the trial as to all matters leading to the judgment, and the superior court tries the case as if there had been no trial in the justice's court.

The attachment proceeding is not a part of every civil action. It is a provisional, independent proceeding initiated by the affidavit. Finch v. McVean, 6 Cal. App. 272, 91 Pac. 1019. The basis for the writ is the affidavit (Baldwin v. Napa Wine Co., 137 Cal. 649, 70 Pac. 732), and if the transmission of all the papers in a cause to the superior court on appeal be to vest that court with jurisdiction of an attachment proceeding pending in connection therewith, such jurisdiction is not for the purpose of reviewing the rulings of the justice court in connection with the attachment, but as incidental to the execution of the judgment which may be rendered in the principal action. No provision for a review is made by the statute, and whatever other action the superior court may be authorized to take in connection with the attachment proceedings before it by reason of an appeal on questions of both law and fact, in the absence of some statutory authorization to review the rulings of the justice court, we are of opinion that it has no jurisdiction to do so.

The writ, therefore, is denied.

ELIZALDE v. MURPHY et al. (Civ. 6S2.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
July 14, 1909. Rehearing Denied by
Supreme Court Sept. 10, 1909.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 45*)—
PROPERTY HELD BY DECEDENT IN TRUST—DUTY OF EXECUTOR.

While property held by a decedent in trust is not part of his estate, and cannot be applied in satisfaction of his debts, or be distributed to his heirs, and while the claimant of such property may sue therefor without presenting a claim, the administrator is not released from his duty to maintain the right of the estate to such property until it has been judicially determined that it does not belong to the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 296; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 528*)—
PROPERTY HELD BY DECEDENT IN TRUST—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

An administrator receiving a fund held by decedent in trust must account for it to his successor as part of the estate, and that he is also individually liable to the owner of the fund does not release his sureties from the primary obligation incurred by him as administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2378; Dec. Dig. § 528.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—QUESTIONS OF LAW AND FACT.

Negligence becomes a question of law only in the exceptional case, being generally a mixed question of law and fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 280; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—FORMER AP-PEAL—LAW OF CASE.

An inference of fact drawn on appeal does not become the law of the case on a subsequent appeal, where the facts from which the inference is to be drawn are different.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4358; Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 79*)—GROUNDS—FINDINGS OF COURT—OMISSION.

While an erroneous conclusion of law from the facts found is not a decision against law for which a new trial will be granted, such a matter being reviewable properly under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663 and 663½, by motion to vacate the judgment or by appeal from the judgment, yet, where a finding as to an essential fact is omitted, the remedy is by retrial of the issue of fact that the court may make a finding thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 165½; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*) — SPECIFICATION OF GROUNDS—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6, providing that a new trial may be granted for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, a specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment is insufficient on motion for a new trial; the decision of the court being found in its findings and not in the giving of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 261; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Eliza P. Elizalde, as administratrix of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, against P. W. Murphy and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff for less than the amount demanded, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial she appeals. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 87 Pac. 245.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. Louis Lamy, W. H. Spencer, and Wm. Shipsey, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. This is an action against the sureties on an administrator's bond, by his successor in office, to recover the balance found upon an accounting, to be due from said administrator to the estate of the deceased. Plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the amount of the judgment in favor of the estate, appeals from an order of the superior court denying her motion for a new trial. This is the second appeal taken by plaintiff based upon the alleged improper allowance by the trial court of items of credit on behalf of defendants.

On the former appeal (4 Cal. App. 117,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

87 Pac. 245) the judgment of the trial court was reversed because of the improper allowance of two items, then before the court, and a new trial ordered. Under the law of the case declared with respect to them, and the failure of respondent to appeal, these two items have passed out of consideration; but two other allowances made on the second trial are claimed by appellant to have been erroneous. One of these (hereinafter spoken of as the Dargie note) was considered by this court in connection with the findings of the trial court made, and the evidence given, upon the first trial, and it is contended by respondents that the decision of this court then rendered has become the "law of the case" as to that item also. On the new trial, in addition to the findings of formal facts necessary to the judgment, the execution of the undertaking, relations of the parties, etc., the trial court found that Ernest Graves, as administrator of the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, on the 28th day of May, 1898, filed the last account made by him of his administration of said estate, wherein he charged himself with the sum of $8,142 received, and credited himself with disbursements in the sum of $3,008.50; among the items going to make up the former amount being one as follows: "Money in hands of administrator as per decree of this court, August, 1897, $6,392." This account of Graves was, by an order of the superior court made July 9, 1898, settled and allowed, as filed, except that an additional allowance of $500 for attorney's fees was made. It is also found that after the filing of the account of May, 1898, said Graves collected the sum of $405 in rents, and the sum of $157.50 on account of the Dargie note, and paid out on account of disbursements on behalf of said estate the sum of $1,195; the latter sum including the $500 attorney's fees allowed. From this showing it appears that there is a balance due said estate from defendants of $4,501; whereas the judgment in favor of plaintiff is for only $3,501 and costs. The finding upon which the court based this reduction of the amount of the judgment is as follows: "Third. That the item of $6,392 contained in the account set forth in paragraph 10 of the complaint herein (the balance on hand from prior account above mentioned) includes the sum of $1,000, to wit, the $1,000 claimed by the defendants to be the property of one Francisco Elizalde, an incompetent person. That said $1,000 never belonged to Marcos A. Elizalde or the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde." This finding appellant contends is not supported by the evidence. It is further found, as to this item of $1,000: That the same was money held in trust by Marcos A. Elizalde for the benefit of one Francisco Elizalde, an incompetent person, which after the death of Marcos A. Elizalde came into the hands of said Graves, and was held by him in trust for the benefit of the incompetent and without prejudice to the right of said incompetent or his guardian to take any lawful means for the collection thereof; that an action was brought by said incompetent against Graves as administrator of the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, to recover the same, and the said action is still pending; that an appeal was taken from a judgment rendered therein, which is referred to as reported in 137 Cal. 634, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861, and from which it appears that a judgment rendered against plaintiff in this action as administrator, payable in "due course of administration," was reversed; that this action is still pending in the superior court of Santa Barbara county; that said Graves died pending the appeal; and that plaintiff herein was, on the death of said Ernest Graves, substituted as the defendant in said action. From the decision on appeal it appears that the substitution took place prior to the reversal of the former judgment, and the order made on the appeal is predicated in part at least upon the fact that the change of administrators would make some difference in the judgment that might be entered.

The evidence relating to the $1,000 item shows an acknowledgment in the account of C. A. Thompson, executor of the will of Marcos A. Elizalde, the probate of which was revoked, that he held that sum to be paid to the guardian of Francisco Elizalde, a report by him, accompanying said account, to the effect that the sum of $1,000 was held by Marcos A. Elizalde in his lifetime as trustee under the will of Maria Ignacia Elizalde for the benefit of the incompetent, an order settling said account and directing the executor to pay over to the special administrator of the estate (Ernest Graves) said sum, without prejudice to the right of the guardian of the incompetent to apply for an order directing said sum to be paid over to him by the special administrator, and that the money was received by Graves as special administrator, and retained by him as general administrator of the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased. In the reports accompanying three several annual accounts filed by Graves as administrator of the estate he reports that an action has been brought, or is pending, against the estate to recover the said sum, and in the order settling the last account filed by him is contained the recital that judgment had been obtained against him as administrator in favor of said incompetent for $2,109.50. It is stipulated that this judgment was reversed, and that the action has never been retried, but is still pending in the superior court. The effect of all this is merely to establish that $1,000 of the estate is in litigation. While, as was said in the department opinion in Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 634, 642, 66 Pac. 639, 70 Pac. 861, property held by a decedent in trust is not a part of his estate, and cannot be applied in satisfaction of his debts, or form a portion of his estate to be distributed to his heirs, and no presentation of a claim is required before the claimant of such trust property can maintain an action therefor, nevertheless the administrator of the estate is not released from his duty to maintain the right of the estate to such property until it has been finally judicially determined that it is not the property of the estate. In considering the question of the superior court having awarded interest on the judgment obtained by the incompetent against the administrator Graves, it is said in the opinion of the court in bank (137 Cal. 638, 70 Pac. 862): "The heirs or executors will take the trust property, and they must settle the accounts of the testator in relation to the trust. They must also see that the property is protected and preserved. Perry on Trusts (3d Ed.) § 344. It thus becomes the duty of the personal representative to preserve the trust fund, in common with the other funds which have come into his possession. * * * The reason is plain. It may often happen that a personal representative takes possession of funds which may be proved to be trust funds without any knowledge that such is the fact. Not knowing the fact, it would be his duty to resist, on behalf of the heirs, legatees, and creditors of the estate, any attempt to deprive it of a part of its assets; that is, he is bound to assume for this purpose that the trust fund constitutes a part of the assets of the estate."

If Graves, as administrator, had prevailed in the action brought by the incompetent, there is no question that the fund would have remained a part of the assets of the estate, and that defendants would have been responsible for its preservation by him. If Graves had lived and continued as administrator, and the action remained pending, as it does, it cannot be doubted that it would have been his duty, as administrator, on behalf of the estate, to continue to defend against the claim. Unquestionably he would have been administering the estate in respect to this fund. No distinction can be drawn between the right of the estate to this fund and its right to any other part of the estate which may have been in litigation when Graves died. If Marcos A. Elizalde was the trustee of the fund under an express trust, his estate was not relieved from liability for the $1,000 by his death. This liability of the estate did not change with the death of Graves, and if it be conceded, as respondent contends, that Graves also became individually liable to the incompetent, this would not release his sureties from the primary obligation incurred by Graves as administrator. To say that Graves was not liable as administrator is to say to the incompetent that his right to have the trust declared was lost by the death of Marcos A. Elizalde. Having received the fund into his possession by virtue of his office, Graves must account for it to his successor as part of the assets of the estate. This view renders it unnecessary to pass upon appellant's contention that defendants are estopped to deny that there is due to the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, from the defendants, the balance reported by Ernest Graves in his last account as settled and allowed by the probate court in its order of July 9, 1898, or by reason of the adjudication of the matter by this order.

While there is some doubt in our minds whether the matter of the Dargie note can properly be considered on the record before us, as the same questions presented in relation thereto must, or, at least, may, arise on the new trial required because of the error of the trial court in allowing the defendants credit for the $1,000 item, we will state our views of the law applicable. The points presented by appellant in regard to this note are: (1) That the finding of the court that Graves was not guilty of negligence in failing to collect this note is not supported by the evidence; and (2) that the findings show that Graves converted the Dargie note to his own use on April 4, 1894, when he took from Dargie notes in lieu thereof executed to Graves as an individual, and that the intention to appropriate is established by the findings as to Graves' further action in connection with the notes so made to him as an individual. No express finding of fact was made by the trial court as to whether or not Graves converted or appropriated the note. Neither does the finding relieving him from negligence clearly cover this matter. This finding is that "Graves, as such administrator, was not guilty of negligence in not collecting the amount due." There is an uncertainty in the context which renders it difficult to determine whether this finding relates to the amount due on the original note or on those given to Graves. Accepting it as relating to the original note, it was misconduct, rather than neglect, to take the notes in lieu thereof in his own name rather than to collect the note. Considered in connection with the notes "taken in lieu," it is apparent that when Graves invested the funds of the estate in his own name he created the relation between himself and the estate of debtor and creditor to the value of the property taken by him, and as between him and the estate it became unimportant whether he was negligent in collecting these three notes. He was liable to the estate for the property taken whether he collected these notes or not. There is no pretense that there was any necessity for his taking the notes in his individual capacity. There is no evidence that he ever reported the exchange to the court or asked its approval in the six years he lived after the transaction. He never mentioned the notes in any account or report filed by him, and the matter was not brought to the attention of the court until this action was tried. This brings the case directly in line with the facts in Matter of Bane, 120 Cal. 533, 538, 52 Pac. 853, 65 Am. St. Rep. 197. Upon the new trial there should be a finding of fact on the issue of the appropriation or conversion of the original note by Graves, as this is a mixed question of law and fact; so, also, in order that the court may determine whether or not the principal sum should bear interest, it is important that the trial court also make a finding of the good or bad faith of Graves in taking the notes in his own name, the latter finding being necessary to the determination of the right of the estate to interest, but having no application to the question of the conversion of the principal sum. Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 44 Pac. 182; Matter of Bane, supra, 120 Cal. 536, 52 Pac. 853, 65 Am. St. Rep. 197.

Respondents object to the consideration of this question on this appeal upon the grounds: (1) That the decision of this court on the former appeal has, as to the Dargie note, become the law of the case; (2) that the matter of appropriation and conversion as here presented is a question of law which cannot be considered on an appeal from an order denying a new trial; and (3) that there is no specification of insufficiency of evidence in the record which can be considered to cover the matter. Negligence becomes a question of law only in the exceptional case, and is generally a mixed question of law and fact, and we think what is said as to the Dargie note in the decision of this court on the former appeal is of the latter character. Without examining the record on that appeal, it appears from the opinion (4 Cal. App. 117, 87 Pac. 245) that the finding considered by this court was that "there was no negligence upon the part of the administrator in his failure to realize upon this asset," and what was said in the opinion in this regard was based chiefly upon evidence that Dargie was at all times insolvent; whereas, there is a finding in the record before us that Dargie was at all times solvent. The facts being dissimilar, it cannot be said the inference of fact drawn therefrom by the court on that appeal becomes the law of the case here. Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 Pac. 1000.

When considered solely as a deduction from the findings made by the trial court, the question of appropriation or conversion is, of course, a mere conclusion of law. While there are earlier cases cited as holding that an erroneous conclusion of law from the facts found is a decision against law for which a new trial has been granted, it is now held otherwise (Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 167, 73 Pac. 828); such a matter being said to be reviewable properly on a motion under sections 663 and 663½, Code Civ. Proc., or by appeal from the judgment. In the case at bar, as in the case cited (Kaiser v. Dalto), however, there was a failure to find upon an issue of fact. In that case this "decision against law" was not especially urged by appellant, while here it comes within one of the grounds mentioned in the motion for a new trial, and, though it receives but little attention in the brief, we think it proper for us to consider it. There is also the further distinction between the Dalto-Kaiser Case and that before us, that the finding there under consideration was not material to the judgment, while here the absence of such a finding precludes the appellant from successfully availing herself either of a motion under section 663, or an appeal from the judgment. The remedy for appellant here is by a retrial of an issue of fact that the court may make a finding thereon.

Under the distinction drawn in Swift v. Occidental M. Co., 141 Cal. 161, 166, 74 Pac. 700, 701, the "decision against law" here considered must be classified with those properly reviewable by a motion for a new trial. Says the chief justice, writing the opinion in that case: "An example of the first class (decisions against law reviewable by motion for a new trial) is where the trial court has failed to make any finding upon some material issue. The omitted fact being essential to the judgment, a new trial for the purpose of determining the issue is the appropriate remedy, and the refusal to grant it is reviewable on appeal from the order." This is not a case in which every material issue of fact has been decided in favor of the appellant, and in which, a new trial being clearly ineffective, the only remedy is by motion under section 663, or by appeal from the judgment. Sharp v. Bowie, 142 Cal. 462, 467, 76 Pac. 62, 66. Under such a state of the record, we think it proper for us to resolve such doubts as we have as to the proper practice in favor of a hearing of the question on its merits. This is rendered all the more necessary by the fact that there appears to be no specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision (findings) of the court under which the matter can be considered.

The third specification, which appears to be the one addressed to this matter, makes no reference to any finding, but is stated as follows: "That the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision of the court in giving the plaintiff judgment for the sum only of $3,501, without interest, as the evidence shows," etc. The "decision" of the court is found in its findings and not in the giving of the judgment. The ground of motion for a new trial based on the sufficiency of the evidence relates to the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the inferences of fact included in the verdict of the jury or "other decision"—that is, finding of fact—by the court, and a specification of insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment cannot be considered. Boston Tunnel Co. v. McKenzie, 67 Cal. 485, 8 Pac. 22; Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6. While the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court have receded from the strictness of the rule as to specifications declared in De Molera v. Martin, 120 Cal. 544, 52 Pac. 825, and now construe them liberally in favor of the right of the moving party to be heard (Swift v. Occidental M. Co., supra; American Type Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 461, 62 Pac. 744), it can hardly be said that the rule has been so relaxed as to include the specification before us as a specification of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision.

The order of the trial court is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the foregoing views.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; SHAW, J.

1. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—SUBJECTS—PROCEEDINGS OF COURTS—CONTEMPT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, providing that a writ of prohibition shall arrest the proceedings of any tribunal, etc., when such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal, prohibition will not lie to restrain a court from passing judgment of contempt where it did not appear that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in any respect.

2. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—GROUNDS—ADEQUACY OF REMEDY BY APPEAL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1103, providing that a writ of prohibition may be issued in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, prohibition will not lie to restrain a court from passing judgment in contempt proceedings on petitioners for violating an injunction; petitioners' remedy being by appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-19; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—GROUNDS—WANT OF JURISDICTION.

That the complaint in an action for an injunction was defective, and that there was a failure of proof of the violation of the injunction, did not show lack of jurisdiction in the court so that prohibition would lie to restrain it from punishing defendants in the action for contempt in violating the injunction.

Petition by Charles Lange and others for a writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of the State of California for the County of Solano and A. J. Buckles, Judge. Denied.

Morrissey & Jocks and Keogh & Olds, for petitioners. F. R. Devlin, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Petitioners are two of the defendants in an action pending in said superior court in which the Vallejo Ferry Company (a corporation) is plaintiff. In the complaint the said corporation, among other things, alleged: "That on the 18th day of March, 1896, the city of Vallejo by ordinance No. 132 of ordinances of said city [a copy of the ordinance being set out in the complaint], in consideration of the sum of $10,151.00 paid said city of Vallejo by one William Whitney, duly granted, sold, and conveyed to said William Whitney and to his assigns, the franchise, right, privilege, and authority to construct, keep, and take tolls upon a public ferry running between said city of Vallejo and the United States Navy Yard at Mare Island for the term of 20 years from said date, which said ordinance and grant of franchise has ever since March 18, 1896, been, and now is, in full force and effect. That on or about the 28th day of March, 1896, said William Whitney duly granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed said ferry franchise and all his rights under said franchise and ordinance to the Vallejo Ferry Company, plaintiff herein, and plaintiff ever since March 28, 1896, has been, and now is, the sole owner and holder of said ferry franchise and of all the rights and privileges granted to said William Whitney by said ordinance and by said city of Vallejo." Then follow the allegations that ever since said date the plaintiff by virtue of said franchise and ordinance has operated said ferry, and that said defendants, without any franchise or license, have for the past year established and conducted a ferry between said points and have carried passengers and freight contiguous to and within one mile of plaintiff's ferry, and that these acts of defendants have resulted in substantially diminishing plaintiff's business and the value of its franchise, and that defendants threaten to continue to maintain said ferry. The prayer was for an injunction and for damages. The complaint was verified.

Afterwards, on March 10, 1909, upon affidavits, an injunction pendente lite was issued commanding the defendants "to absolutely desist and refrain from running, operating, maintaining, or conducting a ferry or boats for the transportation of passengers, goods, or merchandise from the city of Vallejo or from any point within one mile of the ferry landing of said plaintiff without first obtaining a franchise or license therefor, until further order of this court." Thereafter, on the 5th day of April, 1909, the plaintiff filed an affidavit charging the defendants with a violation of said injunction and praying for an order directing that they show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt and punished therefor. The order was made, and it and the affidavit upon which said order was based were served upon said defendants. In pursuance thereof, and in response to said order, on April 9, 1909, the defendants appeared by counsel and filed their affidavits, and the matter was thereupon heard, and the defendants were found guilty of violating said injunction and were declared to be in contempt of said court and were ordered to appear on the 20th day of April for judgment and sentence. Thereupon application was made to this court for a writ of prohibition to restrain respondent from passing judgment upon said defendants or either of them. An alternative writ was issued, and upon the return thereof an answer was filed by respondent denying some of the allegations of the petition; but, as we understand it, there is no controversy between the parties as to the material facts, the difference being rather as to the legal conclusion to be drawn therefrom.

The application of petitioners for a peremptory writ should be denied for two reasons: First, it does not appear that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in any respect; and, second, petitioners had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law of which they should have availed themselves. Sections 1102 and 1103, Code Civ. Proc. It is evident from the recital already made of the allegations of the complaint that the superior court of Solano county had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the litigation. The action is admittedly one in equity, and the acts of which complaint is made were committed within the territorial limits of said county. If plaintiff had the franchise and was being deprived of the fruits of it, as alleged in the complaint, it cannot be and really is not disputed that the superior court of Solano county is the proper tribunal under the Code for the redress of plaintiff's grievance. Again, there is no question but that plaintiff complied with the requirement of the statute (section 527, Code Civ. Proc.) in obtaining the injunction. The sufficiency of the affidavit upon which the order was based is, indeed, not challenged, and it appears that proper service was made upon petitioners. The subsequent proceedings, also, culminating in the finding of the court that petitioners were guilty of contempt, were strictly in accord with the provisions of the law. The act complained of was "disobedience of a lawful order of court" and therefore punishable as a contempt. Section 1209, Code Civ. Proc. It was not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court or of the judge at chambers, and therefore an affidavit was presented, reciting the facts showing a disobedience of the said order. Petitioners filed counter affidavits raising an issue of fact which the court determined against them.

It thus appears from beginning to end that no element of jurisdiction is lacking, and therefore petitioners are mistaken in their remedy if they are entitled to any. Their argument, indeed, proceeds from a misconception of the meaning of "jurisdiction." They argue that jurisdiction is wanting because the complaint is defective and because there was a failure of proof of the violation of the injunction. Neither of these considerations is involved in the question before us. "Jurisdiction" is "authority to hear and determine a cause. Since jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, it does not depend upon the regularity of the exercise of that power or upon the rightfulness of the decisions there made." Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 17, p. 1041. In the matter of the Estate of James, 99 Cal. 376, 33 Pac. 1123, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60, it is said: "If the facts stated in the complaint are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded therein and awarded by the judgment, the action of the court in deciding otherwise and rendering its judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint can be nothing more than error. Head v. Daniels, 38 Kan. 1, 15 Pac. 911; Rowe v. Palmer, 29 Kan. 337; Frankfurth v. Anderson, 61 Wis. 107, 20 N. W. 662; Van Fleet's Collateral Attack, § 61. See, also, Blondeau v. Snyder, 95 Cal. 521, 31 Pac. 591." In Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 469, 75 Pac. 55, it is said: "Whether the complaint states a cause of action or not was for the court of original jurisdiction to determine, and it was within the province of such court to allow the pleading to be amended. If the court below should hold a complaint sufficient, when as a matter of law it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, such ruling would be erroneous; but nevertheless the court had jurisdiction. It had jurisdiction to determine the question and to determine it wrong as well as right. If it committed error, the remedy was by appeal." It is equally well settled that a wrong decision by a court as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support a finding cannot be questioned in this proceeding. Beaulieu Vineyard v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 250, 91 Pac. 1015; Wreden v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. 504. We deem it therefore unnecessary to discuss either the authority of the board of trustees of the city of Vallejo to grant the said franchise, as it involves simply a question of the sufficiency of the complaint, or the adequacy of the showing made as to the violation of the injunction by petitioners. Besides, as stated by counsel at the oral argument, the case was set for an early trial and the validity of said ordinance can be properly adjudicated in the regular way.

Again, if petitioners believed the trial court had improperly granted the injunction, they should have moved to have it dissolved, or should have appealed from the order granting it. The practice of violating such an order, taking the chances on a favorable decision by a higher court on application for a writ of prohibition when there is a remedy by appeal, should not be countenanced. The contention of petitioners would be entitled to greater consideration, indeed, if any effort had been made to secure a modification or dissolution of said injunction, or if petitioners upon a showing of great loss to themselves in case of its continued operation had applied for its suspension until the cause could be determined upon its merits. At any rate, they should not have courted the penalty for disobedience of a deliberate order of an important judicial tribunal but should have pursued the ordinary course. In Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 103, 27 Pac. 50, it is said: "Petitioners had the right to appeal from the order refusing to dissolve the attachment, and would have an appeal from any final judgment in the case; and such an appeal being a 'plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law' within the meaning of section 1103 of the Code of Civil Procedure," prohibition does not lie. A remedy does not fail to be speedy and adequate because by pursuing it through the 'ordinary course of law' more time would probably be consumed than in the proceeding here sought to be used; and it makes no difference that in this instance a question of jurisdiction incidentally depends upon the validity of an attachment. If that were so, then in every ordinary civil action, wherein a defendant chose to raise a point of jurisdiction, either of the person or of the subject-matter, he could by prohibition stop the ordinary progress of the action toward a judgment until this court had passed upon the intermediate question, and thus this tribunal would, in innumerable cases, be converted from an appellate to a nisi prius court." Therein is quoted with approval the rule as stated by High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 770, as follows: "Like all other extraordinary remedies, prohibition is to be resorted to only in cases where the usual and ordinary forms of remedy are insufficient to afford redress; and it is a principle of universal application, and one which lies at the very foundation of the law of prohibition, that the jurisdiction is strictly confined to cases where no other remedy exists; and it is always a sufficient reason for withholding the writ that the party aggrieved has another and complete remedy at law."

The order to show cause is therefore discharged, and the peremptory writ is denied.

CARTER v. FOX. (Civ. 672.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 21, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 16, 1909.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 186*) — CONTRACT—TIME OF ESSENCE.

Plaintiff and defendant agreed in writing for the sale of land, plaintiff to pay a sum in cash and the balance upon receipt of a deed conveying clear title, with certificate of title, which defendant covenanted to deliver on or before 90 days from the execution of the agreement, it being further agreed that plaintiff should pay the costs of the certificate, and that time should be of the essence of the agreement. Defendant did not convey within the required time, being unable to secure a certificate of title. Held that, as defendant's conveyance within the stipulated time was a condition precedent to plaintiff's covenant to pay the balance within that time, plaintiff was not in default for not paying the balance within 90 days.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 334*)—REMEDIES OF PURCHASER—DISAFFIRMANCE—RESTORATION OF BENEFITS.

Where plaintiff agreed to purchase land from defendant, and pay part cash and the balance within 90 days if defendant delivered to him a good deed within that time, which defendant covenanted to do, time being made of the essence, upon defendant's failure to convey within the agreed time, because of his inability to do so, plaintiff could disaffirm the contract and recover the cash payment; there being a total failure of consideration.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 339*)—REMEDIES OF PURCHASER—RESCISSION—RESTORATION OF BENEFITS—NECESSITY.

Where defendant breached his covenant to convey land to plaintiff free from incumbrances, with certificate of title, within a stipulated time, so that plaintiff received nothing under the contract, a formal rescission or the return of the nominal benefits received by plaintiff was not necessary to entitle him to sue for a payment made; there being a total failure of consideration.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 85*)—REMEDIES OF PURCHASER—"RESCISSION BY CONSENT."

Where the vendor was unable to convey good title within a stipulated time, as agreed, and plaintiff, instead of asserting his rights under the contract, acquiesced in defendant's repudiation thereof, and demanded the return of the purchase money paid, there was a rescission of the contract by consent of the parties within Civ. Code, § 1689, subdiv. 5, authorizing rescission by consent of the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by J. E. Carter against Edwin R. Fox. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to render judgment for plaintiff.

Chas. Silent and Frank J. Thomas, for appellant. Hutton & Williams, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On September 8, 1905, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract whereby defendant agreed to sell and convey to plaintiff, and the latter agreed to buy, certain real estate therein fully described. According to the terms of the contract, the consideration for the purchase was $10,000, payable as follows: $2,000 cash, upon the execution of the contract, and the balance of $8,000 upon the execution and delivery by defendant to plaintiff of a deed, conveying the title thereto, free and clear of all incumbrances.

ces, liens, etc., together with an unlimited certificate of title of the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles showing the title to the property to be vested in defendant free and clear of such incumbrances, which deed, duly acknowledged, so conveying said property, together with such certificate of title, defendant covenanted and agreed to deliver to plaintiff and place him in possession of the premises on or before ninety days from the date of the execution of the agreement. Plaintiff further agreed that at the time of making said payment of $8,000 he would also pay the charges of the Title Insurance & Trust Company for making said certificate of title. It was further stipulated that, if plaintiff failed to comply with the terms of the contract on his part, defendant should be released from all obligation to convey the property, and as to all acts and things to be done under the terms of said contract by either party thereto time was the essence of the agreement. Upon the execution of the agreement plaintiff paid to defendant the sum of $2,000 in accordance with the provisions thereof. Defendant did not deliver, or tender any deed of conveyance of, the property, whereupon, plaintiff brought this suit to recover the $2,000 paid upon the execution of the contract. Judgment went for defendant, from which plaintiff prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll, accompanied by bill of exceptions.

In addition to setting forth the terms of the contract, the payment of the $2,000 specified therein to be paid upon its execution, the neglect and failure of defendant to make conveyance of the property within 90 days, or at all, as he agreed to do, the complaint alleges: That on December 14, 1905, plaintiff tendered to defendant the balance of the purchase price of $8,000, together with the sum of $350, which was the charge of the Title Insurance & Trust Company for furnishing the certificate of title, and demanded of defendant that he comply with the terms of his contract, but defendant refused so to do; that neither at the time of making the contract, nor at any time thereafter, did defendant have title to the property therein described, and that at no time since the date of the execution thereof was he able to procure from said Title Insurance & Trust Company a certificate of title showing the title to the property to be vested in defendant, free and clear of incumbrance; that on December 20th plaintiff made demand upon defendant that he return and repay to plaintiff said sum of $2,000 so paid as a part of the purchase price of the property, but this defendant also declined to do—all of which allegations, other than the demand for the return of the $2,000, which is not denied, the court found to be true. The only allegations of the answer material to a consideration of the case are: That plaintiff did not within 90 days from the date of the execution of the contract make any tender to defendant of the balance of $8,000 due upon the purchase price thereof, or within said period perform or offer to perform the contract on his part. It is further alleged in the answer "that at no time has the said plaintiff ever rescinded the said agreement in writing, nor restored nor offered to restore to defendant anything of value which he, the plaintiff, has received from the defendant under the said contract, nor has the said plaintiff ever reconveyed or offered to reconvey to defendant any interest which he has under said contract in any part of the lands described in said contract, nor has the said plaintiff ever canceled or offered to cancel or discharge the said contract or the record thereof," which allegations of the answer the court found to be true. From these findings the court found as a conclusion of law that plaintiff was not entitled to recover. In arriving at this conclusion the court erred.

Respondent contends that as time was made the essence of the agreement, and, as plaintiff did not tender the balance due upon the purchase price, he was in default and hence could not, in the face of such default, maintain an action to rescind the contract and recover what he had paid on account of the purchase price of the property. It is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of this proposition. It may be conceded. An analysis of the contract, however, fails to disclose any covenant made on the part of plaintiff as to the performance or which he was in default. The sole obligation imposed upon him was to pay the $8,000 and the cost of the certificate of title, but these sums were not payable within 90 days from the date of the execution of the agreement, unless defendant performed his covenant to convey the property, as well as perform other conditions of the contract, all of which the court finds he failed to perform. As defendant had the full period of 90 days within which to comply with the terms of the agreement, he could not be in default, and plaintiff could have no right to complain, until the expiration of such period. Therefore, as payment of such balance was due from plaintiff only upon delivery of the deed conveying good title to the property, and this was not done, it follows that there was no default on the part of plaintiff and no covenant on his part contained in the contract as to which the provision that time was the essence of the contract could apply. Defendant having failed and refused to convey the property within the time specified and in accordance with his covenant, and as to which covenant time was expressly made the chief factor of importance, and plaintiff not being in default, the latter had a legal right to disaffirm and insist upon the repayment of the money which defendant had received on account of the proposed sale which defendant refused to consummate. Conceding, however, that plaintiff had such right, respondent insists that he was not entitled to recover by reason of the finding that plaintiff did not, prior to bringing his suit, rescind the contract and return what he had received of value from defendant, nor cancel or offer to cancel the contract. This appears to have been the theory upon which the learned trial judge disposed of the case.

A formal rescission was not a prerequisite to plaintiff's right to recover. The action is not based upon the contract, but is a suit to recover money paid where there has been a total failure of consideration. All that plaintiff received from defendant was a covenant to convey, within a specified period, certain lands free and clear of incumbrance, together with the delivery of a certificate of title, of a designated title and insurance company showing title to such lands to be vested in defendant, who was to place plaintiff in possession thereof, as to all of which covenants the complaint alleged, and the court found, defendant was at the time of the execution of the contract, as well as at the time of the trial, wholly unable to perform. Plaintiff therefore received nothing of value from defendant, and hence there was nothing to restore. "It was not necessary to return or offer to restore the contract as a condition precedent to the right to recover the money paid. The defendant's conduct was, in effect, a positive refusal under any circumstances to return the money already received, and this positive refusal relieved the other parties from the necessity of offering to return or cancel the contract prior to beginning the action." McDonald v. Pacific Debenture Co., 146 Cal. 668, 80 Pac. 1090. In Russ Lumber & Mill Co. v. Land & Water Co., 120 Cal. 521, 527, 52 Pac. 995, 997 (65 Am. St. Rep. 186), it is said: "Practically there is no difference in the effect upon the contract between the successful defense of a plea of want or total failure of consideration and the successful termination of an action to rescind it. In either case the contract is rendered incapable of enforcement, the judgment being a bar to any future action, so far at least as parties to the action, or those concluded by it, are concerned. Where the failure of consideration is total, as where nothing of value has been received by the defendant under it and the plaintiff cannot perform it, no notice of rescission is required, but the defendant may plead want or failure of consideration." In discussing a similar question in the case of Richter v. Union Land, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 373, 62 Pac. 40, the court expresses itself as follows: "Nor where the failure of the consideration is total—which implies, of course, that nothing of value has been received under the contract by the party seeking to rescind—is it necessary that a formal rescission be made before bringing suit. In such cases a suit may always be maintained for the recovery of the consideration paid. [Citing cases]. Practically there is no difference in the effect upon the contract between the successful defense of a plea of a want or total failure of consideration (or, it may be added, an action to recover back the money paid on a contract of which the consideration has wholly failed), and the successful termination of an action to rescind it. In either case the contract is rendered incapable of enforcement; the judgment being a bar to any future action." In the case of Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 10, 55 Pac. 716, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, the court in discussing the remedies for a breach of contract upon the part of the vendor says: "Treating the vendor's breach as an abandonment, he (the vendee) may himself abandon it, when, the contract having thus come to an end, he may sue at law to recover what he has paid, in an action for money had and received; for, the contract being at an end, the vendor holds money of the vendee to which he has no right, and to repay which, therefore, the law implies his promise." See, also, Chatfield v. Williams, 85 Cal. 518, 24 Pac. 839; Duncanson v. Walton, 111 Cal. 516, 44 Pac. 174; Hooe v. O'Callaghan (Cal. App.) 103 Pac. 175.

Moreover, we are of the opinion that the facts alleged in the complaint and admitted or found by the court to be true constituted a rescission under subdivision 5 of section 1689 of the Civil Code. When defendant refused to perform the covenants of the contract on his part, and plaintiff, instead of asserting his rights thereunder, acquiesced in and assented to such repudiation and demanded the return of the money paid, such facts were sufficient to constitute a rescission of the contract by consent of the parties.

It therefore follows from what has been said that the finding of the court as to want of rescission on the part of plaintiff as well as the fact that plaintiff within 90 days following the execution of the contract made no tender of the balance of the purchase price are facts wholly immaterial, and do not affect plaintiff's right to recover upon the findings herein. Under the circumstances disclosed by the record, it would be grossly unjust and inequitable to permit defendant to retain the money so received, particularly in view of the fact that he has not parted with anything of value constituting a consideration for the $2,000, and could not compel specific performance against plaintiff on account of being unable to comply with his part of the contract. "In such a case there is a complete failure of the consideration, and the vendor has no more right to keep the purchaser's money than he would have to compel specific performance of the contract." Mauvin on Merchantable Title to Real Estate, § 238a.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to render judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

One purchasing an interest in land from a defendant in an action for the land because of defendant's fraud, after defendant's default and the recordation of the lis pendens, takes title with notice and may not intervene in the absence of an effort on his part or on the part of defendant to excuse and open the default.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Isaac N. Martin and others against James W. Lawrence, Jr., and others, in which Ocean Park Bank intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order dismissing the complaint of the intervenor and vacating the order granting leave to intervene, defendant James W. Lawrence, Jr., and the intervenor, appeal. Affirmed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, for appellants. R. Y. Williams, Works, Lee & Works, and Smith, Miller & Phelps, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The complaint charged: That the California Fruit Growers' Association was a corporation organized for the purpose of carrying on fraudulent transactions and swindling operations; that through its officers it induced plaintiffs to convey to it certain of their lands under contracts and agreements, whereby in turn the corporation would at the end of five years convey to plaintiffs other lands which in the meantime they would plant to oranges, nurture, and care for. It is alleged: That all the plaintiffs received for the lands which they deeded to the corporation were executory contracts to this effect; that the terms and representations were made to deceive and without any intention upon the part of the corporation to fulfill them; that they did not own the lands; and that the contracts were worthless. Defendant James W. Lawrence was impleaded as having been a participant in these frauds, and it was further alleged that he had taken a conveyance of the legal title to plaintiff's lands from the Fruit Growers' Association without consideration and with full knowledge of all the fraudulent transactions. Notice of the pendency of the action was recorded at its commencement. The California Fruit Growers' Association and defendant Lawrence both suffered default. Subsequently the Ocean Park Bank, a corporation, upon ex parte application and without calling to the notice of the court the fact that defendant Lawrence was in default, obtained permission to intervene. The complaint in intervention alleged that the California Fruit Growers' Association was indebted to the Commercial Bank of Ocean Park in the sum of $1,500, and that as security for this indebtedness it made a deed absolute in form to Lawrence, and that, subsequent to the commencement of this action and to the recording of the lis pendens, the Ocean Park Bank had acquired the note evidencing the indebtedness, and Lawrence had made and executed to it his deed to the land in controversy as security therefor. Thereafter plaintiff moved to set aside the order granting the Ocean Park Bank leave to intervene and to dismiss the complaint in intervention. The motion came on regularly for hearing, and all the foregoing facts being made to appear to the court, and it being further established without controversy that there was no attempt on the part of Lawrence, or his successor in interest, the intervenor, to defend the action upon its merits, and that the intervenor had become the successor of Lawrence after recordation of the lis pendens and after entry of Lawrence's default, the court dismissed the complaint in intervention and vacated the order granting leave to intervene. At the conclusion of these matters a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs under stipulation of the remaining parties to the controversy. From this judgment and from the order dismissing the intervenor's complaint and vacating the order granting leave to intervene, Lawrence and the Ocean Park Bank prosecute their appeal.

Upon the appeal it is contended that it was error for the court to strike out the complaint in intervention, and that plaintiff's complaint fails to set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Respondent objects to a consideration of the bill of exceptions offered in support of the appeal on the first proposition upon the ground that it was not prepared in time. We waive the consideration of this question for the reason that the court's order under the circumstances was correct: First, because the intervenor's claim upon the land admittedly comes through Lawrence, an original defendant in the action, and was acquired after Lawrence's default and after the recordation of the lis pendens. Lawrence, by his default, having admitted the fraudulent charges preferred against him, was entitled to take nothing and had no valid claim upon or interest in the property. His successor, the intervenor, taking its title with notice and after the default of Lawrence, with no effort upon the part of either to excuse and open the default, was not entitled to be heard in the action. The case here presented is much stronger than that of Hibernia, etc., v. Churchill, 128 Cal. 633, 61 Pac. 278, 79 Am. St. Rep. 73, where the action of the court in dismissing a complaint in intervention, as was here done, is upheld.

It is contended that the complaint is obnoxious to a general demurrer. The right of the defaulting defendant Lawrence to urge this matter upon this appeal from the judgment is, of course, assured. Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 29, 41 Pac. 24. The complaint is sufficient against general demurrer. It alleged that the corporation and its officers represented and promised that they would set out the land to be exchanged, to oranges, and would care for it for five years, and would then convey it to plaintiffs with a five year old orange grove growing thereon. It is alleged that the defendants had not only failed to carry out each and every provision of the contract, but that they "never at any time intended to carry out any of the provisions of the contract." Where a defendant makes a promise touching a substantive part of the consideration moving to the plaintiff, in bad faith and without intent to perform the promise, it constitutes a species of fraud well recognized in equity and in terms denounced by the Code. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; Langley v. Rodriguez, 122 Cal. 580, 55 Pac. 406, 68 Am. St. Rep. 70; Becker v. Schwerdtle, 141 Cal. 386, 74 Pac. 1029; Montgomery v. McLaury, 143 Cal. 83, 76 Pac. 964.

It further alleged that the defendants did not own the land which they agreed to exchange, had taken no steps to acquire the same, and had done nothing toward the improvement of it, and that the contracts which plaintiffs received from the California Fruit Growers' Association were absolutely worthless. In seeking a rescission the Code requires an offer of restoration of anything of value which the plaintiff may have received (Civ. Code, § 1691); but, where it is asserted that no consideration has passed and, as here, that the purported contracts are absolutely worthless, an offer to restore becomes unnecessary. Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797; California Farm & Fruit Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 732, 91 Pac. 593.

The court properly found that the Ocean Park Bank was the successor in interest of the defendant Lawrence, and no just complaint can be predicated upon this finding. It appears that three months elapsed after discovery of the fraud by plaintiffs before the commencement of their action. This, under the circumstances, was not an unreasonable delay.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

The filing of a map showing a subdivision of land into lots and blocks, followed by a sale of lots as designated on the map, constitutes an offer to dedicate the spaces marked thereon as streets.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against John McCollum and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Elizabeth L. Kenney and Charles L. Batcheller, for appellants. Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty. (Hass, Garrett & Dunnigan, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action by the city of Los Angeles to recover possession of a parcel of land claimed to be part of a public street. Judgment went for plaintiff, and four of the defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The court finds that on June 27, 1884, the defendant Elmira Hall, then the owner of a tract of land including the parcel in controversy, caused to be recorded a plat or map, in which said tract was divided into lots and blocks, and streets were laid out in connection with the plat for the use of prospective purchasers of said lots and blocks. By such recording, she offered to dedicate as public highways of the city of Los Angeles the streets shown upon the map. The strip of land in controversy was shown upon the map as a public street, and formed a continuation or extension of Johnston street, a then public and accepted street of the city. The street was thereupon opened for public travel, and remained so until August, 1894. In December, 1890, the city council, by ordinance, accepted said street so offered to be dedicated as a public street. The offer to dedicate was never withdrawn or rescinded prior to August, 1904. The appellants attack, as unsupported by the evidence, the findings that there was an offer to dedicate, and that such offer, if any was made, was not revoked prior to acceptance. We think the evidence fully sustains each of these findings. The questions presented can be best explained by a reproduction of the essential features of the map filed by Mrs. Hall in June, 1884:

The land in controversy is the undesignated strip, 94 links in width, running along the westerly line of lot 21. That this strip, south of its intersection with "Hall street," as shown on the map, was and is a public street, known as "Johnston street," is not disputed by appellants; but they contend that no street was created north of Hall street. It seems perfectly clear that the court was at least authorized, if not bound, to conclude, from a mere inspection of the map itself, that its filing constituted an offer to dedicate, as a public street, the whole of the strip bordering on lots 1 and 21. Dedication is, in each case, a question of intention. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 643; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 541. The filing of a map showing a subdivision of land into lots and blocks, followed by a sale of lots as designated on the map, constitutes an offer to dedicate to public use the spaces marked thereon as streets. Logan v. Rose, 88 Cal. 263, 26 Pac. 106. We have no doubt that this map did mark the disputed strip as a street. It is true that it is not, on the face of the map, described or named as a street. On the other hand, it is not numbered as a lot, nor is it, by lines, cut off from the adjoining streets and bounded, as are the lots shown on the plat. It joins Hall street, and, so far as the map shows, furnishes the only means of access to Hall street, and through it to the numbered lots of the subdivision. There is nothing to indicate any distinction or demarcation between the part of the strip north and that south of the northerly line of Hall street; the latter, as we have said, being concededly a public street. As against all this, the fact that the strip is not named or designated as a street does not overcome the inference that it was intended to mark a street or public highway. San Francisco v. Burr, 108 Cal. 460, 41 Pac. 482; London & S. F. Bank v. City of Oakland, 90 Fed. 691, 33 C. C. A. 237; Rowan v. Town of Portland, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 232, 246; Hanson v. Eastman, 21 Minn. 509; Elliott, Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) § 119. Nor is any force to be attributed to the circumstance that the northerly end of the strip was cut off by a dotted line. In each of the cases last cited, the land held to be dedicated constituted a cul-de-sac.

Where rights of individuals have not intervened, an offer to dedicate may be revoked before acceptance by the proper public authorities. Prescott v. Edwards, 117 Cal. 298, 49 Pac. 178, 59 Am. St. Rep. 186; Los Angeles v. Kysor, 125 Cal. 463, 58 Pac. 90. Here, however, the offer was duly accepted by ordinance of the city council, accepting in general terms all streets, parks, etc., theretofore offered to the public for dedication. This was a sufficient acceptance. City of Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623, 22 Pac. 928, 23 Pac. 1085. On the question of revocation before acceptance, the most that can be said in support of appellants' position is that the evidence was conflicting. There was testimony tending to show that the strip in question had never been used as a road, that natural conditions were such as to preclude such use, and that the defendant Hall had at all times kept it fenced at both ends, had a house standing upon it, and had exercised acts of ownership in consistent with the existence of a public right of way. But, if these circumstances evidenced a revocation of the offer to dedicate, they were met by testimony showing that parties having occasion to reach the land beyond the strip did use it as a passageway from time to time, and that the southern end of the strip was not closed until after the passage of the ordinance of acceptance. This testimony supports the finding that there had been no revocation prior to acceptance.

A point is made on the refusal of the court below to permit Mrs. Hall to testify that she had not intended to dedicate the alleged street. The position of the appellants is that, inasmuch as the ultimate question, in cases of dedication, is one of intention, the party may be asked to state his intention in performing the acts relied on as evidencing a dedication. Such testimony has, in cases of this character, been held to be admissible for the purpose of throwing light upon the real nature of acts which were in themselves consistent with the intent to dedicate or not to dedicate. Bidinger v. Bishop, 76 Ind. 244; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Noftsger, 148 Ind. 101, 47 N. E. 332; Goodfellow v. Riggs, 88 Iowa, 540, 55 N. W. 319; City of Chicago v. Chicago, R. I., etc., Ry. Co., 152 Ill. 561, 38 N. E. 768. In Helm v. McClure, 107 Cal. 199, 40 Pac. 437, this court said that the testimony of the alleged dedicatory that he had had no intention to dedicate "was relevant, but not conclusive, evidence of his actual purpose." On the other hand, the rule that the party may give testimony of his actual intent should, we think, be limited to cases where the acts done by him do not manifestly indicate an intent to dedicate. Where they are inconsistent with anything but such intent, he cannot destroy the effect of his own conduct by subsequent declarations that he did not mean to be bound by the necessary import of that conduct. No weight should be given to declarations of an intent contrary to that plainly shown by acts done and acted on long before. "The intention to which courts give heed is not an intention hidden in the mind of the landowner, but an intention manifested by his acts. It is the intention which finds expression in conduct, and not that which is secreted in the heart of the owner, that the law regards." Indianapolis v. Kingsbury, 101 Ind. 201, 213, 51 Am. Rep. 749; Fossion v. Landry, 123 Ind. 136, 24 N. E. 96. See, also, Morgan v. Railroad Co., 96 U. S. 716, 24 L. Ed. 743; 4 Wig. Ev. § 2413, note. In accordance with these views, this court has held it proper to exclude evidence of the unexpressed intention of the landowner, where her acts and deeds plainly indicated that she intended to dedicate, and did dedicate, a street to public use. Brown v. Stark, 83 Cal. 636, 24 Pac. 162. What we have already said concerning the map filed by Mrs. Hall will be sufficient to make clear our reasons for holding, as we do hold, that the paper itself, taken in connection with the fact that it was made and filed as the basis for sales of lots delineated thereon, so clearly manifested an intent to offer the strip in question for dedication that the court was fully justified in excluding Mrs. Hall's offer to prove by her own statement that she had a contrary intent. In any view, the exclusion of the proffered testimony, if erroneous, was without prejudice, as her statement would have been entitled to no weight as against her prior unequivocal acts.

It is also urged that the court erred in striking out some of Mrs. Hall's testimony with reference to the preparation of the map. The court's ruling went no further than to strike out her testimony that she had instructed her surveyor to leave a street from Griffin avenue, and that she did not intend to leave Johnston street open beyond the north line of Avenue Twenty-Eight, or to have a line drawn across the space marked "Proposed Street." If she was entitled to show that she was ignorant of the real condition of the map when it was filed, any testimony which she may have given tending to show such ignorance was allowed to stand. Her instructions to her surveyor were mere hearsay. The exclusion of her testimony as to what she intended the map to represent was correct, for reasons already stated.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by W. N. Sarver against the County of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. P. Adams and J. W. McKinley, for appellant. Scarborough & Bowen, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff, a taxpayer of the county of Los Angeles, sought by his action an injunction to restrain the supervisors of the county from entering into a contract for the construction of certain steel cells within the county jail. The substance of his complaint is that the county advertised for bids for the work to be performed, as it was required to do under section 4041, subd. 8, of the Political Code (St. 1907, p. 368, c. 282). This section, in empowering boards of supervisors "to cause to be erected, or rebuilt, or furnished, a courthouse, jail, hospital, and such other public buildings as may be necessary," prescribes that in so doing they shall advertise for bids and let the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, and shall erect or construct "none of the aforesaid buildings * * * until the plans and specifications have been made therefor and adopted by the board." It is charged that bids were duly advertised for pursuant to the plans adopted, and that upon the opening of the bids the board of supervisors arbitrarily and in defiance of law refused to award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, but announced its intention to award the contract to the Pauly Jail Building Company, whose bid was over $6,000 in excess of that of the lowest responsible bidder. The board of supervisors made answer: That, while they had adopted general plans and specifications for the proposed work, still from its nature it was impossible to formulate complete plans and specifications, and this because of the different kinds of material which could be employed, of the varying advantages or disadvantages in patented locking devices, and for many other like reasons not necessary here to set forth in detail; that the character of the work was therefore such as called for the exercise of discretion upon the part of the board in awarding the contract; and that in the exercise of this discretion and for the benefit of the county and its taxpayers it was decided to award the contract to the Pauly Jail Building Company. Upon the filing of this answer plaintiff moved for and obtained a judgment upon the pleadings, and defendants appeal.

The question presented upon appeal is whether the work for which bids were received was of a character which made it compulsory upon the board to award the contract, based upon plans and specifications previously adopted, to the lowest responsible bidder, or whether, as appellants contend, from the nature of the work, it was impossible so to do, and the board was at liberty therefore, and, indeed, that it became its duty, to exercise a judgment in the matter. There can be no doubt but that, depending upon their mode of construction, cells in a common jail may either be a part of the structure, or they may be, as here, steel tanks or cages erected within, but quite independent of, the jail building. When such is the case, these cells become a part of the modern jail furnishings. Pauly Jail Bldg. & Mfg. Co. v. Com'rs, etc., 68 Fed. 171, 15 C. C. A. 351. In the erection or reconstruction of a public building the statute contemplates very properly that the contract shall be let, and the work performed, under plans and specifications previously adopted; but there is no such requirement in the case of furnishing a public building. The law does not say that no furnishings shall be purchased except under adopted plans and specifications. It says "none of the aforesaid buildings shall be erected" except under such adopted plans, and the reason is quite apparent. In the matter of furnishings, something, from the necessities of the case, must be left to the sound judgment and honest discretion of the board of supervisors. Desks, chairs, book shelves, carpets, light fixtures, etc., are of different prices and quality. Many of such articles are manufactured under patents and could be procured but from one source. It would be practically impossible to call for the furnishing of a building under preadopted plans and specifications adequate to exclude the necessary play of discretion and judgment, and, as we have said, the law has not undertaken so to hamper the boards of supervisors in the performance of this important duty. In the case at bar it may well be, as the appellants plead, that, notwithstanding the Pauly Jail Building Company's bid was higher in terms of money, it was still the lowest and the best in consideration of the quality of work, of material to be used, and of patented devices to be employed. That such patented devices may be considered, and, indeed, called for by the board of supervisors, is well settled. Nicolson Pavement Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699; Dunne v. Altschul, 57 Cal. 474.

We have not been favored with a brief by respondent upon the matter; but from appellants' brief we gather that reliance was placed in the lower court upon the case of Ertle v. Leary, 114 Cal. 238, 46 Pac. 1. The case is not at all in point, as will be seen from the following quotations: "The jail in this case is a new edifice, and we agree with plaintiff that the cells are an integral part of the same—not 'furniture' merely, as said by appellants. In the contract the structures to be completed and delivered by Van Dorn are themselves called 'the jail,' and they probably are the most essential part of the prison. They are therefore within the statute prohibiting the board from causing the same to be constructed until plans, etc., have been made and adopted." Such is not the condition here presented. The Los Angeles jail is an existing building with a number of such cells erected therein, and the call in this contract is for the taking into the building steel and other proper material and therein constructing another tier of tanks or cages.

Still further it is said in Ertle v. Leary. "To permit each bidder to propose the plans and specifications according to which he will construct the building not only prevents competition in bidding for the work, but gives to the board an opportunity for the exercise of favoritism in awarding the contract, instead of being required to let it to the lowest responsible bidder, for, since neither of the bidders can know of the plans and specifications under which others are making their bids, there is no standard by which the board can determine which is the lowest bidder." This language, directed as it is and as it declares, to the construction of the "building," is manifestly just and proper; but it has no application to the case of "furnishings" concerning which, as has been shown, the law, from the nature of the thing to be done, requires no preadopted plan.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to defendants' answer and proceed with the trial upon the merits.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 651*)—STREETS—NAMES.

A map of a subdivision of a block was recorded, with a street thereon designated as O. street. The city council thereafter accepted as public streets all streets which had been dedicated as public streets. Held, O. street thus legally became the name of the street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 651*)—STREETS—CHANGE OF NAME.

After O. street became the legal name of a street to the extent of the map of a subdivision filed by S., a map was filed by D. adopting the subdivision into lots in the S. map, and continuing the subdivision on to adjoining lands not in the S. map; O. street, however, being named on the D. map D. street. Held, that such filing of the D. map could not legally change the name of O. street, whatever might be its effect as to the name of the street fronting on the lots actually owned by D., so that a subsequent ordinance changing the name of D. street to S. street did not change the name of O. street within the map of S.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 444*)—STREET IMPROVEMENT—RESOLUTION OF INTENTION—NOTICE.

An ordinance, giving notice of intention to improve "S." street, could not give notice to owners of lots on "O." street, at least where they did not know of an attempt to change the name of "O." street to "S." street; and so because of such defect in the ordinance their lands could not be charged with a lien for the street work.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by E. C. Peck against O. A. Stassforth and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Sherer and Edward Winterer, for appellant. Shankland & Chandler, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. The complaint shows that the city council passed its ordinance of intention for the grading, graveling, curbing, etc., of "Savannah" street. All subsequent proceedings were directed to these improvements upon Savannah street between Fourth and Second streets. Defendants are the owners of certain lots fronting on Savannah street, if such be that street's true name. If such be not its true name, then the resolution of intention and all subsequent proceedings fail to charge the defendants with notice of the proposed work. The court found that Savannah street was not the legal name of the street fronting upon defendants' property, but that the true name was Otto street, and judgment properly passed for defendants accordingly. The facts upon which this finding is based are without conflict. In 1886 the defendants filed for record a map of their subdivision of a portion of Workman & Hellman's subdivision of block 73, Hancock's survey of the city of Los Angeles. That map showed lots from 4 to 11, inclusive, upon one side of a street designated as "Otto street." In 1890 the city council of Los Angeles adopted an omnibus ordinance accepting as public streets, alleys, and parks all such streets, alleys, and parks which had been dedicated or which had been offered for dedication. Thus legally Otto street became the name of the street upon which these lots fronted. Subsequently, in 1894, another map was filed, which was "Davin & Jullien's subdivision" of part of lots 6 and 7, block 73, Hancock's survey. This map also was duly recorded. It adopted the subdivisions into lots made in the earlier Stassforth & Hellman map, and continued the subdivisions on to adjoining lands not embraced in the Stassforth & Hellman map. Upon the Davin & Jullien map, Otto street was named "Davin street." In 1897 the city council adopted an ordinance changing the name of Davin street to Savannah street. The court held, and properly, that by the resolution of 1890 Otto street became the official name of the street in question, at least to the length and extent of the plat of Stassforth & Hellman, showing lots presumptively owned by them. The subsequent filing of the Davin & Jullien map, readopting the plat of the Stassforth & Hellman lots, but changing the name of Otto street to Davin street, could not legally operate to change that name, whatever may have been its effect as to the name of the street fronting upon the lands which Davin & Jullien actually owned. Notice of intention to improve Savannah street could not therefore carry notice to the property owners upon Otto street. Moreover, these defendants deny any actual knowledge of the attempted change in the name of the street upon which their lots fronted. The conclusion of the court, thus properly reached, necessarily rendered void the attempted lien upon defendants' property.

The defendants' answer did not deny the ownership of the land in the complaint described, but raised the issue above considered. The complaint described the land as being lots 4 and 5 of the Davin & Jullien subdivision. Lots 4 and 5 could be identified from the Davin & Jullien subdivision, and it was not incumbent therefore upon the defendants to deny ownership of this land. What they did deny, and what they sought to show, and conclusively did show, was that, by reason of the defect in the resolution of intention above pointed out, their lands could not be charged with a lien for the street work.

Under the views above expressed, no other points call for consideration, and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

water rights. At the same time they executed a contract, reciting execution of the deed and mortgage, pendency of the suit, desire of defendant to sell the land, and desire of plaintiffs to buy it, if right to use the water could be established, providing that the deed should be delivered absolutely, and defendants should receive the notes and mortgage, both subject to the further provisions of the contract: That payment of notes and interest should be suspended while any injunction against use of the water was in force, provided that such suspension should not extend more than 5 years, and that time for full payment of the notes should not be extended more than 10 years, beyond the date of the contract; that during such period of extension plaintiffs should pay an annual rental of $800, less taxes; that plaintiffs should at their own cost prosecute the defense of the suit to final judgment by the Supreme Court; that defendant would waive no rights in the suit; that, if plaintiffs made any compromise or waiver of rights therein, the notes and mortgage should be absolutely enforceable, and payable at the times therein provided; that, if it should be adjudged that the land was not entitled to water from the river, then plaintiffs "shall" reconvey the land to defendant, and defendant shall satisfy the mortgage and secured debt; that plaintiffs may "at any time" obtain releases of the mortgage as to lots of not less than 100 acres on payment of a certain amount per acre; and that, if it be adjudged that the land was entitled to the water rights, the notes and mortgage should be enforceable. Held, that the contract did not require, but merely allowed, plaintiffs to reconvey the land, and have the debt satisfied, if it was decreed that the land was not entitled to the water right.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by C. H. Fuller and others against Fred J. Smith. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and remanded.

E. W. Freeman and Freeman, Summerlin & Laughlin, for appellants. John G. North, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment entered on the pleadings on motion of and in favor of defendant. The action was one to obtain a decree declaring the amount due on certain notes executed by C. H. Fuller to defendant, the payment of which notes was secured by a mortgage on certain lands alleged to have been conveyed by defendant to him, and requiring defendant upon the payment of such amount within the time to be fixed by the decree to deliver up said notes and mortgage with a release of the mortgage executed and acknowledged so that it could be recorded. The plaintiffs other than C. H. Fuller were his partners and interested with him in the transaction; but the legal title was taken in the name of C. H. Fuller. In all the matters referred to herein, C. H. Fuller acted in his individual name, but for himself and his coplaintiffs, and they were at all times equally interested with him therein. On November 4, 1907, C. H. Fuller executed and delivered to his coplaintiffs a deed of conveyance, conveying to each an undivided one-third of the property. Defendant's claim is that, under the terms of the agreement between the parties, by reason of certain facts alleged in his cross-complaint, and either not denied or expressly shown by the allegations of plaintiffs' answer thereto, defendant is entitled to a reconveyance from plaintiffs of all the land described in his deed to C. H. Fuller, upon the delivery up by him of said notes and mortgage. No part of the principal sum evidenced and secured thereby has been paid. The trial court adopted this theory of defendant, and its judgment requiring such reconveyance was necessarily based thereon. If this theory be not supported by the admitted facts shown by the pleadings, it is manifest that the judgment in favor of defendant must be reversed, for admittedly plaintiffs' complaint states facts warranting the relief sought by them, unless they are without the right to retain the land, paying the amount due therefor. In view of our conclusion as to the true intent and meaning of the written agreement made by C. H. Fuller and Smith at the time of the execution of the deed, notes, and mortgage, it will be necessary to consider but one of the many propositions suggested in the briefs of counsel.

The land in question consisted of several parcels containing in the aggregate 800 acres, being a portion of the Jurupa ranch in Riverside county. On May 31, 1900, they were, and had been for a long time in the possession of plaintiffs under a lease from Smith, at a rental of $800 per annum less taxes. The fair and reasonable value of said land at such time did not exceed $40,000, and was alleged by plaintiffs to be only $25,000. At that time plaintiffs had already constructed a canal to convey water from the Santa Ana river to and upon these lands so leased by them from Smith, and also upon other lands in the same vicinity owned by them, claiming that all of such lands were riparian to such river. There had then been commenced and was pending in the superior court of Riverside county an action, being case No. 2,148 therein, in which the Anaheim Union Water Company and the Santa Ana Valley Irrigation Company were plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs herein and Smith were defendants, the object of which action was to obtain a decree perpetually restraining the defendants from diverting by means of said ditch, or by any other means, the waters of said Santa Ana river to or upon any portion of a 400-acre tract of the Smith land so leased to plaintiffs, or a 900-acre tract in which plaintiffs were interested as owners; the theory of the plaintiffs therein being that said lands were not riparian to the said Santa Ana river. On said May 31, 1900, Smith executed and delivered to C. H. Fuller a deed of conveyance of the land in question; the instrument being in the usual form of a grant, bargain, and sale deed, and the consideration expressed therein being the sum of $40,000. This deed was duly recorded. As a part of the same transaction, C. H. Fuller executed and delivered to Smith nine several promissory notes amounting in the aggregate to $40,000, the entire purchase price of said premises, and also a mortgage covering said property to secure the payment of said notes. The notes were four for $1,000 each, payable respectively two, three, four, and five years after date, and five for $7,200 each, payable respectively six, seven, eight, nine, and ten years after date, and each provided for interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. The mortgage was duly recorded.

At the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, a written agreement was executed by C. H. Fuller and Smith. This agreement recited the contemporaneous execution of the deed and mortgage, the pendency of the action brought by the Anaheim Union Water Company et al. against the parties to the agreement and others, that Smith desires to sell said lands and their appurtenances, and that said Fuller desires to buy the same, "provided a riparian right to the use of the waters of the Santa Ana river through said canal for the irrigation of the said lands in whole can be established by decree of court in said suit, or suits, as hereinafter provided." It was then mutually agreed: That the deed shall "be delivered absolutely" to Fuller, "subject, however, to the mutual covenants and agreements hereinafter contained," and that Smith should receive the notes and mortgages, "subject, however, to the mutual covenants and agreements hereinafter contained." That said deed and mortgage should be recorded as soon as may be. That the time of payment of said principal and interest "shall be suspended" during the time any injunction may be in force in said action, enjoining any of said parties from using the waters of the Santa Ana river for irrigation on said lands through said canal, provided that such suspension shall not be extended beyond five years from May 31, 1900, and that nothing shall be so construed as to extend the time for the full payment of the notes beyond ten years from May 31, 1900. That during any such period of suspension, Fuller shall pay an annual rental for the land of $800 less taxes. That Fuller will, at his own cost and expense, but for both Smith and himself, diligently press to a judicial determination the matters involved in said action, take an appeal to the Supreme Court from any judgment or portion of a judgment favorable to plaintiffs therein and against defendants therein, and prosecute said appeal or appeals with due diligence to final decision, and "prosecute the defense of said suit" until a final judgment "is rendered and entered by the Supreme Court * * * settling all controversies involved in said cause." That Smith will not make any agreement with the plaintiffs in said action which would waive or have the effect of waiving any right of Fuller or his codefendants in said cause to so take such water. That no compromise is to be made by Fuller, of any of the matters involved in said action, without the written consent of Smith. That no order or judgment by stipulation or consent is to be made except one adjudicating in favor of the defendants in said action all of the matters contested therein. That, should Fuller make any such compromise or waiver of his rights or those of his codefendants, "then said promissory notes and mortgage * * * shall be absolutely valid and enforceable without defalcation or delay, and payable at the times in said notes and mortgage written." Then follows the provision upon which Smith mainly relies, and which is as follows: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that in case said party of the second part shall fail to secure a judgment or decree of court, entitling said party of the second part or his assigns to use the waters of said Santa Ana river, through said canal, upon said lands described in said exhibits, then in that case the said party of the second part or his assigns shall reconvey by grant, bargain, and sale deed to the record holder of said mortgage all of said lands described in said exhibits and the said party of the first part or his assigns shall, upon the tender of said deed conveying said lands as aforesaid in the manner hereinafter provided, execute an instrument in such form and manner as to entitle it to be recorded in the office of the county recorder of Riverside county, Cal., satisfying the lien of said mortgage and the debt thereby secured, and at the same time deliver up to the said party of the second part, or his assigns, the notes and mortgage hereinbefore described and referred to as 'Exhibit B.' The said tender of said deed shall be made by leaving the same with the said county recorder of said Riverside county to be delivered to said mortgagee upon the delivering up of said satisfaction of mortgage and notes to said recorder to be by him delivered to said party of the second part hereof, or his assigns, as herein stipulated." Then follows a provision to the effect that Fuller may "at any time" obtain a release of said mortgage of portions of said land, of not less than 100 acres at any one time, by paying at the rate of $75 per acre for lands not in alfalfa and at the rate of $100 per acre for lands in alfalfa. This was followed by provisions as follows: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that except it shall be adjudged in said suit and decreed by judgment of said court that all of the said lands described in said exhibits hereto attached are not riparian to said Santa Ana river and are not entitled to the use of the waters of said Santa Ana river, through said canal, the said promissory notes and mortgage described in said exhibits shall then and in that case be valid and collectible as though this agreement never existed, except as hereinbefore provided as to suspended payments of interest. * * * It is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the essence of this contract is that said notes referred to in this agreement shall not become collectible unless the said defendants shall succeed in securing the right to use at least one inch of water measured under a four-inch pressure upon said land, for each and every five acres of said land, through said Fuller ditch."

We have omitted to mention several other provisions which appear to us to throw no light on the question of the proper construction of this agreement. This agreement was signed and acknowledged by C. H. Fuller and Smith, but was not recorded. Fuller faithfully complied with all the provisions of this agreement as to the defense of said action. The action was tried in the superior court, with the result that on the 12th day of November, 1903, judgment was entered therein restraining each of the defendants therein from diverting by means of said Fuller ditch any of the usual and ordinary flow of the waters of the Santa Ana river upon any portion of said 400-acre tract, or of said 900-acre tract. A motion for a new trial was made by Fuller on behalf of the defendants, and this motion was denied by the trial court. Fuller thereupon appealed from such judgment and order to this court, and on January 19, 1907, said judgment and order were affirmed by this court. A petition for a rehearing was denied on February 18, 1907, and said judgment became final. We shall assume here that it was thus finally determined that Fuller had failed to secure the judgment or decree contemplated by the provision of the agreement relative to reconveyance which we have hereinbefore quoted, and that the event upon the happening of which a reconveyance should or might be made and the notes and mortgage be canceled had then occurred.

Plaintiffs have been in possession of said premises ever since May 31, 1900. They have made permanent improvements thereon in fencing, leveling, and preparing the same for husbandry, and buildings for the proper use and enjoyment thereof. They have prepared and planted to alfalfa 400 acres thereof. Since the prohibitory judgment was made by the superior court, November 12, 1903, they, at their own cost and at an expense of over $6,000, bored wells on the land and erected, in connection with said wells, a pumping plant which is capable of producing and which does produce 300 inches of water measured under a four-inch pressure, which water has been used for irrigation on said land in lieu of the waters of the Santa Ana river formerly used thereon. Up to November 30, 1903, they paid all interest which became due on said notes. Thereafter, and up to November 30, 1906, because of the judgment enjoining the use of the water from the Santa Ana river, they paid $800 per year, less the taxes. After the affirmance of such judgment by this court, plaintiffs notified defendant that they desired to pay in full the aforesaid notes and mortgage according to the tenor and effect thereof. On September 13, 1907, defendant gave to plaintiffs' attorney a written statement of the amount that he claimed to be due, saying therein that he had sent to England for the notes and that they would be obtained within a few days, and he expected "prompt payment" as soon as the notes were ready for delivery. In this statement he claimed that the interest from November 30, 1903, should be paid. Plaintiffs at once objected to this, claiming that, in view of the fact that they had been enjoined from the use of the waters of the Santa Ana river ever since that date, they were required by the agreement to pay, in addition to the principal, only $800 per annum, less taxes. Some discussion was had by the parties relative to submitting the matter to arbitration, and, while the further disposition of the matter was pending undetermined, Smith, on November 25, 1907, notified Fuller that the contingency had arisen upon which he was obligated to reconvey the property to him, and demanded such reconveyance, offering to deliver up the notes and mortgage upon receipt of the reconveyance. He concluded his notice as follows: "I have been willing heretofore to accept payment of the principal and interest on the said notes and mortgage in full and allow you to retain the property, but you have failed to make such payment. There seems to be no way left for me but to make the demand and offer which I hereby make and, in case of refusal, to proceed to enforce the reconveyance of the said property." On December 2, 1907, plaintiffs, by instrument in writing, dated November 30, 1907, notified Smith that they, as owners of the premises, declared each of said notes to be due and payable, and offered to pay $40,000, together with $800, less $458.08 taxes, in lieu of interest to November 30, 1907, upon delivery up of said notes and a proper satisfaction of the mortgage. In their complaint in this action, filed December 4, 1907, plaintiffs declare that they have elected and do now elect to pay said notes and mortgage in full according to the terms and effect thereof and of the agreements aforesaid, and that they have heretofore waived and do now waive all right to reconvey said land in lieu of payment of said notes and mortgage.

There would be much force in the contention of learned counsel for defendant as to the meaning and intent of the provision in the agreement relative to reconveyance, if that provision stood alone, and we had nothing else from which to determine its meaning. This, however, is not the situation. Under familiar rules, we are required to take the whole contract into consideration in determining the exact intent of the parties as to any particular provision, and, if we can reasonably do so, we must make of it all a consistent whole. When we consider the agreement of these parties in that way, it appears very clear to us that the provision as to a reconveyance, which constitutes the whole basis of defendant's claim, was a provision inserted solely for the benefit of the purchaser, which he, having complied with the other provisions, might enforce or not as he saw fit, and that it should be read just as though the word "may" had been written, instead of the word "shall," in the clause providing that, if the purchaser shall fail to secure a certain judgment, he "shall reconvey," etc. The provision itself indicates this very strongly in the stipulation that Smith shall be called upon to do anything in the matter of delivering up the notes and executing a release of the mortgage, only upon the tender of a deed of reconveyance by Fuller, to be made by him in the manner carefully prescribed. Taking the whole contract together, it seems very clear, as we have said, that the provision was one solely for the benefit of Fuller, which he had the absolute right to waive. The price agreed on, $40,000, was admittedly the full value of the land, even with the right to take water for irrigation purposes thereon from the Santa Ana river. The agreement shows that Smith desired to absolutely sell the land for that price, and to free himself from the burden and expense of any litigation in regard to the water rights thereon. It further shows that Fuller was not willing to be bound to take it if such water could not be had, but was willing to take it with the understanding that if, making all proper and diligent effort in that behalf at his own expense, he could not obtain a final judicial determination that he was entitled to such water for the land, he might rescind the contract of purchase. The written agreement between the parties, except as to the provisions relative to suspension of interest, annual rental during such suspension, the release of an existing mortgage, the conditions as to partial release from the lien of the mortgage given by Fuller to Smith, and the application of damages recovered on any injunction bond, was, practically, simply an agreement reserving to Fuller the right to rescind the contract of purchase upon a certain contingency on certain conditions. The conditions were that Fuller should diligently and at his own expense defend to the end, without compromise of any kind, the pending proceeding brought to obtain a decree depriving the land of such water, and any other suit instituted by either of the same plaintiffs for the same purpose within three years of the date of the agreement. The contingency was the failure of Fuller, notwithstanding his full compliance with the conditions, to obtain the right by judgment in said action or actions, to use said waters upon said land to the extent of "at least one inch of water measured under a four-inch pressure upon said land, for each and every five acres of said land, through said Fuller ditch," as stated in the last stipulation of the agreement. The provision as to the limitation of the period of suspension of interest, the maximum being 10 years, the provision against any compromise of the action by Fuller under penalty of being compelled to retain the land and pay the agreed purchase price according to the terms of the notes and mortgage, and the provision giving Fuller the right "at any time" to obtain releases of the mortgage as to lots of not less than 100 acres on payment of a specified rate per acre, show very clearly the intention of the parties that Fuller had the absolute right to hold the land for the consideration agreed on regardless of the result of the litigation concerning the water. There is no foundation for any theory that Smith could be advantaged by a favorable determination of the litigation to the extent stipulated, otherwise than that by reason of such determination Fuller would be precluded from rescinding and the sale would stand. His whole object appears to have been to most carefully limit the right of Fuller to rescind to the single contingency specified, and to guard against the bringing about of that contingency by any act or failure on the part of Fuller himself. The theory of learned counsel for defendant as to the effect of the provision regarding reconveyance would, in our judgment, make it inconsistent with the whole spirit of the contract. It is impossible to conceive of any good reason why Smith, desiring to absolutely sell the land for $40,000, should wish to reserve to himself the privilege of taking it back in the event of a decree depriving it of certain alleged water rights, and thus unfavorably affecting its value. We think that the contract manifestly shows that he was not stipulating for any such right, but that he was, in fact, simply conferring the right of rescission in a certain contingency on Fuller, and prescribing the manner in which that right was to be exercised.

The allegations of the pleadings show a practical construction of this agreement by the parties similar to the construction that we place upon it. As to Fuller and his associates, there can be no doubt in this regard. The development of water thereon by them at great expense, the cultivation and improvement of the land, and their acts following the final adjudication as to the water of the Santa Ana river, practically demonstrate their understanding of the contract. Smith appears to have regarded it in the same way and to have acknowledged the right of plaintiffs to hold the land notwithstanding the result of the litigation, until after he and the plaintiffs differed as to the amount due on the notes, in view of the provisions as to suspension of interest during the time that plaintiffs were deprived by injunction of the use of the water from the Santa Ana river; but we do not rest at all upon this in our conclusion, for we are satisfied that the written instruments upon their face, taken as a whole, clearly show the understanding and intention of the parties to be as we have stated it.

If we are correct in our conclusion as to the proper construction of the contract, the judgment given on the pleadings must be reversed. The order appointing a receiver is a part of the judgment and will fall with it.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

McCALEB v. DREYFUS. (L. A. 2,215.)

Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 284*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTS—DELEGATION OF POWER BY MUNICIPALITY.

Where the nature of a public improvement permits a predetermination of its actual cost, it should be determined by the city council, but a provision in sewer specifications that if, in the judgment of the city engineer, it shall be necessary to form any part of the foundation of the sewer of concrete, it shall be paid for as extra work, was not void as giving the city engineer discretionary power to vary the cost of the work.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 33*)—PRESUMPTIONS—DISCHARGE OF OFFICIAL DUTY.

It is presumed that official duty will be properly performed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 284*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

Sewer specifications were not objectionable for providing that the city engineer, and not the superintendent of streets, should determine whether any concrete was necessary for the foundation, where the contract required the work to be done under the direction of the street superintendent, pursuant to the provisions of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153), in view of Santa Barbara Charter, Amendment No. 7 (St. 1905, p. 937, § 123, subd. 1), requiring the city engineer to make all surveys, inspections, and estimates required by the council.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1042*)—HARMLESS ERROR—STRIKING OUT PLEADING.

In an action by a contractor to foreclose sewer assessment liens, the contract not being invalid because the specifications provided that if, in the city engineer's judgment, it was necessary to use concrete in the foundation, it should be paid for as extra work, the refusal to strike an allegation of the complaint that no extra concrete was in fact used was immaterial.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 339*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTS—CONFORMITY TO SPECIFICATIONS.

That sewer specifications called for "a lamp hole to be placed at the point indicated on plans," when the plans, profile, and resolution called for six lamp holes which were constructed, was not misleading, so as to deprive the city council of jurisdiction to order the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 339.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 293*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—PRELIMINARY PROCEEDINGS—RESOLUTION OF INTENTION.

A property owner cannot complain because the resolution of intention to construct sewers was printed in full instead of being given in substance, and referring to the resolution for further particulars, as permitted by law.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 572*)—SPECIFIC ASSESSMENTS—ENFORCEMENT—RELIEF—ATTORNEY'S FEE.

While, under section 12 of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 157, c. 153), authorizing suit against the owner of land assessed for public improvements to enforce the assessment, and awarding plaintiff, if successful, an attorney's fee of $15 in addition to taxable costs, a contractor can enforce several liens on lots against the owner in a single action, he can only recover a single attorney's fee.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Samuel E. Crow, Judge.

Action by W. H. McCaleb against Louis G. Dreyfus. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant. Henley C. Booth, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to foreclose liens upon an assessment for sewer work. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and the defendant property owner appeals.

1. The specifications for the work provided that "if, in the judgment of the city engineer, it shall be necessary to form any portion of said foundation (of the sewer) of concrete, said concrete shall be paid for as extra work at the price per cubic yard mentioned in the contract." This language forms the foundation of the principal attack made by appellant. He insists that under the authority of Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 244, 38 Pac. 881, 45 Am. St. Rep. 33, and Perine v. Pasadena, 116 Cal. 6, 47 Pac. 777, there is by these words conferred upon the city engineer the discretionary power at will to increase or decrease the cost of the work to the property owner, and that a contract which so permits is void. The underlying principle in Bolton v. Gilleran is indubitably sound, and that is that, where the nature of the work permits a predetermination of its actual cost, such predetermination shall be made by the council in awarding the contract, and no improper discretionary power shall be left with the street superintendent or city engineer whereby such cost may either be increased to the injury of the property owner, or diminished to the benefit of the contractor. This is usually possible in that class of work known generally as street work. It is difficult, if not practically impossible, to enforce such a condition where the work is the construction of a sewer, or the driving of a tunnel. Bolton v. Gilleran has been seized upon by property owners and used in every possible way to defeat the just recovery of the contractor, until, finally, this court felt impelled to voice its protest against these efforts, in Haughwout v. Raymond, 148 Cal. 311, 312, 83 Pac. 53, where it is said: "Notwithstanding that the proceedings for street work and sewer work, like proceedings in taxation, are in invitum, and that, therefore, a fairly strict and accurate compliance with all the statutory requirements is necessary, this is the limit to which any court should be expected to go in disposing of the questions which are involved. The contractor who has honestly and substantially complied with his contract, of which the property owners have received and will continue to receive the benefit, is quite as much entitled to the protection of the law as are the property owners themselves, and, upon the other hand, an endeavor—even a successful endeavor—upon the part of the property owners to defeat the just claims of such a contractor, by a resort to the extreme technicalities of the law, can, upon the whole, operate only to the disadvantage of the property owners themselves, since it necessarily tends to increase the price at which any and all future contractors will be willing to engage in work, payment for which, after having been duly performed, is met by harassment and vexatious delay, with the prospect at the end of utter failure of recovery."

In awarding a contract for street work it is quite apparent, since the surface of the ground is exposed, that there may be an accurate predetermination of the amount and character of material to be used. It is unnecessary, therefore, to delegate any discretion in this matter to the street superintendent. Such was the condition in Perine v. City of Pasadena, supra (a street work case), where the specifications required that "the contractor shall put in such extra concrete as the superintendent of streets and the city engineer may require, and in such places and in such form as they may designate." It was easily susceptible of predetermination upon the part of the council whether any extra concrete was required at all, and, if so, the quantity and the place of use. This delegation, therefore, was held to be unreasonable. But where, as here, the work is the construction of a sewer, involving, first, the digging of the trench, and, second, the placing of the sewer upon a durable foundation, it is apparent that but one of three courses can be pursued in the letting of the contract. First, the course here pursued, where the possibility of uncovering soil unsuitable in its natural state for the foundation was anticipated and provision was made that where such soil was encountered, a concrete foundation should be constructed. Indisputably the determination as to whether or not a concrete foundation would be necessary must be vested in some one. Indisputably, also, the proper person to determine this was not the contractor, but the street superintendent or city engineer. For the concrete which should be so required the specifications provided that payment should be made at a given price per cubic yard. It could at once be determined whether this price was reasonable or unreasonable, and, while the quantity which might be used could not be predetermined, the cost was fixed with all of the exactness which the circumstances permitted. If such a method—a method which would unquestionably be adopted by any private individual contracting for the doing of such work—is not permitted to a city, it must result in the city adopting one or the other of the methods hereafter considered. Let us briefly state them, to see whether, under the most liberal view, it can be said that either of them presents any advantage to the property owner over the method here adopted. One of these methods is that which appellant here insists upon, whereby a bid for a lump sum would be called for, thus enabling the property owner to know the exact amount in dollars and cents which the work is to cost. By this method the discretionary power to say whether artificial foundations shall be constructed and where and to what extent is still vested in the street superintendent. Obviously, under such circumstances, the contractor will bid a sum amply sufficient to protect him, should concrete foundations be called for along the whole route. The immediate and direct effect of such a plan would be to increase the cost of the work to the property owner. Moreover, the door to fraud is not hereby closed, since it is equally open to the dishonest or incompetent street superintendent to refuse to call for foundations where foundations should be constructed, and thus materially enlarge the profits of the contractor. The only remaining method would be that whereby the contract for the work should be let in sections—a contract first let for the construction of the sewer trench, and then, with the land exposed, a subsequent contract let for the erection of the sewer, with proper foundations, where the disclosed undersoil showed that they were necessary. Can it for a moment be said that this method (even if permissible) would be to the benefit of the property owner? It would mean an interminable prolongation of the work and a serious detriment to the use of the property while the work was in progress, and it is not to be supposed that the letting of the two separate contracts would be had at so advantageous a figure as would be the letting of a single contract for the whole work. It seems to us plain that the first method—that actually adopted by the city—is not only the method which would be adopted by a prudent person in awarding such a contract, but is the one that best protects the property owner, and enables the work to be quickly and advantageously done at the lowest price. Official duty it is presumed will be performed, and we cannot perceive that, under this method, the property owner will suffer at the hands of an iniquitous street superintendent, when every foot of the work and every order which the street superintendent may give are carefully watched and open to public inspection. Thus we find in Haughawout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 675, 63 Pac. 1078 (a sewer case), a specification upheld valid, which declares that, "when the ground does not afford a sufficiently solid foundation, the contractor shall excavate the trench to such increased depth as the street superintendent may decide to be necessary, and shall then bring it up to the required level and form with such material and in such manner as the street superintendent may direct." So in Banaz v. Smith, 133 Cal. 102, 65 Pac. 309 (a sewer case), it is said, discussing the same subject: "For instance, when the ground is wet, the soft earth is to be removed and gravel filled in; but the specifications do not determine the amount of wet, soft ground to be removed, or the quantity of gravel required to fill the excavation. It is not left to the street superintendent to say how much shall be done in any case. The contractor must do the work as required by his contract, and the street superintendent cannot accept less or require more." In Belser v. Allman, 134 Cal. 399, 66 Pac. 492, likewise a sewer case, a specification was upheld which declared that "under so much of said sewer as is to be constructed of brick and concrete, wherever the natural foundation is soft, spongy, or springy, such natural foundation shall be removed down to a firm and solid natural foundation, and, instead of the removed material, there shall be placed and constructed a firm and durable foundation of broken rock and concrete," etc. Here, while in terms the discretion to say where such natural material should be removed and replaced by concrete is not expressly conferred upon the street superintendent, it is not to be doubted that the control of the matter was in fact and in law vested in him. And in Chase v. Scheerer, 136 Cal. 248, 68 Pac. 768, considering the nature of the work imposed by sewer construction, where the specifications declared that the contractor should excavate the trench to such increased depth as the street superintendent may decide to be necessary, it is said: "It would be practically impossible for the city council to burrow into the ground all along the line of the contemplated sewer to see if the ground formed a sufficient foundation for the trench of the sewer." It is held, therefore, that the specification here under consideration, with its delegation of authority to the city engineer, is reasonable and valid, and, if it shall be considered that this view is in direct conflict with that expressed in Bolton v. Gilleran, it must suffice to say that to this extent Bolton v. Gilleran is overruled.

2. Objection is made that the specifications provided that the city engineer, and not the superintendent of streets, should determine whether any, and, if so, how much, concrete should be used for the artificial foundation. But the contract provides that the work shall be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the street superintendent, thus following the provisions of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153), and the city engineer, under charter amendment No. 7 of the charter of Santa Barbara (St. 1905, p. 937, § 123, subd. 1), is required "to make all surveys, inspections and estimates required by the council." It was therefore not improper to delegate this discretion to the city engineer. After the exercise of the city engineer's discretion in the matter, the work must still be inspected and approved and the assessment issued by the street superintendent.

3. Under the views above expressed it matters not that the court refused to strike out the allegation of the complaint to the effect that no extra concrete for foundation was in fact used.

4. The specifications called for "a lamp hole to be placed at the point indicated on plans and profile." The plans, profile, and resolution called for six lamp holes, and these lamp holes were in fact constructed. We cannot agree with counsel that this trifling imperfection in the use of the singular for the plural, by which, with the reference to the plans, no one could be misled, produces such an inconsistency as to deprive the council of jurisdiction to order the work.

5. It is complained that the posted notices of intention were not such as the law contemplates. Herein it is not contended that they did not contain all that the law required, but the somewhat singular contention is made that they contain more than the law required, in that the resolution of intention was printed in full, instead of being given in substance, with a reference to the resolution "for further particulars." Something also is urged as to the smallness of the type in which the body of the notice was printed. A copy of the notice is inserted in the transcript. It is sufficiently legible, and the property owner cannot be heard to complain with justness because the notice itself conveys to him more information than the law requires that it should.

Defendant was the owner of all of the lots against which the liens were sought to be enforced in a single action. While the method of procedure is permissible under section 12 of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 157, c. 153), yet a single attorney's fee only can be recovered in such an action. Hughes v. Alsip, 112 Cal. 587, 44 Pac. 1027.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom all but one award for attorney's fees and costs, and, as so modified, the judgment and the order appealed from will stand affirmed.

BROOKSHIRE OIL CO. v. CASMALIA RANCH OIL & DEVELOPMENT CO. et al. (L. A. 2,040.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1909.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 73*)—OIL LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

A lease provided that A. thereby granted to M. the sole right to produce oil and gas from certain land, specifically granting to M. for 10 years the exclusive right to drill and operate oil and gas wells, to lay and operate pipe lines, telegraph and telephone lines, the necessary right of way over the premises, the use of enough land on which to preserve the products, the use of water and wood on the premises, till oil is found, that, should M. find a paying production of oil or gas on the land during said term, then A. would extend the lease, from year to year, so long as such production continued, and that in consideration M. agreed to use and occupy only so much of the land as might be necessary for the purposes granted, to commence operations within a year, to pay a royalty on oil and gas produced, also agreeing to use no water necessary for A.'s stock. Held, in view of the general rules of interpretation of contracts, stated by Civ. Code, §§ 1648, 1650, 1653, and the main object and attendant provisions of the lease, that it gave no general or exclusive right to pay and operate pipe lines, but only sufficient rights in that respect to enable the lessee to carry out the main object of producing and removing the oil and gas, so that he could not interfere with a pipe line, subsequently laid by another with the lessor's permission, not affecting his operations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 49*)—LEASES—ADVERSE USE.

A lease gave exclusive right to procure oil and gas from land, and prior rights to lay and operate necessary pipe lines. Thereafter, with the lessor's permission, a third person constructed a pipe line across the land to conduct his products from other land to the market. Held, that his use was not adverse to the lessee till the latter began to use the part of the land through which the pipe line ran in a way incompatible with the maintenance of such line.

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 51*)—INTERRUPTION OF PIPE LINES—DAMAGES.

That between the times a pipe line for conducting oil to market was torn up and reconstructed, the owner was prevented from marketing oil of a certain value, does not show damage from destruction of the line; but if during the interruption the market value of oil depreciated, or if because of the interruption oil was lost or destroyed, or oil which otherwise would have come through the owner's wells was, because of their being closed, drawn through the wells of another, and so lost to such owner, and this could be shown, such damages could be recovered.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by the Brookshire Oil Company against the Casmalia Ranch Oil & Development Company and others. From parts of the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals, and from part of the judgment defendant company appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded for new trial.

See, also, 151 Cal. 577, 91 Pac. 333.

Richards & Carrier and McD. R. Venable, for plaintiff. Wm. H. Chapman and H. C. Booth, for defendants.

SHAW, J. Three separate appeals are presented upon the same transcript: An appeal by the plaintiff from the parts of the judgment consisting of paragraphs numbered 2 and 3; an appeal by the plaintiff from an order denying its motion for a new trial; and an appeal by the defendant company, which for brevity we will call the Casmalia Oil Company, from the part of the judgment consisting of paragraph numbered one. The defendant's appeal was taken more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment, and it does not present the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the part appealed from. The nonappealing defendants are officers and agents of the defendant corporation, and, as the plaintiff urges nothing against the judgment in their favor, their rights need not be further considered.

The object of the action was to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the acts of the defendants in tearing up about 4,000 feet of pipe line maintained by the plaintiff over a tract of land owned by one Juan B. Arellanes and in destroying the pipe, and to enjoin the defendants from preventing the construction and maintenance of said pipe line by the plaintiff. The defendant company, under an oil lease executed by Arellanes in 1899, claims the exclusive right to maintain pipe lines over the land. The plaintiff claims the right to maintain its particular pipe line over the land by virtue of a parol license from Arellanes to lay and maintain such pipe line, given in January, 1905, and the subsequent construction thereof with his consent. The principal question involved is whether the lease, or contract, of Arellanes to the Casmalia Oil Company's assignors gave the exclusive right to maintain any pipe line over any part of the land and the right to prevent any other person or persons from laying or maintaining any such pipe line for any purpose, or whether it gave them only the right to lay and maintain such pipe lines as they might find necessary in the process of extracting and transporting the oil produced by them under the contract. The material parts of the lease of Arellanes to Morehouse and his associates, who transferred the same to the Casmalia Oil Company, are as follows: "The first party (Arellanes) hereby grants unto the second parties the sole right to produce petroleum, asphaltum and other hydrocarbon substances, and natural gas, from the following named tract of land (describing about 5,000 acres of land). Specifically granting to the second parties, for and during the term of ten years from this date (November 25, 1899), the exclusive right to drill and operate oil and gas wells; to lay and operate pipe lines; telegraph and telephone lines; the necessary right of way over the premises; the use of enough land on which to preserve the products and erect such buildings as they may desire; the free use of water and wood, if found on the premises, until oil is found; with the right at any time to annul this lease by failing to comply with its terms; and to remove all machinery and fixtures which they may have placed thereon; and should the second parties find a paying production of oil or gas on said land during said term, then first party agrees to extend this lease upon the same terms and conditions as herein provided for, from year to year, so long as said production continues. In consideration for which the second parties agree as follows: * * * Second. To use and occupy only so much of said land as may be necessary for purpose herein granted. Third. To commence operations on land herein leased, or other lands of the vicinity, within one year from this date. * * * Fifth. To pay to said party of the first part one tenth royalty of all oil and gas produced on said leased land. * * * Also agreeing to use no water that is necessary for his stock."

Under the authority of said instrument, the Casmalia Oil Company, within three months after its execution, entered upon the land and began drilling for oil thereon and has ever since continued the work of exploration for oil thereon, but has not discovered oil or any other substance in marketable quantities. It has not laid any pipe line over or upon the land, nor has it made any plans for that purpose. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that the pipe line constructed by it was laid in a part of the land where it would not interfere with any pipe line that the Casmalia Oil Company would have to lay to conduct oil from the land to any point of shipment or use, but upon the objection of the said defendant the evidence was excluded. This instrument does not vest in the so-called lessees any present title in the land. It grants only the right to do certain things thereon and to take certain mineral substances therefrom, and no title to such substances passes from the original owner until the same is severed from the realty. In regard to such agreements it is said: "The title is inchoate and for purposes of exploration only, until oil is found. If it is not found, no estate vests in the lessee, and his title, whatever it is, ends when the unsuccessful search is abandoned. If oil is found, then the right to produce becomes a vested right, and the lessee will be protected in exercising it in accordance with the terms and conditions of his contract." Venture Oil Co. v. Fretts, 152 Pa. 451, 460, 25 Atl. 732; Steelsmith v. Gartlan, 45 W. Va. 27, 34, 29 S. E. 978, 44 L. R. A. 107; Lowther Oil Co. v. Miller, etc., Co., 53 W. Va. 501, 44 S. E. 433, 97 Am. St. Rep. 1027; Huggins v. Daley, 99 Fed. 608, 40 C. C. A. 12, 48 L. R. A. 320; Gadbury v. Gas Co., 162 Ind. 14, 67 N. E. 261, 62 L. R. A. 895; Eaton v. Alleghany Gas Co., 122 N. Y. 417, 25 N. E. 981; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 242; Union, etc., Co. v. Bliven, etc., Co., 72 Pa. 173; Grubb v. Grubb, 74 Pa. 33; Thornton on Oil, § 53.

With regard to possession of the land, the agreement gives it for special purposes only, and so far as may be necessary and convenient for such purposes and no farther. The right of possession is limited to the possession necessary to enable the lessees to search for the minerals they are allowed to take, until such minerals are found, and thereafter to the possession of only the part required for the convenient operation of the works they may construct and use for the extraction and removal of the minerals. Funk v. Haldeman, supra. The right to lay and operate pipe lines is stated in general terms and is not expressly limited to such pipe lines as should be found necessary for the production and removal of the oil and gas, and so, for that matter, is the right to erect and operate telephone and telegraph lines. These general words, however, do not necessarily confer a general right for all purposes. "However broad the terms of a contract, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract." Civ. Code, § 1648. "Particular clauses of a contract are subordinate to its general intent." Civ. Code, § 1650. "Words in a contract which are wholly inconsistent with its nature, or with the main intention of the parties, are to be rejected." Civ. Code, § 1653. With these rules of interpretation in mind, and considering the main object of the agreement as well as the attendant provisions, it is plain that there was no intention to grant a general right to lay and operate pipe lines, or to erect and maintain telephone or telegraph lines for general purposes over the entire tract, and that the design was to give only sufficient rights of that character to enable the lessees to carry out the main object of producing the oil and gas that might be found, and to make explorations to find these substances. The "necessary right of way over the premises" is given, and the lessees are bound to "use and occupy only so much of said land as may be necessary for purposes herein granted." Their right to operate telegraph or telephone lines over the land, and their right to lay and use pipe lines as well, would, no doubt, be paramount to that of the lessor, or of any person claiming under him by subsequent grant or license, to the extent that, if such subsequent line came in conflict with any line which the lessees found it necessary or convenient to lay and operate for the purposes stated, the lessor, or those claiming under him, must yield supremacy to the lessees and avoid any interference with the operations under the lease; but the lessees' right goes no further than this, and when it is found that any pipe line laid across the land with the permission of Arellanes by a third person does not in any way affect the lessees in their explorations for oil or other minerals, or in their operations in producing and removing the same, the lessees have no right to complain of such pipe line and no right to interfere with its maintenance and operation.

The Casmalia Oil Company does not claim that the pipe line of the plaintiff interferes at all with its operations for the discovery of oil on the premises. The defense is founded wholly upon the theory that by the agreement with Arellanes the Casmalia Oil Company has the sole right to lay pipe lines in the land, for any or all purposes and in all parts of it, and that any pipe line laid in the land is a trespass on its right. The theory is that the agreement creates some sort of an estate in the land for pipe line purposes, that it severs from the fee all right to use the land for that purpose and vests that use in the lessees and their successors, and that it cannot be used for that purpose by any other person without invading that estate. The theory is untenable. The right given is limited to the use of the land for the purpose of producing the minerals. Any use by the owner, or others operating under him, which does not affect the search for and production of the minerals, is lawful, and the defendants have no right to interfere with such use, except when in the actual exercise of the lessees' rights under the lease, the other occupation or use shall be found adverse, injurious, or conflicting.

So far as the pipe lines are concerned, the agreement grants an easement only, and this is done in general terms. The case is similar to that of Winslow v. Vallejo, 148 Cal. 723, 84 Pac. 191, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, 113 Am. St. Rep. 349. There the grant was of a right of way "for any water pipes or mains which may be laid by the city of Vallejo." The court quoted from Jennison v. Walker, 11 Gray (Mass.) 423, the statement that: "Where an easement in land is granted in general terms, without giving definite location and description to it, so that the part of the land over which the right is to be exercised cannot be definitely ascertained, the grantee does not thereby acquire a right to use the servient tenement without limitation as to the place or mode in which the easement is to be enjoyed." A similar principle applies here. The Casmalia Oil Company has not the right to take and hold possession of all the land in virtue of the grant of the right to lay and operate pipe lines over all of it. Its right of possession for that purpose is limited to the part of the land which may be required as a right of way for such pipe lines as it does actually lay, and it has no right of possession at all for that purpose until it actually begins the laying of such line. In the meantime the lessor has the right of possession and dominion over the land and may use it for any purpose "not inconsistent with the rights granted by the agreement. The lessor's grantee or licensee has the same right. In view of the nature of the operations to be carried on by the lessees, the grant would not be exhausted by the location of one pipe line, as is generally the case in grants of an unlocated easement for a single purpose; but the company may lay as many lines as it may need from time to time in its operations. With that qualification, its rights are no greater than in grants similar to that considered in Winslow v. Vallejo."

The court finds that the line laid by the plaintiff was over a part of the land which was not occupied, used, or operated upon by the Casmalia Company under the lease. The evidence excluded would have shown that it was situated in a part of the land which, in all probability, the Casmalia Company would never have occasion to use for a pipe line, or for any other purpose. The part of the judgment from which the plaintiff appeals enjoins the plaintiff from maintaining any pipe line over any part of the land and commanded it to remove the pipe already laid therein. There is a finding that the maintenance of the pipe line over the land by the plaintiff would in time ripen into a prescriptive right to keep it there. There is, however, no finding that the plaintiff claimed adversely to the defendants' actual rights under the lease, nor is there any allegation to that effect, and there is no evidence of any such claim. The fact is that the plaintiff was operating oil wells on premises about a mile east of the Arellanes tract, and that, in order to market its oil, it laid a pipe line from its wells westerly over the northerly corner of that tract, to a railroad station some five miles away, solely to transport its own oil, and not for any purpose connected with the Arellanes tract of land. Under these circumstances, the use by the plaintiff was not adverse, and would not become adverse, until the Casmalia Company, in the course of its operations, began to use the part of the land through which the pipe line ran, in a manner incompatible with the maintenance of the pipe line. The judgment enjoining the plaintiff cannot be justified on the theory that it was necessary in order to prevent the use by the plaintiff from creating a prescriptive right. It cannot be sustained on the theory that the lease gave the lessees the right to maintain exclusive possession prior to the laying of any pipe line, nor on the ground that the plaintiff's pipe line was an obstruction to the free use by the Casmalia Company of its rights under the lease. There is no theory upon which it can be supported. The plaintiff has the right to lay and maintain the pipe line by permission of Arellanes, so long as it does not interfere with the actual operations of the defendant under the lease. The injunction was granted upon the cross-complaint of the Casmalia Oil Company. It does not show that the plaintiff was invading its rights, nor that the pipe line had caused it any legal damage. The demurrer to the cross-complaint should have been sustained.

The complaint alleged that the damage caused by the destruction of the pipe taken up was $2,500. The court found this damage to be $1,232, and that it was not necessary for the defendants to destroy the pipe in order to preserve the rights which the court concluded the Casmalia Company had under the lease, and it gave judgment for the above sum against the Casmalia Company, but in favor of the other defendants, who, it seems, did not participate in the wrong. The complaint also alleged that by reason of the destruction of the pipe line the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $5,000 by "the loss incident to the conduct of oil from the property of plaintiff to said railway station." The plaintiff rebuilt its pipe line after its destruction by the defendant company; but it was delayed in the use thereof for the period of 47 days by reason of said destruction. In the meantime it was prevented from transporting its oil from its wells to its customers, except by other means than the pipe line, and it was thereby prevented from marketing, during that period, oil of the value of $3,151.24. A special issue was submitted to a jury and an advisory verdict rendered fixing this amount, which, however, the court refused to adopt, and it made no finding on the subject. We do not think it would necessarily follow that the plaintiff would be damaged to the extent of the value of the oil which it was thus prevented, for a short time, from delivering. It was not deprived of the oil, and there is nothing to show that the oil was not as valuable afterwards as before, nor that any of it was lost or destroyed by reason of the interruption. There was an offer of evidence tending to show that a flowing well on adjacent land, and near to the oil wells of the plaintiff, was, during that time, spouting large quantities of oil from the same stratum, and that the effect of this flow was to take oil from the part of the stratum which belonged to plaintiff, and that by reason of the delay aforesaid, during which the plaintiff was compelled to cap its wells, some of the plaintiff's oil was drawn off to the adjoining land and lost to the plaintiff. This evidence was excluded by the court. We are by no means certain that any reliable proof of such a loss could be made. It must be to a great extent a matter of conjecture. We can only say in regard to it that, if it should appear that loss actually occurred from that cause, it would be a legitimate element of damage. It may also be observed that if there was a change in the market value, of such a character that the plaintiff, when it became able, by the rebuilding of its pipe line, to market the oil which it was prevented from marketing during the interruption caused by the destruction of the pipe, could not and did not obtain as high a price for it as it would have obtained had it been marketed during the period of interruption, the difference in the price would be a loss which the plaintiff could recover as damages for the unlawful act of the defendant company.

This disposes of all the points presented by the plaintiff in support of its appeals. It follows from what we have said that the judgment granting the injunction against plaintiff, and the order denying a new trial, were erroneous.

The appeal of the defendant company is from the part of the judgment giving damages to the plaintiff. The only point made in support of that appeal is that the defendant was justified in destroying the pipe as the only means of preventing the rebuilding of the pipe line. From what we have heretofore said in discussing the plaintiff's appeals, it is clear that the point is without merit.

There does not seem to be any necessity for a new trial of the case so far as the damages from the destruction of the pipe are concerned. The plaintiff is satisfied with the award, and the objections of the defendant thereto are unfounded. That part of the judgment may be allowed to stand. The new trial will be confined to the other issues. We presume the views we have stated will dispose of the defendants' claim to an injunction. The evidence given in support of the plaintiff's additional claim for damages would not sustain a judgment. Other evidence may be adduced upon a new trial, however, and we cannot say that the errors in excluding evidence were without substantial prejudice to plaintiff's rights.

The parts of the judgment in favor of plaintiff against the Casmalia Ranch Oil & Development Company for $1,232 and costs and in favor of the defendants other than the said company are affirmed. In all other particulars the judgment is reversed. The order denying a new trial is reversed, except as to the issue of damages for the destruction of the pipe of plaintiff and the issue as to the liability of the natural persons defendant, and the cause is remanded for a new trial upon all the other issues; but the judgment for damages is to remain unaffected by the subsequent proceedings upon the new trial.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 22, 1909.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 14*)—CONVEYANCES TO HUSBAND AND WIFE—TENANCY BY ENTIRETY.

The common law of tenancy by entirety is not recognized by Civ. Code, § 164, declaring that, in case of a conveyance to husband and wife, the presumption is that she takes as tenant in common, and section 682, providing that ownership of property by several persons is either a joint interest, partnership interest, interest in common, or community interest of husband and wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-89; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 14*)—CONVEYANCES TO HUSBAND AND WIFE—JOINT TENANCY.

A deed to a husband and wife "as joint tenants with fee to the survivor," or to husband and wife for their joint lives "as joint tenants and afterwards to the survivor in fee simple absolute," creates a simple joint tenancy, and not a common-law tenancy by entirety.

3. HOMESTEAD (§§ 84, 118*)—ESTABLISHMENT—RIGHT OF WIFE.

Under St. 1867-68, p. 116, c. 138, authorizing the selection of a homestead, though the land is held in joint tenancy, land held in joint tenancy by husband and wife may at her instance be impressed with a homestead, without segregation or partition or delimitation of boundaries, for she may do so as to her own interest which is her separate property, and may do so as to her husband's interest, and a deed of the husband alone made after the wife's declaration is inoperative.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by W. H. Swan against Edward Walden and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Louella Walden appeals. Reversed.

Halsey W. Allen and Henry W. Nisbet, for appellant. Leonard & Surr, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial. The action was for the partition of lots 3, 4, and 5 in block L in the city of Redlands. While defendants Edward Walden and Louella, his wife, appellant herein, were the admitted owners of these lots under deeds hereinafter to be considered, Louella made a declaration of homestead on lots 3 and 4, where she and her husband resided. Subsequently, the homestead never having been abandoned, the husband executed a deed of grant of all of his interest in the lots to plaintiff Swan. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and Louella Walden appeals, urging (1) that the estate held by herself and her husband in the lots was a tenancy by the entirety, that consequently the husband was without power to convey, and his deed was therefore void; (2) that by reason of the valid homestead upon lots 3 and 4 the husband was unable to convey any interest or estate affecting those lots.

1. On the first proposition appellant contends for the existence of the common-law tenancy by entirety. This tenancy was a modification of the joint tenancy, and arose where an estate was conveyed to a husband and wife under circumstances which would have created simply a joint tenancy if the conveyance had been made to any two people other than a husband and a wife. The estate was still at common law a joint tenancy, but, because of the disabilities of the wife, the common law regarding the husband and wife as one, by construction the courts erected a modification of the tenancy. The modification was that while such estates had, like a joint tenancy, the quality of survivorship, they differed in the essential respect that neither spouse could convey his or her interest so as to affect the right of survivorship in the other. In the eye of the law the spouses were not seized of moieties, but of entireties. 1 Wash. Real Prop. (6th Ed.) p. 562. Thus, while in the case of a joint tenancy a severance of any of the unities, as a conveyance by one of the joint tenants to a third person, terminated the joint tenancy and transformed the new estate into a tenancy in common, this could not be done in a tenancy by entirety, owing to the fiction of the law that in the latter tenancy each held an undivided right to the whole, and not, as in a joint tenancy, a right to an undivided half. Of course, it was well settled, and is well settled, where a tenancy by entirety is recognized, that neither spouse can so destroy the character of the estate as to prevent the survivor becoming sole owner. Frost v. Frost, 200 Mo. 474, 98 S. W. 527, 118 Am. St. Rep. 689; Thornburg v. Wiggins,

In this state, however, the reason which obtained at common law, and which forced the courts into the declaration of a tenancy by entirety, has no existence whatsoever. The right of the wife to hold property and to contract is fully recognized and upheld. With the ending of the reason for the rule the rule itself should cease. The spirit of our laws makes against the recognition of such an estate. Besides the compulsion of the common-law theory, there was an added protection to the wife when property was conveyed to the spouses under these circumstances. It was her clumsy equivalent to the modern homestead. She could not be disturbed in her possession, in her title, nor in her enjoyment, and, if she survived, the fee vested absolutely in her. But in this state the Code declares (section 682, Civ. Code) that the ownership of property by several persons is either (1) of joint interest; (2) of partnership interest; (3) of interests in common; and (4) of community interest of husband and wife. And it further declares (section 164, Civ. Code) that in case of a conveyance to a married woman and to her husband the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument. In effect, then, this is a refusal upon the part of our law to recognize estates other than those named in section 682 of the Civil Code. Moreover, in those states where tenancy by entirety is recognized, the trend of decision is to treat such estates as a simple joint tenancy, unless the language of the instrument forbids such interpretation. Stewart, Husband & Wife, § 310; Tiedeman on Real Prop. § 244; Thornburg v. Wiggins, supra. An inspection of the deeds by which the Waldens took discloses clearly that the estates conveyed were designed to be estates in joint tenancy. Thus the grant of lots 3 and 4 was "to Edward Walden and Louella Walden, husband and wife, as joint tenants with fee to the survivor." Lot 5 was granted "to Edward Walden and Louella Walden, husband and wife, during their joint lives, as joint tenants, and afterwards to the survivor in fee simple absolute. * * * The intention of this grant being to constitute a joint tenancy in said land in the said Edward Walden and Louella Walden." In Indiana, where tenancies by entirety are recognized, it is said: "Husband and wife, notwithstanding tenancies by entirety exist as they did under the common law, may take and hold lands for life, in joint tenancy or in common, if appropriate language be expressed in the deed or will creating it; and we know of no more apt term to create a joint tenancy in the grantees in this estate than the expression 'convey and warrant to Daniel S. Wiggins and Laura Belle Wiggins in joint tenancy.'" Thornburgh v. Wiggins, supra. It is held, therefore, upon this proposition, first, by the laws of this state, tenancy by entirety is not recognized, and, second, if it were, the deeds in question do not create such a tenancy, but a simple joint tenancy.

2. The second question to be answered may be thus stated: May land, held in joint tenancy by husband and wife, be impressed with a homestead at the instance of the wife; the sole objection to the validity of the homestead being the nature of the tenancy in which the land is held? As early as 1855 this court decided in Davis v. Fleischacker, 5 Cal. 244, 63 Am. Dec. 121, that under the homestead act as it then existed a homestead could not be carved out of land held in joint tenancy or by tenancy in common; the reason given being that "it required the title of all the tenants to constitute an ownership in the land, and that there was therefore no part of it which he (the homesteader) had the power to set apart as his own so as to constitute the homestead," and no mode had been provided under the homestead act for the ascertainment and separation of the particular estate sought to be impressed by the homestead. In that case the homestead was attempted to be declared by the husband who held in joint tenancy with two strangers to his family. Immediately following this was decided the case of Giblin v. Jordan, 6 Cal. 416, where the tenancy in common was that of the husband, the wife, and a daughter. Here also the husband had attempted to impress the land, or his estate therein, with a homestead, and a distinction was sought to be drawn between the situation thus presented and that of the Fleischacker Case. But this court declared that it was at a loss to find a distinction, saying: "The defendants are as much tenants in common as though they were entire strangers to each other, and the estate of the wife and child cannot be impressed with the character of a homestead simply because they have resided upon the premises." These decisions were adopted and followed in a long line of cases, unnecessary here to cite, until in Seaton v. Son, 32 Cal. 483, where the father, being in the exclusive possession of property, and believing that he was the sole owner thereof, declared a homestead, and it proved that he held legal title, not to all, but to an undivided seventeen-eightieths, and that the title to the remaining eightieth was in another person, notwithstanding the fact that the father was in the exclusive possession of all the property, the court felt compelled to hold the homestead invalid. This harsh rule led to the adoption by the Legislature in 1868 (St. 1867-68, p. 116, c. 138) of a statute declaring that "whenever any party entitled to a homestead under the laws of this state shall be in exclusive occupation of any parcel or tract of land, having the same enclosed, and shall select and record and reside upon the same as a homestead, such party so selecting and claiming shall be entitled to such homestead, and to all rights and exemptions provided by the general law, * * * although such land be held in joint tenancy, or tenancy in common, or such claimant own only an undivided interest therein," and the validity of homesteads declared under the indicated circumstances has been established. Cameto v. Depuy, 47 Cal. 79; Rousset v. Green, 54 Cal. 136. Moreover, by force of this statute it was held in case of co-tenancy that the husband's interest, if he was residing upon the property under conditions fulfilling the requirements of the statute, could be impressed with a homestead at the instance of the wife. Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 259. Saving, however, in the cases mentioned, this court, which was the first to declare that a homestead could not be impressed upon land held in co-tenancy, has, though somewhat reluctantly, felt impelled to adhere to its decisions as a rule of property under the doctrine of stare decisis, and such uniformly have been its decisions, to the last recorded case of Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 148 Cal. 550, 83 Pac. 999. But in all the cases that have been adjudicated the precise question presented by this case has never before arisen. Generally speaking, the cases have been like that of the Fleischacker Case in 5 Cal. and 63 Am. Dec., where the husband had sought to declare the homestead and where his inability to do so has been based upon the fact, first, that the metes and bounds of his holding could not be delimited because of the nature of the tenancy, and, therefore, it could not be said that the whole land or any specific parcel was impressed by the homestead, since it was legally impossible to impress his cotenants' interests with this characteristic. The same reasoning, as we have noted, was applied in Giblin v. Jordan in 6 Cal., where, of course, by his own declaration the husband could not impress the homestead character upon his wife's separate property or upon his daughter's property, in which sense they stood in the position of strangers. But the case which is here presented is different in this respect. Here the wife seeks to impress the whole land with the homestead characteristic. This she may do as to her own interest, which is her separate property, and this she may do as to her husband's interest, since she has the power to declare a homestead upon the husband's separate property, though he has no such power over hers. The homestead thus attempted to be declared is upon land, all of which is susceptible at the instance of the wife of having the homestead characteristics impressed upon it. There is no occasion for segregation or partition or delimitation of boundaries, since the homestead attaches to all of the estate and all of the land. The reasons which, in the view of this court, made it legally impossible for the husband to declare such a homestead when there was a co-tenancy between himself, his wife, or third persons, do not exist in the peculiar instance of the case at bar. We have seen in Higgins v. Higgins, supra, that, where the wife has no interest in the property, she may, if her husband, a co-tenant, be in the exclusive possession of it, declare a homestead upon his estate. How much more readily should the rule apply in this case, where the whole estate and all of the land may, at the instance of the wife, be made subservient to the homestead rights? In this respect the finding of the court that the wife was not in the exclusive possession of the land within the contemplation of the statute of 1868 is meaningless. Her husband certainly was in such possession precisely as in the Higgins Case.

For which reasons we hold that the homestead declared by the wife was valid, and, as a necessary consequence, the deed of the husband alone, made after the declaration, was inoperative and void.

The judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a new judgment in conformity with the above.

11 Cal. App. 15

HARRISON et al. v. WOODWARD et al.
(Civ. 559.)
(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
July 12, 1909.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 610*)—VOLUNTARY LIQUIDATION—AGREEMENT OF STOCKHOLDERS.

Plaintiffs and defendants, who together owned practically all the stock of an insolvent corporation, agreed that plaintiffs should pay the debts, liquidate the business, and on payment of plaintiffs' advances, $40,000 by a certain date, time being made essential, and other sums later on, should surrender to defendants all their interest in the concern, the agreement providing that all reasonable and proper expenses of liquidation should be taken from the cash proceeds of liquidation before the application thereof to the payment of plaintiffs' advances. Held that, though plaintiffs had credited on the $40,000 certain cash proceeds of the liquidation, they were entitled to reduce such credits by the amount of expenses subsequently paid by them, and were not required to postpone any credits to themselves for payments on the ground that they would later take in more money.

2. PAYMENT (§ 39*)—APPLICATION—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Defendants being under no obligation to make any payments, but having simply the option of reimbursing plaintiffs, the relation of debtor and creditor did not exist between them, and hence Civ. Code, § 1479, subdiv. 2, providing that an application once made by the creditor cannot be rescinded without the debtor's consent, did not govern, such statute applying only to debtors and creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

3. ESCROWS (§ 15*)—CONDITION—FAILURE OF PERFORMANCE—REDELIVERY TO DEPOSITOR.

Plaintiffs and defendants, who together owned practically all the stock of an insolvent corporation, agreed that plaintiffs should pay all the debts, provided that defendants would contribute to the assets a mortgage on their property; plaintiffs agreeing to surrender all their interest in the corporation to defendants on being repaid a certain sum. A satisfaction of the mortgage and also all the stock were deposited in escrow to be delivered to defendants on their performing the agreement, and, on their failure so to do, to be returned to plaintiffs. Held, that defendants being under no obligation to make any payment, but simply having an option so to do, plaintiffs were entitled on defendants' failing to pay to the stock and satisfaction of the mortgage, the rule that equity will not lend itself actively to enforce a penalty or forfeiture not applying, a forfeiture under such rule implying a breach of duty on the part of one losing his interest in the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escrows, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

4. ESCROWS (§ 15*)—REDELIVERY TO DEPOSITOR.

Civ. Code, § 3380, providing that any person having the possession or control of a particular article of personal property of which he is not the owner may be compelled specifically to deliver it to the person entitled to its immediate possession, authorized an action by plaintiffs against the depositary to recover the papers.

5. ESCROWS (§ 15*)—REDELIVERY TO DEPOSITOR — ACTION AGAINST DEPOSITARY — DEFENSES.

The depositary claiming no interest in the property beyond the right to hold possession until the happening of the contingency provided for, he could not defend on the ground that plaintiffs were seeking to enforce a forfeiture.

6. ESCROWS (§ 15*) — ACTION AGAINST DEPOSITARY—PLEADING.

Plaintiffs were not required in such action to allege the value of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by A. Dalton Harrison and others against O. J. Woodward and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Franklin P. Nutting and Henry Brickley, for appellants. Wright & Wright, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The determination of the controversy really turns upon the construction of a certain agreement between James E. Bell and A. Dalton Harrison, the parties of the first part, and John M. Seropian and George M. Seropian, the parties of the second part, executed on the 23d day of January, 1904. These parties were the owners of all but two shares of the capital stock of a corporation engaged in the fruit business. It is not disputed that the corporation was indebted to various persons in a sum exceeding $135,000, and it appears that it was insolvent. The affairs of the concern were involved in litigation, and there was great dissension and bitterness between Bell and Harrison on the one hand and the Seropians on the other. To prevent a sacrifice of the property in a court of bankruptcy and to effect a permanent settlement of their joint affairs, the said agreement was entered into by the terms of which the said Bell and Harrison were to pay all the debts of the corporation, provided the Seropians would contribute to its assets a $15,000 mortgage on their Fresno ranch, and the former further covenanted to surrender to the latter all their interest in said corporation upon repayment to them of the sum of $110,000. An escrow arrangement was devised to accomplish the desired result. A satisfaction of said mortgage and also all of the capital stock of the corporation owned by the parties, properly indorsed so as to entitle it to be transferred on the books of the corporation, were deposited with O. J. Woodward, subject to the following conditions, to wit: "Said satisfaction of mortgage and all of said stock to be delivered to second parties, they having performed all of the terms and stipulations of this agreement by them to be performed, whenever within two years from the date thereof said first parties shall have been repaid, on account of their advances made and those to be made to said corporation as herein before specified, the sum of one hundred and ten thousand dollars U. S. gold coin. * * * It being a still further condition of such payment that said $40,000.00 and interest thereon be fully paid within six months from date hereof * * * time being expressly made of the essence of this agreement and particularly of the escrow. * * * In the event, however, such payments have not been made to said parties of the first part in the amount and at the times hereinbefore specified, and also, in the event that parties of the second part have failed or neglected to perform any of the covenants, terms, conditions or stipulations on their part to be performed by this agreement, then all of said capital stock so deposited in escrow, and said satisfaction of mortgage shall be delivered to parties of the first part, and said escrow shall thereupon be terminated." The method contemplated for the repayment to the said parties of the first part is shown in the following provision of the agreement: "It is further agreed that the parties of the first part shall have full charge of the liquidation of the affairs of said corporation of Seropian Bros. The parties of the first part shall proceed at once to sell in the name of said corporation, and shall sell as speedily as possible, at prevailing market prices, all fruits of said corporation; * * * it being understood that the cash proceeds of the liquidation of the assets of said corporation, including therein proceeds of sales of any assets of said corporation which shall be made during such liquidation shall be applied on account of said sum of $110,000." It was further provided "that all reasonable and proper expenses connected with the liquidation of the affairs of said corporation, including the packing, seeding and stemming required by agreements with the California Raisin Growers' Association are to be taken from cash proceeds of liquidation before the application thereof to the payment of indebtedness of the corporation to the parties of the first part," and that the parties of the first part "shall advance the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars to enable said corporation to complete its confirmation or purchase of raisins from the California Raisin Growers' Association, which said advance shall be considered one of the expenses of the liquidation of the affairs of the corporation, to be paid together with interest thereon from the date thereof, at the rate of six per cent. per annum to said parties of the first part, independent of said sum of one hundred and ten thousand dollars."

On the ground that they had not been repaid the sum of $40,000 as prescribed, plaintiffs, after the expiration of the six months and the days of grace allowed, brought the action to recover a judgment directing the said O. J. Woodward to deliver to plaintiffs said documents held by him in escrow as aforesaid. Defendants denied "that all money received by plaintiffs from the sale of the assets of said corporation or from any proceeds of said liquidation was credited by plaintiffs on the said sum of $40,000 and interest thereon that was to be paid to them in accordance with the terms of said agreement, but allege that large sums of money far exceeding the said sum of $40,000 and said interest thereon were received by said plaintiffs and not credited on said sum of $40,000 or on their accounts with defendants." Defendants also filed a cross-complaint charging plaintiffs with inefficiency, want of diligence, and criminal conspiracy in conjunction with their employes in their method of caring for the fruit and in selling the same and making collections therefor, whereby defendants were damaged in a sum exceeding $200,000.

The conclusion of the court was in favor of plaintiffs upon all the material issues. The amount including the interest to be paid within the six months was the sum of $41,200, and the court found that to this account no more than $31,000 could be credited as payment. This finding is the subject of the principal controversy between the parties.

Appellants insist that error was committed by the trial court in charging against this sum of $41,200 as expenses of liquidation, two items of $3,500 and $9,694.27. It seems that plaintiffs about a week after the execution of said contract of January 23d advanced the sum of $3,500 to "complete the confirmation" of the purchase of certain raisins pursuant to said contract, and on the same date they caused the corporation to execute and deliver a promissory note for $9,694.27 in favor of the First National Bank of Fresno. This note was also signed by the plaintiffs, and was paid by them prior to the expiration of the term for the payment of the said sum of $41,200. Prior to the execution of the contract of January 23d, the corporation, by George M. Seropian, acting president, entered into a contract for the purchase of a large quantity of raisins from the California Raisin Growers' Association, agreeing to pay therefor $19,614, paying on account 10 per cent. of the purchase price. Certain lots of these were sold and paid for prior to said January 23d, and at that time $13,194.27 was the balance due on the purchase price. As before stated, it was a part of the contract of liquidation that plaintiffs should advance the said sum of $3,500 to close the transaction of purchase; it being understood by the plaintiffs and the Seropians that Woodward would advance on the security of the raisins taken over the balance of the purchase price. The association was in need of funds, and was insisting upon the payment by the corporation of its indebtedness. The association owed the corporation $6,075 for rent of the latter's packing house, and it had also agreed to pay the corporation a bonus of $3,375 on condition that the corporation keep its agreement as to the purchase of the raisins. Both these sums were likely to be lost if the purchase was not completed. Woodward refused to loan the $9,694 on the corporation's note to be secured by the raisins, but insisted upon the signatures, as joint makers, of Bell and Harrison. The note was thereupon executed upon the agreement of the association to waive all claim to the forfeiture of the said bonus of $3,375, and to pay at once the said rent of $6,075 then past due. This rent was applied to the payment of one of the obligations of the corporation which plaintiffs had assumed under the said contract of January 23d. As stated by respondents: "In purchasing these raisins the corporation not only saved the 10 per cent. which it had already paid, but made an immediate collection of $6,075 and a few months later of the bonus of $3,375 and in addition realized later the full value of the raisins purchased. Not to have completed this transaction would have been most detrimental to the interests of the corporation, and, had Bell and Harrison failed to do so in the face of their stipulation to make the $3,500 advance, the Seropians would certainly and properly so have been most severe in their denunciation of them." Indeed, there can be no valid objection to the action of the plaintiffs in completing the purchase of the raisins. It was not only authorized by said contract of January 23d, but it was clearly within the principles of ordinary prudence and fair dealing. Nor does it seem a matter of just complaint that the payment was made a short time before plaintiffs could be compelled by Woodward to do so. They had a right to use their own judgment as to such details of the liquidation, and the trial court was justified in holding that they acted wisely and in the utmost good faith.

The appellants, however, contend that the respondents having rendered a statement to the Seropians under date of July 12, 1904, showing at that date $29,171.60 to have been paid on the said $40,000 and interest, leaving a balance of $10,870.49 to be paid on or before August 8th, the said respondents could not by a subsequent application of expenses of liquidation reduce this balance. Appellants declare: "There can be no question as to when or how the changes in the application of payments took place. The first occurred on July 14, 1904, and consisted in taking the sum of $3,500 and interest from the $29,171.60 already credited on the $40,000 account and with it paying the account entitled 'Catton, Bell & Co. a/c C. R. G. Assoc.' This amount was then charged to the debit side of the account with the Seropians. The next change was made on July 21, 1904, when the further sum of $8,241.77 was deducted from the $29,171.60 already credited on the $40,000 account to pay the remainder of the account entitled 'Bills Payable a/c C. R. G. A.' This change of application was noted in the statement sent to the Seropians on July 21, 1904. These two changes in the application of payments already credited on another account aggregated $11,747.77. Adding to $31,000—the amount found by the court to have been paid on the $40,000 account—the said sum of $11,747.77 and the amount paid by the Seropians was $42,741.77, $1,541.77 in excess of the amount required." The point is that the law does not permit such a change of the application of payments already made on account. Wendt v. Ross, 33 Cal. 650; Cardinell v. O'Dowd, 43 Cal. 586; White v. Costigan, 138 Cal. 564, 72 Pac. 178; Civ. Code, § 1479, subd. 2.

The trial judge, in disposing of this contention, used the following language: "There is some claim as to the way in which the various charges and credits are made in reference to settlements with the raisin association. I do not understand the claim to be made now that the plaintiffs are not entitled to credit the amount they paid in confirming that sale. * * * In determining how these credits and charges should be made, the defendants must consider the matter as simply between plaintiffs and the corporation without regard to the question whether the $40,000 was to be raised by a certain time. The charges should be made and the credits given just as they occurred. When the plaintiffs paid out money, they paid it. Of course, that should be credited to them at that time. If they afterwards got any money, they would charge themselves with it, but only as of the time when they received it. The theory of the defendants seems to be that they should postpone any credits to themselves for payments because afterwards they would be getting in more money. That is not the proper theory of the case at all. They should be charged and credited just as the transaction occurred." The foregoing is the reasonable view, and is in accordance with the method contemplated by the parties. The stipulation to which we have already referred in relation to "all reasonable and proper expenses" of the liquidation cannot be construed as claimed by appellants. The parties themselves by their contract having established a rule of appropriation, effect, of course, must be given to it to the exclusion of any other. Again, the rule as to application of payments invoked by appellants is in force only between debtors and creditors. The parties here do not sustain that relation to each other. It is clear that no obligation was imposed upon the Seropians to make any payments whatever. They had the option to make sales, and also from their own funds to supply any deficiency in the reimbursement of plaintiffs, but they were under no legal nor moral compulsion to do either. Under some circumstances, after reporting $29,000 as paid on the $40,000 account, plaintiffs would be estopped from reducing it by reason of expenditures subsequently entered, but estoppel is not pleaded nor does it appear that appellants were misled to their prejudice. It cannot be said that at any time within the six months was there in the hands of the liquidators the sum of $40,000 after deducting the just and reasonable expenses of liquidation, and therefore under the provisions of the escrow agreement plaintiffs were entitled to the documents held by Woodward. Indeed, the evidence shows that on August 16, 1906, five months prior to January 23, 1907, the date of the final payment under the contract, the liquidators had received only the sum of $32,871.03, with the packing houses as the only remaining asset—which it is stated by respondents and not disputed by appellants was sold in the summer of 1907 for $14,000. Thus it is seen how barren ultimately would be the victory of appellants if they should be upheld in their technical view of the application of payments on the $40,000 account. Appellants are equally at fault in their contention that this is a proceeding to which the rule applies that equity will not lend itself actively to enforce a penalty or forfeiture or a loss in the nature of a forfeiture. The principle upon which appellants rely is stated in 1 Pomeroy, Eq. Juris, § 459, as follows: "When will a court of equity by its decree actively enforce or carry into effect a forfeiture? The general answer to this question is easy and clear. It is a well-settled and familiar doctrine that equity will not interfere on behalf of the party entitled thereto and enforce a forfeiture but will leave him to his legal remedies, if any, even if the case be one in which no equitable relief would be given to the defaulting party against the forfeiture." But the forfeiture which equity hesitates to enforce is what Blackstone defines as "a punishment annexed by law to some illegal act or negligence in the owner of lands, tenements or hereditaments, whereby he loses all his interest therein, and they become vested in the party injured as a recompense for the wrong which he alone or the public together with himself hath sustained." 2 Bl. Com. 269. It implies a breach of duty on the part of the one losing his interest in the property. In the case here no obligation was imposed upon defendants to make any payment. They had simply an option to do so which they failed to exercise.

The action itself, while involving equitable principles, as it relates to the termination of a trust, has particular features that carry it beyond the ordinary range of equitable cognizance. Indeed, it is authorized by a special provision of the statute contained in section 3380 of the Civil Code that "any person having the possession or control of a particular article of personal property of which he is not the owner may be compelled specifically to deliver it to the person entitled to its immediate possession." There is no apparent reason why effect should not be given to this remedial measure, and since the evidence is clear that Woodward had in his possession these articles of personal property of which he was not the owner, and furthermore that under the terms of the agreement of January 23d, plaintiffs had become entitled to the same, and, it further appearing that there was nothing immoral, illegal, or inequitable in the original transaction of January 23d, we have a proper case for the the relief provided in said section 3380. In fact, Woodward was the only necessary party defendant, and he obviously could not refuse to deliver the papers to plaintiffs on the ground that the latter were seeking to enforce a forfeiture, as that is no concern of his. He is indifferent as between the other parties, and he claims no interest in the property beyond the right to hold the possession until the happening of a certain contingency. The Seroplans were made defendants that a judgment concluding the trust and directing the delivery of the said documents to plaintiffs might bind all and protect Woodward from further litigation of the question of fact as to whether said contingency had occurred. It must be clear, therefore, that, if we concede an element of forfeiture to be involved in the suit it is not available as a defense to Woodward, it would not excuse him from delivering the papers to plaintiffs as he agreed, nor does it entitle the defendants to any affirmative relief as that would be in violation of their contract with plaintiffs and opposed to the well-established principle that equity will not aid those who do not regard their covenants. The theory of appellants, therefore, leads to the conclusion that neither are they nor is Woodward entitled to the possession of the papers, but that he should deliver them to plaintiffs.

What has been said is perhaps a sufficient answer to appellants' contention that there should have been an allegation of the value of the property as is required in an action in claim and delivery. Technically this is neither such an action nor is it a proceeding for specific performance, but it is an action for specific delivery of personal property under a title of the Code providing for "Specific and Preventive Relief," and the measure of the relief granted is found in the provisions of chapter 1 of said title. Section 3380, as originally adopted, reads as follows: "Any person having the possession or control of a particular article of personal property of which he is not the owner may be compelled specifically to deliver it to the person entitled to its immediate possession in either of the following cases: (1) When the thing claimed is held subject to an express trust in favor of the claimant. (2) When pecuniary compensation would not afford adequate relief for the loss of the thing claimed and (3) When it would be extremely difficult to ascertain the actual damage caused by the loss." It was amended by eliminating the specification of the cases in which it was allowed. The purpose of the amendment undoubtedly was to enlarge its scope, although as it formerly stood it would have authorized this action, since the documents were held by Woodward "subject to an express trust." The tendency, however, of legislation as well as of its construction by the courts is to enlarge the operation of remedial principles to promote justice and prevent wrongdoing. The boundaries of equity are being constantly extended to meet the demands of our complex civilization. As said by Chief Justice Fuller in the case of Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 163 U. S. 564, 16 Sup. Ct. 1173, 41 L. Ed. 265: "The jurisdiction of equity to decree the specific performance of agreements is of very ancient date and rests on the ground of the inadequacy and unfitness of the remedy at law. Its exercise prevents the intolerable travesty of justice involved in permitting parties to refuse performance of a contract at pleasure by electing to pay damages for the breach. It must not be forgotten that in the increasing complexities of modern business relations all equitable remedies have necessarily and steadily been expanded, and no inflexible rule has been permitted to circumscribe them. As has been well said, equity has contrived its remedies 'so that they shall correspond both to the primary right of the injured party and to the wrong by which that right has been violated,' and 'has always preserved the elements of flexibility and expansiveness so that new ones may be invented or old ones modified in order to meet the requirements of every case and to satisfy the needs of a progressive social condition in which new primary rights and duties are constantly arising and new kinds of wrongs are constantly committed.' Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 111."

There is nothing in the statute nor can any good reason be advanced requiring the plaintiff in an action of this kind to allege the value of the property. It would be a strange defense for Woodward to urge that he was not required to execute his trust because the property was of no pecuniary value to plaintiffs, and the only purpose to be subserved by an allegation of value would be to recover it instead of the property itself if possession of the latter could not be obtained. But plaintiff is not required to allege anything more than to show that he is entitled to recover what the statute specifically authorizes; that is, the possession of the identical thing detained. The position taken here by appellants is as destitute of merit as would be the contention that a plaintiff in an action of ejectment must allege the value of the real property in order to state a cause of action.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

STANDARD BOX CO. v. MUTUAL BISCUIT CO. (Civ. 588.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
July 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied by
Supreme Court Sept. 7, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 24*)—OPTION CONTRACTS—ACCEPTANCE—TIME.

Where an option to purchase goods limited no time of acceptance, it was revoked by the lapse of a reasonable time without acceptance.

2. SALES (§ 88*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS—QUESTION OF LAW.

What is a reasonable time to accept an option to purchase goods is a question of law.

3. SALES (§ 24*)—OPTIONS—ACCEPTANCE—TIME OF ACCEPTANCE.

Notice of acceptance of an option to purchase boxes 10 months after the option was given, and after a disastrous earthquake and fire had greatly increased the market value of the goods, was not given within a reasonable time.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 442*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING CONTRACTS—EXTENDING TIME OF ACCEPTANCE.

That which is implied by law becomes as much a part of a written contract as its written terms, and if, aided by such implication, it is clear and complete, the part implied cannot be contradicted by parol, so that the reasonable time within which the law required an option to be accepted where no time was stated could not be extended by a prior or contemporaneous executory parol agreement.

5. SALES (§ 89*)—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT—“EXECUTED CONTRACTS.”

An oral agreement between the buyer and seller to extend the time of acceptance of an option to purchase to a certain date, made when the option was given, was not an executed contract within Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a written contract may only be altered by a contract in writing or an executed parol agreement, where the written option was not accepted within a reasonable time, and the seller at the time of the acceptance refused to recognize the existence of the option.

6. SALES (§ 35*)—VALIDITY—“DURESS”—“MENACE.”

Civ. Code, § 1569, defines “duress” as (1) the unlawful confinement of a person; (2) unlawful detention of the property of any such person; (3) confinement of such person, lawful in form, but fraudulently obtained. Section 1570 defines “menace” as consisting of the duress specified in subdivisions 1 and 2, and unlawful and violent injury to the person and property of such person, or injury to his character. Defendant demanded the right to purchase boxes from plaintiff at an alleged contract price, which contract, in fact, did not exist, but plaintiff refused to sell at less than practically the market price, which was higher than the alleged contract price. It was practically impossible to then buy the boxes elsewhere, and they were essential to the continuance of defendant's business, and defendant claimed it was coerced into paying the price charged therefor. Held, that some element of compulsion or threatened exercise of power over the person or property to compel payment must be present to constitute duress, and defendant was not compelled by duress to purchase and pay the price charged for the boxes.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Standard Box Company against the Mutual Biscuit Company. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for appellant. P. L. Benjamin, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict for $1,444.83, the amount claimed in the complaint. Defendant appeals from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

It appeared that defendant had been purchasing certain boxes, cases, and trays from plaintiff for defendant's use in its business during the year 1905 under a written agreement dated July 25, 1905. While this contract was in force, to wit, September 1, 1905, plaintiff addressed the following letter to defendant (Defendant's Exhibit No.

2): "Gentlemen: We hereby agree to give you an option from one year from July 25, 1906, to furnish boxes at the same price as agreed upon in contract entered into between the Mutual Biscuit Co. and Standard Box Company. We furthermore agree to allow discount of 19½% off said prices, as present in said contract." On the same day defendant wrote plaintiff as follows (marked Defendant's Exhibit No. 3): "Gentlemen: We are in receipt of your communication of this inst., containing option for the continuation of contract for one year from July 25, 1906, with same conditions, prices and discounts as at present." It is not pretended that this last above letter was anything more than an acknowledgment of the receipt of plaintiff's letter. It is in no sense an acceptance of the option given defendant, and may be dismissed from further consideration. By the earthquake and fire of April 18, 1906, the plant of defendant was destroyed and was not rebuilt until the latter part of August of that year. On July 25th defendant mailed the following letter to plaintiff bearing that date: "Temporary Office Mutual Biscuit Co., 72 Central Ave., San Francisco, July 25, 1906. Standard Box Co., Beale & Bryant Sts., City. Gentlemen: In accordance with your contract letter of Sept. 1, 1905, we hereby accept the option therein, agreeing to purchase all of our boxes of you upon same terms and prices as in previous contract, 19½% discount off. This to be in effect for one year from July 25, 1906, pursuant to contents of said letter. In a previous letter we stated that we would change our stamp, but this we have decided not to do for a while at least. You will please have delivered at factory anywhere from Aug. 20th to Sept. 1st, the following: 1000 of our ¼ boxes. 1000 of our ¼ boxes. 500 of our ½ cases. 500 of our full cases. To be delivered at our new factory at Stevenson, Crocker and Colton streets." Coincidentally with offering this letter in evidence defendant endeavored to prove that prior to and at the time the option (Exhibit 2) was given the plaintiff verbally agreed with defendant that defendant should have and was given to and including July 25, 1906, within which to accept said proposal or offer contained in said option, if defendant so desired. Objection was made by plaintiff to all such evidence and to the letter offered in evidence as incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant and also upon the ground that "the conversation sought to be proved was merged into the subsequently executed papers whatever those papers may have been; and upon the further ground that it is an attempt to vary a contract, which, if it exists, is in writing, and is required to be in writing by the statute of frauds." The court sustained the objection, and neither the oral evidence nor the letter of July 25, 1906, was admitted.

It appeared that payment for the goods, the subject of the action, became due between October 13, 1906, and November 26, 1906; that the price to be paid was the usual market price prevailing at the time of delivery. Defendant claimed that if he had not been compelled to purchase the goods from plaintiff at the going prices, and had not also been compelled to purchase from other box factories at advanced rates, the difference between the prices so paid by it and the prices mentioned in said option would be considerably in excess of the amount now claimed by plaintiff, and for this excess defendant asks judgment in its several counterclaims pleaded. Defendant does not claim that a contract arose by virtue alone of its written acceptance sent to plaintiff after the option was given, but it is claimed that, having been verbally told at the time that it would be allowed one year within which to inform plaintiff of its acceptance, it should have been permitted to make this proof, and that the court erred in refusing evidence of that fact. The question then is: Was it competent to prove by parol that defendant had one year within which to accept plaintiff's offer? The option is silent as to the time of acceptance. It was but a proposal which is revoked by "the lapse of a reasonable time without communication of the acceptance." Civ. Code, subd. 2, § 1587. See, also, 9 Cyc. 291; Chicago & G. E. R. R. Co. v. Dane, 43 N. Y. 240; 1 Page on Contracts, § 38. What is a reasonable time is a question of law for the court. Roberts v. Evans, 43 Cal. 380, was the case of an offer to sell personal property, and it was said: "An offer to sell, where no time is given, must be accepted at once, or within a reasonable time thereafter. A year, or even six months, must be held, as a matter of law, to be an unreasonable time." In Crossmore v. Page, 73 Cal. 213, 14 Pac. 787, 2 Am. St. Rep. 789, a promissory note provided that default in payment of interest should work the immediate maturity of the note, at the option of the holder. A delay of seven months was held to be a waiver of the right to exercise the option, and that the holder must wait until another installment of interest became due. In the case, Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., supra, four months was held not to be a reasonable time within which to accept the offer there involved. The notice of acceptance here was given 10 months after the offer and, if that would matter, after conditions in San Francisco had so changed as to greatly increase the market value of the goods. We think the acceptance was not given within a reasonable time.

Nor do we think it was competent to show by parol testimony that at the time the option was given plaintiff agreed that defendant should have one year within which to accept it. It is a well-settled principle that that which is implied by law becomes as much a part of the contract as that which is therein written, and, if the contract is clear and complete when aided by that which is imported into it by legal implication, it cannot be contradicted by parol in respect of that which is implied any more than in respect of that which is written. In the present case the law required that the acceptance should be communicated to plaintiff within a reasonable time, and this reasonable time could not be extended by parol. The principle was stated by us in Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525, 90 Pac. 948: "Where the contract appears to be merely an incomplete memorandum, or to be partly in writing or partly in parol, extrinsic evidence is admissible to show what the mutual stipulations were. But this is true only as to such matters concerning which the written memorandum is silent or as to which terms are used which import ambiguity or uncertainty—i. e., which on their face admit of doubt as to what the parties meant by their use. There is another principle to be observed, namely, that whatever the law implies from a contract in writing is as much a part of the contract as that which is therein expressed; and to the extent that the contract, with that which the law implies, is clear, definite, and complete, it cannot be added to, varied, or contradicted by extrinsic evidence"—citing Fawcner v. Smith Wall Paper Co., 88 Iowa, 169, 55 N. W. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 230. In Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 Pac. 964, the memorandum of sale of the goods did not state the time and place of delivery, and it was hence argued that the memorandum was incomplete. But the court held otherwise and that the provisions of the Civil Code (sections 1753 and 1754) are deemed to be a part of the contract and supplied the missing provisions. The rule that prior or contemporaneous negotiations cannot be used to contradict, add to, or vary a written contract applies not only to the letter of the written document, but also to its legal effect, as for example, where no time of performance is fixed, the law implies that a reasonable time is given, and evidence that a specific time had been agreed upon is inadmissible. 17 Cyc. 570; 2 Page on Contracts, § 1195, citing Fisk v. Casey, 119 Cal. 643, 51 Pac. 1077. The principle was applied in the following among many other cases which I have examined: Stone v. Harmon, 31 Minn. 512, 19 N. W. 88; Liljengren F. & L. Co. v. Mead, 42 Minn. 420, 44 N. W. 306; Irish v. Dean, 39 Wis. 562; Warren v. Wheeler, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 99; Driver v. Ford, 90 Ill. 598; Smith v. Caro, 9 Or. 284; Boehm v. Lies (Super. N. Y.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 577; Rodney v. Wilson, 67 Mo. 123, 29 Am. Rep. 499; Doolittle v. Ferry, 20 Kan. 230, 27 Am. Rep. 166; Charles v. Denis, 42 Wis. 56, 24 Am. Rep. 383; Stack v. Beach, 74 Ind. 571, 39 Am. Rep. 113; Bryan v. Duff, 12 Wash. 233, 40 Pac. 936, 50 Am. St. Rep. 889; Skelton v. Dustin, 92 Ill. 52; Martin v. Cole, 104

U. S. 38, 26 L. Ed. 647; Allen v. Chambers, 13 Wash. 333, 43 Pac. 57. Certain decisions of our Supreme Court are cited as establishing a contrary rule to that we have given. In Wangenheim v. Graham, 39 Cal. 169, it was held that the time for the performance of a simple contract in writing may be waived, or extended, by subsequent oral agreement. But it was pointed out in Henahan v. Hart, 127 Cal. 656, 60 Pac. 423, that the Wangenheim Case was decided prior to the amendment of section 1693 of the Civil Code, and that the rule laid down in that case is not now the law. Henahan v. Hart, supra, was followed in Harloe v. Lambie, 132 Cal. 136, 64 Pac. 88. See, also, Muller v. Swanton, 140 Cal. 249, 73 Pac. 994. Appellant relies with much confidence upon Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571, and subsequent cases in which it is cited. In the Sivers Case the written agreement was to pay $300 loaned "or any further sum of money which he may loan us at such time as circumstances may occur," and, if not paid within a certain time (five years), the signers agreed to give a mortgage as security upon certain described land. As conclusion of law the court found that no time of payment being specified the obligation became due on demand. It was alleged in the complaint and found by the court that at the time the agreement was entered into it was orally agreed that defendants should pay the sum named in the instrument "whenever they should sell the real estate described, and that such sale had been made prior to the plaintiff's demand and the commencement of the action." It was objected that oral proof of this written agreement was incompetent, as the written agreement must be held to embrace all the terms of the agreement between the parties. It was said on appeal: "The instrument, therefore, being silent in respect of the time for the payment of the money, it was competent for the plaintiff to show that a period or event had been agreed upon between the parties thereto at which payment should be made, and such agreement could be shown by oral testimony. This evidence did not contradict or vary any of the terms in the instrument. The rule which excludes evidence affecting the terms of a written instrument does not apply * * * when the evidence is not inconsistent with the terms embodied in the instrument"—citing Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630, 30 Pac. 786. "Inasmuch, therefore, as the instrument does not specify any time for its performance, the finding of the court that the money therein named became payable immediately upon the demand therefor was correct (Civ. Code, § 1657); and the further findings respecting the foregoing oral agreement did not prejudice the appellant. If the money was payable immediately on demand, they were not prejudiced by the fact that the demand was not made until after they had sold the property, or by the fact that it had been agreed that a demand should not be made until after such sale." It must be admitted that some expressions in the opinion would seem to be at variance with what may safely be said to be the universal rule as we have given it. We do not think the writer of the opinion, or the court in adopting it, intended to establish a rule so greatly different from that prevailing generally in this country and in England. We think the rule there laid down was with reference to what was regarded as a collateral agreement upon which the instrument was silent and all the authorities hold that such an agreement does not vary the written instrument and may be shown by parol. The writer of the opinion in the Sivers Case also wrote the opinion in Savings Bank v. Asbury, 117 Cal. 96, 48 Pac. 1081, and he cited the Sivers Case as applying to a collateral agreement. The Sivers Case was cited in Bradford Investment Co. v. Joost, 117 Cal. 204, 48 Pac. 1083, but was distinguished and was not followed because not applicable. In Board of Education v. Grant, 118 Cal. 39, 50 Pac. 5, the Sivers Case is referred to, and it was pretty broadly hinted that so much of the opinion as held that, where the written agreement mentioned no time of payment, evidence of a contemporaneous oral agreement was admissible, must be considered as dictum. In Wolters v. King, 119 Cal. 172, 51 Pac. 35, the defendants were to be paid in lumber for certain land which they sold, as plaintiff's agents, to the Red Cross Lumber Company. Defendants were to receive all the lumber in payment for the land and were to be paid their commissions also out of the lumber. They claimed the right, under section 1657, Civ. Code, to appropriate the first lumber delivered as commissions, but evidence was admitted that at the time the contracts were entered into it was orally agreed that the commissions were not to be paid until all the lumber was delivered. This evidence was held admissible. In Richter v. Union Land Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 Pac. 39, the circumstances were peculiar to that case and the oral agreements were held admissible under section 1856, Code Civ. Proc. In Williams v. Ashurst Oil Co., 144 Cal. 619, 78 Pac. 28, all that was there held on the point was that, as the writing did not show on its face what shares of stock were meant by the writing, "parol evidence is admissible to show other conditions or explain latent ambiguities." But we have seen that, where the law fixes the time of performance, parol evidence of some other definite time is inadmissible as varying the written instrument. In Pierce v. Edwards, 150 Cal. 650, 89 Pac. 600, the Sivers Case is again cited but to the point that oral stipulations sought to be proved are not inconsistent with the terms embraced in the writing. But the law in the present case completed the agreement by clearly implied terms which could not under the settled rule be changed by parol. The last case, in which reference is made to the Sivers Case, is Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319. The contract there was in writing by which defendant sold to plaintiff certain "five hundred boxes apricots, more or less," designated by lots A, B, etc. The question was whether evidence was admissible to show a sale by samples and hence a warranty of quality. It was held inadmissible. It was said: "If it (the writing) imports on its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement—that is, contains such language as imports a complete legal obligation—it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular [matter] to which parol evidence is directed. The rule forbids to add by parol when the writing is silent, as well as to vary where it speaks"—citing Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469, from which the quotation is taken. The court said further: "To hold parties to diligence and care in reducing their negotiations to writing, and to hold the writing to be subject to attack only by specific allegations of fraud or mistake, appears to be the better rule, and is now supported by the weight of authority. Like the statute of frauds, this rule is founded upon the long and convincing experience that written evidence is more certain and accurate than 'slippery memory.' So long as the rule is applied, the actual contract made can be preserved without fear of its being affected in its terms by the frailties of an interested human recollection. That sometimes the written contract does not include all the terms intended by reason of neglect or oversight, and injustice thereby done in particular cases, does not justify the abandonment of the rule. To construe it away is to destroy one of the greatest barriers against fraud and perjury."

Appellant cites numerous cases from other jurisdictions holding that evidence of a subsequent parol agreement may be given extending the time of performance, but obviously they have no application here for the Civil Code (section 1698) provides that "a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise." The claim that the alleged oral agreement was an executed agreement within the meaning of section 1698, Civ. Code, is without merit. Platt v. Butcher, 112 Cal. 634, 44 Pac. 1060; MacKinzie v. Hodgkin, 126 Cal. 598, 59 Pac. 36, 77 Am. St. Rep. 209; Henehan v. Hart, 127 Cal. 656, 60 Pac. 426; Harloe v. Lambie, 132 Cal. 133, 64 Pac. 88.

attention to its counterclaims which it seeks to support because, as is alleged, its purchases and payments were "at prices higher than the contract rates," and "were compulsory, involuntary, and under protest." After alleging the prices as provided for in the alleged contract, the first two counterclaims rest substantially upon the following averments: That defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling bread stuffs, crackers, and biscuits; that by reason of the earthquake and fire of April 18, 1906, its plant was destroyed as were also "a large number of plants located in San Francisco wherein were manufactured boxes, cases," etc., in which defendant packed its articles of manufacture; that by reason thereof "it was practically impossible for said defendant to procure or purchase from any person, firm or corporation, other than plaintiff, the boxes, * * * required by it in its said business, or any large portion of the same, and without such boxes * * * it would have been impossible for defendant to have continued in its said business, all of which was known to said plaintiff," which, as is alleged, would have resulted in defendant's great financial loss and the loss of its business; that on various occasions between September 19, 1906, and December 21, 1906, plaintiff, "taking advantage of the distressed condition of defendant and its necessities, wrongfully demanded amounts of money aggregating $2,843.39 in payment of said boxes * * * so furnished to defendant, although the agreed price * * * was and is the sum of $1,628.27 and threatened defendant that if it refused to pay said sums, aggregating $2,843.39, said plaintiff would refuse to furnish said defendant any further boxes," etc.

A second counterclaim of $905.18 consists of a discount of 19½ per cent. upon certain boxes, trays, etc., and in addition to those mentioned as constituting the first counterclaim, being the same boxes, etc., as are referred to in plaintiff's complaint, and it is claimed that this amount should be allowed defendant under the terms of the alleged contract.

As a third counterclaim, it is alleged that between December 2, 1906, and January 27, 1907, "plaintiff wrongfully refused to furnish said boxes, trays, and extra tops or any portion thereof, pursuant to the terms of said contract, * * * denied that it was any longer in force or effect, and denied that it was under any obligation or liability whatever to comply with the terms, or any term of said contract, or to furnish defendant with any of said boxes, cases, trays, or extra tops," by reason whereof "defendant was compelled to and did purchase the same from other plants in the city and county of San Francisco, paying therefor the sum of $1,959.84, being $873.30 in excess of the price which plaintiff agreed to furnish to defendant said boxes * * * pursuant to the terms of said contract," and that said sum of $1,959.84 "was the least amount for which said boxes * * * could be purchased by defendant."

A fourth counterclaim is set forth based upon like averments and averring that between January 25, 1907, and July 25, 1907, by reason of plaintiff's refusal to comply with said alleged contract, defendant was compelled to purchase elsewhere in San Francisco, articles which cost defendant $6,573.22, being $3,369.42 in excess of the prices at which plaintiff agreed to furnish the same.

It will be observed that the counterclaims, except the two arising out of purchases made from plaintiff prior to December 2, 1906, are for articles purchased from factories in San Francisco, other than plaintiff's. It is nowhere alleged in the answer that defendant was at any time compelled to pay either to plaintiff or any other factory more than the market rates existing at that time, or that the prices charged were exorbitant or oppressive, and a comparison of the prices paid to outside parties by defendant, as appears by the answer, will show them to have been quite as high as, if not higher, than those paid to plaintiff. The evidence was that upon being told by plaintiff that it would have to pay the current market rates, paid by all others, defendant objected, and claimed that it should be supplied at the contract rates contemplated in the option; that plaintiff denied that any contract existed, and refused to furnish any boxes to defendant except at market rates, whereupon defendant accepted the goods upon plaintiff's terms, and paid the earlier bills as rendered by plaintiff without objection or protest. Later in their dealings, when there became due certain bills, about November 26, 1906, amounting to the sum named in the complaint, defendant refused payment, and this suit was brought on December 8, 1906. The third and fourth counterclaims are based wholly upon plaintiff's refusal to comply with the alleged contract whereby defendant was compelled to purchase its supplies elsewhere, and both of these counterclaims accrued after this suit was brought. As plaintiff was under no obligation to provide boxes to defendant under the alleged contract, its proposal never, in fact, having ripened into a contract, it is obvious that these particular claims are groundless. Plaintiff had a right to refuse to deliver boxes when demanded by defendant at times and at prices to which plaintiff had never agreed. No issue of duress or compulsion is involved in these items of the counterclaims, and they may be dismissed from further consideration. They rest entirely upon breach of an alleged contract having no existence.

Defendant offered to prove all the allegations contained in its first and second counterclaims. Plaintiff's counsel consented that the offer might be made in that way but objected to the evidence as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objection was sustained and defendant took an exception. It is not claimed by defendant that it offered to or could prove any facts showing duress other than as alleged in the answer. Is sufficient there set forth to constitute what the law regards as duress? Reduced to its essence, the answer shows that defendant was in great need of certain boxes, cases, and trays with which to conduct its business of making and marketing biscuits; that it was "practically impossible" for defendant to purchase them elsewhere than of plaintiff; that defendant demanded of plaintiff that it furnish the articles under the alleged contract set out in the answer; that plaintiff denied the existence of any contract between the parties, and refused to sell defendant any of said articles at the alleged contract prices, and, taking advantage of defendant's "distressed condition," exacted a sum for said articles in excess of the prices fixed for the same in said alleged contract, and informed defendant that, unless such sum was paid, plaintiff "would refuse to furnish defendant any further boxes"; that these articles were essential to defendant if it was to continue business, without which "its business would have suffered irreparable loss by reason of defendant's inability to supply its customers with said breadstuffs," all of which "was well known to plaintiff."

As there were no contract relations between plaintiff and defendant by which defendant had any right to demand the merchandise, all considerations of contract obligations on the part of plaintiff must be eliminated from the case. When, therefore, defendant solicited the goods, it stood to plaintiff as a stranger seeking to make purchases. It was told the prices it must pay, and the evidence was, and it is not alleged otherwise, that these prices were the market rates charged to other customers. However pressing defendant's need and whatever consequences to its trade should it fail to get the articles, plaintiff had a clear right to make its own prices and having made them, and defendant having accepted the goods under the agreement then made, its action, it seems to us, was voluntary as was its subsequent payment for the goods. Defendant, in fact, when its averments are reduced to their last analysis, alleged no more than that plaintiff refused to recognize the existence of any contract, demanded the current market prices, and that in order to secure the much needed articles defendant paid to plaintiff the higher price demanded. We fail to discover in the transaction the elements of duress. Section 1569 of the Civil Code defines "duress" as (1) the unlawful confinement of a person; (2) unlawful detention of the property of any such person; (3) confinement of such person, lawful in form but fraudulently obtained, etc. "Menace" is defined by section 1570, Civ. Code, and consists of such duress as is specified in section 1569, subds. 1, 2; of unlawful and violent injury to the person and property of any such person or injury to his character. It is not possible to find any constituent of duress or menace as thus defined in any of the averments of the answer.

In the early case of Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 272, 79 Am. Dec. 176, the court considered quite fully what in law would constitute compulsion or coercion sufficient to render payments involuntary. Among other principles it was there affirmed that where a person, with full knowledge of all the circumstances, pays money voluntarily under claim of right, he shall not afterwards recover back the money so paid, and, to avoid the application of this rule, it must appear that the party was compelled by duress of his person or goods to pay the same. This case was cited in the following cases: Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 589, 598, 13 Am. Rep. 220; Wills v. Austin, 53 Cal. 152; Dear v. Var-num, 80 Cal. 86, 89, 22 Pac. 76. In Holt v. Thomas, 105 Cal. 273, 38 Pac. 891, it was held not legal duress to threaten to bring suit for the enforcement of a debt. The Brumagim Case, supra, was approved in Rooney v. Snow, 131 Cal. 51, 54, 63 Pac. 155. See, also, Huddleston v. Washington, 136 Cal. 515, 519, 69 Pac. 146. In Dear v. Var-num, supra, the court said: "In the absence of acts amounting to duress or coercion, the payment of the tax was voluntary; and the mere protest, made at the time of payment, does not divest it of its voluntary character." As was said in Phelan v. San Francisco, 120 Cal. 5, 52 Pac. 39: "There must be some compulsion or coercion which controls the conduct of the party making the payment, * * * some threatened exercise of power or authority over his person or property which can be avoided only by making the payment." In Huddleston v. Washington, supra, the court said: "A payment is not to be regarded as compulsory unless made to emancipate the person or property from an actual and existing duress imposed upon it by the party to whom the money is paid." A threat to refuse performance of a contract cannot be made the predicate of legal duress. 9 Cyc. 448; Taylor v. Ford, 131 Cal. 440, 63 Pac. 770. In Silliman v. United States, 101 U. S. 465, 25 L. Ed. 987, an oft-cited case, the question arose out of alleged compulsion in entering into new charter parties. The court said: "There was no threat of injury to their persons or to their property, to avoid which it became necessary to execute new charter parties. Nor were those charter parties executed for the purpose nor as a means of obtaining possession of their property. They yielded to the threat or demand of the department solely because they required, or supposed they required, money for the conduct of their business or to meet their pecuniary obligations to others. Their duty, if they expected to rely upon the law for protection, was to disregard the threat of the department and apply to the courts for redress against its repudiation of a valid contract." In Cable v. Foley, 45 Minn. 421, 47 N. W. 1135, certain contracts were sought to be avoided as having been executed under duress. The evidence offered for that purpose, said the court, "amounted to no more than that, the plaintiff being without means to pay his men, the defendants refused to pay what was then due him, unless he executed the contracts. The mere threat to withhold from a party a legal right, which he has an adequate remedy to enforce, is not, in the eyes of the law, duress; certainly not such as will avoid the execution of a contract." Defendant's duty here was to seek aid of the courts to enforce his rights under the contract. He could not receive the goods under the terms upon which they were delivered, afterwards pay for them, and then claim that the payment was compulsory, and recover the difference between the price thus paid and the prices mentioned in the contract. The payment must be regarded as voluntary. Regan v. Baldwin, 126 Mass. 485, 30 Am. Rep. 689.

Appellant says that it seeks relief "on the line of the complaint" in Rowland v. Watson, 4 Cal. App. 476, 88 Pac. 495. The circumstances there were very different from the facts here, and that case furnishes no guide for us here. Burke v. Gould, 105 Cal. 277, 38 Pac. 733, is cited. Without stating the facts in that case, suffice it to quote from the opinion: "The unvarying principle of them all [the cited cases] is that by the performance or threat to perform some unlawful act whereby plaintiff will suffer loss the defendant has induced the plaintiff, under circumstances sufficient to control the action of a reasonable man, to pay money which he otherwise would not have paid." The court then proceeds to show that all that defendant threatened was to foreclose the mortgage which plaintiff had executed, and that this was not an unlawful act; that it was the exercise of a right which the law conferred upon him, and was neither in law nor in morals reprehensible. We fail to see how this case can avail defendant. Here there were no contractual relations, as we have held, and plaintiff did no more than to require defendant to pay for the merchandise its market value. Refusing to sell more goods unless defendant would pay for what it had bought was but an act of common business prudence. There was absolutely nothing unlawful in plaintiff's action in the matter. Robertson v. Frank Brothers Company, 132 U. S. 17, 10 Sup. Ct. 5, 33 L. Ed. 236, relied upon, was the case of a United States collector of revenue imposing certain illegal charges which the importer paid under protest in order to get possession of his goods and the question was whether "the settlements made in pursuance of that demand of necessity were voluntary in such sense as to preclude the appellant from subsequently insisting on his statutory right." Said the court: "The parties were not on equal terms. The appellant had no choice. The only alternative was to submit to an illegal exaction, or discontinue its business." It was held that the payment was not "a voluntary act within the meaning of the maxim volenti non fit injuria." It will be observed that the exaction was illegal, and for this reason and to get possession of his property the law permitted the importer to save his business by paying the illegal dues without being penalized by the enforcement of the rule as to voluntary payments. It is not necessary to further pursue the examination of the cases relied upon by defendant. Conceding that the courts recognize what may be termed moral duress under some circumstances, there is always some element of illegality in the demand complained of, some denial of a right, some unfounded claim, some extortion, as was said by Justice Cooley in Hackley v. Headley, 45 Mich. 569, 8 N. W. 511, "as a condition to the exercise by the party of a legal right." Here defendant had no legal right to demand the goods at his own prices or at all for that matter. On the contrary, plaintiff had the legal right to fix the price upon his own goods. It was no concern of plaintiff that defendant could not get the goods elsewhere. Plaintiff was under no obligation to see that defendant's business was safeguarded. It is not pretended that defendant was treated differently from other customers of plaintiff's or that more than market rates were charged for the goods or that those rates were excessive or burdensome.

We do not deem it necessary to notice other points raised by defendant.

The order is affirmed.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—USE OF STREETS—NEGLIGENCE—ACTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries by being struck by defendant's automobile at night, an instruction that if defendant was operating his machine without lights, contrary to ordinance, he was negligent, and plaintiff was not required to make further proof of negligence, construed in connection with further instructions that, if the accident was caused through defendant's negligence without negligence by plaintiff contributing thereto, the jury must find for plaintiff, and with other instructions given for defendant that, notwithstanding his negligence, plaintiff could not recover if she was herself negligent, or could by ordinary diligence have avoided the accident, and the violation of the ordinance would not in itself justify a verdict for plaintiff, were not objectionable as authorizing a verdict for plaintiff merely because defendant violated the ordinance, irrespective of whether such violation contributed to the injury.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—USE OF STREETS—NEGLIGENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

It must be assumed, in the absence of contrary evidence, that plaintiff could see, so that, had defendant's automobile displayed lights as required by ordinance, plaintiff might have seen the car approaching, and have avoided collision therewith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by Addie E. Fenn against Ion L. Clark. From an order setting aside a verdict for plaintiff, and granting a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Earl Rogers, Paul W. Schenck, and W. H. Dehm, for appellant. T. M. Stewart and Jones & Weller, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for damages for personal injuries. A trial was had before a jury, which brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Thereafter the court made an order setting aside the verdict and granting defendant's motion for a new trial, from which order plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Plaintiff alleges that while attempting to cross Main street at its intersection with Sixth street, in the city of Los Angeles, at the usual and regular crossing thereof for pedestrians, she was knocked down, permanently injured, and disabled by an automobile which defendant was then and there carelessly and negligently running and operating upon said street. It further appears from the allegations of the complaint that the collision occurred about 6 o'clock p. m. on December 24, 1906, at which hour darkness prevailed, and defendant was running the automobile at the time without any lights displayed thereon, and gave no warning or signal of his approach while running at a dangerous and reckless rate of speed. The answer denies that defendant was guilty of negligence in operating the automobile, denies that plaintiff was damaged, and alleges that such injuries as she may have sustained were due to her own negligence. The evidence tended to prove that at about 6 o'clock p. m., December 24, 1906, while plaintiff was crossing said Main street at its intersection with Sixth street, she was struck and knocked down by an automobile operated by defendant, which she did not see until it was upon her, as a result of which she sustained serious injuries; that it was dark at the time, and before attempting to cross the street she looked up and down the street and saw no vehicles approaching. Defendant admitted he had no lights displayed on the machine. Plaintiff introduced in evidence an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles making it unlawful for any person to run or operate an automobile upon the streets of the city between one-half hour after sunset and one-half hour before sunrise unless such automobile has displayed a lamp or lantern, throwing a white light toward the front and a red light toward the rear of the machine. There was proof that on the day of the collision the sun set at 4:50 p. m. Defendant testified that as the machine reached her plaintiff stepped back in front thereof. This was denied by plaintiff. At the hearing of defendant's motion for a new trial it was stipulated that the motion was made and urged upon the sole ground that the court had erred in giving to the jury, at plaintiff's request, among other instructions, the following: "You are instructed that failure to comply with a municipal ordinance, or to perform a duty which is imposed by a municipal ordinance, is negligence in itself; therefore, if you find that defendant, at the time of the alleged accident, was operating his automobile in the city of Los Angeles in violation of any ordinance of said city, that in itself establishes negligence on the part of the defendant, and it is not necessary that the plaintiff make any further showing of negligence in defendant in order to recover." The only question presented on this appeal is whether or not the giving of this instruction constituted error.

It has been repeatedly declared by the Supreme Court of this state that the failure to perform a duty imposed by statute or municipal ordinance constitutes negligence. Siemens v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418; Driscoll v. Market Street, etc., Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 553, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203; Bresee v. L. A. Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059. But the omission to perform such duty must contribute directly to the injury; otherwise, however illegal the act or omission thereof, in the abstract, no action for damages can be maintained thereon. McKune v. Santa Clara V. M. & L. Co., 110 Cal. 480, 42 Pac. 980. The instruction complained of is one of a series, and respondent concedes that it should not be separated from its context, but contends that by the instructions, considered as a whole, the jury was precluded from determining the question whether or not the omission to display lights as required by the ordinance was the direct cause of the collision, as a result of which plaintiff was injured; but, on the contrary, he insists "the whole body of instructions given left the jury to understand that the violation of the ordinance alone made the defendant liable for any injury that the plaintiff had sustained, wholly irrespective of the question whether or not the act or omission contributed directly to the injury." Regarding the instructions as a whole and in the light of the issues tried, they do not admit of such interpretation. In order to recover, it devolved upon plaintiff to prove certain facts, among which was defendant's negligence, and by this instruction they were told, in effect, that, if they found defendant was operating his machine contrary to the provisions of the ordinance, such fact sufficiently established defendant's negligence, and in order to recover plaintiff was not required to make other proof upon this point. But they were further instructed that: "If you believe from the evidence that the said accident was caused by and through the negligence of the defendant, and that there was no negligence on the part of plaintiff which contributed thereto, then you must find for the plaintiff." Having found the existence of facts which constituted negligence on the part of defendant, they were compelled, under this last instruction just quoted, to further find that the collision, as a result of which plaintiff was damaged, was "caused by and through the negligence of the defendant, and that there was no negligence on the part of plaintiff which contributed thereto." The jury was further and fully instructed on behalf of defendant that, notwithstanding defendant's negligence, plaintiff was not entitled to recover if she was guilty of contributory negligence, or could by ordinary diligence have avoided the accident, and that the violation of the city ordinance would not in itself justify a verdict for plaintiff.

The giving of an instruction almost identical with the one under consideration was sustained in McKune v. Santa Clara V. M. & L. Co., supra. As said in that case, there may be exceptional cases when the omission to comply with the provisions of an ordinance would not, as to one falling within the exception, constitute negligence. We must assume, however, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the record, that plaintiff was in possession of the sense of seeing, and hence, had the car displayed the lights required by the ordinance, she might have seen the car approaching and avoided the collision. Such evidently was the view entertained by the jury, and they were justified in such conclusion.

The instructions taken as a whole constitute a correct declaration of the law applicable to the issue in question, and the court erred in setting aside the verdict and granting the motion for a new trial.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

FORD & SANBORN CO. v. BRASLAN SEED GROWERS' CO. et al. (Civ. 562.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 7, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 138*)—NOTICE OF INTENTION TO APPLY—"ADVERSE PARTIES."

Where judgment was rendered against several defendants, one of whom contended that its codefendants were alone liable, which contention, if sustained, would relieve it of all liability, and cast the burden of the judgment wholly on such codefendants without right of contribution, the latter were "adverse parties" within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring notice of motion for new trial to be served on the adverse party.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 414*)—NOTICE OF APPEAL—"ADVERSE PARTIES."

Such codefendants were also "adverse parties" within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 940, requiring notice of appeal to be served on the adverse party, and of sections 941a, 941b, and 941c (added by St. 1907, p. 753, c. 410), prescribing a new method of appeal, and providing that notice of an appeal taken under such sections need not be served on any of the parties to the action.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 414*)—NOTICE OF APPEAL.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 941a, 941b, 941c (added by St. 1907, p. 753, c. 410), providing a new method of appeal, provide that the notice of appeal therein mentioned need not be served on any of the parties to the action, but when filed shall, without further action on the part of the appellant, transfer the cause to the higher court, and that, when taken under these sections, the appeal shall have the same force and effect as appeals taken pursuant to the provisions of sections 939, 940, and 941, "provided, however, that any question may be reviewed therein which question could be reviewed on an appeal taken pursuant to the provisions of section 939." Held that, where notice of appeal by a defendant was duly filed as required by section 941a, the appeal was so far perfected as to give the appellate court jurisdiction, though the appeal was apparently taken under the old law, and codefendants, who were adverse parties, were not served with notice as required thereby.

4. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 46*)—NOTICE TO ADVERSE PARTY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 659, as amended by St. 1907, p. 717, c. 330, provides that the party intending to move for a new trial must within 10 days after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment file with the clerk and serve on the adverse party a notice of his intention, designating the grounds of the motion, and whether it will be made on affidavits, bill of exceptions, or statement of the case. Paragraph 2 provides that the bill of exceptions shall be prepared as provided in section 650. Section 650 provides that a party desiring to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in a bill of exceptions may prepare a draft of the bill and serve the same by copy on the adverse party, etc. Held, that such directions are not directory in so far as they relate to service of notice of proceedings to settle the bill, and that, where such notice is not given, the bill cannot be considered on appeal from an order denying the motion for a new trial, but the order will be affirmed, notwithstanding notice of appeal was filed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by the Ford & Sanborn Company (a corporation) against the Braslan Seed Growers' Company (a corporation) and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the Braslan Seed Growers' Company appeals. Affirmed.

Campbell, Metson, Drew, Oatman & McKenzie, C. D. Wright, and Alexander & Alexander, for appellant. Dougherty & Lacey, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action in assumpsit for goods, wares, and merchandise sold to defendants by plaintiff. The complaint is verified. Defendants Braslan Seed Growers' Company and Charles P. Braslan filed their verified answer specifically denying the averments of the complaint so far as they related to the alleged sale of the goods. Defendants G. T. and W. F. Duncan answered in their own proper persons as follows: "The defendants G. T. Duncan and W. F. Duncan hereby enter this their appearance in the above-entitled case, and deny each and every allegation of the complaint." The cause was tried by a jury and plaintiff had judgment upon the verdict against W. F. Duncan and G. T. Duncan and Braslan Seed Growers' Company for the sum of $2,087.34 and costs of suit, and defendant Charles P. Braslan had judgment against plaintiff for his costs of suit. Defendant Braslan Seed Growers' Company appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial. It is claimed by respondent that the bill of exceptions cannot be considered, and that the appeals must be dismissed or the judgment and order affirmed. This contention arises out of the following condition of the record: Judgment was entered September 23, 1907. Notice of intention to move for a new trial was served upon plaintiff's attorneys "in due time," date not given. Notice of appeal from the judgment was served upon plaintiff's attorneys and filed November 19, 1907. Bill of exceptions was presented to attorneys for plaintiff, date not given, who "stipulated that the foregoing may be settled and allowed by the court," and on March 16, 1908, it was indorsed by the court "approved and allowed." It bears no filing mark or date by the clerk. Motion for new trial was denied June 26, 1908, and notice of appeal from the order served on plaintiff's attorneys July 8, 1908. It is conceded that no service of the notice of intention to move for a new trial or of any other steps in perfecting the bill of exceptions or taking the appeal, was made upon either of defendants, W. F. and G. T. Duncan. They seem to have been ignored as negligible quantities in the preparation of the papers on appeal.

In the trial of the case certain relations were shown to have existed between defendants the Duncans and defendant Braslan Seed Growers' Company in the purchase of the goods, subject of the action, which, as claimed by respondent, fixed a liability upon the defendants, the Duncans, and also upon the company both as guarantors of and either as partners or as engaged in a joint enterprise with the defendants, the Duncans, and the judgment was against the Duncans and the Seed Growers' Company. The contention of the appellant at the trial was and is here that the Duncans were alone liable. That the Duncans are adverse parties, within the meaning of sections 659, 940, Code Civ. Proc., and sections 941a, 941b, and 941c, as added by St. 1907, p. 753, c. 410, would seem not to admit of a doubt. Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co., 146 Cal. 571, 80 Pac. 719; Id., 152 Cal. 196, 92 Pac. 182. See, also, Niles v. Gonzalez (Cal.) 100 Pac. 1080. The contention of appellant, if sustained, would relieve it from all liability, and cast the burden of the judgment wholly upon the Duncans without the right of contribution. They are therefore directly interested in and would be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken, in which case, as was said in Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637-640, they would be adverse parties, "within the meaning of the provisions of the Code, irrespective of the question whether they appear upon the face of the record in the attitude of plaintiffs or defendants or interveners." They are adverse parties because, as was said in Terry v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 85, 42 Pac. 464, "by the record they appear to be interested in the judgment so that they will be affected by its reversal or modification."

By the provisions of the newly added sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, approved March 20, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 753, c. 410), namely, sections 941a, 941b, and 941c, a "new and alternative method by which appeals may be taken from judgments, orders or decrees of the superior court" is provided, and it is provided, that the notice of appeal therein mentioned "need not be served upon any of the parties to the action * * * but when filed * * * shall, without further action on the part of the appellant, transfer the cause for decision and determination to the higher court." When taken under these sections, the appeal "shall have the same force and effect as appeals taken pursuant to the provisions of sections 939, 940, and 941 of this Code; provided, however, that any question may be reviewed therein which question could be reviewed upon an appeal taken pursuant to the provisions of section 939 of this Code." In the light of Mitchell v. California & Oregon S. Co. (Cal.) 99 Pac. 202, we think it apparent that the appeal was so far perfected as to give this court jurisdiction of it, whether appellant proceeded under the old or the new law. The notice of appeal was duly filed, and, though not served on the Duncans, the filing complied with section 941b. To all appearances the appeal was in fact perfected in accordance with the old law, still, as we understand the opinion in the Mitchell Case, supra, the filing of the notice of appeal was equally effective under whichever method was pursued by appellant. We conclude, therefore, that the appeal from the judgment had the effect to bring up for review the judgment and whatever properly became part of the judgment roll. The appeal from the order also brought up the order, for the amended Code provision refers to orders as well as to judgments. And here arises the question: Can the bill of exceptions be considered in view of the fact that the defendants, the Duncans, as adverse parties were not served with any notice of any of the proceedings leading up to the order denying motion for a new trial? Can it be held that, by the mere filing of the notice of appeal from the order, the appellant is relieved from the necessity of complying with statutory provisions relating to the preparation of its bill of exceptions? Does the filing of a notice of appeal have such retroactive operation as to obviate all noncompliance with the statute, or render inoperative its plain provisions relating to the preparation of the bill? Are adverse parties to be deprived of the right to service of the notice of intention to move for a new trial or to participate in preparing the bill by the mere filing of notice of appeal from the order after the bill is settled? If one adverse party may be ignored, may not all, and, if so, may not the appellant proceed ex parte and have his bill settled? It seems to us that there can be but one answer to these questions and that answer is that the appealing party must comply with the statute which gives the right to have a bill of exceptions reviewed or it cannot be considered.

Section 659, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 717, c. 380), provides as follows: "The party intending to move for a new trial must, within ten days after receiving notice of the entry of the judgment, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention," designating the grounds of the motion and whether it will be made upon affidavits, minutes of the court, bill of exceptions, or statement of the case. The notice in the present case declared that the intention was to move for a new trial, as to certain grounds, "upon evidence to be thereafter prepared, served and filed," and as to certain other grounds, upon a bill of exceptions to be thereafter prepared, proposed, served, and settled in accordance with the provisions of law." Paragraph 2 of this section provides that the bill of exceptions shall be prepared as provided in section 650, Code Civ. Proc. This section provides that: "When a party desires to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in a bill of exceptions, he may (within the time specified and upon the conditions prescribed) prepare the draft of a bill, and serve the same by copy thereof upon the adverse party." It then prescribes certain steps to be taken to complete the bill by amendments proposed, if any, "after such service upon the adverse party." "The proposed bill and amendments must" be presented by the party seeking its settlement to the judge "upon five days' notice to the adverse party," etc. It is not necessary to pursue the provisions of this section further. There may be some confusion or contradiction in the terms of the section, but upon the point that the adverse party is to have notice of the proceedings to settle the bill there is no confusion or doubt. At the time section 659 was amended a new section, 663a, was adopted which provides, that "the party intending to make the motion mentioned in the last section (663) must * * * serve upon the adverse party and file with the clerk of the court a notice of his intention," etc. There is nothing in the new sections or in the amendments of the old sections that would warrant the court in holding that service of notice of intention and of the other steps in the preparation of the bill are dispensed with. In this respect there is no change in the law.

It was held in Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 82, that "section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, however, requires that the party intending to move for a new trial shall 'serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention.' The 'adverse party' upon whom this notice is to be served is determined by the same rules as is the 'adverse party' upon whom a notice of appeal is to be served, viz., every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the motion is adverse or will be affected by the granting of the motion or changing the former decision of the court. * * * The superior court can have no jurisdiction to re-examine an issue of fact that it has tried, and change its decision thereon, unless all the parties to the issue and former decision are properly before it." The same question came before the court in U. S. v. Crooks, 116 Cal. 43, 47 Pac. 870, and was similarly decided. These cases hold that the appeal will not be dismissed, but that the order will be affirmed. We can see no reason why service of notice of the statutory steps should not be required as directed by the statute, for we cannot believe the Code contemplates that the appealing party may proceed ex parte and prepare and have approved his bill of exceptions without notice to the adverse parties. There is no more reason for requiring service of the notice of intention than of the subsequent proceedings. Estate of Scott, 128 Cal. 578, 61 Pac. 98. Our conclusion is that the bill of exceptions cannot be considered and that the order must be affirmed. Appellant's reply, as to want of service of the bill, is, first, that the provisions of section 650 as amended "are so absurdly confused that no one can follow it"; second, that the provisions are directory only; third, that "counsel by participating in all the proceedings waived want of service"—citing Hicks v. Masten, 101 Cal. 651, 36 Pac. 130. The reply to want of service of notice of intention, is, first, by citing Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co., 146 Cal. 571, 80 Pac. 719; second, that the Duncans are not complaining and that they were not adverse parties, being satisfied with the judgment.

We find no confusion in section 650 sufficient to render it absurd or inoperative. We do not think its provisions directory in so far as they relate to service of notice. Counsel for respondent may have waived want of service as to respondent by assisting in the settlement of the bill, but Hicks v. Masten, supra, decides nothing beyond waiver as to the party who without notice takes part in settling the bill. The case does not hold that this excuses notice to other adverse parties for whom no one appeared in the settlement of the bill. Johnson v. Phenix Ins. Co., supra, furnishes no support to appellant's contention. In that case the judgment was dismissed, but the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order was denied. The question as to whether service upon the nonappealing San Mateo bank was necessary was not decided. But in the same case, when the question arose on its merits, the court decided that the order must be affirmed because the notice of motion for a new trial, as required by section 659, Code Civ. Proc., was not served upon an adverse party. It is immaterial that the Duncans are not complaining. They had no opportunity to complain for they had no notice of an intention to appeal or to move for a new trial. They might well be satisfied with a judgment that made the company jointly liable with them, but might seriously object to having the judgment reversed or so modified as to make them solely liable. We have thus for review the appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone; i. e., the pleadings, copy of the verdict of the jury, copy of any order made on demurrer (there was no demurrer), or relating to the change of parties (of which there was none), and a copy of the judgment. The bill of exceptions cannot be treated as part of the judgment roll for the reasons already stated.

The only conflict between the general verdict and the special findings related to the individual liability of defendant Charles P. Braslan. The general verdict ran against him personally with the other defendants. Special findings were to the effect that he was not individually liable. On motion of his attorneys the court gave judgment for Braslan against plaintiff. We discover no inconsistency or conflict between the other special findings and the general verdict. Neither the general verdict nor the special findings are open to attack as unsupported by the evidence.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. PLEADING (§ 381*)—ISSUES AND PROOF.

A complaint alleging the sale and delivery by plaintiff to defendant of a quantity of cabbage at an agreed price, and nonpayment of a part thereof, was based upon a different contract than that alleged in the answer, which was a written agreement by plaintiff to sell the cabbage for the year through defendant, who should receive a certain commission, and did not rest upon the written agreement or vary it, so that it was unnecessary to amend the complaint by alleging the abandonment of the written agreement.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 245*)—ABANDONMENT—NEW AGREEMENT.

A new oral contract to sell to defendant absolutely the cabbage raised by plaintiff abrogated a prior written contract to sell the same cabbage through defendant on commission; Civ. Code, § 1693, providing that a written contract may only be altered by one in writing or by an executed oral agreement not applying to the new contract.

3. CONTRACTS (§ 245*)—EVIDENCE—WAIVER.

Waiver by defendant of all rights acquired under a written contract to sell plaintiff's cabbages on commission need not be by an express agreement, and a subsequent oral contract by which defendant was to buy the cabbage absolutely was evidence of a waiver of all of defendant's rights under the commission agreement.

ing of an absolute sale to defendant, and not a delivery for sale on commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by F. E. Proud against Thomas Strain. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. E. Harpham, for appellant. E. J. Marks, H. C. Head, and R. Y. Williams, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action for goods sold and delivered. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

From the bill of exceptions in the record it appears that plaintiff went to trial on a complaint which alleged the sale and delivery by plaintiff to defendant at the latter's request between March 22 and May 11, 1906, of a certain quantity of cabbage at an agreed price, the payment of a part of said price and the nonpayment of a balance of $667.09. The same matter was stated as a second cause of action for the same sum upon a quantum valebat count. The complaint also alleged seven other causes of action, doubly stated in the same manner, based upon sales of cabbage made to defendant by seven different persons who had assigned their respective claims therefor to plaintiff. All of said sales took place between March 19 and June 27, 1906, the aggregate of unpaid balances in the several causes of action being stated at $2,141.41, for which a judgment was asked. Defendant answered, denying that any sales of cabbage had been made to him by plaintiff or any of his assignors, and alleged that all the cabbage mentioned in the several causes of action was received by him under and by virtue of several and distinct agreements in writing made by defendant with the plaintiff and each of his said assignors, each of which writings was in substance as follows: "I agree to sell my cabbage for the season of 1906 through Thomas Strain, he to receive 10% (ten per cent.) and cost of crating and loading as compensation for marketing same." These writings were each set out in full in the answer, showing the signature of plaintiff and his assignors thereto, and the dates thereof, respectively, range from February 13, 1906, to March, 1906. When plaintiff attempted to introduce evidence of the terms of the sale of the cabbage to defendant, at the trial, the defendant objected on the ground that the answer would be incompetent if it attempted to vary the terms of the written agreement set out in the answer, and on the further ground that it was not the best evidence, because the written contract set up in the answer was the best evidence of this. Plaintiff then offered to prove a sale of the cabbage, as alleged in his complaint, to Thomas Strain entirely separate and distinct from the agreement set out in defendant's answer. Whereupon defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence as to the terms of any agreement to sell or sale other than the written agreements set out in defendant's said answer, and the court sustained this objection and required plaintiff to amend his complaint by alleging the abandonment or setting aside of the contract set out in defendant's answer before he could offer any evidence as to any other sales. This allegation was inserted under the ruling of the court, and it is contended by appellant that there is no evidence to support the special finding in plaintiff's favor on this issue, or the finding in plaintiff's favor on this element of his case, implied by the general verdict for plaintiff.

Plaintiff's cause of action did not rest upon the writing, or the cancellation of the writing, which the court required him to allege was set aside and abandoned, but upon a sale of the cabbage to defendant. The contract sued on by plaintiff was not an alteration of the writing pleaded in defendant's answer, but an entirely new and distinct contract. The pleadings as originally framed raised the issue whether the contract pleaded by plaintiff or that pleaded by defendant should determine the rights of the parties. It was not necessary that there should be an express destruction, cancellation, or setting aside of the first contract in order that plaintiff might state a cause of action under the new. We do not regard the allegation thus thrust into the plaintiff's pleading, or a finding thereon in his favor, as necessary to sustain the verdict in his behalf. Taking the complaint, however, as amended by order of the court, the allegation that a new obligation has been substituted for the old finds support in the evidence. The new oral obligation created by the absolute sale of the cabbage to the defendant abrogated the commission contract, and evidence of the creation of the new contract is evidence of the waiver of all rights under the commission contract by defendant. He could not while making an absolute purchase of the cabbage say that the old contract was still in force as to the very cabbage which he was buying. To such a new agreement substituted for an existing written agreement section 1698 of the Civil Code has no application. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 325, 95 Pac. 154, 159.

Appellant's three points made, to wit, that there was no evidence to sustain a finding that the commission contract was set aside, that there was no evidence of any sales made by plaintiff and his assignors to defendant, and that there was no evidence to show that other agreements of sale were substituted for the commission agreements are all included in the one question: "Was there a sale of the cabbage to defendant?" The evidence as to the waiver of all rights of defendant under the commission contracts (if he acquired any rights thereby) need not be in the nature of an express agreement. While the instructions given by the court at the request of the defendant and the requirement of the court that the plaintiff amend his complaint so as to allege formally that the commission agreement was set aside and abandoned by the agreement of the parties gives some color to appellant's contention that the trial court intended by its instruction to require the proof of a formal agreement to abrogate or abandon, yet we do not think this is the necessary construction of the language of the instruction. There is nothing in the instruction inconsistent with the construction placed thereon by the jury by their special finding, to wit, that the intention to abandon the old agreement and substitute a new one might be implied from the acts of the parties, even in the absence of any express statements of such an intention by the parties. Under this view there is abundant evidence to sustain a finding that there was a sale of the cabbage to defendant as distinguished from a delivery to him to be sold on commission, and from this the inference might well be drawn that the commission agreement was abandoned.

Plaintiff and each and every of his assignors testified that he sold the cabbage to the defendant. While the testimony may be in the form of a conclusion, the form of it was not objected to when given. Each of the parties to the respective writings testified, in substance, that nothing was ever done under the original agreement. Again, none of the written statements of account made by defendant to the parties delivering the cabbage, which were rendered before this action was brought, showed any charge either for commission, crating or loading, while on the day following the service of the summons regular account sales on a commission basis, with deductions for commissions, crating, and loading, were forwarded to those to whom the ordinary statement of account, such as might have been made in case of a straight sale, had been previously rendered. That defendant explained why the first statements were so made out, and expressly denied that he had purchased any of the cabbage or accepted it in any manner, except under the writings pleaded in his answer, does not affect the question as this court must consider it. His testimony only raised a conflict in the evidence and the jury decided this in favor of plaintiff.

The rule invoked by appellant, that the trial judge should set aside the verdict if satisfied that it is against the weight of the evidence, is one that can be urged only in the trial court. The conclusion of the trial judge on the application of that rule is final. There is no review here for an abuse of discretion in that respect. This court will not inquire into the question of fact for the purpose of ascertaining where the preponderance of evidence lies.

No prejudicial error being presented by appellant, the order is affirmed.

Supreme Court Sept. 16, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Verdicts or findings cannot be set aside by appellate courts where they rest upon evidence in which there appears to exist, or does in fact exist, a substantial conflict.

Circumstantial evidence held to sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 552*)—MURDER—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—FLIGHT.

Flight of an accused is but a circumstance tending to establish a consciousness of guilt; but whether it is a strong or weak circumstance depends largely upon the circumstances, and its significance in a case made up entirely of circumstantial evidence must be determined by the jury in the light of other attending circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1257; Dec. Dig. § 552.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 228*)—MURDER—EVIDENCE—CORPUS DELICTI.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 404*)—HOMICIDE (§ 174*)—MURDER—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a murder case, as a part of the original case for the people, testimony of the officer who arrested accused a few days after the homicide.

as to the finding of pistols lying on the bed in the room in which the arrest was made, was admissible, together with every other circumstance occurring at the time of the arrest having any bearing on the crime or upon accused's conduct when arrested, and the pistols were properly admitted as exhibits.

7. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

In a murder case, where a police officer had testified that he had been detailed to watch certain outgoing trains and search any Chinese thereon, that he searched accused on one of the cars, and found no weapons upon him, it was error on cross-examination to exclude the question whether witness' object in searching accused was to find whether he had any weapons.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

The witness having testified that he had found no weapons upon accused, the exclusion of the question on cross-examination, as to whether his object in searching accused was to find whether he had any weapons, was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 361*)—EVIDENCE—ALIBI — EXPLANATION OF CONDUCT.

Where an alibi is relied upon by accused, much latitude is generally allowed him in explaining his conduct which might otherwise be interpreted as indicating a consciousness of guilt, and hence, where a Chinaman accused of murder had testified that he came to town the day after the homicide to procure medicine from a Chinese doctor whose office was not in the Chinese quarter, and that while looking for the office he was stopped by a policeman, it was error to refuse to permit him to answer a question as to what the officer did to him, the purpose of the question being to show that the officer searched him, which might explain why he remained away from "Chinatown," which Chinese usually visit upon arriving in a town.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF QUESTION ASKED WITNESS.

Accused having just previously stated that, before meeting the policeman, a Chinaman had apprised him of the killing of a "Bing Kong Tong man" on the preceding day by a member of the Tong of which accused was a member, and that the "Bing Kong Tongs" were "after" all the members of accused's Tong, thus putting accused on his guard, the testimony being received to explain why accused did not visit the Chinese quarters on the day following the homicide, the exclusion of the question was not prejudicial.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 358*)—MURDER—ALIBI — EVIDENCE.

In a murder case, accused having testified that he reached the city where the crime occurred from M. at about noon on the day after the killing, the people could introduce testimony of a telephone operator in the city that accused came to the telephone office between 11 o'clock and 11:30 o'clock in the forenoon of that day and telephoned to some one in M.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1168*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR — ORDER OF RECEIVING EVIDENCE.

Though such evidence could appropriately have been a part of the people's original case, and being relevant and material even if it was not proper rebuttal testimony, the fact that it was introduced out of the regular order would not be ground for reversal.

13. WITNESSES (§ 290*)—EXAMINATION—REPLETION.

Where accused on cross-examination in presenting his original case was asked by the district attorney if he was not in a telephone office in the city where the homicide was committed at the time designated by a witness, and whether he did not telephone to a person at another town, and he declared that he was not in the telephone office at the time designated and was permitted on surrebuttal to say that he had never seen the witness until she came into court as a witness, the exclusion of a question asked accused on surrebuttal, as to whether he was in the telephone office at the time mentioned and under the circumstances detailed by the witness, was not error, since the answer would have amounted only to a repetition of what accused had previously testified to.

14. WITNESSES (§ 379*) — IMPEACHMENT — INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS.

In a murder case, where the foundation for impeachment of a witness had been laid, it was error to exclude testimony of a newspaper reporter that the witness, who had identified accused as a man who immediately after the killing had run with a pistol in his hand and disappeared in a cellar, had shortly after the homicide stated to the reporter that he did not believe he could identify any of the Chinamen who ran from the scene of the homicide.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

The prosecuting attorney having himself asked the impeaching witness the same question on cross-examination, and he having replied that the identifying witness had made the statement imputed to him, the error was cured.

16. WITNESSES (§ 389*)—IMPEACHMENT—PREDICATE.

Accused is not precluded from showing that a witness had before the trial made a statement inconsistent with his testimony, merely because the witness, upon being asked on cross-examination whether he had made the statement, answered that he did not remember whether he had made it or not.

17. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*) — APPEAL — REVIEW — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—CONFLICTING AFFIDAVITS.

A motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence being regarded with suspicion and disfavor, a wide discretion is committed to the trial court in ruling upon such a motion, and, where the showing made by the affidavits on both sides involves sharply conflicting evidence, the ruling thereon will not be disturbed on appeal.

18. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 761*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS—"HOMICIDE"—"CRIME."

In a murder case, the court charged that it was contended by accused that he was elsewhere at the time of the commission of the homicide, and consequently that it was impossible for him to have committed it, that the contention constituted an alibi, which if established was a perfect refutation of any crime charged, and, being interposed by accused as proof that he was not guilty, it became the duty of the jury to pass upon the question whether accused was present at the scene of the homicide at the time of the commission thereof. Held, that the charge was not objectionable as assuming the proof of the crime charged against accused, on the hypothesis that "homicide" is synonymous with "crime," since the killing of a human being under any circumstances constitutes homicide, but whether a homicide is a crime depends on the circumstances under which it is committed.

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 572*)—EVIDENCE—ALIBI.

If accused introduces sufficient proof upon the contention of an alibi to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, he is entitled to an acquittal.

20. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 351*) — EVIDENCE — FLIGHT.

Flight, unexplained by other circumstances, may become a circumstance in the chain of evidence of guilt, depending upon its connection with all the other circumstances shown.

21. HOMICIDE (§ 340*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a murder case, a charge that it is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation of the slayer, to constitute the killing murder in the first degree, etc., was not so erroneous as to require reversal because of the omission of the words "and the result of" following the words "preceded by," where the evidence showed that accused just prior to the shooting was seen walking back and forth on the street near where decedent was killed, and that two men were engaged in the shooting, and that immediately upon the cessation thereof they fled with unusual celerity in different directions from the spot at which the homicide took place, thus strongly tending to show that the shooting and the killing, by whomsoever done, was deliberate, premeditated, and willful, and no element of self-defense appeared from the proved circumstances, since the jury must have understood from the charge that if accused had deliberately and premeditatedly formed the will to slay decedent, and did thereupon slay him, such slaying must have been the result of the will or intention so formed, and that under such circumstances only could they find him guilty of first-degree murder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Mar Gin Sue was convicted of murder, and appeals from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. Affirmed.

C. T. Jones and J. E. Alexander, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The indictment upon which he was tried and convicted charged the defendant with the murder of one Lee Tong in the city of Sacramento on the 25th day of April, 1908. The jury found the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree, fixing the penalty at imprisonment for life (section 190, Pen. Code), and the court thereupon rendered judgment in accordance with said verdict. This appeal is from said judgment and the order refusing the defendant a new trial.

The judgment and order are attacked on the grounds that the evidence does not warrant the verdict, alleged errors in the rulings of the court upon questions of the admissibility of certain evidence, and alleged errors in giving and refusing to give to the jury certain instructions. There appears to be no question but that two Chinamen, each having a revolver, fired upon and shot the deceased, inflicting wounds which produced almost instant death; but there is a sharp conflict in the evidence as to the identity of the defendant as being one of the perpetrators of the homicide. Upon this point therefore, under the well-known rule as to the conflict of evidence, the judgment is beyond disturbance by a reviewing court. The contention of the defendant at the trial was that he was not in the city of Sacramento on the day of the homicide, and consequently could have taken no part in the slaying of Lee Tong.

1. The homicide occurred on I street, near the southwest corner of Third and I streets, in said city of Sacramento, at about 8 o'clock p. m., on the day alleged in the indictment. The facts may be gathered by a reference to some extent to the testimony. The witness Gayne heard the shooting from the corner of Third and I streets, where he was standing at the time. He heard, he said, about five shots. After the first shot, he looked in the direction of the point where the shooting was going on and saw two Chinamen engaged in shooting at some one; that, just after the shooting, he saw the two men who were engaged in it running away, one going across Third street to the east side thereof, carrying a revolver in his hand, and disappearing in a cellar from the sidewalk. He testified that the defendant resembled the man he saw crossing Third street. Immediately after the shooting this witness went to the spot where Lee Tong fell, and, on examination, found that he was dead, and observed some wounds in his body. The witnesses Guernsey and Myers were near the corner of Third and I streets when the shooting took place. Guernsey testified: That he had been sitting upon a railing surrounding the entrance to the basement of a building on Third street, within a few feet of I street, for about 10 minutes prior to the shooting; that, a few minutes before the firing began, the defendant came to a point near and just back of him; that defendant walked "up to the corner twice and back." The witness said that he "asked the defendant the time of day"; that he noticed with the defendant another Chinaman, whom he described as "a dark, heavy-set Chinaman, very badly pock-marked." The witness further testified that, upon hearing the shots, he left the railing and stepped to the corner, and that, just as he reached the corner, the defendant, with a pistol in his hand, ran past him, colliding, in his haste, with the witness Myers, and running "direct across the street to the east side of Third street and disappeared in a cellar." The other Chinaman ran north in the direction of and to the "sand lots." After the arrest of the defendant, a few days subsequently to the killing of Lee Tong, the witness went to the district attorney's office, to which place the defendant and another Chinaman had previously been taken, and there picked out the former as the man who, immediately after the shooting, with a pistol, ran to the east side of Third street and disappeared in a cellar. This witness was positive that the defendant was the man he saw under the circumstances just indicated. The witness Myers, who was at Third and I streets when the shooting occurred, corroborated Guernsey on all the important points to which the latter testified. He, too, pointed out the defendant and identified him in the district attorney's office as the man he saw, immediately following the shooting, running with a pistol in hand, across and to the east side of Third street and descend from the sidewalk into a cellar. A number of white witnesses—two of them boys, each claiming to be 15 years of age—testified that they were near the scene of the shooting when it occurred, and saw two Chinamen running from Third and I streets in different directions as soon as the shooting ceased. They each appeared to be positively of the opinion that the defendant was not one of the fleeing Chinamen. The witness Ong Get said he heard the shooting, and saw and knew the man who ran across Third street and entered a basement, and that he was not the defendant, but that "he knew him as Ah Gee Ung." The defendant, in support of his claim of an alibi, testified that he was in San Francisco on the day that the shooting resulting in the death of Lee Tong occurred, and left that city on that evening, about 8 o'clock, on the "Oregon Express," for Marysville; he having received a letter that day from a friend in the last-mentioned place asking him to go there. The defendant was corroborated on the point of having been in San Francisco and leaving there for Marysville at about 8 o'clock on the evening of April 25th by two other Chinamen.

Briefly, and in a general way, we have thus referred to the principal evidence received at the trial, and it is at once plainly apparent therefrom that, as stated, it is conflicting in a marked degree. Some of the witnesses for the prosecution were shown to have deviated in a slight degree in their testimony at the trial from statements previously made concerning the facts to which they testified; but whatever differences were made to appear between their testimony at the trial and statements made at some other time were for the jury to consider and settle by the aid of legal rules which, obviously, could be of little or no avail to appellate courts, were they at liberty generally to pass upon questions involving the credibility of witnesses, or the weight which should be attached to their testimony. Counsel for the appellant argue, however, that there is no conflict in the evidence, basing such contention on the fact that no witness produced by the prosecution saw or claimed to have seen the shooting, and that all that the people were able to and did prove was the death of Lee Tong from gunshot wounds and the immediate flight of two Chinamen, one carrying a pistol, from the scene of the homicide; that, on the other hand, the testimony for the defense was not only emphatic and direct that the defendant was not one of the fleeing men, but that at the time of the killing he was on his way to Marysville, only a short distance out of San Francisco, and therefore could not possibly have been concerned actually in the commission of the crime. But the circumstances established by the prosecution are sufficient, as stated, to sustain the verdict of the jury. It must be remembered that one of the white witnesses testified that he saw the defendant, just prior to the shooting, on Third street, near I street, and that the latter walked to the corner and back several times. This is a circumstance from which the jury were warranted in inferring that the defendant was looking or watching for some one, and adding it to the fact of the killing of Lee Tong by means of pistols, and the circumstance of the flight of the defendant, with a pistol still in his hand, from the scene of the homicide, immediately after it occurred, there is made out what we deem to be a good case of circumstantial evidence. Then there are always certain features developed in the trial of cases which cannot be made to clearly appear in the record on appeal, and by which a jury may properly be more or less influenced in reaching a verdict. In addition to considering the facts and circumstances proved by the people in a criminal case, the jury may, and, presumably, invariably do, consider the nature and character of the defense or the contention which the defendant sets up in opposition to the charge. They may consider whether the witnesses introduced by the defendant to support his defense or contention tell a likely story or relate it in such manner as to entitle it to credence. It is true the burden of proving the guilt of a party charged with crime beyond a reasonable doubt is always upon the people; but the jury, after the cause is submitted to them, are, of course, at liberty to review and consider the whole record, and where circumstances are proven which, with sufficient clearness, show, as is the fact here, that the accused must have been concerned in the actual commission of the crime charged, the rejection of his defense or contention against the charge for the reason that it is in the judgment of the jury fabricated or untrue adds just so much more force to the persuasive power of the evidence presented by the people; and the rejection of a defense or contention interposed by one accused of crime is generally for the reason that the manner of the witnesses in giving their testimony in support of such defense or contention is such as to inspire distrust or a belief that such testimony is not to be credited. Hence the rule in this state that verdicts or findings cannot be set aside by appellate courts where they rest upon evidence in which there appears to exist or does in fact exist a substantial conflict.

We are not unmindful, in the discussion of this feature of the case, of the rule as to the flight of one accused of crime as laid down in the text-books and decisions. Roscoe on Criminal Evidence, 18; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 118, 17 Am. Rep. 401; People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 151, 35 Am. Rep. 69. It is quite true, as these authorities hold, that flight is but a circumstance tending to establish a consciousness of guilt in the person fleeing; but whether it is a strong or a weak circumstance must depend largely upon the circumstances under which the flight is prosecuted and accomplished. If a party kills another and, not having been seen near the scene of the homicide, flees to some distant locality, the fact that he was found in such other place after the killing would perhaps amount to a mere circumstance tending only to prove a consciousness of guilt; but if, after another has been shot and killed in a room or a building by means of a revolver, and immediately after the shots are heard, a party is seen running from such room or building, with a revolver in his hand, then the circumstance of flight under those circumstances becomes one of which, considered in connection with the circumstance of the shooting and killing of the deceased, a jury would be justified in predicating a verdict of guilty, in the absence of an explanation satisfactorily showing it to be an innocent circumstance. In other words, the significance of the circumstance of flight, in the extent of its persuasive power, in a case made up entirely of circumstantial evidence, must be determined by the jury in the light of other attending circumstances. In the case at bar, the flight of the defendant from the scene of the homicide, immediately following the firing of the shots and the killing of Lee Tong, carrying, exposed to view, a revolver, constituted an incriminatory circumstance of the most potent significance and importance.

2. The appellant insists that the corpus delicti was not established; that the man who was found dead upon the sidewalk upon the cessation of the shooting was not shown to be Lee Tong, who is alleged in the indictment as the man murdered by the defendant. There is no merit in this contention. The witness Gayne testified that he witnessed the shooting, saw the deceased immediately after he fell to the sidewalk, and then examined his body sufficiently to find that he was dead. The coroner testified that an autoptical examination of the body of the deceased, made at the inquest, disclosed six gunshot wounds in the body, one of which was on the left side and at the base of the neck, another in the jaw, the bullet passing through the jaw and cutting it in two; one in the right shoulder, one between the fourth and fifth ribs, one between the ninth and tenth ribs, and another in the left leg, ranging downwards. Lee You Ding saw the deceased at the coroner's office and recognized him as Lee Tong, an uncle of the witness. This witness also saw the wound in the jaw of the deceased. The circumstances thus referred to, considered with the other circumstances in the case, amply established the corpus delicti. That the testimony proves that the deceased was shot by another person, and that he died from the effect of the wounds thus inflicted upon him, and that said wounds were unlawfully inflicted, there is, it seems to us, no room for a reasonable doubt, or even cavil. Of course, it will not be denied that the corpus delicti may be proved by circumstantial, as well as by direct, evidence.

3. It is contended by appellant that the court erred to his prejudice in allowing the witness Lamphrey, the officer who arrested the defendant at Marysville a few days after the homicide, to testify that he found a couple of pistols lying on the bed in the room in which the arrest was made, and in receiving said pistols in evidence as exhibits in the case. It was not clearly shown by the people that those pistols were the property of the defendant. They were claimed by a woman who occupied the room and who testified for the defendant. At the time of the arrest and the finding of the pistols there were another Chinaman and the woman in the room. The claim is that there was no connection disclosed between the weapons and the crime charged, and that therefore no testimony should have been received concerning them, nor should they have been exhibited in the case. As a part of the original case of the people, we think the testimony with regard to the finding of the pistols was proper as furnishing a circumstance bearing upon the charge, whether directly or remotely, was for the jury to decide in view of all the other facts and circumstances. Lamphrey said that when he first stepped into the room and looked about he saw the weapons on the bed, and asked to whom they belonged, whereupon the defendant started to walk behind him, when he shoved the Chinaman backward and against the wall and then took possession of the pistols. The woman declared at that time that she was the owner of the pistols, it is true, and in fact claimed ownership of everything in the room; but the people not only had the right to the testimony complained of, but to prove every other circumstance occurring at the time of the arrest of the defendant having any bearing on the crime for which the defendant was arrested or upon his conduct when arrested. His actions when the detective inquired as to the ownership of the pistols were proper to be described to the jury, and in that connection it was proper enough to receive the testimony relative to the finding of the pistols. In any event, it being undisputed that the deceased was killed by means of a revolver, and the identification of the defendant as one of the parties who left the scene of the homicide with great haste having been sufficiently established, the ruling could not have prejudiced the accused.

It is next urged that the court committed a prejudicially erroneous ruling in refusing to permit the witness Desmond to answer the following question propounded by counsel for the defendant on cross-examination: "Your object in searching him was to find out whether he had any weapons or not upon him, was it not?" This witness, who is a police officer of Sacramento, had testified on direct that he had been detailed to watch the outgoing trains of the Northern Electric Company leaving its depot at Eighth and J streets, in said city, for the purpose of watching for and searching any Chinese who might take any of the cars of said company. On the 27th of April, he testified, he saw the defendant on one of these cars, and searched him. The officer declared that he found no weapons upon him. The question was a proper one on cross-examination, and the court should have allowed an answer thereto; but we cannot see, in view of the witness' direct testimony, how the refusal to allow it could have been in the least harmful to the accused. Undoubtedly the point which it was important that the defendant should desire to appear clear to the jury was that the officer, having searched him, found no weapons upon his person, and this does appear clearly to have been the fact from the officer's direct testimony. Therefore whether the officer's object in making the search was to learn whether the defendant had any weapons upon him at that time became altogether unimportant and immaterial.

The defendant testified that he came to Sacramento from Marysville the next day after the homicide for the purpose of procuring medicine from a Chinese doctor for one Chin See, a Chinese woman, who was ill. After his arrival at Sacramento, and while looking for the doctor's office, which was not located in the Chinese quarters of said city, a policeman stopped and questioned him as to where he came from, where he had slept the night before, and where he was going. He was then asked by his attorney "what the officer did to him"; the purpose of the question being to show that the officer searched him. Upon objection by the district attorney, the court refused to permit an answer to this question. Counsel for defendant declare that the question was proper for the purpose of showing the effect the conduct of the officer had upon the defendant. Where an alibi is introduced and relied upon by a defendant in a criminal case, very large latitude is generally allowed the accused in explanation of conduct which might otherwise be interpreted as indicating a consciousness of guilt. For illustration, where flight is one of the circumstances upon which the prosecution rely to establish guilt, the defendant may testify that certain persons had communicated to him the fact of the commission of the crime and had advised him, for reasons perfectly consistent with his innocence, to keep "under cover" or to go to some other locality. It is a fact within the compass of common knowledge that, when a Chinese visits a city or town, the first place he seeks is that part of such city or town inhabited by his countrymen. It therefore becomes of peculiar importance to a Chinese, on trial for the murder of one of his countrymen, to explain why, if it be a fact, he remained away from "Chinatown" where and after the homicide was committed, when seen in the city or town in which it occurred; and in such case he should be allowed, as in fact any defendant should, to state any fact which would reasonably tend to explain either flight or why he remained away from those places which, in the very nature of things, under ordinary circumstances, he would be expected first to visit. The question to which objection was sustained by the trial court should have been allowed to be answered; but the ruling could not have operated prejudicially against the accused, in view of the fact that the defendant had just previously stated that, before meeting the policeman, a Chinaman had apprised him of the killing of a "Bing Kong Tong man" on the preceding day by a member of the "Chee Kong Tong," of which the defendant is a member, and that the "Bing Kong Tongs" were "after" all the "Chee Kong Tongs," thus putting the accused on his guard. This testimony was offered and received for the purpose of explaining why the defendant did not visit the Chinese quarters in Sacramento on the day following the homicide, and we cannot perceive how the circumstance of the search of the person of the defendant by the policeman could have added anything to the explanation of his conduct in that respect. The ruling was therefore without prejudice.

The defendant having testified that he reached Sacramento from Marysville on Sunday at about the hour of 12 o'clock in the daytime, the people were allowed, in rebuttal of that statement, to prove by a Miss Maybelle Springfield, who was then employed as an operator in the telephone office at Sacramento, that the defendant came into said office between 11 o'clock and 11:30 o'clock in the forenoon of that day and had telephonic communication with some one in Marysville. It is now claimed that this testimony was not in rebuttal of any new material fact brought out by the defense, and that the ruling admitting it involved prejudicial error. Counsel declare that such evidence is immaterial, because it could have no tendency to prove that the defendant was in Sacramento the night before. We do not assent to this contention. It was a circumstance bearing upon the question of the defendant's presence in Sacramento the preceding evening, of more or less importance, according to the weight which the jury, considering it in connection with the other proven circumstances, might feel justified in giving it. The testimony could appropriately have been made a part of the people's original case, and even if, strictly speaking, it was not proper rebuttal testimony, it being relevant and material, the fact that it was introduced out of the regular order would not justify a reversal of the case. People v. Arrighini, 122 Cal. 121, 54 Pac. 591; People v. Grimes, 132 Cal. 34, 64 Pac. 101; People v. Maughs (Cal. App.) 96 Pac. 407. It is, however, claimed that the fact that the defendant telephoned to some one in Marysville was clearly not rebuttal, nor material for any purpose, and that its admission was injurious to the defendant. If such fact were the only and principal one sought to be proved by the witness, and the circumstance not shown to have had any connection with the crime charged, it would doubtless be an immaterial fact; but we cannot say that even then it would be prejudicial. But the important point which the people designed to bring out through Miss Springfield's testimony was the fact that the defendant was in Sacramento on the day following that upon which Lee Tong was killed at an earlier hour than that at which he claimed to have arrived there from Marysville, and the fact that he communicated with some one at Marysville over the telephone was doubtless referred to by the witness merely as a circumstance explanatory of her recollection of his presence in the telephone office at the time mentioned by her.

The defendant was recalled to the witness stand after the prosecution had concluded their rebuttal testimony and asked if he was in the telephone office at the time mentioned and under the circumstances as detailed by Miss Springfield. The court sustained an objection by the district attorney to the question on the ground that it was not surrebuttal, and said ruling is assigned as error prejudicial to the defendant. The ruling was not erroneous. When under cross-examination, in the presentation of his original case, the defendant was asked by the district attorney if he was not in the telephone office at Sacramento at the time designated by Miss Springfield and communicated with a party at Marysville, and emphatically declared that he was not in said telephone office at any time in the forenoon of Sunday, the 26th of April, 1908. The defendant was permitted in surrebuttal to say that he had never seen the witness Springfield, until she came into court as a witness, and having already denied, during his cross-examination, that he was in said telephone office on the day and at the hour mentioned by Miss Springfield, the testimony of the latter brought out nothing new, and, obviously, the answer to the question to which the people's objection was sustained would have amounted only to a repetition of what the defendant had previously testified to.

It was error for the court to decline to permit the witness Davis, called by the defendant for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of the witness Myers, to testify to a certain inconsistent statement which it was claimed that the latter had made. Myers, it will be recalled, identified the defendant as the man who, immediately after the shooting, ran from the west to the east side of Third street, disappearing in a cellar. Davis, then a reporter on a Sacramento newspaper, interviewed Myers, shortly after the homicide, with regard to the shooting, and the latter said to Davis: "Now, I don't believe I could identify any of them"—referring to the Chinese who ran from the scene of the homicide. The foundation for the impeachment having been properly laid when Myers was under cross-examination, Davis was called as a witness for the defendant and asked if Myers had made the statement referred to. The district attorney's objection to this question was sustained, and we doubt not that the ruling would have been prejudicially erroneous but for the fact that the district attorney himself asked Davis the same question on cross-examination, and the witness replied that Myers did make the statement imputed to him, thereby curing the error involved in the ruling disallowing an answer to the question on the direct examination of the witness. The court's ruling appears to have proceeded on the theory that Myers' reply to the question whether he had made the statement attributed to him did not involve a denial that he made such statement, and that there was therefore nothing to contradict. Myers' reply to the question was,

"I don't remember." But we think the defendant was entitled as a matter of fairness to have it clearly appear whether the witness did or did not make the inconsistent statement, and that he was not precluded under the rule from showing that the witness did make such inconsistent statement merely because he answered that he did not remember whether he made it or not. Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 462.

4. One of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was urged was that of newly discovered evidence, and in support thereof the defendant presented several affidavits. The facts set out in said affidavits were refuted by affidavits filed by the people, and the showing upon that ground involves evidence in which there is a sharp conflict. For this reason the ruling of the trial court thereon cannot be disturbed by this court. A motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence has always been regarded by the courts with a great deal of suspicion and disfavor, for which reason a wide discretion is committed to the trial court in ruling upon the motion when made on that ground. It has been said "that the temptations are so strong to make a favorable showing after a defeat in an angry and bitter controversy, and the circumstance that the testimony had just been discovered when it is too late to introduce it is so suspicious, that courts require the very strictest showing of diligence." People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 360, 28 Cal. 261.

5. The appellant complains of the following instruction; his criticism thereof being that it assumes the proof of the crime charged against him: "It is contended by the defendant here that, at the time of the commission of the homicide, he was at a place other than the scene thereof, and, consequently, that it was impossible that he should have committed the same. This particular contention constitutes and is termed in law an alibi, and, if established, is a perfect refutation of any crime charged. Such contention being interposed by the defendant as proof that he is not guilty, it then becomes the duty of the jury to pass upon the question as to whether or no said defendant was present at the scene of the homicide at the time of the commission thereof. * * *" The objection to the foregoing instruction for the reason stated is based upon the hypothesis that the word "homicide" is synonymous in meaning with the word "crime," and that therefore the court in the instruction necessarily assumed the commission of the crime. The contention is untenable. The killing of a human being by another under any circumstances constitutes a homicide, as an etymological analysis of the word itself will plainly show; but whether a homicide is murder or any other like crime depends, necessarily, on the circumstances under which it is committed. Our Penal Code expressly sets forth the circumstances and conditions which would make a homicide a murder, and, furthermore, it prescribes the conditions upon which it would be either excusable or justifiable. There could be no such thing as an excusable or justifiable murder; but counsel's argument, carried to its logical end, would inevitably lead to such an absurd result. The authorities cited by counsel on this point need not be specifically noticed, for they do not, of course, uphold their contention; but it is further contended that the instruction is erroneous in that it declared to the jury that an alibi, "if established is a perfect refutation of any crime." The argument is that, by the use of the words "if established," the court in effect told the jury that it rested with the defendant to prove that contention by a preponderance of the evidence. We do not think that the instruction, when considered with the several instructions upon the burden of proof and reasonable doubt, should be so construed. The rule is that, if the defendant introduces sufficient proof upon the contention of an alibi to raise a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, he is entitled to an acquittal, and the court in effect so instructed the jury. The words "if established" should therefore be construed to mean, as it was, manifestly, when read by the light of the other instructions, so intended, that if the proof in favor of the contention of alibi was of that degree that it would create a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, then such alibi would be "established," and the accused entitled to an acquittal. It is to be assumed that the jury considered the instructions as a whole and understood them, and upon this assumption it must be said that they understood the instruction here complained of as we have construed it. This instruction is very much different in its phraseology from the one condemned in the case of the People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 Pac. 137. The instruction in that case treated an alibi as a defense and so characterized it, and declared that it was the duty of the defendant to "prove and establish" it to the satisfaction of the jury. Clearly, such an instruction is erroneous, because an alibi is not a defense, but an element only of the case which the people must make out before they can demand a conviction. In other words, the prosecution must always prove the presence of the accused at the place where the crime was committed, where it is claimed that he personally participated in its commission. The characterization of an alibi as a defense would of itself be almost sufficient to vitiate the instruction; but the statement therein, in connection with declaring it a defense, that an alibi must be "proven and established" to the satisfaction of the jury, rendered it a palpably prejudicial misstatement of the law. We do not approve of the statement in the criticised instruction that an alibi should be "established"; but, as declared, the word as so used should be interpreted and the instruction construed by the light of the other instructions, and as so construed, and as undoubtedly it was understood by the jury, it was harmless, if not strictly correct.

The instruction upon flight was given in general language, and stated the law correctly. It does not assume the commission of the crime charged against the defendant in this case. Nor is this instruction erroneous because it declares that flight, "if unexplained by other circumstances," may become a circumstance in the chain of evidence of guilt, "depending upon its connection with all of the other circumstances shown." This is a clear and correct statement of the law.

It is vigorously insisted that the following portion of the given instruction defining "murder of the first degree" does not involve a correct statement of the law on that subject, and that the defendant was thereby greatly prejudiced: "It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer; and, if such is the case, the killing is murder of the first degree," etc. This instruction, as thus phrased, was criticised by the Supreme Court in the case of the People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187, for the reason that there was an omission to insert therein, immediately following the words "preceded by," the words "and the result of," so that the instruction would have read: "It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by and the result of a concurrence of the will," etc. But the court in that case does not say that the instruction as given here amounts to such error as to require a reversal, and it is our opinion that it does not. We readily recognize the soundness of the logic at the bottom of the criticism of the instruction in the Maughs Case, and must as readily concede that the inclusion of the omitted words referred to would render the description of the crime of murder of the first degree clearer and more easily understood by jurors; yet, in view of the evidence in this case that the defendant, just prior to the shooting, was seen walking back and forth from a point on Third street to the corner of Third and I, near which Lee Tong was shot and killed, and that two men were engaged in the shooting, and that, immediately upon the cessation thereof they fled with unusual celerity in different directions from the spot at which the homicide took place, thus strongly tending to show that the shooting and the killing, by whomsoever done, was deliberate, premeditated, and willful, and no element of self-defense appearing from the proven circumstances, we think the jurors must have understood from the instruction that, if the defendant had deliberately and premeditatedly formed the will to slay the deceased, and did thereupon slay him, such slaying must have been the result of the will or intention so formed, and that under such circumstances only could they find him guilty of murder of the first degree. It may be remarked that the judgment of reversal in the Maughs Case, supra, was expressly put upon the ground that the instruction to the effect that it is the duty of a person taking life in self-defense, when attacked, to "employ all reasonable means within his power, consistent with his safety, to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing," was prejudicially erroneous.

Other errors are claimed with reference to instructions given and refused; but they are not of sufficient importance to demand special notice here.

We have extended this opinion to a much greater length than we had intended; but the briefs of the appellant are voluminous and exhaustively argue from appellant's standpoint every question upon which a reversal of this cause was thought to be justified, and we felt that under such circumstances all the main propositions should be to some extent specially reviewed.

We have examined the record with care, and as a result are convinced that the defendant was fairly tried, the court's charge, as a whole, full, clear, and correct, and that the verdict is warranted by the evidence.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 773*) — DISMISSAL — FAILURE TO FILE BRIEF.

Where more than three years had elapsed since the transcript was filed, and no brief had been filed, the appeal will be dismissed, under Supreme Court Rule No. 2, subd. 4 (78 Pac. vii), requiring appellant to file his brief 30 days after the filing of the transcript.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of W. B. Shiveley, deceased. Appeal by Daniel Shiveley and another, administrators. Appeal dismissed.

H. L. Ford and J. S. Burnell, for appellants. J. N. Gillett, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that appellants have failed to comply with Supreme Court Rule No. 2, subd. 4 (78 Pac. vii), requiring them to file their brief 30 days after the filing of the transcript. The motion is not contested, and as it has been more than three years since the transcript was filed, and no brief has ever been filed, it seems to be peculiarly a case for the enforcement of said rule.

The appeal is dismissed.

12. WILLS (§ 230*) — RIGHT TO CONTEST — AGREEMENTS—CONSIDERATION.

In the absence of a contrary showing, it is presumed that an agreement by legatees in a later will to compensate the legatee in a prior will, excluded in the later will, on his agreement not to contest the later will, is fair and honest.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by J. M. Ruth against Lotta Ruth Krone and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Daniel A. Ryan, for appellants. Otto Irving Wise and Louis Hirsch, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action on a promissory note for the sum of $2,000, alleged in the complaint to have been executed by the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone in favor of and payable to the plaintiff. The cause was tried by a jury and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the face of the note, with legal interest from the date of its maturity; said note, dated June 3, 1903, having been made payable three years after its date, without interest. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff in accordance with the terms of the verdict. This appeal is prosecuted from said judgment and from the order denying the defendants a new trial.

The complaint is in the ordinary form of actions for recovery upon promissory notes. The defendants, by answer, specifically deny the material averments of the complaint, and, moreover, filed a cross-complaint, in which, admitting the execution of the note, they attack the validity of the instrument upon the ground that it is without consideration for its support. The plaintiff introduced the note in evidence, and thereupon rested his case. The note constituted prima facie proof of all that it purported to be. The presumption is that the note was supported by a sufficient consideration (section 1963, subd. 21, Code Civ. Proc., and section 1614, Civ. Code), and the burden of overcoming such presumption or of showing want of consideration sufficient to support the note was cast upon the defendants (section 1615, Civ. Code; Keating v. Morrissey, 6 Cal. App. 163, 91 Pac. 677).

Considerable space is devoted in the briefs of counsel for both sides to the discussion of the question of the "shifting of the burden of proof." We fail to appreciate the pertinency of the discussion. It is only elementary to say that the burden of proof is always on the party maintaining the affirmative of the issue. In the case at bar it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove the due execution and nonpayment of the note; but, when he has made out a prima facie case, then he may rest and thus invite the defendant to exhibit whatever defense he may be able to interpose thereto. Our law, as seen, provides (section 1614, Civ. Code, supra) that a written instrument imports a consideration, and that the burden of showing that such an instrument is without a sufficient consideration to support it rests upon the party seeking to invalidate or avoid it. Section 1615, Civ. Code, supra. Therefore when the plaintiff proved the note and its nonpayment he made out a prima facie case upon which he was at liberty to rest until the defendants had introduced proof showing or tending to show that the note was unsupported by a sufficient consideration. While the burden was upon the defendants to dispel the presumption of a sufficient consideration, the burden in its strict sense was upon the plaintiff to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence. "The two burdens," says the Supreme Court in Scott v. Wood, 81 Cal. 401, 22 Pac. 872, "are distinct things. One may shift back and forth with the ebb and flow of the testimony." As is said in Encyclopedia of Law and Practice (Cyc.) vol. 16, p. 926: "'Burden of proof,' as a phrase, means either: (1) The necessity of establishing the existence of a certain fact or set of facts by evidence which preponderates to the legally required extent, or (2) the necessity which rests on the party at any particular time during a trial, to create a prima facie case in his own favor, or to overthrow one when created against him." So, in the case at bar, as we have shown, the plaintiff having made the case required of him, it became the duty of the defendants to overthrow it, if they could, by proof sufficient to dispel the presumption which the law raises in favor of a consideration sufficient to support the instrument declared upon. Referring to subdivision 2 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that jurors may be instructed "that they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a less number, or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds," the Supreme Court, in People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 179, 54 Pac. 837, says: "In this is a distinct recognition of the facts: (1) That a presumption is evidence; and (2) that it is evidence which may outweigh the positive testimony of witnesses against it. It has been said that disputable presumptions are allowed to stand, not against the facts they represent, but in lieu of proof of the facts, and that, when the fact is proven contrary to the presumption, no conflict arises, but the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled. [Citing Savings, etc., Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922.] This is true. Against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption has no weight; but, where it is undertaken to prove the fact against the presumption, it still remains with the jury to say whether or not the fact has been proven, and, if they are not satisfied with the proof offered in its support, they are at liberty to accept the evidence of the presumption." (Italics ours.)

The jury in the present case accepted the evidence of the presumption, supported by the testimony of the plaintiff, as against the other evidence offered to rebut it; but appellants claim that the jury were not warranted in so doing. Let us briefly examine the evidence by the light of the rules as we have stated and as we understand them. The undisputed facts show that the plaintiff and the defendant, Lotta Ruth Krone, are brother and sister, and that, after the death of their father, their mother married one J. C. Walker, who, subsequently to said marriage, adopted the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone as his own child. On March 30, 1903, Walker died. On January 6, 1903, the deceased executed a will, devising all his real property to his three stepchildren (there was another daughter of Mrs. Walker by her first husband) and a nephew in equal shares, and bequeathing his personal property to the three stepchildren, to the exclusion of said nephew. By the terms of this will the plaintiff was made the executor thereof, to serve as such without bonds. When this will was executed, Walker was in his last illness, being confined to his bed in a hospital in the city of San Francisco. On the 19th day of January, 1903, 13 days after the execution of the first-mentioned will, Walker executed another will by which he gave all his property to the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone, and named her as executrix of said will without bonds. On the day of Walker's death, March 30, 1903, this latter will was filed for probate and was admitted to probate on the 10th day of April, 1903. To dispel the presumption that the note upon which this action is founded is supported by a sufficient consideration, the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone testified, in substance: That, immediately upon the death of Walker and upon learning of the execution by the deceased of the later will, the plaintiff began to ply the defendant Lotta with threats of trouble in the form of litigation unless she made a settlement with him; that he represented to her that the fact that she had been adopted by the deceased gave her no right to participate in the fruits of the estate left by Walker superior to his right to share therein as a stepson; that, as a stepson, he was entitled to one-third of said estate; that she received nothing for the note, but executed it "out of generosity" and to "prevent annoyances." She declared, in explanation of what she meant by her answer, that she made the note "to prevent annoyances"; that she executed the instrument to prevent "being pestered to death by his requests for some kind of a settlement." At first, she testified, he asked for only $1,500, but subsequently demanded $2,000, for which finally, she gave him the note in dispute. The plaintiff thereupon, so said defendant further declared, agreed not to contest the later will. She declared that in none of the conversations with her brother in which he demanded a settlement did he make any reference to the will executed by the deceased on the 6th of January, 1903, and therefore made no claim that he was entitled to share in the estate of the deceased by reason of the provisions of said will.

The plaintiff, testifying in rebuttal, stated: That he had, after the death of Walker, consulted attorneys Reuben Lloyd and E. W. Hill with reference to a contest of the later will of the deceased. That his sister, Mrs. Krone, had telephoned to him on the day she executed and delivered the note to plaintiff, June 3, 1903, requesting him to call at the Alcalde apartment house in San Francisco, "saying that she would like to talk to me. I went there. Mr. Krone, the husband of my sister, was present in the apartment when the note was executed. My sister furnished the paper and ink. I never asked for $1,500 and raised it. * * * When she sent for me, and when I got to her apartments, she stated that she wanted to settle the difficulty between us, and I sat and listened to her. She said, 'Well, Jack, you are entitled to your interest in this will that you claim,' and she said, 'I want to continue the friendly feeling that a brother and sister should have, and I would like to settle this matter now,' and I told her that was agreeable to me; and so she told me of her condition then, that she was going to build flats in Fresno, and use the money that was in the bank, and borrow money from her father-in-law, and that she was perfectly willing to pay me if she had the money on hand. I told her that I was in no need of money then, and that I was perfectly willing to wait. She felt that she was not able to pay more than $2,000, and she volunteered that amount. I had not made any proposition. I accepted her offer then and there. I received nothing from the estate of Mr. Walker directly or indirectly, other than this promissory note. * * * She said that we were entitled to what was coming to us, my other sister and myself, but she thought it was hard that a distant nephew like Axon Walker should get any part of the money. She said that she wanted to keep the money among her own relatives." Plaintiff further testified that, immediately upon hearing of the death of Walker, he went to the city hall in San Francisco for the purpose of filing for probate the will of January 6, 1903, but did not do so because the said defendant had already filed a will (referring to the later will of the deceased), and because, also, he desired to consult an attorney. He denied saying to his sister that as a stepson of deceased he was entitled to a share in the estate. He declared that he never threatened the defendant Lotta, but said that "I told her husband that I was going to contest the will, and he told her." The note, he said, was given by Lotta upon the agreement that he "would not petition for the probate of the will," referring to the first will executed by deceased, and that, upon receiving the note, he ceased to take further steps in the matter. The plaintiff further testified: "She gave me a note for $2,000, and, for reasons of my own, I wished to take the note and compromise the whole matter in that way. The reasons were that I was willing to compromise because Mr. Walker was moved one night by Mrs. Krone from St. Mary's hospital, without anybody's knowledge. He was so ill at the hospital that the doctors said that if he was moved he would die in the ambulance. I was told by the nurse that, although Mr. Walker was as a rule given but one powder, they gave him two the night he made out the will, which my sister had, and that he was in no condition to execute that will. Further, because the nurse told me that Mr. Krone, my sister's husband, had blackened himself and introduced himself to Mr. Walker as his brother, and on another occasion had brought in a doll made of rags and introduced the doll as the child of my sister, and I did not want to give information to distant relatives so that they could attack us upon other property which was not involved, and, rather than give such testimony in law, I promised to take that money, rather than to have any trouble." He said that he had intended to file the will of January 6, 1903, up to the time that his sister compromised or settled their differences by executing the note in dispute, and then, having agreed as a consideration for said note to stop further proceedings on his part, he abandoned any intention he might have had to file said will.

We have thus given a substantial epitome of the important and vital facts to which both the defendant Lotta and the plaintiff testified upon the issue tendered and submitted by the pleadings. The testimony of these two parties constituted all the evidence received at the trial, except certain documentary evidence in the form of certain deeds and the two wills, etc. It will readily be observed that there is a marked variance between the testimony given by the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone and that of the plaintiff upon the vital question whether the note in controversy was executed and given upon a valid or sufficient consideration, and we think the case as to that fact is, therefore, clearly within the rule as to conflicting evidence. Counsel for the appellants suggests some dozen or more reasons for which, he claims, the judgment and order should be reversed. We have carefully gone over all the grounds for a reversal thus presented, but we consider it necessary to give particular attention to a few of them only. The claim that the evidence discloses that the note was given without a valid consideration for its support is based not only upon the testimony given by the defendant Lotta, but also upon the testimony of the plaintiff and alleged variances between his testimony and certain allegations contained in the answer to the cross-complaint filed by defendants, the purpose of which was to secure a decree that the note be surrendered for cancellation upon the ground that it was void for want of a valid consideration to support it.

The answer to the cross-complaint we would not commend as an exhibition of model pleading of the negative kind. Its denials seem to be not only inconsistent with each other, but some of them, if taken alone, would fall far short of tendering an issue upon the important question involved in the litigation and upon the solution of which alone hinges the determination of the proposition whether the plaintiff is or is not entitled to recover upon the note upon which he declares. The theory of the defendants, as evidenced by the averments of the cross-complaint, seems to have been that the plaintiff was without any right whatever to contest the later will of the deceased, notwithstanding the fact that in the earlier will of Walker the plaintiff was named as one of the four devisees and legatees, to share equally with the others so named in said will in the estate of the deceased. The cross-complaint alleges: "That on or about the 3d day of June, 1903, said plaintiff, J. M. Ruth, threatened to contest the last will and testament of said J. C. Walker, deceased, unless said defendant, Lotta Ruth Krone, executed and delivered to him the said promissory note mentioned in said amended complaint; that said Lotta Ruth Krone thereupon and in consideration of said plaintiff forbearing to contest said will, and in ignorance of the fact that said plaintiff had no right to contest said will, executed to plaintiff said promissory note set forth in said amended complaint; that said agreement of said plaintiff to forbear contesting said will was the sole consideration for the execution of said promissory note; that said plaintiff was not a blood or any relation of said J. C. Walker, save and excepting that the said J. C. Walker was at one time married to the mother of the plaintiff"; that his said mother died before the death of said J. C. Walker; "that said plaintiff was not a party interested in said will or in the estate of said deceased and had no right to contest said will and could not have contested said will." The answer to the cross-complaint first specifically denies all the foregoing averments, and then denies that plaintiff was not a party interested in the last will and testament of the deceased or in the estate of said deceased, "and he denies that he had no right to contest the last will and testament of the said J. C. Walker, and in this behalf this plaintiff alleges that, within a few weeks of the death of the said J. C. Walker, the said J. C. Walker made, published, and executed his last will and testament wherein and whereby, among other things, he bequeathed a very large portion of his estate to this plaintiff, and in which he named this plaintiff as an executor thereof, and that the alleged will produced by said defendant Lotta Ruth Krone was not the last will and testament of the said J. C. Walker, deceased, and that the said promissory note in the amended complaint set forth was made and delivered to this plaintiff by the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone for a good and valuable consideration other than in the said amended cross-complaint set forth." The answer, taken as a whole, states a defense to the claims of the cross-complaint. It is not easy to understand why the plaintiff denied that he threatened to contest the later will of the deceased, since the promise to waive his right to contest said will could be the only valid consideration for the support of the note, unless the denial was intended only to negative the charge, if such was its meaning, that such "threat" was made in its offensive or illegal sense, or to deny, as plaintiff denied when testifying, that he made the alleged "threat" to the defendant Lotta personally; but, whether the special demurrer should have been sustained or not, the answer was, in any event, good as against a general demurrer, and, the trial of the main question having been fully gone into under the issues as thus framed, no objection being made to the evidence addressed thereto, except as to the form and competency of certain questions, the error in overruling the special demurrer was thereby cured.

The plaintiff, as we have seen, testified to the effect: That he had consulted his attorneys with a view of taking proceedings to contest the later will of the deceased; that he had reason to believe that said will was not, in law, the last will and testament of the deceased; that such reason was founded upon the circumstances under which he had been informed said alleged will had been made and executed by the deceased; that he had informed Lotta's husband of his intention to contest the said will; that such intention had been communicated to Lotta by her husband; that, upon receiving the note in dispute from his sister, he abandoned further intention to contest said will; and that that was the agreement upon his part upon which the note was executed and delivered to him. It is now claimed by counsel for the appellants that this testimony by the plaintiff is inconsistent with the denials of his answer to the cross-complaint, and that the effect of such denials is to impeach his testimony given at the trial. The claim that such inconsistency exists has, apparently, some foundation. As a pleading, as we have before said, the answer is not a model specimen, and the special demurrer thereto should have been sustained upon the ground of the uncertainty and ambiguity of its denials; but when a court or jury is called upon to consider certain allegations of fact in a pleading as evidence in the case, and which allegations are inconsistent with other allegations setting up a good cause of action or a meritorious defense, such facts are to be so considered by and subject to the same rules by which evidence of any other character is to be considered. Assuming that the denial in the answer to the cross-complaint that plaintiff ever threatened to contest the later will of the deceased, etc., is to be construed as meaning what the language of the averment or denial appears upon its face to imply, yet that declaration in the answer, when viewed with the other allegations therein, is not necessarily conclusive evidence upon the point, no more than would be the declaration made in a different form. It, like any other statement inconsistent with a witness' testimony, could have no other effect than to either impeach or weaken the testimony given by the plaintiff, according as the jury or court might view the variance. Therefore, the jury having found in favor of the plaintiff on the question of consideration, it is to be presumed that they fully and fairly considered the alleged discrepancies, and either reconciled them with the testimony as given by plaintiff, or viewed them as not possessing sufficient importance to justify a total disregard of plaintiff's testimony. In any event, the jury must have found that, whatever disparity may have been disclosed between the denials in the answer to the cross-complaint and plaintiff's testimony, or whatever discrepancies, if any, may have been developed in plaintiff's testimony through cross-examination, these, even when considered with the testimony of the defendant, were insufficient to dispel the presumption that the note was given for a valid consideration. In this connection, it may be stated that, when plaintiff's attention was called to the denials in his answer to the cross-complaint, which counsel for appellants claims are inconsistent with a valid defense to the charge of want of consideration, he explained that the answer and the particular averments thus referred to were the work of his attorney and not his, thereby disclaiming personal responsibility for said declarations.

It is next claimed by the appellants that, assuming that the consideration moving the defendant Lotta Ruth Krone to execute and deliver to plaintiff the note was a promise on his part to forbear instituting a contest of the will of January 19, 1903, the note is nevertheless without consideration "because plaintiff had no such right." In the case of the Estate of Langley, 140 Cal. 130, 73 Pac. 824, the Supreme Court held that claimants under an alleged prior will have the right to appear as contestants of a subsequent will; but the appellants undertake to differentiate that case from the one at bar on the ground that in that case the "alleged prior will" had been filed for probate, and in the present case the prior will was not filed or offered for probate. We are, however, unable to appreciate the force of the suggested distinction. The first will executed by the deceased appears upon its face to be in all respects valid, having been, apparently, executed with all the formalities required by our law. If it could have been shown that the later will had been procured to be executed through undue influence, or while the deceased was laboring under a mental state in which he would have been incompetent to make a will, and such will set aside for such reason, then the earlier will, assuming it to be perfectly valid, as it appears on its face to be, would have been the last will and testament of the deceased; and we can see no possible reason upon principle why the plaintiff, as a beneficiary under the first will, has not equal right with a lawful heir to institute a proceeding by which the pretended will could be shown and declared to be no will at all, and thus open the way for the disposition of the estate of the deceased in accordance with his expressed intention. And, whether the first will could have been shown not to express the intention of the deceased, whether it could have been shown that its execution was brought about by the exercise of undue influence over the deceased, or under other circumstances which would render it invalid as a testament, are questions which cannot constitute an answer to the proposition that the plaintiff, as a legatee under said first will, had the right to contest the later will. A man is the disposer by law of his own fortune or estate, and if, in conformity with the formalities prescribed by our law, he gives, as he has the undisputed right to do, his property by will to persons who are strangers to his blood, to the exclusion of those to whom his estate would descend in the case of intestacy, those who are so made the beneficiaries of his bounty stand upon just as firm a foundation in their relations to the estate of the deceased testator as if they were his lawful heirs, capable of acquiring his estate under the laws of succession. A person, as suggested, is under no legal obligation to leave his estate, at his death, to his heirs or other kin, and when he elects to give his fortune to those who are not related to him by consanguinity, and does so according to the forms of law, he substitutes them as the beneficiaries of his bounty for those who would succeed to his estate if he were to die without making a testamentary disposition thereof. It might be an unnatural disposal of his estate, but not an unlawful one. We are therefore, as declared, unable to conceive any sound or sane principle of law which would prevent strangers to the blood of the testator from contesting any subsequent will of the deceased, by the terms of which, if valid, a prior will, under whose provisions they were entitled to succeed to his estate, would be nullified or destroyed; and we think that the principle here stated has a much broader application as it is enunciated in the case of Estate of Langley, supra, than appellants are disposed to accord to it. The case of Prater v. Miller, 25 Ala. 320, 60 Am. Dec. 521, which is called to our attention by appellants, is not, in our opinion, an authority against the application of the principle referred to in the case at bar. In that case there was no prior will, nor did there appear to exist in that case any circumstances, as the plaintiff here testified he had information existed, from which a reasonable inference might follow that the will of the deceased had been brought into existence either through undue influence or when the deceased was mentally incompetent to make a will. In the case cited, the court, referring to the facts, says: "Her [a daughter of the testator] engagement was to interpose no objection to the probate of her father's will—a general forbearance to gainsay its validity in the probate court"—and then declares that such general forbearance is not a sufficient consideration to support a verbal agreement to pay the sum demanded by the proposed contestant. The court in that case deals with the facts as they were established therein, and here we must treat the questions presented by the light of the record in this case. Manifestly, the plaintiff here should not recover if the evidence clearly disclosed that he had procured the making of the note through fraudulent representations or by threats amounting to duress; but the facts in this case, as found by the jury, do not show such to have been the character of the transaction culminating in the execution of the note.

Although counsel for the appellants expressly disclaims that his contention is that an heir has no right to contest his ancestor's will until he has first shown that there is available to him proof which will fully sustain his claim, we think that such is the necessary assumption of his argument, or at least the effect of it. Clearly and concededly, an heir has the legal right to contest the will of his ancestor, and, with equal right, a legatee under a prior will may contest a later will of a testator excluding him, whether there is tenable ground upon which to base the exercise of that right or not. The heir or legatee may not succeed, because of paucity of proof to sustain his contest, in setting aside the will; yet the right to attempt to do so by appropriate proceedings is one of which he cannot be divested by any means of which we have any knowledge. And, having the legal right to contest, who is there to gainsay his legal right to dispose of such right? Or, to put the proposition concretely, a promise to waive such right would, obviously, it being in all respects a legal one, operate as a valid consideration upon which to rest an agreement with the other heirs or interested parties by which the latter agree to compensate him for such waiver, and such an agreement would be enforced where there was no showing that the transaction resulting in the making of the agreement was tainted with fraud or the result of duress or marked by other elements which would vitiate any contract. The presumption is that the transaction here was fair and honest, and that the parties making the agreement, being fully cognizant of all the facts, acted in perfect good faith with each other, recognizing the consummation of the transaction in the light of the facts known to them as being justified and warranted upon principles of fair dealing and honesty. Such we say it is to be presumed was the character of the transaction here until the contrary might be made to appear by evidence of so satisfactory a nature as to so convince the jury or the trial court.

But, after all, the main proposition here is, as declared in the outset, that it was the duty of the defendants, in order to have defeated plaintiff's action, to overthrow the presumption that the note which is the subject of the controversy is supported by a valid or sufficient consideration. The jury found against the defendants upon this issue, and, as there appears a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the question of consideration, which is in effect merely to say that defendants' proof was not strong enough to overcome the presumption of consideration, this court cannot interfere with that finding.

Complaint is made that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendants in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. We shall not review these assignments in detail; it being sufficient to say that we have given the charge of the court to the jury painstaking examination and are of the opinion that therein the law applicable to the issues and the evidence presented was fairly, fully, and correctly declared. Many of the rejected instructions do not contain correct statements of the law, while the principles correctly stated in other rejected instructions were covered by the court's charge.

Objection is also urged against some of the court's rulings admitting and excluding certain evidence. These rulings we have examined carefully, and find nothing in them invading the substantial rights of the defendants.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

JAMES v. OAKLAND TRACTION CO.
(Civ. 501.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
July 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 7, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 598*) — PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2, the preponderance of the evidence does not depend on the number of witnesses introduced to support the affirmative of the issue, but lies with the person producing the testimony which carries conviction to the jury.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—VERDICT—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, a verdict for plaintiff cannot be set aside on appeal, unless it appears from plaintiff's testimony that in the nature of the case the accident could not have happened in accordance with her theory.

4. TRIAL (§ 62*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

Where, in an action for injuries to a street car passenger, defendant's witnesses testified that plaintiff, during the "trolley ride" in which she was injured, stood on one of the steps of the car, and attempted by stooping to catch hold of the grass growing near the track, while the car was in motion, and that she was warned that if she did not get on the car she might fall, the court properly permitted witnesses to testify in rebuttal that plaintiff was not at any time occupying a position on the steps, that she was not cautioned against riding on the step, and did not attempt to catch hold of the grass while the car was in motion.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 93*) — VESTED RIGHTS—STATUTES—AMENDMENT.

Civ. Code, § 501, as it stood at the time plaintiff was injured, provided a maximum fare for trolley cars, and also declared that the rate of speed must not be greater than eight miles an hour. The speed provision was eliminated after the accident by St. 1903, p. 172, c. 156. Held, that since a cause of action for injuries to a passenger on a street car, by excessive speed, vested in her independent of the statute at the time of the accident, and the statute as it then existed merely prescribed the measure of care in the matter of speed, plaintiff had a vested right to have her contract of transportation performed in the manner specified by the statute, and hence the subsequent repeal did not affect plaintiff's right to rely on the violation

Code, § 6, providing that no action or proceeding commenced before the Code takes effect and no right accrued is affected by its provisions, St. 1903, p. 172, c. 156, amending Civ. Code, § 501, by eliminating the provision limiting the speed of electric cars to eight miles an hour, was ineffective to deprive a person injured by the alleged violation thereof prior to its repeal of her right to rely thereon.

7. STATUTES (§ 274*)—REPEAL—RETROACTIVE OPERATION.

The rule that when a right of action exists independent of statute, and a statute is enacted prescribing a condition constituting an additional element of the matter out of which the right of action arises, the repeal of the statute after the right of action accrued and prior to the trial will not affect its application to such action, is applicable to causes of action ex delicto, as well as to those sounding in contract.

8. CARRIERS (§ 297*)—STREET RAILROADS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EXCESSIVE SPEED.

A carrier's breach of Civ. Code, § 501, limiting the speed of electric cars to eight miles an hour, alleged to have caused injury to a passenger, is negligence per se, which, in the absence of evidence that plaintiff's own act or conduct contributed proximately to the injury, is sufficient to sustain a verdict in his favor.

9. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVENESS.

Plaintiff, a female child 13 years of age, of robust health, was thrown from an electric car and injured. Her physician testified: That her face was torn to ribbons; that the only part that could be recognized as a face was one eye and the teeth; that two of the tendons of the right wrist were cut, and an artery injured; that the left wing of the nose was split through to the bone; that he found the upper lip in her throat; that there was an area of two by three inches on the right side that was lost entirely; that she sustained a fracture of the orbital plate of the frontal bone, and also had a comminuted fracture of the ankle, and would be permanently disfigured. Three years after the injury, she testified that her ankle was still weak, and that she experienced difficulty in walking. Held, that a verdict for $15,000 was not excessive, under the rule that there is no precise measure of damages in actions for personal torts, except the good sense and unbiased judgment of the jury.

10. NEW TRIAL (§ 102*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

An action for a new trial for newly discovered evidence was properly denied, where it appears that the witness' testimony could have been obtained at the trial before the close of defendant's case, by the exercise of proper diligence.

11. NEW TRIAL (§ 105*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—CUMULATIVE OR IMPEACHING EVIDENCE.

Where alleged newly discovered evidence urged as a ground for new trial was both cumulative and impeaching, the denial of the application was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Harry A. Melvin, Judge.

Action by Rosie James, a minor, by George James, her guardian ad litem, against the Oakland Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harmon Bell, for appellant. M. C. Chapman and Reid & Nusbaumer, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $15,000. The defendant appeals from the judgment entered in accordance with the terms of said verdict and from the order denying it a new trial. A reversal of the judgment and the order is insisted upon because the evidence, it is claimed, is insufficient to justify the verdict, and because of alleged erroneous rulings admitting and rejecting certain testimony and for giving and refusing to give certain instructions.

1. The claim as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is founded upon the contention that the testimony of the plaintiff and of the other witnesses testifying in her behalf describing the circumstances under which the accident occurred is inherently improbable. It is therefore the position of counsel for the appellant that there is not that conflict in the evidence upon the salient points in the case which would preclude, under our constitutional provision confining the appellate jurisdiction of courts of appeal in this state to the consideration of questions of law alone, a review of the evidence and a determination by this court that, as a matter of law, the verdict is unwarranted and unjustified under the proofs. It may be just as well to declare at the outset that we are unable to perceive in the story of the plaintiff and that of her witnesses, detailing the circumstances of the accident, anything which would authorize this court to say that they bear upon their face the earmarks of improbability. Counsel for appellant devotes much space in his briefs to a critical and an analytical discussion of the evidence for the purpose of demonstrating the utter unreliability of the testimony from which the verdict was, manifestly, deduced. Addressed to a jury, as the sole arbiters of the questions of fact, the argument would be appropriate; but when addressed to a court of review, under our system, it is lost labor. It is true, as appellant declares, that by far the larger number of witnesses testified favorably to its contention or the theory upon which it undertakes to account for the accident; but it is only stating a commonplace to say that the preponderance of evidence in a civil case is not determinable by the number of witnesses introduced to support the affirmative of the issue, and, indeed, our Code so expressly provides (subd. 2, § 2061, Code Civ. Proc.); but, tested by those rules which were established and are approved by long usage as the best and the surest means of facilitating such determination, that testimony which produces conviction in the unprejudiced minds of the jurors represents the preponderance of proof, regardless of the number of witnesses from whom it proceeds, whether from one or a hundred. We shall not undertake to follow counsel in his argument of this feature of the case, nor shall we examine minutely in this opinion the record evidence. It will be sufficient to state in substance the evidence adduced in support of the averments of the complaint and from which the jury, obviously, reached the conclusion represented by their verdict.

The accident occurred in the city of Oakland on the evening of the 26th day of April, 1900. It appears that on that evening (a number of cars of the defendant having previously been chartered for that purpose) a "trolley ride" or an excursion was conducted by the "Maccabees," a fraternal organization. The cars left the Masonic Temple in East Oakland early in the evening, and were so "crowded" that all the seats inside and in the open spaces of the cars, as well as all available "standing room," were occupied. The plaintiff, her mother, a sister, and a brother were in one of the cars. The route of the cars was from East Oakland to Alameda, and thence to Berkeley, where the plaintiff, her mother, sister, and brother changed to another car, which carried them back to Oakland by way of Grove street. The defendant, at the time of the accident, maintained and operated a double track on said street. The car on which the plaintiff was riding was known and numbered as "car No. 139," and was traveling south on Grove street, on the west track. When this car reached Twenty-Seventh street, car No. 125, traveling on the east track and going in the opposite direction, or northerly, came along, and at this juncture, and as the two cars were passing each other, a crash and the sound of breaking glass was heard. The two cars came to a stop, and the respondent, having been by some means thrown from the car on which she was riding, was found lying in the street north of car No. 139. She was unconscious, and the flesh was almost entirely torn from one side of her face.

The testimony of all the witnesses for the plaintiff was to the effect: That the car on which plaintiff was riding had so many passengers aboard that there was scarcely "standing room" left; that the car, at the time plaintiff fell or was hurled to the ground, was traveling at a high rate of speed, the witnesses for plaintiff estimating the speed of the car variously at the rate of from 15 to 25 miles per hour. The evidence submitted by plaintiff further shows that the car at and near the point at which the accident occurred swayed back and forth from one side of the track to the other, and, as some of the witnesses put it, "bobbed up and down and pitched" very much after the fashion, we infer, of the movements of a bark sailing over a high sea. The plaintiff's testimony is, in part, as follows: "Coming from Berkeley to the point of the accident, I was on the front of the car on the east side. There was no one to the east of me. * * * When I first boarded this car, I came on to the rear and went through the car to the door, in the position where I was standing at the time I was pitched from the car. When I went through the car, all the seats were occupied excepting the one my mother sat in. * * * I occupied the same position from the time I went outside until the time I was pitched from the car. The window that I had my back against was protected by a few iron rods. I had one of my hands behind me, holding on to the iron bars going across the window. * * * I had hold of the bar from the time we left the power house until the time I was thrown from the car. * * * The car was going at a swift rate, and was swaying and pitching from side to side, and it appeared to me just when it landed on the east side of the track it went over to the west side of the track and back again. It was swaying, jolting, and jerking, and the general condition as to speed was going faster, very fast, it appeared to me. * * * I was pitched from the car by the force of the swaying and rolling. I don't know what happened. I remember the sensation was just as if I was going up in a swing. I lost consciousness then. I can't remember of having been struck by anything."

The theory of the defense is that the plaintiff was standing on one of the steps of the car at the moment the accident occurred and was leaning out from the car, looking back at a car following the one on which she was riding, and that her body was struck by the car going north, thus causing her to be thrown to the ground and thus sustaining the injuries she received. There was testimony received on behalf of the defendant supporting this theory; but the plaintiff positively denied that she was at any time during the course of the trip from Berkeley to the point at which she received her injuries standing on one of the steps of the car, or that she leaned out so that her body could have been struck by the north-bound car. She declared, as we have seen, that she remained all the while standing on the front platform of the car, with her back against the front window on the east side, holding on with one hand to one of the iron bars crossing said window. In this, as shown, she was corroborated by a number of her own witnesses. The defense also introduced testimony showing: That the track over which the car was passing when the accident happened was then in excellent condition; that there was no swaying or pitching or "jolting" by the car at that time; that the car was traveling at a moderate rate of speed—not over 10 miles an hour, some of the witnesses declared. In short, the important testimony introduced in support of the allegations of the complaint was flatly contradicted by the witnesses for the defense.

It is thus readily perceivable that there exists a substantial conflict in the evidence, and that unless, as contended by the appellant, it can be said that the testimony presented by the plaintiff is, upon its face, or in its very nature, improbable, there is no room for an interference by this court with the verdict upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, and, as we have declared, it cannot be said that plaintiff's evidence is inherently improbable. To the contrary, if the car on which she was riding and from which she fell or was thrown to the ground was traveling at the rate of 20 or 25 miles an hour, and as a result of the rapidity with which it was going the car swayed from one side of the track to the other and pitched forward, etc., in the manner described by plaintiff's witnesses, the story of the circumstances under which the accident happened as told by plaintiff and her witnesses is, in our opinion, a most probable one. Indeed, assuming the plaintiff's testimony to be true, which we are required to do, since the jury so found, it is only to be wondered that the car did not leave the track altogether, and it is no matter of surprise that a passenger standing in the position which plaintiff claimed to have occupied on the car should have been hurled from the car under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence she presented.

2. There is nothing in the claim that the 20 rulings of the court receiving and rejecting certain evidence are prejudicially erroneous. Most of these rulings were upon objections that the testimony offered in rebuttal of the defendant's case was not in fact proper rebuttal, and in a number of instances it is objected that the facts thus sought to be established were brought out by plaintiff in her original case. We have been unable, after a careful examination of the rulings complained of, to discover any testimony received at the behest of the plaintiff after the close of the defendant's case which was not relevant, material, and therefore proper. For example, certain witnesses for the defendant testified: That the plaintiff during the course of the "trolley ride" stood upon one of the steps of the car and engaged herself in stooping and attempting to catch hold of the grass growing near the track as the car was in motion; that she was warned that if she did not get upon the car or go "inside" she might probably fall from the car. In rebuttal, over the objection of counsel for the appellant, witnesses were permitted to testify that she was not at any time occupying a position on one of the steps, nor was she at any time cautioned against riding on the step or requested to get on the platform of the car, nor did she attempt to catch hold of the grass growing alongside of the track while the car was in motion. This was clearly relevant testimony, and even if these facts were brought out in her original case, either through direct or cross examination, their admission in rebuttal, while in such case perhaps unnecessary, could not, obviously, have been harmful to the defendant. It is so manifest from a mere examination of the alleged errors involved in the rulings of which complaint is made that the defendant could not have been prejudiced thereby, even if it may be conceded that some of the objections might have well been sustained, that we shall not attempt to give them specific or further attention.

3. We find no error in the action of the court in refusing to give and in giving in a modified form certain instructions proposed by the defendant. Some of these instructions involved, virtually, a direction to the jury to find for the defendant. The answer to the complaint that the court erred in declining to submit such instructions to the jury may be found in the discussion in this opinion of the proposition that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The instructions which the court gave at the request of the defendant after altering them in certain particulars did not, as originally proposed, correctly state the law, and their modification was therefore proper.

It is, however, contended with vigorous insistence that the court erred in giving the following instruction on the motion of the plaintiff: "I further instruct you that it is the law of this state that the rate of speed of street cars within the corporate limits of towns and cities of this state must not be greater than eight miles per hour, and if you find from the evidence in this case that the car upon which the plaintiff was riding at the time of the accident to her was running at a greater rate of speed than eight miles per hour at the time she received said injuries, and solely by reason thereof, and without any fault on her part, the plaintiff was injured, then your verdict will be in favor of the plaintiff, for the violation, if any, of any statutory regulation established for the purpose of protecting persons or property from injury is of itself sufficient to prove such a breach of duty as will enable this plaintiff to maintain this action, if the other elements of actionable negligence concur as explained in these instructions. In other words, the violation of a statute of this state regulating the speed of street cars is such a breach of duty as may be made the foundation of an action by any person belonging to the class intended to be protected by such regulation, provided he is without fault on his part specially injured thereby." Section 501 of the Civil Code, as it read at the time at which the respondent sustained the injuries complained of here, contained the following provision: "The rate of fare on the cars must not exceed ten cents for one fare, for any distance under three miles. The cars must be of the most approved construction for comfort and convenience of passengers, and provided with brakes to stop the same, when required. The rate of speed must not be greater than eight miles per hour. A violation of the provisions of this section subjects the corporation to a fine of one hundred dollars for each offense." The Legislature of 1903 (St. 1903, p. 172, c. 156) amended the foregoing section in several particulars, and, among other amendments of the section thus effected, eliminated the language therein which we have put in italics, so that under the existing general law there is no provision regulating the rate of speed at which cars may travel within the limits of cities.

The contention of the appellant is that the quoted instruction involves an erroneous statement of the law because of the premission in the said amendment of section 501 of the Civil Code of the provision prescribing the maximum rate of speed beyond which cars were not suffered to travel within the limits of cities. The argument of counsel is that the repealed provision with reference to the rate of speed to which cars were limited in traveling over the streets of cities is merely a rule of evidence, and that, quoting from Marx v. Hanthorn, 148 U. S. 181, 13 Sup. Ct. 508, 37 L. Ed. 410, "rules of evidence may be changed. They form no part of contracts made while they are in force. As changed they apply to existing causes of action even where retrospective legislation is forbidden"—citing, also, Coe v. Ritter, 86 Mo. 282; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Jones, 149 Ill. 361, 37 N. E. 247, 24 L. R. A. 141, 41 Am. St. Rep. 278.

We think the criticised instruction states the law upon the subject to which it relates as it existed at the time the accident happened clearly and with accuracy, and we do not assent to the proposition that the repeal by the Legislature subsequently to the happening of the accident of that portion of the section regulating the rate of speed of cars within cities had the effect of depriving the plaintiff of any rights vouchsafed to her by the statute at the time her injuries were sustained. The action here is not founded upon the statute. In other words, there was immediately vested in plaintiff, upon receiving the injuries of which she complains, the right to institute an action, independently of the statute, to recover damages for such personal injuries as she might have sustained through the negligence of the defendant. The statute prescribed the measure of care, in the matter of speed, which the defendant was required to exercise in the execution of its contract with her to transport her with safety from one point to another over its lines. While it may be correct to say that the breach of the condition thus imposed upon the defendant by the Legislature in the operation of its business as a common carrier would operate as a rule of evidence, since the violation of the condition would raise the presumption of negligence, the condition was nevertheless an element entering into the contract with plaintiff as important and substantial as any other essential element involved in the care with which common carriers are charged by the law in the transportation of passengers. This condition is not therefore, as appellant contends, a mere matter of procedure or a rule of evidence which, having been abrogated after a right of action had accrued and before the trial thereof, cannot be invoked or applied in such action under the rule laid down by the authorities cited. In the case of Jordan v. Fay, 98 Cal. 267, 33 Pac. 96, discussing the effect of the amendment by the Legislature of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 328, c. 219) of section 164 of the Civil Code upon the status of property conveyed to a wife after marriage, the Code providing before the amendment that "all other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, is community property," the Supreme Court, in reply to the contention that the section before its amendment prescribed only a rule of evidence, says: "But the rule declared by the statute was more than a rule of evidence. It was a rule of property as well, and we do not think the Legislature intended or had the power to change it so that it would be retroactive in effect and disturb titles already vested."

In the case here the plaintiff's right of action was a vested right, founded in the breach of the contract of carriage between herself and the defendant; one of the substantial elements of the agreement upon the part of the latter being that, in order to insure the safe and comfortable carriage of plaintiff, the rate of speed of the car on which she took passage, when passing through the streets of a city, would not exceed the limit prescribed by the statute. In other words, the law regulating the business of the transportation of passengers by street railroad corporations subsisting at the time and place of the making of a contract of carriage and where such contract is to be performed enters into and forms a part of it, as if such law was expressly referred to, or incorporated in its terms. "This principle," says the Supreme Court of the United States, in Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 535, 18 L. Ed. 403, "embraces alike those which affect the validity of the contract, its construction, discharge, and enforcement." See, also, Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 24 L. Ed. 793; Wolff v. New Orleans, 103 U. S. 358, 26 L. Ed. 395; People v. Bond, 10 Cal. 563. Clearly, we think, the provision of section 501 of the Civil Code fixing the maximum rate of speed of street cars when traveling over the streets of a city is more than a rule of evidence. It is a rule of property, for a vested right is property whatever may be the nature or condition of the object of such right; that is to say, that "a vested right of action is 'property' in the same sense in which tangible things are property, and is equally protected against arbitrary interference." Cooley's Const. Lim. (4th Ed.) p. 449. Of course, a distinction is to be observed between the right of action and the remedy, for the right to a particular remedy is not a vested right, unless the destruction of the remedy necessarily operates to destroy the right of action, in which case an act abrogating the remedy could not, obviously, have a retroactive effect.

All the judicial law to which our attention has been directed very clearly points out the distinction between those cases in which the repeal involved only some rule of procedure in no way materially affecting contractual rights or the essential remedy for the enforcement of such rights and those cases where the repeal or the amendment either necessarily destroyed the only possible remedy by which rights could be restored or wrongs redressed or had the effect of directly impairing the obligations of a contract. As is said in Williams v. Johnson, 30 Md. 500, 96 Am. Dec. 616, in passing upon a proposition analogous to the one under discussion here: "It would be extending this opinion to an unnecessary length to review in detail the many authorities relied upon by the counsel for the appellee. It is sufficient to say that upon examination they will be found to be cases arising upon penal statutes, where it was held that the action was defeated by the repeal of the law; or where a statute conferring an executory right was repealed before the right became executed; or where it was held that the remedy, procedure, and even the statute of limitation, may be changed or modified without impairing the right of action or the obligation of the contract. But no case can be found in which it has been held that a right of action, founded upon the municipal law of a country, is defeated by change or abrogation of the law. Apart from this view, it is a sound rule of construction, founded in the wisdom of the common law, that whenever a statute is susceptible, without doing violence to its express terms, of being understood, either prospectively or retrospectively, courts of justice invariably adopted the former construction. A statute ought not to have a retroactive operation, unless its words are so clear, strong, and imperative that no other meaning can be annexed to them, or unless the intention of the Legislature could not be otherwise satisfied; and especially ought this rule to be adhered to when such a construction would alter the pre-existing situation of parties, or would affect or interfere with their antecedent rights."

As we have declared, and as is plainly obvious, the action here is not one the authority for which is to be found in the section of the Code under consideration, for, as seen, the moment the accident occurred and the plaintiff thereby injured, there vested in her, eo instante, a right of action against the defendant which it was not within the power of the Legislature to destroy. Nor is the action upon an executory right yet uncrystallized into an executed one, and neither is the proposition one involving merely the modification or a change in the remedy or procedure. No one will question the right of the Legislature to change or modify the remedy and prescribe rules of evidence, if such legislation does not have the effect of creating a new obligation, or of attaching a new disability, retrospectively; but, as is well said in Hope Mutual Ins. Co. v. Flynn, 38 Mo. 483, 90 Am. Dec. 440: "It is not within the constitutional competency of the Legislature to annul by statute any legal ground on which a previous action is founded, or to create a new bar by which said action may be defeated." In Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 477, 5 Am. Dec. 306, it is said: "The very essence of a new law is a rule for future cases. The construction here contended for on the part of the defendant would make the statute operate unjustly. It would make it defeat a suit already commenced upon a right already vested. This would be punishing an innocent party with costs, as well as divesting him of a right previously acquired under the existing law. Nothing could be more alarming than such a subversion of principles." See, also, Bailey v. P. W. & B. R. R. Co., 4 Har. (Del.) 389, 44 Am. Dec. 389; Terrill v. Rankin, 2 Bush (Ky.) 453, 92 Am. Dec. 500; Creighton v. Pragg, 21 Cal. 115; Pacific M. S. Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450, 17 L. Ed. 805; Vandekar v. Rensselaer, etc., R. Co., 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 393; Taylor v. Woodward, 10 Cal. 90.

But the instruction under review is not alone supported as a correct exposition of the law by the principles established by the foregoing authorities. Our own Legislature has expressly prescribed certain rules of interpretation which reflect the general legislative policy of the state upon the question of the effect of legislation repealing or amending statutes upon rights of action which have accrued prior to the enactment of such legislation. Section 3 of the Civil Code provides: "No part of it [said Code] is retroactive, unless expressly so declared." Section 8 of the Political Code reads: "No action or proceeding commenced before this Code takes effect, and no right accrued, is affected by its provisions, but the proceedings therein must conform to the requirements of this Code as far as applicable." Section 6 of the Civil Code contains the following: "No action or proceeding commenced before this Code takes effect, and no right accrued, is affected by its provisions." The foregoing Code provisions were, no doubt, enacted for the express purpose of preventing interference with and disturbance of vested rights subsisting prior to and at the time of the adoption of the Codes, yet they nevertheless serve to display a legislative recognition of those principles which forbid the retroactive operation of statutes in cases where the effect thereof would be to destroy vested rights. Counsel for appellant cites many authorities in his voluminous briefs which he contends sustains his position on the proposition we are considering. We shall not review these cases, for it is enough to say that they are not in point here because they involve actions deriving the authority for their institution and maintenance entirely from the statute itself, as, for instance, actions for recovery of statutory penalties, and the like. As an illustration, however, of the class of cases upon which appellant relies for the support of his contention, we may refer to the case of Napa State Hospital v. Flaherty, 134 Cal. 315, 66 Pac. 322, where it is said that: "It is a rule of almost universal application that when a right is created solely by a statute, and is dependent upon the statute alone, and such right is still inchoate, and not reduced to possession or perfected by a final judgment, the repeal of the statute destroys the remedy unless the repealing statute contains a saving clause." With this declaration we can find no fault; but, as we have already said, the action here is not for the enforcement of or recovery upon a right "created solely by statute and dependent upon the statute alone." It is a right which existed, we may say at the expense of repetition, independently of the statute, which went no farther than to prescribe a condition constituting an additional element entering into the contract out of which the right of action arose.

It will not be questioned, we apprehend, that the principles herein discussed are applicable alike to cases of tort or actions arising ex delicto as well as to those sounding in contract. This proposition is so well settled that we shall content ourselves with the mere mention of some of the innumerable authorities establishing and confirming it: Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 465, 64 Pac. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62; Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 24-26, 53 Pac. 416; Hunsinger v. Hofer, 110 Ind. 390, 11 N. E. 463; Cooke v. Cooke, 43 Md. 522; Miner v. Warner, 2 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 448; Martin v. Walker, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 46; Weir v. Day, 57 Iowa, 84, 10 N. W. 304. But appellant objects to the instruction for other reasons than that to which we have perhaps given more extended attention than was necessary; but we think it is not obnoxious to those objections. The instruction declares, to paraphrase it negatively, that, notwithstanding the fact, if it was a fact, that the car on which plaintiff was riding was, at the time, running at a greater rate of speed than eight miles per hour, the plaintiff could not recover unless it was shown that she received her injuries solely by reason of said excessive rate of speed and without any fault on her part. It further declares that the "violation, if any, of any statutory regulation established for the purpose of protecting persons or property from injury is of itself sufficient to prove such a breach of duty as will enable this plaintiff to maintain this action, if the other elements of actionable negligence concur (italics ours), as explained in these instructions." It is hard to conceive of a clearer and more accurate statement of the rule applicable to the circumstances of this case. That the breach of such a statutory regulation constitutes negligence per se is well settled, and where, in such case, the evidence introduced does not show that the plaintiff's own acts or conduct contributed proximately to the injury sustained, the proof of such breach is manifestly sufficient to support a verdict. See Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Company, 149 Cal. 139, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059.

4. Appellant complains of the verdict, declaring the damages thereby awarded to be so excessive as to compel the conclusion by this court that they were given under the influence of passion or prejudice. Section 657, Code Civ. Proc. There is nothing appearing from the evidence indicating that the damages given were the result of passion or prejudice upon the part of the jurors returning the verdict, and in the absence of any such showing upon the face of the record we cannot say that, as a matter of law, they are excessive, simply because the amount may be larger than is ordinarily allowed in such cases. The judge who presided over the trial of the cause, and who had equal opportunity with the jury to hear the testimony as it came directly from the lips of the witnesses and of observing the manner in which the latter testified, approved the verdict, and certainly he was in a much better position than this court to say whether the verdict was or could have been inspired by or tainted with passion or prejudice. The rule as to the admeasurement of unliquidated damages in actions for personal torts, as enunciated in Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 516, has been uniformly followed in California. There it is said: "In actions for personal torts the law does not attempt to fix any precise rules for the measurement of damages, but, from the necessity of the case, leaves their assessment to the good sense and unbiased judgment of the jury."

* * * The leading object of such actions is to obtain reasonable and just compensation for the injury sustained, comprehending both the present and the future." See Clare v. Sac. Elec., etc., Co., 122 Cal. 506, 55 Pac. 326; Walker v. Erie Railway Co., 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 260-267; Morgan v. S. P. Co., 95 Cal. 508, 30 Pac. 601; *Sherwood v. The court before which an action for a personal tort is tried should not substitute its judgment for that of the jury, nor should a new trial be granted merely because the judge deems the verdict excessive, unless it is so excessive as to indicate that it proceeded from passion or prejudice. Sherwood v. Kyle, supra. And much less is a reviewing court justified in setting aside a verdict because of the alleged excessiveness of the damages awarded. The injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff through the accident were, in their nature and effect, but a little short of fatal, according to Dr. Porter, the physician who attended her. His description of her wounds is as follows: "Her face was torn into ribbons by coming in contact with something, and the only part about the face that you could recognize as a face at the time was one eye showing and the teeth. The rest of it was torn into shreds. * * *

Two of the tendons of the right wrist were cut out and the artery so that a good deal of the hemorrhage was due to bleeding. * * * The right cheek was badly lacerated, and the tissues about the face torn into ribbons, the left wing of the nose incised or split right through to the bone beneath, and the upper lip I got in her throat. Then there was an area of about two inches by three on the right side that was entirely lost, from which the tissues and flesh of the cheek were gone. Then there was a fracture of the orbital plate of the frontal bone; that is, over the ridge of the eye. That bone was fractured, and there were several 'horseshoe' flaps—that is, the skin was cut through and down over the face—and she had comminuted fracture of the ankle of the right leg. The ankle bone was broken on the outside. A comminuted fracture is one which has several fragments, broken into several pieces—a simple fracture is just a simple break." The doctor further testified that the face and nose of the plaintiff were noticeably disfigured, and that such disfigurement would be permanent. The plaintiff testified that, even up to the time of the trial of this cause, over three years after her injuries were received, her right ankle, which sustained a comminuted fracture, as the doctor explained, was still weak, and that at times she experienced some difficulty in walking. The condition, as thus described, in which the plaintiff has been left by reason of the severe injuries she received as a result of the accident, furnishes ample proof, so far as this court is concerned, of the soundness and fairness of the judgment of the jury in finding that the sum of $15,000 represents a just and reasonable compensation for the great and irreparable loss which the plaintiff has suffered through the culpable negligence of the defendant. She was only 13 years of age and in robust health at the time of the accident. The injuries inflicted upon her have permanently disfigured her face and otherwise crippled her so that she is seriously handicapped in the waging of life's battles, if circumstances should require her to do so upon her own responsibility, as well perhaps in greatly impeding her in the accomplishment in full measure of many of the laudible purposes peculiar to her sex. Under the circumstances of this case, we commend the verdict of the jury as an exemplification of the exercise of a just judgment.

5. One of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was made was that of newly discovered evidence, which the defendant asserts that it could not, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial. The alleged newly discovered evidence is set out in the affidavits of John Ferrin, Sallie B. Hughes, and Harry R. Meade. Ferrin was the claims agent of the defendant, and in his affidavit declares that it was his duty to look up evidence for the defendant, and that he learned and knew nothing of the testimony that Mrs. Hughes and Meade would give until during the progress of the trial, that, for the first time during the trial, he also learned that one Mrs. O. P. Hamlin, a resident of Oakland, would testify that she was on the car from which plaintiff claimed to have been hurled when the accident happened, and that said car was neither traveling at an unusual rate of speed nor "swaying and rocking," as described by plaintiff's witnesses. Mrs. Hughes deposed that she would testify that on the morning after the plaintiff was injured she called at the residence of Mrs. James, mother of plaintiff, and made inquiry concerning the condition of the plaintiff and how the accident happened, that Mrs. James told affiant that the accident was "through Rosie's disobedience; that she (Mrs. James) had told Rosie to keep still and not be carrying on, that something would happen," etc., and that at about that time plaintiff either fell or was pitched from the car. Meade declared that he would testify that he was riding in a car a short distance behind the car on which plaintiff was riding at the time of the accident, and that a few minutes prior to the accident he "noticed a lady who was standing on the step on the left-hand side of the front open section of the car upon which Miss Rosie James was riding, was holding on to one of the stanchions and leaning out from the car at arm's length." A number of witnesses, testifying for the defense, stated that the car was not traveling at more than an ordinary rate of speed when the accident occurred, and that the car did not pitch and sway and rock as described by plaintiff's witnesses. It will thus be seen that the testimony of Meade and Mrs. Hamlin would have been only cumulative of a large amount of testimony to the same point. Besides, Mrs. Hamlin, it was shown, resided in Oakland at the time the trial was going on, and it would seem that her testimony could have been secured before the close of defendant's case by the exercise of the most ordinary diligence. Mrs. Hughes' testimony could be offered, manifestly, only for the purpose of impeaching Mrs. James, while Meade does not pretend to say that the "lady he noticed standing on one of the steps of the car holding on to one of the stanchions and leaning out from the car at arm's length" was the plaintiff. Besides, Margaret James, a sister of plaintiff, testified that she was "on the only step there was on the front platform on the east side of the car," and that she occupied "that position all the way from Berkeley."

There is no rule better understood or more impreguably settled in this state than that the granting or refusing a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is a question committed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and that, before an interference with the exercise of such discretion by an appellate court can be justified, there must appear from the record a plain and palpable abuse thereof, and where it appears that the diligence required by the statute for the procurement of the alleged newly discovered evidence before the beginning of the trial has not been exercised, or that the evidence is merely cumulative, or the only office of such evidence is to impeach an adverse witness, then it is clear that the ruling of the court on the motion based upon purported newly discovered evidence cannot be disturbed. Spelling on New Trial & Appellate Practice, vol. 1, § 206; Hayne on New Trial & Appeal, § 88; People v. Demasters, 109 Cal. 608, 42 Pac. 236;

Sonoma County v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32, 57 Pac. 681; Harralson v. Barrett, 99 Cal. 607, 34 Pac. 342; People v. Loui Tung, 90 Cal. 377, 27 Pac. 295; *McCormick v. Central R. The showing here for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence may well be said to be wanting in every one of the essential requisites which alone justify an order granting a new trial upon such ground.

Our conclusion is, as is obvious from the foregoing views, that the verdict is sufficiently supported by the evidence, that the law was fully, fairly, and correctly declared to the jury, that those rulings upon the evidence which, strictly speaking, may be erroneous, are without prejudice, and that the amount of damages awarded is not excessive, but reasonable and just.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by Louis Kleinpeter and another against Andrew R. Castro and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the unnamed defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, for appellant. Gray, Barker & Bowen, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Defendant Castro was a notary public whose official bond was made by the defendant American Bonding Company of Baltimore. The action was instituted against Castro as principal and American Bonding Company as surety upon this bond to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiffs as the result of a false certificate of acknowledgment to a deed made by Castro as such notary. Castro was not served with process, his whereabouts being unknown; neither was his testimony produced at the trial. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiffs against the bonding company, from which defendant prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The court, among other things, found: That the certificate of the notary was false and that the true name of the person who signed and acknowledged the deed was other than the name signed thereto. Says appellant: "Upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support these two findings the merits of this appeal depend." The deed purported to be a grant of a lot to plaintiffs, and appellant concedes that the person who executed it was not the owner thereof, but that he, whatever his name, so far as the ownership of the property is concerned, was an impostor for the time being personating the true owner of the lot. At the time of the transaction the real estate in question, consisting of lot 13, block 23, Park tract, in Los Angeles, was owned by George A. Peterson, a resident of Oakland, Cal. In September, 1905, a party unknown to them called at the office of Justice, Moss & Co., real estate agents in Los Angeles, stated that his name was George A. Peterson, that he owned the lot in question, and desired to sell it, and showed them a certificate of title to the property theretofore obtained by him from the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles, together with certain tax receipts which he claimed he had just paid. Negotiations were entered into, as a result of which this firm of agents took an option on the property at the price of $1,100, and soon thereafter effected a sale thereof to plaintiffs for $1,500. This impersonator of the true owner described himself as being a waiter or cook at a hotel in San Pedro, and gave his post-office address as San Pedro, directing that letters be addressed to a certain post-office box at that place, and in response to letters so addressed called upon the agents from time to time pending the consummation of the sale. He protested against making the deal through an escrow and objected to payment of the money by check. In making the purchase plaintiffs deposited with the Title Insurance & Trust Company the amount of the purchase price, instructing the company to pay the same upon title to said lot vesting in them. At the same time the real estate agents left with the company for delivery a deed to said lot, wherein plaintiffs were made grantees, which purported to be signed by George A. Peterson, the acknowledgment to which was duly certified by defendant Andrew R. Castro, reciting therein that the person executing the deed was personally known to him. The escrow holder in carrying out the instructions paid to the agents by check $400 and delivered to them a check for the balance of the purchase price of the property payable to the order of George A. Peterson, which check was given to the signer of the deed, who presented the same to the bank on which it was drawn, and, upon being identified by a member of said real estate firm, received payment thereof, since which time, so far as disclosed by the record, his whereabouts have been unknown. The deed described the grantor therein solely as "George A. Peterson, unmarried," and there is no evidence touching the question as to whether the impostor was single or married. George A. Peterson, the owner of the lot, did not sign or acknowledge the deed. There is no direct evidence showing when or how Castro met the impostor, though the members of the firm of Justice, Moss & Co. testified that his office was near theirs, and it was their custom to send him notarial work. Upon discovery of the fraud, some two years afterward, search and inquiry was made for a George A. Peterson at San Pedro, but no one was found who had ever known such person. There was also testimony given by one of that name, a resident of Los Angeles (not the impostor nor the owner of the lot), that he knew of no other than himself in Los Angeles bearing the name of George A. Peterson, and that he had not signed or acknowledged the deed.

Defendant offered no evidence to show that the name of the person who signed and acknowledged the deed was George A. Peterson, but relied solely upon the certificate as furnishing prima facie proof of such fact. The evidence controverting the truth of the certificate in this respect must of necessity be of a negative character. Undoubtedly there are a great many persons bearing the name of George A. Peterson, and appellant's position is that it devolved upon plaintiffs to show that the person who appeared before the notary was not some member of this numerous family. In support of this contention, counsel cite Overacre v. Blake, 82 Cal. 77, 22 Pac. 979. That was an appeal upon the judgment roll, and the court held there was nothing in the findings justifying the deduction made by the trial court to the effect that the certificate was untrue, and, as disclosed by the findings, there was an utter failure to show that the person who signed the instrument did not in truth and in fact bear the name signed thereto. The controlling point, however, on which the opinion in that case is based, was that the party seeking to recover upon the bond introduced the impostor to the notary, thus vouching for his identity, and the court held that by reason of such fact she was estopped from recovering upon the bond. In neither aspect does Overacre v. Blake have any bearing upon the case at bar.

The trial court found that George A. Peterson did not sign the deed, and that the certificate in this regard was false. There was some evidence, however meager, tending to establish this fact. It was conclusively shown that the owner whose name was George A. Peterson did not sign the deed, and that some inquiry was made at San Pedro, where the impostor received his mail and claimed to be employed at the time of the transaction, for George A. Peterson, with the result that no one was found who had ever known him, and that another person by the name of George A. Peterson, residing in Los Angeles, testified that he did not sign the deed and knew no other of that name in Los Angeles county, all of which constituted some evidence tending to controvert the truth of the certificate, and, taken in connection with the "preponderance of probabilities" (Murphy v. Waterhouse, 113 Cal. 473, 45 Pac. 866, 54 Am. St. Rep. 365; Hutson v. Railway Co., 150 Cal. 705, 89 Pac. 1093), fairly deducible from other circumstances connected with the transaction, satisfied the trial court of the fact found. As to whether or not the name of the impostor who forged the deed was in truth George A. Peterson and known to the notary were facts peculiarly within his knowledge. Under these circumstances, plaintiffs should not be required, in order to shift the burden of proof, to produce other than slight evidence. Barnard v. Schuler, 100 Minn. 289, 110 N. W. 966; Joost v. Craig, 131 Cal. 504, 63 Pac. 840, 82 Am. St. Rep. 374; People v. Lundin, 120 Cal. 308, 52 Pac. 807.

There is no merit in the suggestion that plaintiffs' remedy for the loss sustained is against the bank which paid the check. The money was paid pursuant to plaintiffs' direction to the person who received it. They were, by reason of the false certificate, deceived as to his identity, which fact was the proximate cause of the loss. No intervening negligence of any one contributed to it. The facts in Hatton v. Holmes, 97 Cal. 208, 31 Pac. 1131, cited in support of this contention, bear no analogy to the case at bar. The check there was payable to the order of Maria J. Keifer and delivered to one Jenkins, who forged her indorsement thereon and presented it to the bank, which, without inquiry, negligently paid it. The court held that, assuming the check was given upon a forged mortgage, the certificate of acknowledgment to which was false, nevertheless the direct cause of the loss was the forged indorsement of the name of the party to whom it was made payable.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHAW, J. This action was instituted against a number of defendants for the partition of real estate. Defendant Gai appeals from an order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

The property described in the complaint consists solely of land, and no reference is made to riparian or other waters or water rights to which the land may be entitled. By answer, appellant claimed affirmatively that as an owner of an undivided interest in the land he likewise owns an interest in the waters of certain streams flowing through the tract as to which it is riparian.

There were numerous parties whose rights were being litigated in the action, upon none of whom, however, other than plaintiff, was the answer served. For this reason the affirmative matter, conceding it was properly alleged, as to which we express grave doubts, could not be litigated. As to such new matter appellant's codefendants were not in court. Hence, for this reason, if no other, it was not error for the court to find, in effect, that the subject-matter of the affirmative allegations of appellant's answer was not involved in the issues of the action. The case of Rose v. Mesmer, 142 Cal. 322, 75 Pac. 905, cited by appellant in support of his contention, bears no analogy to the case at bar. It might furnish authority under which a party interested in the land could, after the partition thereof, maintain an action for the protection of rights in the waters of the stream to which ownership of land might entitle him. The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 294*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to a servant through the breaking of a defective ladder, there was no claim, under the issues presented, nor any evidence tending to show, that the injury resulted from any act of a fellow servant, an instruction that an employer is not liable for damages sustained by an employé through the negligence of a fellow employé employed in the same general business, and that the law respecting the negligence of a fellow servant, where there is no want of ordinary care on the master's part, recognizes no distinction growing out of the grades of employment of the respective employés, nor does it give effect to the circumstance that the fellow servant through whose negligence the injury was received was plaintiff's superior in the general business in which they were employed, etc., was erroneous as leading the jury to believe that plaintiff could not recover if the ladder was constructed by a fellow servant, or that the foreman who supplied the ladder should be regarded as a fellow servant in the discharge of his duty in connection therewith.

In an action for injuries to a servant, an instruction that though the servant through whose negligence the injury was received was the plaintiff's superior, if both were employed in the general service working to one general end in the construction of the building, then they were fellow servants, and the master is not liable for the negligence of one which injures the other, is too broad as eliminating the element of responsibility on account of the action of a fellow servant intrusted with duties which the law enjoins on the master and in performing which the servant is a vice principal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by Fred E. Potts against H. E. Knerr. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

Sidney J. Parsons and O. P. Widaman, for appellant. M. E. C. Munday, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one brought by a servant against a master on account of personal injuries alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the latter. Plaintiff, a plasterer, was engaged by defendant to perform work as plasterer and to superintend the work of plastering a schoolhouse, for the construction of which defendant had entered into a contract. The general work of the construction was under the supervision of one Hunter, the foreman employed by defendant. Defendant, when he employed plaintiff, agreed to furnish ladders and scaffolding necessary in the prosecution of the work. Hunter, as foreman, directed the immediate performance by plaintiff of certain plastering work and directed him to use a certain ladder then on the lower floor of the building, and one of the appliances used in the work of construction and the only ladder in use on the lower floor. This ladder had originally been made a month or so before under the direction of the foreman, and, had it been properly constructed upon the lines intended would have carried a weight of more than 400 pounds. The workmen who constructed this ladder used what is known as finishing nails in the supporting part thereof, the upper part of which support broke with the weight of plaintiff thereon and caused the injury. This ladder had been repaired a number of times and had been nailed and renailed until the timbers had become weakened and through use it had become covered with mortar and dirt, and its real condition could not be ascertained except by a minute examination. The foreman never inspected the ladder after its construction or repair in order to determine its efficiency or condition. Plaintiff, a man weighing 200 pounds, acting under the instructions of the foreman, ascended the ladder so provided for the purpose of doing some work, and, when he had reached the top, the ladder collapsed, and as a consequence plaintiff was thrown to the floor and upon timbers, the effect of which was to break his arm near a joint and strain certain ligaments. The proximity of this fracture to a joint rendered it difficult to treat and occasioned a partial loss of the use of the arm, not permanent, but of a serious character.

The primary and controlling question involved in the case, under the issues presented by the pleadings, was as to the discharge of the master's duty in providing reasonably safe appliances connected with the work of the servants. There was no claim under the issues presented, nor was there any evidence offered tending to show that the injury was in any manner the result of an act, either of omission or commission, upon the part of a fellow servant. Notwithstanding this, the court, at the instance of the defendant, charged the jury: "An employer is not bound to indemnify an employé for damages which the employé sustains in consequence of the negligence of a fellow employé employed by the same employer in the same general business. The law of this state respecting the negligence of a fellow servant where there is no want of ordinary care upon the part of the employer recognizes no distinction growing out of the grades of employment of the respective employés, nor does it give effect to the circumstance that the fellow servant through whose negligence the injury was received was the superior of the plaintiff in the general service in which they were employed. If both were employed in the general service working to the general end in the construction of the building, then they were fellow servants, and the master is not liable for the negligence of one which injures the other." Under voluminous instructions, of which this formed a part, unmodified or unaffected by other independent instructions, the jury returned a verdict in defendant's favor. The evidence in the record is such that a charitable view of the action of the jury must lead to the conclusion that it was misled and improperly influenced by the charge above specified. The jury must have assumed that such charge was a suggestion or declaration that the plaintiff could not recover if the ladder had been constructed by a fellow servant, or that the foreman, who supplied the ladder, should be viewed and regarded as a fellow servant in the discharge of his duty in connection therewith. There was no evidence of any character to justify the court in submitting to the jury any question relating to the liability of the defendant on account of the act of a fellow-servant. Whatever was done by the foreman in relation to supplying the appliances necessary in the prosecution of the work was done by the foreman as the representative of defendant. In so far as the charge above given stated abstract questions of law disconnected with the case, if the same were calculated to mislead the jury, prejudicial error resulted. Hirshberg v. Strauss, 64 Cal. 272, 28 Pac. 235. In addition, however, the general statement in the last paragraph of the charge is too broad, eliminating, as it does, the element of responsibility on account of the action of a fellow servant who is entrusted with duties which the law enjoins upon the master and in the performance of which the servant is a vice principal. It is evident from the verdict under the evidence that the jury were misled by the charge above set forth.

We refrain from commenting upon the conflict in other instructions appearing in the record and to which exceptions were taken, there being no reason to apprehend a repetition thereof in a subsequent hearing under the issues presented by the pleadings.

The judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 773*)—FAILURE TO FILE BRIEF.

Supreme Court rule 2 provides that appellant shall file his points and authorities 30 days after the transcript is filed. Subdivision 5 provides that the time limited shall not be extended except by order on stipulation of the parties, or on affidavit showing good cause therefor. Rule 5 provides that on failure to file in time, the appeal may be dismissed on motion. After an extension of time for filing points and authorities had expired respondent's attorney refused to stipulate further extending the time, but told appellant that he would not take advantage of the latter's failure to file his brief in time. Appellant did not offer to file the brief until nearly three months thereafter or four months after the original extension expired, and after service and filing of notice to dismiss the appeal. Held that 30 days being under the rules a reasonable time in which to file briefs respondent was entitled to a dismissal, no showing to excuse the default being made.

W. W. Kaye (V. T. Watkins, of counsel), for appellant. T. F. Allen (Norman Williams, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. Motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file points and authorities. The court, under a misapprehension of the facts disclosed by the record heretofore, made an order denying the motion. The appeal is from an order of the trial court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The transcript was filed on October 22, 1908 (not November 21st, as stated by appellant's affidavit). On November 18th, pursuant to stipulation filed, this court made an order granting appellant 30 days' additional time within which to file his points and authorities. This extension of time expired on December 21st, and, so far as disclosed by the record, no further stipulation was filed herein, and no order made further extending the time. On April 1, 1909, appellant not having filed his points and authorities, respondent served notice on his attorney that it would on April 26, 1909, move the court for an order dismissing the appeal upon the ground of appellant's failure to file such points and authorities within the time prescribed by the rules therefor, which notice of motion was filed in this court on April 7th. Thereafter, on April 24th, appellant delivered to the clerk of this court his points and authorities, which, however, were not filed, owing to the time therefor having elapsed. It thus appears that the points and authorities were not presented for filing until the expiration of a period of more than four months after the expiration of the time for filing the same. At the hearing of the motion appellant's attorney presented affidavits of himself and his stenographer, from which it appears that on February 1, 1909, he applied to T. F. Allen, respondent's attorney, for a stipulation extending the time within which he might file his points and authorities; that Allen refused to make any stipulation granting further extension of time for such purpose, but stated to appellant's attorney that he would not take advantage of appellant's failure to file his brief in time and would not move to dismiss "the appeal on the ground of the appellant's failure to comply with the provisions of rule 4" of the Supreme Court governing this court. (This rule has no application whatever to the case.) It is further averred that, owing to pressure of other professional engagements during the period extending from the time of filing said transcript to April 1st, affiant did not have time to prepare appellant's points and authorities, the preparation of which required three or four days' careful labor. It is also averred that appellant had stipulations from respondent extending the time to February 1, 1909. No such stipulations were filed, however, and no order made by this court based thereon extending the time as required by subdivision 5 of rule 2, nor were such stipulations presented upon the hearing. It appears, therefore, that more than a month elapsed after appellant's default before application was even made on February 1st for a further extension of time, at which time appellant had no existing right to file points and authorities, and that respondent refused to grant the same. Conceding, but not holding, that an affidavit of an oral statement made under such circumstances to the effect that the respondent would not take advantage of such default might be considered in opposition to a motion to dismiss, and accepting this statement at its full value, it could not be construed as effective in extending the time beyond a reasonable time. Appellant took no step in the matter until the lapse of nearly three months, and after service and filing of notice of motion to dismiss. Under the rules 30 days is regarded as a reasonable period within which to file points and authorities, yet in this case appellant is claiming more than four months without any showing that can be regarded as an excuse for his default. Rule 2 of this court provides that appellant shall file his points and authorities 30 days after the transcript is filed, and by subdivision 5 of said rule it is provided that "the time above limited for filing points and authorities shall not be extended except by order of the court upon stipulation of the parties, or an affidavit showing good cause therefor." Rule 5 provides, if "appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed on motion, upon notice given." In order that the court may control its calendars and dispose of its business in an orderly and convenient manner, a compliance with these rules must be exacted from litigants. No hardship can result therefrom, for the rules themselves provide for the granting of further time to perform the acts required upon a proper showing. Shain v. People's Lumber Co., 98 Cal. 120, 32 Pac. 878; McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 Pac. 359; Coats v. Coats, 146 Cal. 443, 80 Pac. 694.

No showing is made which even tends to excuse this long continued default, and it is respondent's right to have the rule for dismissal of the appeal enforced. McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 Pac. 359.

The order heretofore made is therefore vacated and set aside; and for the foregoing reasons it is now ordered that respondent's motion be granted, and the appeal be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by D. C. Reed against J. W. Sefton. Judgment for defendant, and, from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Luce, Sloane & Luce, for appellant. Stearns & Sweet, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to recover money paid for option to purchase real estate, and for damages for failure of vendor to perfect title and make conveyance. Judgment was for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On January 8, 1904, in consideration of the sum of $500, defendant gave plaintiff an option to purchase within 20 days from that date a block of land in the city of San Diego. The sum paid ($500) was to be applied upon purchase price of $15,000, if the purchase was completed, otherwise to become forfeit, "for liquidated damages for such failure to complete said purchase." Time was made of the essence of the option. On January 28, 1904, the plaintiff paid defendant the further sum of $1,000 for an extension of said option for fifteen days upon the same terms; and again on February 12, 1904, in consideration of the payment of an additional sum of $1,000 by plaintiff to defendant, a further extension of 30 days upon the same terms was granted. The same form of forfeiture for failure to complete the purchase is provided as in the original option, and time is made of the essence of both these extensions of the option.

The court finds that prior to the expiration of the time given by the last-named extension of option to purchase defendant furnished to plaintiff an abstract of title to the block of land in question, which contained a bond for a deed to said premises, whereby A. E. Horton, then owner thereof, on the 31st day of March, 1874, bound himself to convey the block in controversy to one O. S.

Fowler of Boston, state of Massachusetts, for a consideration of $1,400, $27 whereof was paid, and the residue to be paid, $1,000 on or before July 1, 1874, and the balance 15 months from the date of the writing. Horton agreed to convey by good and sufficient deed upon the full performance of all and every condition to be performed by Fowler. No further time limitation appeared in the instrument, which was recorded April 1, 1874. No conveyance under this bond was ever made, and no relinquishment of the rights of Fowler thereunder shown, and on November 5, 1877, Horton conveyed the land to one Babe, who thereafter, on June 10, 1883, reconveyed to Horton, and on August 5, 1884, Horton conveyed to one Hoitt through whom defendant deraigns title. As found by the court, there was attached to the abstract mentioned an opinion of title given by N. H. Conklin, then practicing law in San Diego, to defendant under date of December 7, 1893, wherein it is said: "I consider the title a little questionable until the facts of the Fowler heirship are ascertained and his rights determined, either by an instrument of writing or a decree of court." Also, an opinion given by McDonald & McDonald, a firm practicing law in San Diego at that time, under date of January 8, 1899, certifying the title to be good, and as to the bond in question saying that, "although not released or canceled of record, is nevertheless upon the face of the record no longer a lien or an incumbrance upon the property by reason of being barred by the statute of limitations."

Plaintiff, prior to March 12, 1904, notified defendant that his title to the property was not a good and marketable one, owing to the cloud thereon created by said bond, and stated that he was ready, willing, and able to carry out the option upon the removal by defendant of said cloud, and demanded that defendant either perfect the title to said premises by removing said cloud or repay to plaintiff the amounts paid on the option. Defendant refused to either remove the alleged cloud or repay said amounts; hence this action begun November 12, 1906. In addition to sustaining defendant's contention that the bond mentioned did not prevent him from conveying a good and marketable title to the lands described in the contract, the court found plaintiff's first cause of action to be barred by the statute of limitations.

The contention of appellant that the opinion of the attorney expressing doubt as to the sufficiency of the title to the premises which was attached to the abstract may be considered in determining whether or not he was justified in refusing to accept the title displayed by the abstract is disposed of by the holding of the Supreme Court in Winter v. Stock, 29 Cal. 408, 413, 89 Am. Dec. 57, that the correctness of the advice of counsel is a risk assumed by the party who procures it, and that such an opinion is not evidence admissible upon the issue, Is the title tendered by the vendor marketable? See, also, Montgomery v. Pac. C. L. Bureau, 94 Cal. 290, 29 Pac. 640, 28 Am. St. Rep. 122. The difference between the opinions of the two attorneys hereinabove referred to suggests the views of the respective parties here as to whether or not the title of defendant was so incumbered as to justify a court of equity in refusing to compel specific performance of the contract. While the early cases draw some distinction between the rule to be applied in an action at law to recover back the portion of the purchase price paid and that applied in a suit in equity for specific performance, we take it that the equitable rule is now applicable whether the action be one to recover the money or enforce the contract. Moore v. Williams, 115 N. Y. 586, 22 N. E. 233, 5 L. R. A. 654, 12 Am. St. Rep. 844; Maupin on Marketable Titles, § 286. A covenant or contract for a perfect title requires the tender of a title "free from litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts, and should consist of both legal and equitable titles and be fairly deducible from the record." Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. 262, 9 Am. St. Rep. 189; Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 28 Pac. 1046; Gwin v. Calegaris, 139 Cal. 384, 387, 73 Pac. 851. While the option given by defendant to plaintiff contains no covenant for a perfect title, or for record title at all, both parties present the case upon the theory that the rule declared in Turner v. McDonald is applicable, and that plaintiff is entitled to recover unless the title tendered by defendant measures up to the standard fixed by that case.

The cloud here urged is not based upon any question of doubt as to the legal title of defendant. The bond to Fowler must be considered in the light of an incumbrance on the title and as a cause of action vested in Fowler, or his successors in interest, and a right in him or them to call in the aid of a court of equity to enforce any right he or they may have under the bond. While such a defect may be distinguished from those presented by cases in which a link in the chain of title is missing, or there is an entire absence of record evidence connecting the vendor with the paramount source of title, yet, even when tested by the rule applied in such cases in so far as they furnish any aid in determining the question before us, we are of opinion that the finding of the trial court that defendant's title was a marketable one should be sustained. Of the obstacles to the tender of a good title mentioned in Turner v. McDonald, supra, we have to do only with those arising under the clause "free from [probable] litigation." In classifying the cases in which titles are considered doubtful for this reason and those which are not, Maupin distinguishes those cases as doubtful: "Where the probability of litigation ensuing against the purchaser in respect of the matter in doubt is considerable; or where there is a 'reasonably decent probability of litigation.' The court, to use a favorite expression, will not compel the purchaser to buy a lawsuit. If there be any reasonable chance that some third person may raise a question against the owner of the estate after the completion of the contract, the title will be deemed unmarketable." As not doubtful: "Where the probability of litigation ensuing against the purchaser in respect of the doubt is not great, the court, to use Lord Hardwicke's language in one case, 'must govern itself by a moral certainty, for it is impossible in the nature of things there should be a mathematical certainty of a good title.'" Maupin on Marketable Titles, §§ 284, 285. In the same sections this author also distinguishes the rules to be applied where the question of the doubtfulness of the title is to be considered with relation to a title resting upon a presumption of fact. Appellant relies in part upon cases resting upon such a condition of fact. These rules, however, are not applicable to the title of defendant here, and should not be considered in connection with the probability of litigation arising on the Fowler bond, since the distinction drawn by them is between marketable and nonmarketable titles and the marketability of the Fowler equity is not before us. The bond might be a cloud sufficient to destroy the marketability of defendant's title without being itself marketable, and so it might support a cause of action for the recovery of the money advanced by Fowler without being sufficient to sustain an action in equity for its specific performance. The probability of a court of equity entertaining such an action as that last mentioned is extremely remote, but it is only in view of such a contingency that the bond can affect the rights of a purchaser of the property.

It was more than 28 years after the time for the last payment on the Fowler bond, and over 26 years after Horton by conveying the property to another gave constructive notice to Fowler and his successors in interest that he regarded the claim of Fowler as abandoned, that the contract between plaintiff and defendant was entered into. Says the Supreme Court of this state, quoting from Judge Story in Taylor v. Longworth, 14 Pet. 172, 10 L. Ed. 405: "And even when time is not thus either expressly or impliedly of the essence of the contract, if the party seeking a specific performance has been guilty of gross laches, or has been inexcusably negligent in performing the contract on his part, or if there has been, in the intermediate periods, a material change in circumstances affecting the rights, interests, or obligations of the parties, in all such cases courts of equity will refuse to decree any specific performance upon the plain ground that it would be inequitable and unjust." Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317, 325, 70 Am. Dec. 725. Applying the provision of this declaration of the law relating to the material change of circumstances and rights of the parties, it is difficult to see how a court of equity can enforce the performance of a contract to convey real estate calling for a consideration of $1,400 after a default of 28 years, where, upon the face of the proceedings, the property is valued at more than 10 times that amount. It would be inequitable to entertain a bill upon such a showing whatever the disability under which the vendor or his successors in interest may have labored during so extended a period. Time is material to the specific performance of a contract, whenever from the change of circumstances a specific performance, such as would answer the ends of justice between the parties, has become impossible. Pratt v. Law, 9 Cranch, 456, 494, 3 L. Ed. 791. Says Chief Justice Marshall: "Between a contract which is unreasonable when made, and one which has become so before it can be executed, if the application be made by the person in fault, for the aid of the court against the party who has suffered by his in(dis)ability, no clear distinction is perceived." Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call. (Va.) 303, 371, Fed. Cas. No. 5,245. We are of opinion that there is not a "reasonably decent probability of litigation" on the Fowler bond.

Plaintiff's action, therefore, fails both upon the right to recover the money paid for the option and that sought to be recovered as damages for breach of contract. In respect to the first-mentioned cause of action, we also think the finding of the trial court that it was barred by the statute of limitations is sustained by the evidence. When defendant tendered to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed on March 14, 1904, and plaintiff refused to accept it in execution of the option, and no further time was given within which he might make the payment or accept the deed, the cause of action, if any, accrued and the statute began to run. Plaintiff himself recognized this when he made his demand for the return of his money on March 13, 1904. There being no cloud for defendant to remove from his title, the condition attempted to be made by plaintiff had no existence in fact or in law, and could not serve to toll the statute. This was not a case in which no time was provided for the performance of the contract (Richter v. Union Land Co., 129 Cal. 367, 375, 62 Pac. 39), but one in which there was an express limitation, and time was made of the essence of the contract, and, if the tender of the deed by defendant on the 14th of March can be construed as a waiver of one day, it could not extend the time within which plaintiff might have commenced his action to recover the money paid by him.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by William G. Jackson against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. F. Dunne, C. W. Durbrow, and Fred E. Borton, for appellants. J. W. Wiley and E. L. Foster, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. This is an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries by an employé. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff was employed by defendant to run a pumping plant consisting of a boiler and two steam pumps, one of the latter being supposed to pump continuously and the other used as a relief. Plaintiff's duties during his shift were to fire the boiler, look after the pumps, keep one of them going continuously, and the reservoir full of water. The boiler was 50 to 75 feet from the well, and the pumps were 30 to 40 feet down in the well and reached by ladders, the relief pump being some six feet below the regular one. The well was 8 or 10 feet square, timbered with 6x6 or 8x6 timbers placed about 6 feet apart, and lagging or planks set in behind the timbers to keep the rock and earth from falling in, and was covered on top by a platform in which was a manhole 2x3 feet, covered with a trap, through which descent was made into the well. The well was located between the railroad tracks and the foot of the mountain, and the latter had been excavated to secure a place for the well, so that there was a perpendicular wall of loose rock and earth 18 or 20 feet high at the rear of the well, while in front it was nearly level with the track. A tunnel had been started into the mountain near one side of the well and the formation around the mouth of the latter on that side was broken and loose. In some places the lagging in the well was close together and in some places apart, and, in one place, it lacked 10 or 12 inches of reaching to the platform which covered the well. Through this defective place in the timber rocks and earth had fallen to such an extent that complaint was made to the defendant that the well was unsafe. In response to this complaint, the resident engineer of defendant passing through inquired of plaintiff and the pumper who was on the other shift what was the matter, and was told by the latter that the foot of the tunnel was caving into the well, that it was unsafe to go in, that other men refused to go down, and that the timber was broken beneath the flooring from the weight of the dirt, and that it was all the time caving in and was practically unsafe. The engineer ordered the dirt cleared off, said very little about the broken timbers beneath, but declined to go down into the well to investigate; said he could not stop at that time, but told plaintiff he would send somebody back to fix it. Three or four days later plaintiff was ordered to start the relief pump, went down into the well to do so, but, being unable to get it to run, was coming up the ladder when some dirt and rock fell in and knocked his torch and oil can from his hand. In attempting to get under the footway to protect himself from the falling matter, he slipped and fell, the thumb of his right hand being caught in the pump, which was running, and so injured that it had to be amputated.

Plaintiff rests his case upon the rule declared in Anderson v. Seropian, 147 Cal. 201, 208, 81 Pac. 521, and claims that he continued in his employment after knowledge of the unsafe condition of the well only because of the promise of defendant that this condition would be remedied, and the expectation that this would be done soon. In support of its appeal, appellant urges error of the trial court in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, in giving a certain instruction requested by plaintiff, and in modifying another offered by defendant; also, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and that the verdict is against law.

It is contended that the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted because the evidence shows that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, first, in leaving the trapdoor open in the top of the well; and, second, by going down to the lower pump while the upper one was running. The plaintiff testified that he did not know where the rock came from that fell upon him when he was hurt but there is no evidence that any matter ever fell through the trapdoor or could have fallen from that place. There was a diagram of the well introduced in evidence which is not before us, and which, it is true, was a part of defendant's case, but which, if brought up, would be proper for us to consider in determining whether or not any lack of evidence in plaintiff's case had been cured by the evidence given by defendant. Evidence of location of an object dependent upon testimony which locates it by means of a diagram which is not brought up in the record must be assumed to have been most favorable to the view that supports the finding or verdict. Independent of this, we do not think there is anything in the plaintiff's case to show that the leaving open of the trapdoor was necessarily negligence upon his part. Only as it may be argued that it was not necessary to give light in the well because he took a torch can it be said that it was not necessary for that purpose. This would be a matter for the jury. The evidence shows that the manhole was generally covered when the pumper came out, but there is no evidence as to custom when he was in the well, and on this occasion it was thrown aside by plaintiff, and this will be presumed to have been the usual custom and done under instruction in order to support the verdict when the question before us is one of contributory negligence. No question of variance in this respect is suggested in the motion for the nonsuit.

The other ground upon which the nonsuit was asked is, we think, equally untenable. No reason is suggested why the regular pump should be stopped in order to start the relief. There is no evidence that the falling of the rock was due to the vibration of the pump, as suggested by appellant, and, if there were, this would have been a matter of fact for the jury upon the issue of contributory negligence. The same matters are presented in support of the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. This is not a case in which it can be said as a matter of law that the employé had an opportunity to choose between two obvious courses of procedure—one comparatively safe and the other plainly dangerous. As to the trapdoor, there is no evidence that there ever was any danger of rock falling through it; and as to the running of the regular pump, there is no evidence that it had anything to do with causing the rock to fall. Cases like Gribben v. Yellow Aster Co., 142 Cal. 248, 75 Pac. 839, and Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 309, 78 Pac. 710, have no application here.

The cases from other jurisdictions relied upon by appellant to sustain its contention with respect to the instruction which it requested upon the matter of intoxication as constituting contributory negligence appear to be in conflict with the case of Robinson v. Pioche, 5 Cal. 461, which is recognized as authority in the recent case of Perkins v. Sunset Co. (Cal.) 103 Pac. 190, and in Holmes v. Oregon, etc. (D. C.) 5 Fed. 523, 539. In a general instruction to the jury that their verdict must be for defendants if they found "from the evidence that plaintiff did not exercise that reasonable degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under the circumstances," requested by the defendants, appeared the following: "If you find from the evidence that by reason of the carelessness or intoxication voluntarily acquired" of plaintiff he did not use such care, etc. The court struck out the words "intoxication voluntarily acquired." There is the opinion of one witness unsupported by facts that plaintiff was under the influence of liquor when he went down into the well, and it may be conceded that, if defendants had asked it, an instruction to the effect that this evidence might be considered in determining whether or not plaintiff used ordinary care should have been given, but the effect of the instruction as requested was to make the matter of intoxication alone sufficient to support the defense of contributory negligence without regard to its degree or character, and under the evidence in this case that would have been improper.

The instruction given at plaintiff's request of which appellant complains was not erroneous. There was no material element of the case lacking in that instruction. This was not true of the instruction cited from Matter of Calef's Estate, 139 Cal. 674, 73 Pac. 539. A general instruction to render a verdict is wrong only when it omits facts necessary to the conclusion. Such a one is the preceding instruction asked by defendants when it is considered in the alternative form relating to intoxication only, but, with the special fact of intoxication eliminated and the general one of "want of care" allowed to stand unmodified, the instruction was proper. We see no prejudicial error in the modification of one or the giving of the other instruction.

Judgment and order affirmed.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 113*)—INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE.

Defendant operated a narrow-gauge railroad 23 miles long, which principally transported beets loaded in season by farmers, and employed section crews who frequently went over the track to keep it up. The manner of loading beets into the cars was to drive the wagon between the cars and loading posts placed along a siding at intervals and to attach one end of a tackle rope to a chain thrown around the post and the other end to the four corners of the net containing the beets, and pull the beets into the cars by horse power exerted on the tackle. After a farmer had partly loaded a car, defendant put in some empty cars, and shoved the partly loaded car up on the siding past the loading posts, but left it before a telephone pole, and when the farmer brought another load, instead of waiting until the partly loaded car, was placed before a loading post, he threw a chain around the telephone pole, extended it under one rail of the main track, attached his tackle to the chain, unloaded his wagon, and returned to the field without moving the chain and leaving the block between the rails. A train passed 15 minutes later, struck the block, and tossed it aside so as to leave the chain across the rails, which derailed the engine, killing intestate, the engineer. The cars were always placed for loading by the farmers, and not by defendant, and the loading had always been done without accident. Held, that defendant was not negligent by failing to employ track walkers to patrol the track, nor in pushing up the partly loaded car past the loading post; the use of the telephone pole and track for loading not being warranted by defendant's acts.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 129*)—INJURIES—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Even if the method of loading provided was defective, neither that nor defendant's failure to keep a sufficient number of section hands to repair the track or to employ some one to supervise the loading proximately caused the accident; it being solely caused by the farmer's negligence in leaving the chain on the track.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*)—INJURIES—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Where, in an action against the company for a railroad engineer's death by the derailment of his engine by striking a chain placed on the rail by a farmer to assist him in loading beets into a car on the siding, after the car had been pushed away from the loading post provided for attaching the chain to in loading in the usual manner, by the placing of other empties on the track, the evidence showed that decedent had passed along the road several times a day for 10 years, and knew the method of loading at such siding and the resulting dangers from such methods, an instruction that if decedent was employed as an engineer for more than five years before the accident, and passed the siding often enough to familiarize him with the methods of loading, and with the fact that defendant kept no superintendent or loading platform there, and had no track walkers and knew or should have known of the resulting risk, and, continued in the employment as long as two years after having such knowledge, he assumed the risk, embraced all the elements of assumed risk, and should have been given under the evidence.

1 Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by M. Isabel Wyckoff, as administratrix, against the Pajaro Valley Consolidated Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Dougherty & Lacey, for appellant. Lindsay & Netherton and Zabala & Wyatt, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover damages for the death of Cyrus N. Wyckoff, which it is alleged was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The defendant had been engaged for about 15 years in operating a single-track narrow-gauge steam railroad, running from Watsonville to the town of Spreckels, a distance of about 23 miles, and the decedent had been employed by it, at the time of the accident, for about 10 years as a locomotive engineer. For the accommodation of beet growers, the defendant has provided at different places along the line of the railroad 20 sidings or switches; and during the beet season places on these sidings empty cars, into which the farmers load their beets. One of the sidings is known as Gaffey's switch, and it was at this place that the accident happened. Beet growers in this vicinity load cars with beets in the following manner: The beets are thrown from the ground into nets which are spread over the bed of a wagon. The wagon is then hauled to the siding, alongside of which is a stretch of raised earth called a "dump," the purpose of which is to make the loaded wagon level with the car. At Gaffey's switch, between the main track and the siding, there is a line of loading posts, set about eight feet apart. In order to empty a wagon load of beets into a car, a span of horses is driven in between the siding and the main track and hitched to a tackle (consisting of ropes and blocks) which is attached at one end to a chain, the chain is given a turn around one of the aforesaid posts, and the other end of the tackle is attached to the four corners of a rope net. The team is then started, and the net of beets is drawn over and into the car. Whenever it was desired to place a car opposite a loading post, or to separate cars in order to allow passage between them for a team crossing the siding to get between it and the main track, it was the custom of the farmers to move the cars by hand. The defendant never had anything to do with the loading of the beets into the cars. It simply built the siding, and delivered thereon empty cars, and, when they were loaded, hauled them away. The farmers themselves furnished the loading tackle, and also furnished and set the loading posts. On the day of the accident all but three of the 11 or 12 beet farmers who used Gaffey's switch had finished loading and shipping, and James Larkin was one of the 3. Larkin had loaded at Gaffey's switch from 35 to 50 cars of beets each year for eight or nine years. Some two weeks prior to the day of the accident, Larkin had partially filled a car with beets, when, on account of rain, the sugar factory closed down, and the shipment of beets was stopped. A day or two prior to January 22, 1900, Larkin, with two others, was notified that the factory was about to resume operations, and would receive the balance of the beet crops. On the morning of the accident the defendant sent a train of empty cars from the sugar factory to Gaffey's switch. These cars with the engine, completely filled the switch, and shifted the partially loaded car to a point where there was no loading post. At 8 o'clock that morning, and while this train was waiting on the switch for the train, of which the deceased Wyckoff was engineer, to pass by on the main track, Larkin with his son and a hired man arrived at Gaffey's switch with two wagon loads of beets. Larkin desired to load these beets into the half-filled car, opposite to which, as before stated, there was no loading post; but there happened to be a telephone post across the main track, and close enough to be used as a loading post, and Larkin conceived the idea of employing it as such, and proceeded to do so. He first placed a chain around the telephone post, and then extended it to and under the nearer rail of the main track, and in the middle of that track hitched his 10x8 inch block to this chain, unloaded the wagons, returned to his field for more beets, and forgot to remove the chain and block. About 15 minutes later Wyckoff's train came along, the pilot struck the block and tossed it to the left of the track, leaving the chain on the track. The locomotive struck this chain, was thrown from the track, and Wyckoff was instantly killed.

The plaintiff preliminarily objects to the hearing of this appeal upon the merits; that is, the appeal from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the ground that there is no bill of exceptions showing what papers were used upon the hearing of that motion. The bill of exceptions was filed July 17, 1907, and the motion was denied December 2, 1907. This very question was decided by the Supreme Court against the contention of plaintiff in the case of General Conference of Free Baptists v. Berkey, on October 16, 1908.<sup>1</sup> A rehearing in that case has been granted, and it is now again under submission. The rehearing doubtless was granted on account of the importance of the constitutional question involved, and not by reason of any doubt in the mind of the court on the point now under discussion. The bill of exceptions in this case was prepared especially to be used on the motion for a new trial; and it would be extraordinary indeed if, after its elaborate preparation and its settlement and allowance, it was abandoned, and the motion made on some other grounds. We do not, of course, understand that this can be done; and, as the record is silent on the subject, we shall assume that the usual practice was followed, and that the motion was based on the bill of exceptions. The accident which caused the death of Wyckoff was due primarily to the negligence of Larkin, an independent third person, for whose act, standing alone, the defendant, it must be conceded, was in no wise liable; but plaintiff claims that certain acts or omissions of the defendant contributed proximately to cause the injury, and and that, therefore, the defendant must be held responsible. Plaintiff insists that the evidence shows that defendant failed to exercise reasonable prudence and care in providing appliances for loading cars, in watching and tending its track to keep it free from obstacles, in the moving of Larkin's partially filled car from the point where it stood when he began loading it to a point away from the loading posts.

A careful reading of the record fails to disclose to us wherein the defendant was remiss or negligent in any of these respects. There is no evidence that the method of loading at the said switch was in any respect improper or dangerous. On the contrary, the record shows that the method was safe and practical. And, even if this mode of loading the cars was, as it is claimed in plaintiff's argument, crude and deficient, it is not shown to have any causal connection with Larkin leaving the chain on the track. Larkin on that morning could have waited until Wyckoff's train passed Gaffey's switch, when the partially filled car could have been moved into position and loaded in the usual mode, or in like manner, without waiting, he could have loaded his beets into one of the empty cars opposite the loading posts, and later in the day have finished loading the half-filled car. In any event, if Larkin had emptied his beets into the half-filled car in the usual and prescribed mode, whether the mode was safe or unsafe, the block and chain would not have been left on the main track, and the accident would not have occurred. There is no legal connection between the method of loading at said switch and Larkin's oversight.

As to track walkers. This is a short narrow-gauge railroad, extending in length about 23 miles, carrying but few passengers, and engaged principally in handling freight. Inasmuch as it employed section crews who were over the road continually, and considering the character and extent of its business, it certainly cannot in reason be said that in failing to employ track walkers the company was negligent, and that such negligence occurred proximately with the negligence of Larkin in causing the accident. This, too, must have been the view of the trial court, for the jury was instructed that the company had no actual notice of the obstruction, and that it had not been on the track long enough to give the company constructive notice of its presence. Plaintiff lays great stress on the fact that defendant moved the partly filled car to the extreme south end of the switch and out of position to be loaded in the usual mode. The moving of the car was the natural physical result of filling the switch with the empty cars and the engine, and the switch was thus filled, so it appears, to clear the main track for Wyckoff's train. During the entire period of the operation of this road no obstruction had ever before been seen on the track at Gaffey's switch, no accident had ever happened anywhere on the line, and no farmer—Larkin or any one else—at this point had ever before resorted to any mode of loading freight other than the prescribed one. We utterly fail to see how in moving this car the defendant was guilty of any negligence. It is true that the car, when moved, was standing near a telephone pole; but it also appears that this was not by design, or for the purpose of having the pole used as a loading post. In short, the use to which the telephone pole was put was wholly unwarranted by any act or conduct of an authorized agent of the defendant company.

The plaintiff suggests that an insufficient number of section hands were employed to keep the track and roadbed in repair, and that the company should have employed someone to supervise the loading of the beets. This accident was not caused by a defective roadbed or track; and, as Larkin was the only person loading beets at Gaffey's switch that morning, and when the general nature and character of the business of the company is remembered, we think it must be concluded that these two points, like those already considered, are too speculative, and that they bear no causal or legal connection with the unfortunate accident. In our judgment the negligence of Larkin was that of an independent, intervening responsible agency, and was in law the sole proximate cause of the accident. But, even if we assume that the defendant was guilty of negligence, this accident was not one of the probable results of such negligence, and between it and the injury we can perceive no immediate and legal connection.

The case of Cole v. German S. & L. Society, 59 C. C. A. 593, 124 Fed. 113, 63 L. R. A. 416, seems in point. There a boy who was a stranger to the plaintiff and not in the employ of the defendant, but who had been seen on one occasion prior to the accident endeavoring to operate the elevator, and riding upon it and visiting the boy in charge of it a dozen times, upon his own initiative opened the sliding door of the elevator shaft in order to admit the plaintiff to the elevator. The elevator was at an upper story, in charge of its regular operator. The plaintiff, supposing that the boy who opened the door was in charge of the elevator, stepped into the shaft and fell to the bottom, and was seriously injured. There was no artificial light maintained in the hall, and it was dark and gloomy. There was no lock provided for the door to prevent any one from opening it from the outside, and the door was permitted at times to stand open from one to ten inches.

Upon these facts it was held that while the defendant's omissions constituted negligence, still its negligence was not, and the boy's negligence was, the proximate cause of the injury. The court said: "There is no evidence in this case that any such accident or injury as that from which plaintiff suffers ever followed the defendant's act of negligence before the plaintiff fell into the well. Not only this, but there is no evidence that the accident and injury to the plaintiff resulted from these acts or omissions, but positive and convincing testimony that they were produced by the wrongful act of another. * * *

There is nothing in the evidence to the effect that the defendant's acts or omissions ever had produced, or ever would in the natural sequence of events have produced any such injury; while the proof is plenary that it was the act of a stranger which actually caused it. * * * The independent, voluntary act of the strange boy who opened the door of the elevator, and invited the plaintiff to enter the well, was incapable of anticipation. No one could have foreseen it as the probable consequence of the acts or omissions of the defendant. It broke the chain of causation between the prior negligence of defendant and the injury to plaintiff, insulated the defendant's acts and omissions from the plaintiff's hurt, and imposed upon the boy who willed and committed the act which produced the injury the sole liability for the damages which resulted from it. The acts and omissions of the defendant were too remote to legally contribute to the injury, or impose liability for it. They were not a proximate cause of the accident, and mischievous and wrongful act of the strange boy was the sole, moving, efficient, proximate cause that produced it."

In Fredericks v. Northern Railway, 157 Pa. 103, 27 Atl. 689, 22 L. R. A. 306, cars left standing on a side track were moved by a stranger to the main track, and caused a collision in which a passenger was injured. The court in that case says: "If obstructions are placed by strangers upon the road either through accident or design, the company is not responsible for the consequences (even to a passenger) unless its agents have been remiss in not discovering them. There was no time for the defendant's agents to discover the mischief, and they cannot be charged with negligence in that respect." In Latch v. Rummer Ry. Co., 3 Hurlst. & N. 930, cited in the last-mentioned case, the plaintiff claimed that it was negligence on the part of the defendant not to have a person to take care of the points of a siding, who could have prevented the accident in question, which was caused by a stranger placing a stone under one of the levers; but the court said that the siding had been in the same state for months and no accident had happened, and the defendant was not bound to have a person stationed there to prevent such a thing. See, also, Goodlander Mill Co. v. Standard

No negligent act or omission of the company set in operation Larkin's careless and thoughtless act. There was nothing about the company's manner of conducting business at Gaffey's switch from which this accident could have been foreseen and reasonably anticipated, and any possible cause therefor set in motion by the defendant was remote and imperceptible, and the independent, intervening, deplorable, negligent act of Larkin was the sole proximate cause of the accident and resulting injury.

The court refused to give the following instruction or its substance: "If you believe from the evidence that for more than five years immediately preceding the accident in question the deceased, Wyckoff, was employed by defendant as a locomotive engineer, and that he passed Gaffey's switch during said time often enough and under such circumstances as to make him familiar with the situation there, and with the methods of loading which were followed there, and with the fact that defendant kept no loading superintendent there, and kept no depot or loading platform, and had no track walker, and he also knew or should have known the danger and risk to which he was exposed by reason of said facts and such situation, and with full knowledge of said facts and such situation and the said danger and risk to him, he voluntarily elected to continue and did continue in his said employment as locomotive engineer for as long as two years after having become acquainted with said facts, dangers, and risks and said situation, then I instruct you that by so continuing in his employment he assumed said danger and risk." The deceased passed up and down the road from two to four times a day for the 10 years he was employed by the defendant, and the method of loading and conditions generally at Gaffey's switch during all this time were substantially the same as at the time of the accident. The defendant pleaded the assumption of risk, and we think under the law in this state that the instruction should have been given; for if the deceased knew, or had the means of knowledge, of the defects in the mode of conducting the freighting business at Gaffey's switch, and the dangers likely to result from that mode, and voluntarily remained in the employ of the defendant for (as the instruction reads) two years thereafter, then he cannot recover. Sanborn v. Madera Flume Co., 70 Cal. 266. 11 Pac. 710. The proposed instruction embraced all of the elements of the doctrine of assumption of risk; and as there was evidence in the case from which the jury could have concluded that, if the defendant was guilty of negligence in the method of conducting its business at Gaffey's switch, the deceased knew of this method and of the risks resulting therefrom. Hence the refusal to give this instruction was in our opinion prejudicial.

Numerous other objections are made to the instructions, but, as they may not arise on another trial of the case, we deem it unnecessary to notice them in detail.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; HALL, J.

CONSOLIDATED PEOPLE'S DITCH CO.
v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA WATER & IRRIGATION CO. et al. (Civ. 421.) (Court of Appeal. Third District, California. July 9, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge. Action by the Consolidated People's Ditch Company against the Central California Water & Irrigation Company, also known as the Central California Water Company, and others. From the judgment, one of the parties appeals. Affirmed as modified. Bradley & Farnsworth and O. E. Larkins, for appellant. Hannah & Miller, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Pursuant to stipulation, it is ordered: That the portion of the judgment in said action which reads as follows: "First. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the following lands of defendant J. W. C. Pogue are riparian to the Kaweah river, to wit: That part of the west half of section thirty-five, in township seventeen south, range twenty-seven east of the Mount Diablo base and meridian, lying east and south of the mid-channel of the Kaweah river, also the northeast quarter, and the west half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of said section thirty-five, and that portion of section three, in township eighteen south, range twenty-seven east, of the Mount Diablo base and meridian, lying east and south of the mid-channel of said Kaweah river—and that six cubic feet per second, and no more, of the water flowing in said Kaweah river is a reasonable quantity of water for the irrigation of said riparian land and for domestic purposes and the watering of live stock thereon by said defendant J. W. C. Pogue; and it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that, as between plaintiff and said defendant J. W. C. Pogue, said defendant J. W. C. Pogue has, as a riparian owner and as against plaintiff, the prior and superior right to take and divert from the Kaweah river by means of the Pogue, Wallace & Crocker ditch, or Pogue's lower ditch, six cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river, and no more, until said plaintiff is first supplied at the head of its ditch, the Consolidated People's ditch, with three hundred cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river during the months of January, February, March, April, May, June, July, November, and December of each year, and with forty cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river during the months of August, September, and October of each year, and that said defendant J. W. C. Pogue, in the use of said six cubic feet of water per second of the waters of said Kaweah river, has the right to use the same on said riparian lands and on lands away from and not riparian to said Kaweah river, and that after said defendant J. W. C. Pogue is first supplied, at the head of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker ditch, or at the head of said Pogue's lower ditch, with said six cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river, then said plaintiff is entitled at the head of its said ditch to take and divert from said Kaweah river three hundred cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river during the months of January, February, March, April, May, June, July, November, and December of each year, and to so take and divert from said Kaweah river forty cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river during the months of August, September, and October of each year, before said defendant J. W. C. Pogue is entitled to take or divert any more water from said Kaweah river by means of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker ditch, or said Pogue's lower ditch, or otherwise; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff have the injunction of this court perpetually enjoining and restraining the said defendant J. W. C. Pogue, his agents, servants, employés, tenants, and all others acting under him or his authority, or in aid of or on behalf of him, from taking or diverting by means of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker ditch, or said Pogue's lower ditch, or otherwise, more than six cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river, or thereafter in any manner interfering with the free and natural flow of the water of said Kaweah river, until said plaintiff is first supplied at the head of its ditch with three hundred cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river during the months of January, February, March, April, May, June, July, November, and December of each year, and forty cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river during the months of August, September, and October of each year; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that, as between said plaintiff and said defendant J. W. C. Pogue, said plaintiff do have and recover judgment against said defendant J. W. C. Pogue one-half of the costs and disbursements incurred by said plaintiff in said action, which one-half of said costs and disbursements amounts to the sum of $——, which said plaintiff is entitled to as its costs of suit"—be and the same is hereby changed and modified, so that said portion of said judgment shall be and read as follows: "First. It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that as between said plaintiff, the Consolidated People's Ditch Company, a corporation, and said defendants Central California Water & Irrigation Company, a corporation (also known as and called Central California Water Company, a corporation), and the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, a corporation, that said defendants have the prior and superior right to take and divert from the Kaweah river by means of the Pogue, Wallace & Crocker ditch, or Pogue's lower ditch, or both of said ditches together, but not otherwise, six cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river, and no more, and that no more than six cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river shall be taken or diverted from said Kaweah river by said defendants Central California Water & Irrigation Company, a corporation (also known as and called Central California Water Company, a corporation), and the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, a corporation, by means of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker ditch, or Pogue's lower ditch, or both of said ditches together, until said plaintiff is first supplied at all times, at the head of its ditch, the Consolidated People's Ditch, with three hundred cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river, and that, after said defendants have so taken and diverted said six cubic feet of water per second of the waters of said Kaweah river, said plaintiff has the prior and superior right as against said defendants, and each of them, and their and each of their successors and assigns, to take and divert from said Kaweah river the next three hundred cubic feet of water per second of the water flowing in said Kaweah river at the head of plaintiff's said ditch; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff have and is granted the injunction of the superior court of the county of Tulare, state of California, perpetually enjoining and restraining the defendants Central California Water & Irrigation Company, a corporation (also known as and called Central California Water Company, a corporation), and the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, a corporation, and each of them, and their and each of their agents, officers, servants, employés, tenants, successors, and assigns, and all others acting under them or either of them, or under their or either of their authority, or in aid of them or either of them, or for or on behalf of them or either of them, from taking or diverting any water from said Kaweah river, except as aforesaid, or from in any manner interfering with the free and natural flow of the water of said Kaweah river, except as aforesaid." And the court below is directed to change and modify the judgment as aforesaid, and, as so changed and modified, the judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 8, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 324*) — CONTEST — NONSUIT — GROUNDS—STATUTE.

The court has no authority to grant a nonsuit except in the cases specified in Code Civ. Proc. § 581, which does not include the withdrawal from the jury of an issue of undue influence, in a will contest, for alleged lack of sufficient evidence to support it.

2. WILLS (§ 324*)—CONTEST—NONSUIT—ISSUES—WITHDRAWAL FROM JURY.

Withdrawal of an issue of undue influence in a will contest from the jury, at the close of the evidence, was equivalent to an order granting a nonsuit as to one of the causes of action.

3. WILLS (§ 324*)—CONTEST—GROUNDS—WITHDRAWAL FROM JURY.

Where probate of a will was contested on the ground of undue influence and testamentary incapacity, the court, in the absence of a request by the proponent, should not have taken the issue of undue influence from the jury on the theory that the evidence was insufficient to justify its submission.

4. WILLS (§ 324*)—CONTEST—SUBMISSION TO JURY.

Where the evidence in a will contest is so conclusive in favor of the proponent that the court would have been bound to set aside a verdict in favor of the contestant, it could refuse to submit the case to the jury.

5. TRIAL (§ 160*) — NONSUIT — MOTION — GROUNDS.

Plaintiff is ordinarily entitled to a motion specifying the grounds on which a nonsuit is asked, that he may, by amendment or further proof, supply the suggested defect.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 213*) — QUESTIONS NOT RAISED AT TRIAL.

Where a defect urged to support a nonsuit is one which might have been cured if called to plaintiff's attention, defendant cannot urge it for the first time on appeal.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1061*)—ERRONEOUS NONSUIT—PREJUDICE.

Where the defect in contestant's case in a will contest is incurable, in so far as the claim of undue influence is concerned, the Supreme Court will not order a reversal because of error in granting a nonsuit without formal motion therefor, merely that the case may be submitted to the jury on that issue.

8. WILLS (§ 324*)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held insufficient to justify submission of the issue of undue influence in the will contest to the jury.

9. WILLS (§ 166*)—CONTEST—UNDUE INFLUENCE—PRESUMPTION.

Testator, before executing his will, consulted an attorney who visited him for that purpose. At this interview no member of his family but his wife was present. His wife's community interest was explained to him to consist of one-half of the estate, which he declared would be sufficient for her, and he then, after discussing the matter with the attorney, determined the shares to be given his children. Held sufficient to overcome the presumption of undue influence arising from confidential relations between testator and the child receiving the largest share, coupled with activity on his part in preparing the will.

10. WILLS (§ 155*)—EXECUTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Undue influence, to avoid a will, must destroy testator's free agency at the time and in the very act of making the testament.

11. WITNESSES (§ 198*)—COMPETENCY—ATTORNEY—PRIVILEGE.

In a will contest an attorney testified that he had been requested by proponent to draw a deed to be executed by testator conveying all his property to proponent; that he prepared the paper, but testator refused to sign it, and on the following day witness had another conversation with proponent. Held, that there being evidence that the relation of attorney and client existed between proponent and attorney, the details of the last-mentioned conversation and concerning the balance of the first conversation were privileged under Code Civ. Proc.

Evidence that testator had expressed his disapproval of contestant's marriage, which occurred in March, 1879, was admissible, its remoteness affecting its weight rather than its admissibility.

Exclusion of evidence in a will contest that decedent had stated, from 3 to 5 years before, that he intended to keep certain property, afterwards conveyed to proponent for testator's daughter and another son, was not prejudicial, having no direct bearing on the issues of testamentary incapacity and undue influence.

15. EVIDENCE (§ 558*)—EXPERTS—CROSS-EXAMINATION—LIMITATIONS—DISCRETION.

Since the trial court has a wide range of discretion in fixing the limits of cross-examination, contestants having been allowed a reasonably free opportunity to develop any consideration of reliability of experts as to testator's mental condition, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit contestants to ask expert alienists on cross-examination whether they would put the management of $50,000 worth of property into the hands of a man of testator's mental and physical condition.

19. WILLS (§ 330*)—CONTEST—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—INSTRUCTIONS—"SOUND MIND."

An instruction that if testator has sufficient mentality to recognize those who are the objects of his bounty, or should be, and to recollect the property that he is to bestow, and that he is making his will, the courts have no right to disturb it, and that testators have testamentary capacity if they can recognize to whom their bounty should go, or the fact of to whom they wish it to go, and that they have property of which they wish to dispose, was not error when construed with other instructions properly defining "sound mind" as one capable of rationally thinking, reasoning, acting, and determining for himself, or a person of "sound and disposing mind" as one who is in possession of natural mental faculties of mind capable of rationally thinking and acting for himself.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Application by Herbert R. Higgins for the probate of the will of Thomas J. Higgins, deceased, to which Albert E. Higgins and another filed objection. The will was admitted to probate, and contestants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

Edwin H. Lamme, Puterbaugh & Puterbaugh, and H. E. Doolittle, for appellants. Wright, Schoonover & Winnek, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Thomas J. Higgins, a resident of the county of San Diego, died in said county on the 5th day of September, 1907. He left as his heirs his widow, Phoebe B. Higgins, a daughter, Cornelia B. Chick, and two sons, Albert E. Higgins and Herbert R. Higgins. A paper, purporting to be the will of the decedent, was offered for probate by Herbert R. Higgins, and written opposition thereto filed by Albert E. Higgins and Cornelia B. Chick. Two grounds of contest—unsoundness of mind and undue influence exerted by Herbert R. Higgins—were set up by the contestants. The proponent having filed an answer, the contest proceeded to trial before a jury. After all the evidence on both sides had been produced, the court, of its own motion, withdrew from the jury the issue of undue influence, submitting the single question of the competency of Thomas J. Higgins to make a last will and testament. A verdict in favor of such competency was returned, and an order admitting the alleged will to probate followed. The contestants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Great stress is laid by the appellants upon the point that the court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the issue of undue influence. The ruling was, in effect, equivalent to an order granting a nonsuit as to one of the causes of action. The cases in which a judgment of nonsuit may be entered are set forth in section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the court has authority to grant such judgment only in the cases specified by law. Hanna v. De Garmo, 140 Cal. 172, 73 Pac. 830. There is no provision in our statutes authorizing the court (except under circumstances not appearing here) to grant a nonsuit without any motion to that end by the defendant. It would seem, therefore, that the court below should not, in the absence of any request by the proponent, have taken the issue of undue influence from the jury. But, under the facts disclosed by the bill of exceptions, this error or irregularity was not such as to justify a reversal. The evidence on the issue of undue influence was so conclusive in favor of the proponent that the court would have been bound to set aside a verdict in favor of appellants. When this condition appears the court is "justified in refusing to submit the case to a jury." Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 Pac. 57. A plaintiff is ordinarily entitled to a motion specifying the grounds upon which a nonsuit is asked in order that he may, by amendment or further proof, have an opportunity to supply any defect suggested. Where such defect is one which might have been cured, if called to the attention of the plaintiff, it would obviously be unjust to permit a defendant to urge it for the first time in the appellate court. People v. Banvard, 27 Cal. 474; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 261, 22 Pac. 195; Palmer & Rey v. Marysville, etc., Co., 90 Cal. 168, 27 Pac. 21; Durfee v. Seale, 139 Cal. 604, 73 Pac. 435. But this consideration has no application to a case where the evidence has been fully presented, and the plaintiff has totally failed to make out a case which would support findings in his favor. Where there is no reason to believe that any additional evidence in support of the complaint could be produced, it is difficult to see what substantial benefit would be derived from a formal motion for nonsuit, based on the insufficiency of the evidence. Such is the situation here. The defect in contestants' case is incurable, and the court will not order a reversal for the mere purpose of having submitted to the jury an issue which could not be decided in favor of contestants. "Granting," as was said in Estate of Morey, supra, "that the course pursued in this case was irregular, it does not follow that it is fatal to the judgment, even on appeal."

at length in order to support our conclusion that a verdict finding that the will had been obtained by undue influence could not have been sustained. The contestants showed that for some months prior to his death the testator, a man of advanced years, had reposed great confidence in his son Herbert, the respondent, and that the latter had from time to time importuned his father to settle his affairs. The deceased was suffering from physical ailments, and, according to the testimony offered by contestants, had become greatly weakened mentally. The will was executed on the day preceding the testator's death. Said will, after recognizing the right of the widow to one-half of the estate (the whole being community property) and bequeathing to her the household furniture, gave to the daughter, Mrs. Chick, one-sixth, to Albert E. Higgins, two-sixths, and to Herbert R. Higgins, three-sixths of the residue. It also confirmed a deed, theretofore made by the testator and his wife, conveying a valuable lot to Herbert R. Higgins. In all the testimony of contestants there was nothing to show the exercise of any actual pressure or influence by the proponent, unless it be found in his efforts, some months prior to the execution of the will, to induce his father to dispose of all his property. But his importunities in this direction were unsuccessful. They were uniformly resisted by the testator. Giving to contestants the full force of the presumption of undue influence arising from the confidential relations between the testator and the proponent, coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will (In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 33, 30 Pac. 101; Coghill v. Kennedy, 119 Ala. 641, 24 South. 459), this presumption was fully met and overthrown by the uncontradicted evidence showing the actual circumstances surrounding the preparation and execution of the will. Estate of Morey, supra. It was shown that the testator, before executing his will, had consulted with an attorney, who visited him for that purpose. At this interview no member of his family, except his wife, was present. The nature and extent of a surviving wife's interest in community property was explained to the testator, who said that one-half of the estate (all of which he declared to be community property) would be sufficient provision for Mrs. Higgins. Concerning the disposition of the other half, he said he did not desire to give his daughter an equal share. He first spoke of giving her $1,500, but before the close of the interview mentioned the sum of $2,500. He stated that he did not want Mr. Chick, his daughter's husband, to handle any considerable amount of his property. In the afternoon of the same day the attorney, accompanied by his son, returned with a draft of the proposed will. In the absence of the proponent the testator was asked for his decision regarding the gift to his daughter.

ter. He expressed a thought of raising it to $3,500. The attorney then suggested a division into shares instead of a cash legacy. This, after some consideration, was approved by the testator, and he fixed upon the proportions of one-sixth to Mrs. Chick, two-sixths to Albert, and three-sixths to Herbert. Blanks which had been left in the draft were filled accordingly and the will was executed. Its other provisions, such as appointment of executor, etc., followed the directions of the testator. In the face of this showing, which we have set forth in mere outline, there is no basis for the claim that the will was procured to be made by the undue influence of the proponent. "Undue influence, however used, must, in order to avoid a will, destroy the free agency of the testator at the time, and in the very act of the making of the testament. It must bear directly upon the testamentary act." Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. 390, 73 Pac. 1081; Estate of McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 Pac. 101; Estate of Langford, 108 Cal. 608, 41 Pac. 701; Estate of Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 Pac. 577; In re Wilson's Estate, 117 Cal. 262, 49 Pac. 172, 711. The proof above recited amounted to a demonstration that in determining upon the testamentary disposition of his property the testator was forming his own conclusions and expressing his own intentions. On the issue of unsoundness of mind there was testimony in support of contestants' position, but there is no contention that there was not ample evidence the other way to support the verdict in favor of the testator's competency.

Objection is made to certain rulings on the admissibility of evidence. Will H. Holcomb, an attorney at law, testified that he had been requested by the proponent to draw a deed to be executed by the decedent, conveying all of the latter's property to said proponent. He prepared the paper, and took it to the house of the testator, who refused to sign it. On the following day Holcomb had another conversation with the proponent. The testimony tended to show that the relation of attorney and client existed between Holcomb and the proponent, and the court did not, therefore, err, in refusing to permit the witness to state the details of the last-mentioned conversation. Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2. The same may be said of the question asked Holcomb on redirect examination regarding the "balance" of the first conversation between himself and proponent. Such part of this conversation as was shown had been brought out by contestants over the proponent's objection. There was, therefore, no waiver of the point of privileged communication.

The contestant Cornelia B. Chick had been married to Martinez Chick in March, 1879. The proponent was permitted to show that, at that time, the testator had expressed his disapproval of the marriage. The occurrence was so remote in point of time that it could throw but little light on the question of the feelings between father and daughter at the date of the will. The lapse of time, however, affected the weight, rather than the admissibility of the testimony. On similar reasoning, the court might well have admitted, instead of excluding, as it did, the testimony of one Gordon (offered by contestants) to the effect that the decedent had stated, some three or four or five years before, that he intended to keep certain property, afterward conveyed to respondent, for his daughter and his son Albert. But this testimony had no such direct and immediate bearing on any of the ultimate issues that its exclusion could furnish a ground for reversal. A different ruling could not have affected the result.

Albert E. Higgins, one of the contestants, was called in rebuttal, and asked what advances had been made to him by his father. Objection to the question was sustained. It may be conceded that the state of the case was such as to make the inquiry material. But the ruling was not prejudicial, since the witness, when called at an earlier stage of the trial, had already testified that all the advances he had received from his father amounted to about $2,300. Repetition would have added no force to this.

In each of two instances a witness, duly qualified, having given his opinion that the testator was of sound mind, was asked by contestants, on cross-examination, whether he would put the management and disposition of $50,000 worth of property into the hands of a man in the mental and physical condition of the testator. An objection was sustained. It may be said that the inquiry was proper cross-examination for the purpose of testing the value of the opinion given by the witness. Even so, we think the ruling did not constitute prejudicial error. The trial court has a wide range of discretion in fixing the limits of cross-examination (Brumagin v. Bradshaw, 39 Cal. 24; Silverer v. Hansen, 77 Cal. 579, 20 Pac. 136), and the record does not show any abuse of discretion in the ruling complained of. The contestants were allowed a reasonably free opportunity to develop by cross-examination any consideration affecting the reliability of the opinion given by the witness. Dr. Hulbert was called by contestants as an expert witness. An objection to one of the hypothetical questions asked him was properly sustained. There was no evidence of facts assumed as the basis of the question.

The only remaining points are those relating to instructions. In instruction 8 the court told the jury that "every one has the right to dispose of his property according to his own desires, and if there is no defect of testamentary capacity the law must give effect to his will, irrespective of its provisions, or of his reasons or motives for making such disposition; and the jury are not at liberty to consider the character of its provisions, but are solely to determine whether it was his will." The objection raised to this instruction by appellants is that it removes from the consideration of the jury the terms of the will itself. No doubt the nature of the testamentary provisions may be such as to indicate, in connection with other evidence, a want of capacity to make a will. And where the will makes an irrational or unnatural disposition of property, this is a circumstance to be considered in determining the state of mind of the testator. But, if there be no defect of testamentary capacity, a will is not to be upset because its provisions may seem to the court or the jury to be unreasonable, unnatural, foolish, or unjust. In re Wilson's Estate, 117 Cal. 262, 277, 49 Pac. 172, 711; In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 33, 30 Pac. 101. We think the instruction complained of went no further than to declare the rule as we have just stated it. The declaration that the jury is not to consider the character of the provisions of the will, and the preceding statements that the law must give effect to the will, "irrespective of its provisions, or of his reasons or motives for making such disposition," are all alike qualified by the preliminary clause, "if there is no defect of testamentary capacity." Such, apparently, was the interpretation given to this very instruction when it was upheld by this court in Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 64 Pac. 294.

We see no error in the other instructions criticised. In telling the jury that "if there still remains to him (the testator) a sufficient mentality to recognize those who are the objects of his bounty, or should be, and to recollect the property that he is to bestow, that it is his will he is making, and the courts and jury have no right to disturb it," and that "if they (testators) have what is known as testamentary capacity, if they can recognize to whom their bounty should go, or recognize the fact of to whom they want it to go, and the fact that they have property that they wish to dispose of, it is a sound mind sufficient for them to make a testament," the court was not undertaking to give a complete definition of testamentary capacity, but was merely directing the attention of the jury to the established rule that ideal perfection of mentality regarding all subjects is not required, but only such degree of understanding as will enable the testator to act rationally in the matter of making a testamentary disposition of his property. It may be that the language above quoted does not fulfill all the requirements of technical accuracy, but, when read in connection with other instructions defining a sound mind, it is apparent that the jury could not have been misled to the prejudice of the appellants. Among other things, the court told the jury that "a sound mind is one that is capable of rationally thinking, reasoning, acting, and determining for himself, or in other words, a person of sound and disposing mind, who is in possession of the natural mental faculties of mind free from delusions and capable of rationally thinking, and acting for himself." Certainly the instructions, taken together, imposed upon the proponent as severe a test as could reasonably be asked by respondent. We do not suggest that these instructions, in the precise form in which they were given, should be taken as models for future cases, but are satisfied that they did not deprive the appellants of any substantial right.

Of the instructions said to have been requested by contestants and refused, it is sufficient to say that the bill of exceptions fails to show that any instructions were so requested or refused. The only reference to them is in the specifications of error at the close of the bill of exceptions. Among such specifications are several to the effect that the court erred "in refusing to give to the jury instruction No. —, asked by the contestants, as follows: (setting forth the alleged requested instruction)." The assignments of error, unsupported by the substantive part of the bill, are not evidence that the alleged requests were made or denied. Goldman v. Bashore, 80 Cal. 146, 22 Pac. 82; Ferrier v. Ferrier, 64 Cal. 23, 27 Pac. 960.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

ZENDA MIN. & MILL. CO. v. TIFFIN
(Civ. 622.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 780*)—LIEN.

The owner of mining land agreed to convey it to C., part of the consideration to be paid in cash and the balance out of the proceeds of milling the ore from the mine, a mill for which purpose C. agreed to install. As a part of the same transaction C. assigned his contract to B. and others who agreed to perform the covenants thereof. Deeds from the owner to C. and from C. to B. and his associates were signed and deposited in escrow, with instructions to deliver them on performance of the conditions specified to B. and associates. The latter fully complied with the contract, whereupon the deeds were delivered and recorded. Held, that C. had no interest in the property to which a judgment against him rendered after the date of the agreement of sale, but prior to the delivery of the deeds, could attach.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by the Zenda Mining & Milling Company (a corporation) against W. W. Tiffin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. W. Scott and Kemp & Collier, for appellant. Waterman & Wood, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On November 28, 1903, defendant Tiffin had docketed in Kern county a deficiency judgment against George W. Cummings. On September 25, 1905, claiming that Cummings had, after the docketing of the judgment acquired an interest in certain mining property situated in Kern county, the title to which then stood in the name of plaintiff, to which the lien of his judgment had attached, defendant had an execution issued and caused the same to be levied upon said mining property and sold to satisfy said judgment so docketed against Cummings. At the sale defendant became the purchaser thereof, whereupon plaintiff brought this action to quiet title. Judgment went in favor of plaintiff, from which defendant prosecutes an appeal upon the judgment roll.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that on September 8th, prior to the docketing of said judgment, Benjamin G. Parlow entered into an agreement with Cummings whereby he agreed to sell and convey to the latter an undivided  $\frac{26}{48}$  interest in said mining property, together with certain water rights and mill site connected therewith. The consideration for such proposed sale was \$8,920, \$3,500 of which was payable in cash, and the balance to be paid out of the proceeds of milling the ore from the mine, a mill for which purpose Cummings agreed to install within eight months from September 8th.

At the time of entering into this contract Parlow signed and acknowledged two deeds conveying the property to Cummings. On the same day, and as a part of the same transaction, Cummings entered into a contract with H. W. Bryson and associates, which was, in effect, an assignment to Bryson et al. of the contract secured by him from Parlow; Bryson and associates agreeing to perform the covenants made by Cummings in his contract with Parlow. As part of the same transaction, and on the same date, Cummings signed and acknowledged two deeds, wherein Bryson and associates were made grantees, which deeds were of like effect as those wherein he was made grantee in the deeds from Parlow. Bryson and his associates paid to Parlow the cash payment of $3,500, and thereupon the contract made between Parlow and Cummings, together with the deeds from Parlow to Cummings, and the contract between Cummings and Bryson et al., together with the deeds from Cummings to Bryson and associates, were placed in escrow with instructions to the holder, signed by all of said parties, to the effect that if Bryson and associates should, within the time specified, perform the conditions specified in the contracts, all of said papers and deeds were to be delivered to the latter; otherwise, and in case of failure to comply with the conditions, the Parlow agreement and deeds by him made to Cummings should be delivered to Parlow, and the other papers to Cummings. Bryson and associates entered into possession of the property, and thereafter fully complied with the conditions of the escrow and received all of the papers some time in March, 1904, at which time all of them were filed for record, actual notice of which fact defendant had long prior to the sale. Plaintiff was created a corporation by Bryson and associates, and they, by deed dated February 24, 1904, conveyed all of said property so acquired from Parlow to the corporation. Cummings never paid anything on account of the purchase of the property; the entire consideration therefor having been paid by Bryson and associates. After entering into possession of the property on September 8, 1903, Bryson et al., and plaintiff, as their grantee, made improvements, extracted ore from said mine, and milled the same. The judgment must be sustained on several grounds.

Appellant argues at great length that the deed from Parlow to Cummings did not become operative prior to docketing of the judgment, but subsequent thereto. Conceding this to be true, it does not follow that Cummings acquired any interest in the property by virtue of such deed. Under the provisions of section 671, Code Civ. Proc., the judgment when docketed became a lien upon such real property situate in the county and not exempt which Cummings might then own, or such as he might thereafter acquire, until the lien ceased. Appellant does not claim that he owned the property at the time of the docketing of the judgment, but contends that he subsequently acquired the  $2\frac{2}{48}$  interest. Whatever interest Cummings acquired was by virtue of the Parlow agreement, pursuant to which Parlow signed and acknowledged deeds to the property, making Cummings grantee therein. These deeds, however, were not delivered to Cummings, nor was it contemplated in any event that they should be so delivered. The rights of Cummings of whatever character or value were on September 8th prior to the docketing of the judgment, actually transferred to Bryson and associates. Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 133, 13 Pac. 315. Thereafter Cummings had, and could have, no interest in the property. He had parted with all interest in or control over it. Howell v. Foster, 65 Cal. 173, 3 Pac. 647; People ex rel. Ford v. Irwin, 14 Cal. 428. He could acquire none under the instructions of escrow, because the contracts and deeds, upon compliance with the conditions of the contract by Bryson and associates, were to be delivered, not to Cummings, but to the former, in whom it was intended to vest the title.

It may be admitted that delivery of the deeds conveyed to Cummings an apparent interest in the property, but it was nothing more than a naked legal title. Assuming that his interest, if any, acquired under the Parlow contract did not pass to Bryson and associates on September 8th prior to docketing of the judgment, nevertheless, they, Bryson et al., paid the entire purchase price and "the doctrine is well established that where land is purchased in the name of one person, and the consideration is paid by another, the land will be held by the grantee in trust for the person furnishing the consideration." Riley v. Martinelli, 97 Cal. 575, 32 Pac. 579, 21 L. R. A. 33, 33 Am. St. Rep. 209; Currey v. Allen, 34 Cal. 254; Civ. Code, § 853. "Whenever one is a mere conduit, as where he purchases property in his name as the agent of another, with the latter's funds, and subsequently conveys to him, there is no interest to which a judgment lien can attach." Freeman on Judgments, § 373. A correct statement of the rule is that the lien of a judgment creates a preference over subsequently acquired rights, but in equity it does not attach to the mere legal title to the land as existing in the defendant at its rendition to the exclusion of a prior equitable title in a third person. Wilcoxson v. Miller, 49 Cal. 193; Atkinson v. Hancock, 67 Iowa, 452, 25 N. W. 701; Ransom v. Sargent, 22 Kan. 516; Freeman on Executions, § 335. Moreover, in addition to the fact that Cummings had no interest in the property to which the lien of the judgment attached, defendant by reason of actual knowledge of the record of the documents evidencing the transaction, and possession of the property by plaintiff, had notice and means of knowledge equivalent to notice (Lady Washington C. Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 Pac. 809; San Diego Land Co. v. La Presa School Dist., 122 Cal. 98, 54 Pac. 528) of the facts showing plaintiff to be the real owner of the property. A voluntary purchaser from Cummings having such notice could acquire no title to the property (Gal-land v. Jackman, 26 Cal. 79, 85 Am. Dec. 172; Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 122 Cal. 659, 55 Pac. 587), and a purchaser with notice under judicial sale could occupy no better position (O'Rourke v. O'Connor, 39 Cal. 442; Freeman on Judgments, § 366).

The several documents, contracts, and deeds constituting but one transaction antedating the docketing of the judgment, and the purpose and effect of which, upon compliance with the terms thereof, was to vest title to the property in plaintiff's grantors, who had paid the entire purchase price thereof, it would seem clear that Cummings never at any time acquired any interest in the property, and that defendant possessing full knowledge of all the facts constituting the transaction acquired no interest in the property by reason of purchasing the same at a sale under execution issued to enforce payment of the deficiency judgment docketed against Cummings.

1. WITNESSES (§ 372*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION TO SHOW BIAS.

While a question on cross-examination to show bias was proper, such a question was improper where it contained a covert insinuation of improper conduct by witness, a young girl, which was not necessary to disclose the bias, especially where the fact testified to by her was positively established by four other witnesses, and no other conclusion than guilt would have been justified if her testimony had been wholly discredited.

Chas. Ezra Williams, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TAGGART, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of arson, and appeals from a judgment of three years' imprisonment pronounced upon a verdict of guilty, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only error urged as a ground for a reversal is based upon a ruling of the trial court sustaining an objection to a question addressed to a witness for the prosecution on cross-examination. It is contended that the purpose of the question was to disclose animus upon the part of the witness toward the defendant. To the extent that it was directed to this end, the question was proper; and, if it had been confined to this, should, and no doubt would, have been allowed, but, as it contained a covert insinuation of improper conduct upon the part of the witness to whom addressed, it was not a proper question, unless the part containing such insinuation were necessary to elicit the information respecting the animus. Had this element been omitted from the question, the witness might have admitted her animus, or, if the question had been directed to this purpose alone, and she had refused to answer, the reasons of the animus might have become proper matter of cross-examination. It is apparent, however, that the purpose was to reflect upon the character of the witness (a young girl), and the court was not only justified in sustaining the objection, but might well have instructed the jury to remove from their consideration any suggestion caused by the question. The duty of an attorney appearing for a person charged with crime does not require that he shall introduce, or attempt to introduce, or unnecessarily incorporate in a question claimed to have been asked for some other purpose, matter prejudicial to the honor or reputation of either a party or a witness. In this case the facts alleged in the information were established beyond the shadow of a doubt without the evidence of the witness to whom this question was addressed. Her testimony related only to the identification of defendant, and had it been entirely discredited, no conclusion but that of the guilt of defendant could have been drawn from the evidence. Four other witnesses positively identified the defendant in a way that connected him more closely with the crime than did the testimony of the witness in question, and there is not one fact in the evidence in the case inconsistent with the testimony of these witnesses in this respect. Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 6. It is apparent that the importance of her testimony did not require that this witness should have been singled out for this attack. The form of the question indicates that it was intended to gratify some personal feeling of the client, and we cannot refrain from suggesting to attorneys that such a motive is not sufficient to justify them in asking questions of this character. We think it our duty to not only sustain the ruling of the trial court, but commend it to the attention of attorneys for their future guidance.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by H. P. Lane against Albert C. Williams and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph W. Schoonover, for appellant. W. S. Day and W. C. Day, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff, who is appellant here, filed complaints to which demurrers were successively interposed and sustained. To his fourth amended complaint the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment having been entered according to that ruling, he takes this appeal from said judgment. Appellant has endeavored to plead three causes of action in his fourth amended complaint. In the statement of the first one it is alleged that defendants, who were husband and wife, conspired together to cheat and defraud plaintiff, by inducing him, through certain false representations, to purchase from them the whole of, or a half interest in a certain dairy; that some of the property used in the conduct of said dairy was not owned by Williams and his wife, and that the rest of it was mortgaged for nearly, if not quite, its full value; that in pursuance of their conspiracy the defendants communicated to a Mrs. Bense, who, in turn, conveyed information of the supposed facts to appellant, a false statement with reference to the title of defendants to the property, the net profits of the business, and other matters which are enumerated in the pleadings. It is also set forth that, at a later day, Williams and his wife affirmed to Lane the statement that Mrs. Bense had made to him, and added other false representations regarding the value of the dairy, the cattle, and other matters relating to the business, and that they concealed from plaintiff the fact that some of the personality used in the business was not theirs, and suppressed all information relating to the existing mortgage on the property. It is further averred that, relying on the representations made by Williams and his wife, on March 17, 1904, Lane purchased from them an undivided one-half interest in said dairy for $6,500, with intent to give said interest to his daughter, Mrs. Addie L. Allen; that he did give her the property so purchased, causing the bill of sale to be executed in her favor and delivered to her; and that respondents then and there received for said half interest in the business $4,000 in cash, paid by Lane out of his own funds, and a promissory note for $2,500, payable to respondents in one year, with interest, which said note was executed by Mrs. Allen and secured by a chattel mortgage upon said interest in the property. It is further averred that neither Lane nor his daughter ever received anything from defendants for the $4,000 paid as aforesaid, and judgment for damages in that sum is demanded.

In his second cause of action appellant sets up the matters of fraud charged in the first one, and further alleges that his daughter, Mrs. Allen, and A. C. Williams formed a copartnership and that he was employed by Mrs. Allen to manage her interest in the firm, but was prevented from so doing by the defendants, who neither delivered the property to Allen, or to his daughter, nor permitted them, or either of them, to participate in the management of the business.

He charges that, as a consequence of the conduct of the respondents, he lost three years' time, and the result of three years' labor, and he asks for damages in the sum of $3,000.

The third cause of action resembles the second, except that it is for $100 damages, alleged to be due as a result of moving plaintiff's family to Santa Barbara from Ventura, when he went to the former place to take charge of his daughter's business.

The demurrer interposed to this complaint was upon the grounds that it did not, in either of its divisions, state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the first cause of action is uncertain and unintelligible because therefrom it cannot be ascertained whether A. C. or Lilly Le Noir Williams conspired as partners, as joint owners in common, or acting from a common purpose and motive; and that the first cause of action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The causes of action which appellant attempted to state in his fourth amended complaint, depending upon the alleged damage occasioned by his removal from Ventura and his loss of time, were stated in some form in the original complaint, as well as in the last one. The demurrer as to these causes of action was properly sustained. The employment of appellant was by Mrs. Allen, and not by respondents. It is not pleaded that there were any contractual relations between defendants and appellant. On the contrary, although they had agreed that Mrs. Allen, in consideration, among other things, of devoting all of her time to the business, was to get a certain percentage of the profits of the copartnership, she was merely given the right to furnish her father's services at any time in lieu of her own. Appellant was not a member of the firm. Any breach of the contract of copartnership creates a cause of action in favor of the copartner who is injured—not in favor of one whom such partner may have employed as a representative.

While there is no demurrer upon the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff, we think that the demurrer to the main cause of action must be sustained upon the general ground that plaintiff fails to state clearly a cause of action in his favor. According to the allegations of the complaint Mrs. Allen received a bill of sale for the property. It is true that there is an allegation to the effect that neither she nor the plaintiff received anything for the $4,000, or for the note. Yet, while it appears that defendant did not own some of the property mentioned in the bill of sale, there is no allegation either that Mrs. Allen was not in a position to obtain a portion of the property, that she was not satisfied with such title as she had, or that she was willing to surrender the bill of sale and rescind the contract so far as she was concerned. In other words, it is not clear just what plaintiff's interest in the matter may be, he having formally parted with all apparent interest in favor of his daughter. He should affirmatively show such cause of action in his behalf as would prevent a subsequent judgment in her favor for the same money.

We are therefore of the opinion that the demurrer to this cause of action was properly sustained. This conclusion relieves us of the necessity of determining whether or not the action was barred by the provisions of section 339, subd. 1, Code Civ. Proc.

Action by J. H. Bradley against F. M. Davis. From an order denying a motion for change of place of trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Peters, for appellant. Hinkson & Elliott, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a change of place of trial of the action from the superior court of El Dorado county to the superior court of Sacramento county, made upon the ground that the defendant was a resident of Sacramento county at the time of the commencement of the action. The motion was heard, submitted, and determined solely upon affidavits. These affidavits were conflicting upon the question of the place of residence of defendant at the time of the commencement of the action. The affidavits of plaintiff and G. S. Estey were positive and unequivocal to the effect that the defendant was then a resident of El Dorado county, and there is nothing in either affidavit from which we are authorized to infer that the affiants did not have personal knowledge of the facts as to which they swore positively and without qualification. Under these circumstances, notwithstanding the fact that defendant's counteraffidavit is very clear and specific, it must be held that there was a substantial conflict on the question of residence. It has heretofore been held, and we think correctly, that the mere fact that one is registered in a certain place and has voted therein is not conclusive evidence upon the question of his domicile. Quinn v. Nevills, 7 Cal. App. 231, 93 Pac. 1055.

Under section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, defendant was entitled as a matter of absolute right to have the action transferred to Sacramento county, if he resided therein at the time of the commencement of the action. The question whether he did so reside in Sacramento county was, however, one to be determined primarily by the court in which the action was instituted and to which the motion for the change of place of trial was addressed; and it is well settled that the finding of a trial court upon this question of fact will not be disturbed on appeal, where the evidence in respect to residence is conflicting, even though the whole evidence upon the question is contained in affidavits. Hastings v. Keller, 69 Cal. 606, 11 Pac. 218; Daniels v. Church, 96 Cal. 13, 30 Pac. 798; Ludwig v. Harry, 126 Cal. 377, 58 Pac. 858. Two of the cases just cited were decided subsequently to the case of Tuller v. Arnold, 93 Cal. 166, 28 Pac. 863, wherein, upon an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment, it was said that the rule that this court will not pass upon the evidence when conflicting does not apply where the evidence is documentary. This statement is not in accord with the other decisions of this court. The rule has been applied on appeals from orders refusing a change of place of trial, where the question of fact presented solely by affidavits was as to where the contract sued upon was made (see Lakeshore Cattle Co. v. Modoc, etc., Co., 108 Cal. 261, 41 Pac. 472; Bowers v. Modoc, etc., Co., 117 Cal. 50, 48 Pac. 979; Brown v. S. F. Sav. Union, 122 Cal. 648, 55 Pac. 598), and also in several cases on appeals from orders granting or denying motions for new trial, made by a judge who did not preside at the trial. In fact, we know of no case in which it has not been held applicable, even where the evidence was entirely documentary, except the case of Tuller v. Arnold, supra; and while there is some force in the contention that the reasons for the rule are not as strong and apparent in cases where the evidence is entirely documentary as in cases where witnesses have testified orally before the lower court, in view of the many decisions on the subject it must be taken as settled in this state that the rule is applicable in both classes of cases.

We perceive no ground upon which the appeal can be properly sustained.

The order is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by F. L. Matthews against the Town of Livermore and others. From a judgment for defendant on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Reed, Black & Reed and E. Nusbaumer, for appellant. H. A. Mason and W. H. Donahue, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered against him by the court below upon sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. The object of the plaintiff's action is to enjoin the town of Livermore, and the other defendants as its trustees, from proceeding to construct a system of sewers for said town, by the direct employment of labor and purchase of material, instead of having it done by contract let to the lowest bidder, as the plaintiff claims they should in order to comply with the law and act within their powers. It appears that the cost of the sewer system would exceed $100. Livermore is a city of the sixth class. Plaintiff was a taxpayer, and sues in that capacity. The court below was of the opinion that a city of the sixth class has power, under statutes in existence, to build sewers costing more than $100, without letting the work by contract, and gave judgment refusing the injunction.

The act of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 93, c. 49) provides for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations. Section 862 of that act, relating to powers of cities of the sixth class, as amended in 1903, declares that: "The board of trustees of such city shall have power: * * * (5) To construct, establish and maintain drains and sewers. * * * (17) To do and perform all other acts and things necessary or proper to carry out the provisions of this act." St. 1903, p. 93, c. 86, § 1. Section 874, as amended in 1897, provides that "in the erection, improvement, and repair of all public buildings and works, in all street and sewer work, * * * and in furnishing any supplies or materials for the same, when the expenditure required for the same exceeds the sum of one hundred dollars, the same shall be done by contract, and shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, after notice by publication in a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in such city or town, for at least two weeks." St. 1897, p. 89, c. 87, § 1. These sections are parts of one act relating to a particular subject, and they are to be construed together, and harmonized so far as possible. So construed, it cannot be denied that the general power to construct sewers given by section 862 is limited and modified, with regard to sewers costing more than $100, by the specific provisions of section 874, requiring public works of that magnitude to be done by contractors upon contract let to them after due advertisement and an opportunity for competing bids. Unless there is some other or later statute enlarging their powers, or modifying these provisions, the board of trustees were attempting to exceed their powers, and their action should have been enjoined as prayed for.

The respondents claim that authority for the construction of the sewer system in the mode proposed is found in the amendment of 1907 to section 9 of the City Bond Act of 1901. St. 1901, p. 30, c. 32; St. 1907, p. 611, c. 330, § 4. The material parts of the amended section are as follows: "All contracts for the construction or completion of any public work or improvement or for furnishing labor or materials therefor, as herein provided, shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder. [Then follow provisions requiring advertising for sealed bids and bonds from the contractor.] Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting the municipality itself from constructing or completing such works or improvements, and employing the necessary labor therefor." The amendment of 1907 consisted of the addition of the proviso. The theory of the respondents is that the purpose and intention of the Legislature in enacting the proviso was to enable cities constructing public works with money obtained by the sale of bonds issued under this act to do it by direct purchase of materials and direct employment of workmen, without letting contracts therefor after competitive bidding. The complaint alleged that the city had issued bonds in the sum of $35,000 for the purpose of constructing a sewer system.

We think the proviso fails to express such intent or purpose. Its language is entirely negative in effect. It does not purport to confer power, or remove restrictions formerly imposed by other laws. It merely declares how the previous restriction in that section shall be understood and construed. The municipal corporation act contained provisions, couched in general terms, giving power to cities of the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth classes to construct various public works in any way they saw fit. By section 874, above quoted, and by sections 536, 623, and 777, these cities were required to do such work by contract let to the lowest bidder, after advertisement for bids duly made, except in the case of works of small extent; in cities of the third and fourth classes where the cost did not exceed $500, in the fifth and sixth classes where it did not exceed $100. In the excepted cases they could proceed in any manner, with or without contracts or the taking of bids. The proviso to section 9 of the bond act was obviously inserted to preserve this power as to the works of small cost, a power which the opening clause of that section, by reason of its general terms, seemed to take away, and to prevent the section from being given an effect which it was plain was not within the scope or purpose of the bond act. Its main purpose was to enable cities to borrow money for the construction of public works of large cost for which the ordinary revenue would be insufficient. It is scarcely conceivable that cities of the classes mentioned would be under the necessity of borrowing money to build works costing less than $500, or $100, as the case might be. The framers of the bond act had no such insignificant enterprises in mind when it was first enacted, and the failure to except them was obviously an inadvertence. By the time the amendment of 1907 came up for consideration, doubtless the seeming inconsistency between the bond act and the municipal corporation act, in that regard, had been discovered, and the proviso was inserted to remove all doubt as to the effect of the bond act upon such small public works. This sufficiently explains the proviso, and accounts for its negative terms. It has no affirmative force as a grant of power. There is therefore no support for the respondents' position. The municipal corporation act clearly forbids the city to construct public works costing over $100, except by letting the work out to contract. The opening clause of section 9 is more prohibitive and forbids any work, small as well as large, except by contract duly let to bidders. The proviso added in 1907 may prevent this from taking away the power to build small works by day's labor, reserved by the municipal corporation act, but it has no affirmative effect to give the larger power here claimed.

It follows that the court below erred in holding that cities of the sixth class have power to build a general sewer system costing thousands of dollars without letting the same to the lowest bidder, as the law prescribes. The complaint, although not as specific as it should be in some respects, concerning which the respondent does not here criticize it, states a cause of action for an injunction, and the demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed.

8. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 341*)—ACTION FOR DEPOSIT—PLEADING, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

The variance between the complaint in an action by a purchaser for a cash deposit, stating a joint cause of action against the vendor and his agent in the making of the contract, and alleging that the money had been paid to defendants, and the proof that the purchaser had paid the money to the agent as such, and that the agent had accounted for and paid the same to the vendor, did not defeat a recovery against the vendor alone.

9. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 336*)—REJECTION OF TITLE — RECOVERY OF CASH DEPOSIT.

A purchaser in a contract for the sale of real estate, which stipulates that, if the title is not made good within 60 days after notice of a defect therein, the cash deposited by the purchaser shall be returned, does not waive any right by giving to the vendor a 60 days' notice within which to perfect the title, though under the facts it is obvious to both parties that the defect cannot be cured within that period, and, on the defect not being cured, the liability to repay the deposit becomes fixed and absolute on the expiration of the 60 days, and the mere deferring of the demand for the money does not deprive the purchaser of the right to recover the deposit.

10. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 341*)—REJECTION OF TITLE—RECOVERY OF CASH DEPOSIT—INTEREST.

Where the purchaser in a contract for the sale of real estate stipulating that, if the title was not made good within 60 days after notice of a defect therein, the cash deposited by him should be returned, gave a notice rejecting the title on the ground of defects specified and the defects were not cured within the 60 days, the purchaser could only recover interest on the deposit from the date of the subsequent demand for its return.

11. COSTS (§ 238*)—COSTS ON APPEAL—LIABILITY.

Where an objection to the allowance of interest from a designated date, instead of a subsequent date, was not specifically made prior to the filing in the Supreme Court of appellant's reply brief, and the objection did not constitute a ground on which the appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, the court, though correcting the error, will not permit appellant to recover his costs of the appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by W. G. Allen against the Globe Grain & Milling Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Modified and affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendant Globe Grain & Milling Company from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, in an action brought to recover the sum of $5,000, a deposit paid by plaintiff, as vendee, to the Globe, etc., Company, as vendor, under a written contract for the sale of certain real property in San Francisco.

The contract was entered into on April 11, 1906, and bore that date. It recited the sale by said company to plaintiff of the property, describing it, for $102,000, $5,000 cash, the receipt of which was acknowledged, and $97,000 payable on or before June 1, 1906. It then provided: "Thirty days (from the date hereof) are to be allowed for the examination of the title. If the title is not found valid, or made so, within 60 days after notice to us of the defect therein, the deposit for which this is a receipt is to be returned upon demand. If the title is found, or made valid within the time herein specified, and the sale is not closed in accordance with the above terms, the sum of $5,000.00, for which this is a receipt, is to be forfeited. * * * The owner hereby binds itself upon receipt of the purchase money, to deliver to said W. G. Allen a valid title to said property. But if the title is defective, and it cannot be perfected within the time above specified, this contract will thereupon become null and void. Due diligence, however, will be exerted by the seller in perfecting the title. Time is of the essence of this contract." Within the time specified in said contract for "the examination of the title," viz., on June 4, 1906 (each and every day from and including April 20, 1906, to and including June 3, 1906, having been a legal holiday duly and regularly declared by the governor of the state), plaintiff served upon said company and its agent, Baldwin & Howell, written notice, directed to each and which read as follows: "I hereby reject the title to the property described in the contract made and entered into between us April 11th, 1906, for the reason that there is no official record in the city and county of San Francisco, showing that you are the owner in fee of said property, or any part thereof, and nothing to show that the record title to the same is vested in you. Please have this defect cured within sixty (60) days from the date hereof, or I will demand the return of the deposit of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00), as per terms of our agreement." At that time and at all times after April 19, 1906, it was alleged and found the vendor "did not have a good, perfect or valid title to the said property or any part thereof" for the reasons stated in said notice already set forth. The evidence in support of this allegation and finding was practically the same as that given in Crim v. Umlsen (Cal.) 103 Pac. 178, showing, as stated in that case, that in the great conflagration of April 18-20, 1906, "the greater part of the records of the county recorder's office, as well as most of the other public and official records of San Francisco, were burned," with the result that it was impossible to determine from any public or official record whether or not the vendor's title was valid or perfect. Nothing was done in the way of perfecting the record title. After the expiration of the 60 days specified in said notice of rejection of title, the plaintiff demanded the return of the $5,000 deposit. Payment thereof being refused, this action was instituted. The date of such demand is not alleged, and we must assume that it was not made prior to the day on which the complaint was verified and the action instituted, December 13, 1906.

Learned counsel for appellant concede that it is established by the decision in Crim v. Umben, supra, decided after the taking of this appeal, and after the filing of appellant's opening brief, and as to which a petition for rehearing was denied, that where a contract of sale relating to real property in the city and county of San Francisco made prior to the fire of April 18-20, 1906, the time fixed for the performance of which had not arrived at the time of said fire, was such as to entitle the vendee to a title "fairly deducible of record," the vendee could not be required to take such property in view of such destruction of official records; the theory of the decision being that the title was rendered defective within the meaning of the contract by such destruction of records, and that in determining the vendee's rights we can only consider the title as it existed at the time fixed for the performance of the contract and the delivery of the conveyance. It was further decided in that case that such a vendee was entitled to recover from the vendor the portion of the consideration paid at the time of the execution of the contract, the agreement in that case providing, as does the agreement here, for a return of such consideration if the title was found to be defective. Upon his cross-complaint filed in the action brought against him by the vendor for damages for breach of contract, the vendee in that case was given judgment for the recovery of the portion of the consideration paid by him.

It is urged that the contract in the case at bar did not call for a title "fairly deducible of record." This fact was conceded by counsel for the vendors in Crim v. Umben as to the contract there involved, such contract providing that the vendee should have 30 days for examination of the title, that the vendors should have 30 days to "perfect" the title if it was found to be defective, and that, if the title proved to be incurably "defective," the deposit was to be returned. We have no doubt that counsel in that case were amply warranted in making this concession in view of the decisions of this court. It is settled law in this state that, where the provisions of a contract for the sale of real estate are such as to call for a "perfect title," the purchaser is entitled to a title free from reasonable doubt and fairly deducible of record. See Gwin v. Calegaris, 139 Cal. 384, 73 Pac. 851, and cases there cited; Peckham v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 147, 31 Pac. 923. See, also, Title, etc., Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 305, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199. The provisions in the contract in the case at bar were, as we have seen, for a "valid title," for a title that was not "defective," for a "perfected" title in the event that on examination the title was found to be defective. It was expressly provided "that, if the title is defective and it cannot be perfected within the time above specified, this contract will thereupon become null and void." These provisions practically called for a "perfect title" to the same extent as if the precise words "perfect title" had been used. When these provisions are read in connection with the provision for "examination of the title," which clearly referred to an examination of the public records, we cannot doubt that the parties were stipulating for "a good title by the record." See Gwin v. Calegaris, supra.

The notice of rejection of title served on appellant did substantially show that the objection was that appellant did not have a title fairly deducible of record. The reason as specified in the notice was "that there is no official record in the city and county of San Francisco showing that you are the owner in fee of said property or any part thereof, and nothing to show that the record title to the same is vested in you." This was a sufficient specification of the particular objection under the peculiar circumstances of this case. There could not have been uncertainty in the mind of appellant as to the meaning of the objection specified, and the precise nature of the defect on account of which the title was rejected.

No other claim not disposed of by the decision in Crim v. Umben, supra, was made in the opening brief of appellant, except the claim that it was either prejudicial error to overrule demurrers interposed to the complaint on the ground of misjoinder of parties defendant or that the judgment rendered against appellant alone and in favor of its codefendant, Baldwin & Howell, constitutes a fatal variance between the pleadings and judgment, in that, if any cause of action was stated against both defendants, it was a joint cause of action, and that a judgment could not be given against one only of two or more persons against whom a joint cause of action is alleged. Defendant Baldwin & Howell, a corporation, was the agent of the appellant in the matter of making this contract, and it was alleged in the complaint that the $5,000 was paid to the "defendants." The trial court, finding that the $5,000 was paid by plaintiff to and received by Baldwin & Howell solely as the agent for the appellant, concluded that plaintiff was not entitled to any judgment against said Baldwin & Howell, and gave judgment accordingly and in favor of Baldwin & Howell for its costs. Appellant's contention for a reversal because of the rulings of the court in this regard is wholly without merit. We shall not discuss the question whether or not there was any misjoinder in making Baldwin & Howell a party defendant. That defendant prevailed in the action and is not appealing. Appellant was undoubtedly solely liable to plaintiff upon the facts found, the money having been paid to and received by Baldwin & Howell solely as the agent of the appellant, and having been accounted for and paid to appellant by it. If we assume that Baldwin & Howell was improperly joined as a party defendant, it is nevertheless impossible to conceive of any reason why appellant could have been prejudiced in the slightest degree by such misjoinder. Under such circumstances, the judgment should not be reversed even if Baldwin & Howell should not have been joined as a defendant. "It seems to be thoroughly settled that a judgment after trial upon the merits will not be reversed because the court improperly overruled a demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of parties, where it is plain that such misjoinder did not affect any substantial right of a party." See Woollacott v. Meekin, 151 Cal. 701, 706, 91 Pac. 612, and cases there cited. It is settled in this state that judgment may be given against such of several defendants jointly charged as are shown to be liable and in favor of the others who are not shown to be liable, subject perhaps to the qualification that the defendants held liable are entitled to be protected against any material variance between the pleadings and the proof. There was no such material variance here. See Redwood City Salt Co. v. Whitney et al., 153 Cal. 421, 423, 95 Pac. 885, and cases there cited; Dobbs v. Purington, 136 Cal. 70, 68 Pac. 323.

As to certain other claims made for the first time in appellant's reply brief: By the express terms of the contract appellant was required to return to plaintiff the $5,000 deposit on demand therefor, if the title was not found valid or was defective, and was not made valid or perfected within sixty days after notice to appellant of the defect, provided, it may be conceded for the purposes of this decision, that plaintiff gave seasonable notice of the defect and rejection on account thereof. In view of the facts found, the notice of June 4, 1906, was seasonably given. This notice was an unqualified and absolute rejection of the title as it then stood, and a notification that plaintiff would insist upon a return of the $5,000 if appellant could not or did not perfect the title within 60 days, the time allowed the appellant by the contract within which to obviate any defect found. If, as claimed by learned counsel, it was obvious to both plaintiff and appellant that the defect was such that it could not be obviated within the stipulated time or within any reasonable time thereafter, appellant would have been entirely warranted in accepting this notice as an absolute rejection, and treating the contract of sale as being no longer effectual. Although it may be that under such circumstances it was not necessary for plaintiff to give appellant 60 days within which to perfect the title, plaintiff cannot be criticised or held to have waived any right for thus conforming to the express provisions of the contract. At the end of the 60 days, the defect not having been obviated, it is clear that, in view of the notice of June 4, 1906, the contract of sale was at an end. The liability of appellant to pay the $5,000 was then fixed and absolute, and the money was payable whenever demanded by plaintiff. The mere deferring of this demand for the money could not operate to deprive plaintiff of the right to recover it, provided the demand was made within such time as would prevent the application of the statute of limitations as a bar. As we have seen, such demand was made prior to the commencement of this action, and must here be assumed to have been made on December 13, 1906, the day on which the action was commenced.

It is further claimed for the first time in appellant's reply brief that the judgment should be modified by deducting a portion of the interest allowed. The trial court allowed interest at the legal rate from April 11, 1906, the day on which the contract was executed and the payment of $5,000 was made. It is obvious that in this respect the judgment is erroneous and unfair to appellant. The money was rightfully received and held by appellant under the terms of the contract until its return was demanded. Such demand was not made until December 13, 1906. Interest should have been allowed only from that date, instead of from April 11, 1906. Under these views, the judgment is excessive by $235. This objection not having been specifically made prior to the filing in this court of appellant's reply brief, and in no degree constituting a ground upon which the appeal was taken to this court, we are satisfied that our ruling thereon should not affect the question of payment of costs of appeal.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is modified by deducting from the amount of $5,527.91 awarded plaintiff against appellant, the amount of $235, so that the same shall stand for the amount of $5,292.91 (instead of $5,527.91), with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from October 14, 1907, the date thereof, together with plaintiff's costs amounting to $23, and, as so modified, said judgment is affirmed. Appellant shall not recover any costs of this appeal.

FANNING v. GREEN. (S. F. 5,077.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1909.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 262*)—CONVEYANCES—GIFTS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1961, providing that a presumption may be controverted, and

Civ. Code, § 164, providing that, where property is conveyed to a married woman and her husband, the presumption is that she takes the part conveyed to her as tenant in common, etc., a gift to a wife of property purchased with community funds and conveyed to her and her husband pursuant to the directions of the husband will be presumed where a gift is essential to the theory that the property is the separate property of the wife, but the presumption is only prima facie except as to purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and, where the controversy is between the husband and the legal representative of the wife, the presumption may be controverted.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—QUESTIONS OF FACT—REVIEW.

Whether the presumption of a gift to a wife by virtue of Civ. Code, § 164, providing that, where a conveyance is to a married woman and her husband, the presumption is that she takes the part conveyed to her as tenant in common, is controverted by other evidence in a controversy between the husband and the legal representative of the wife, is a question of fact for the trial court.

3. GIFTS (§ 15*)—INTENTION OF DONOR.

There can be no executed gift, in the absence of any intention to give.

4. GIFTS (§ 41*)—REVOCATION.

When the circumstances of a transaction compel the conclusion that a gift was intended by the donor, any subsequent statements of the donor to the contrary are ineffectual.

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 266*)—COMMUNITY—GIFTS—EVIDENCE.

The fact that the husband in the purchase of real estate with community funds directed that the deed should be made to himself and wife as grantees did not compel the conclusion that a gift was intended by him to the wife, but the circumstances might show another reason for the conveyance than an intent to make a gift, and authorize a conclusion that no gift was intended, so that there was no executed gift.

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 254*)—ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE.

Where a husband purchased property with community funds, and directed that the conveyance should be made to his wife with intent to make it her separate property, the conveyance vested the property in her as her separate estate, but the intent to make it her separate property was essential.

7. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 49½*)—ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—GIFT.

A husband purchased real estate with community funds in a savings bank in his and his wife's name, and, pursuant to a suggestion made by his son, he directed that the property should be conveyed to himself and wife. Nothing was said indicating any idea of making any gift or changing the status of any property. The wife knew nothing of the fact that she was named as grantee until subsequently. During the 12 years that elapsed from the conveyance to the wife's death the whole property was treated by the parties as community property. The husband testified that he never intended to make a gift of the property or any interest therein to the wife. Held to justify a conclusion that no gift to the wife was intended, and that no gift was in fact made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 249-253; Dec. Dig. § 49½.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where different inferences may reasonably be drawn from the evidence, the conclusion of the trial court is binding on the appellate court.

9. EVIDENCE (§ 151*)—RELEVANCY—INTENT.

A witness may be examined as to the intent with which he did a certain act, where the intent is material, though the jury or trial judge need not believe the witness; and hence a husband purchasing property with community funds and taking the conveyance in the name of himself and wife may in a controversy between himself and the legal representative of the wife testify that he never intended to make a gift of the property or any interest therein to the wife; his intent being a material factor in determining the question of an executed gift.

10. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—CONCLUSION OF WITNESS.

The testimony of a husband that he had not given property to his wife is objectionable as being his conclusion.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where competent evidence showed that a husband never intended to make a gift to his wife, the error in permitting him to testify that he had never given property to her was harmless.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by John Fanning against Sinon Green, as administrator of Margaret Fanning, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Sanderson, for appellant. Tobin & Tobin and George A. Clough, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial in an action to quiet title. The plaintiff and defendant's intestate, Margaret Fanning, were husband and wife. They had been married many years when they purchased the lot of land in San Francisco, an undivided one-half of which is in controversy here. They had accumulated some property, the proceeds of the savings from the salary of plaintiff as a police officer, and the profits of a grocery store maintained by him which Margaret attended to in his absence. A part of this property was the lot on which was situate their home and grocery store. The remainder was money deposited with the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society in account with "John Fanning or Margaret Fanning." All this was admittedly community property. The lot, a portion of which is in controversy, was purchased from a Mrs. Redington on August 11, 1892, for $6,000, $3,000 of which was paid in cash. A note and mortgage were given by plaintiff and Margaret for the unpaid balance. The 3,000 paid in cash was taken from the moneys on deposit with the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society. Plaintiff and Margaret were named as the grantees in the deed from Mrs. Redington. This was done by the direction of plaintiff. He testified that he gave this instruction at the suggestion of his son, who had asked him: "Father, why don't you put this property in your name and mother's together? You know the other lot is in your name alone." He further testified: "Margaret knew nothing about her name being in the deed until she read it in the newspaper, when she was greatly pleased." Plaintiff always had entire control and management of the property. He collected all the rents therefrom, using the same as a part of his general funds for the support of the family so far as necessary, and depositing the surplus to the credit of the account already referred to. Margaret died in the year 1904, at which time there was a balance in said account of $2,600. Plaintiff testified: "I never intended to make a gift of the property or any interest therein to my wife." Upon this evidence the trial court found that plaintiff never intended to make and never did make a gift to Margaret of any interest in said property, and that the whole thereof constituted community property of the husband and wife from the time of its purchase to the time of Margaret's death. Judgment was given, therefore, in favor of plaintiff, decreeing him to be the owner of all of said property.

If there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court in regard to the question of gift, the conclusion of the trial court as to the ownership of this property is undoubtedly correct. Admittedly the lot was purchased wholly with community funds, and all of it was community property unless an interest therein was given by the husband to the wife. If it was such community property at the time of Margaret's death, it all then belonged to the husband, without administration. Civ. Code, § 1401. We do not see that we would be warranted in holding that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court on this material question. The property having been acquired since the amendment of March 19, 1889, to section 164 of the Civil Code, it is true that the presumption arising from the fact that plaintiff and Margaret were both named as the grantees in the deed was that Margaret took an undivided half thereof as her separate property. The amendment provided: "But whenever any property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, the presumption is that the title is thereby vested in her as her separate property. And in case the conveyance be to such married woman and her husband * * * the presumption is that the married woman takes the part conveyed to her as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument, and the presumption in this section mentioned is conclusive in favor of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration." It being admitted that the property was purchased with community funds, it was necessary, in order to make any portion of it her separate property, that it should have been given to her by her husband. Such a gift will be presumed under this statutory provision where a gift is essential to the theory that the property is the separate property of the wife. See Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 Pac. 657. But the presumption so created is only a prima facie one, except in so far as purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith and for a valuable consideration are concerned. This is manifest from a reading of the statute. See, also, section 1961, Code Civ. Proc. Where the controversy is between the husband and the legal representative of the wife, the presumption "may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect," and it is only where it is not so controverted that the court or jury is bound to find according to the presumption. Section 1961, Code Civ. Proc. Whether or not it is so controverted is a question of fact for the trial court, and the conclusion of that tribunal is conclusive upon an appellate court unless it be manifestly without sufficient support in the evidence.

It is clear that there can be no executed gift in the absence of any intention to give on the part of the donor. It is true that the facts and circumstances of a transaction may be such as to practically compel the conclusion that a gift was intended, and to render worthless any subsequent statement to the contrary on the part of the donor. But no such effect, we are satisfied, must necessarily be given to the mere fact that, in the case of the purchase of real property with community funds, the husband has directed that the deed shall run to the wife as grantee. There is nothing in the nature of such a fact that renders it consistent only with the theory of gift, and other facts and circumstances may so tend to show another reason than the desire and intent to make a gift as to furnish ample warrant for a conclusion that no gift was intended, and therefore that there has been no "executed gift." The case of Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 603, 65 Pac. 321, 66 Pac. 860, strongly relied on by defendant, cannot reasonably be construed as holding contrary to this. That case was decided upon its own particular facts, which were, according to the opinion, that the deed made by the vendor to the wife by direction of the husband showed on its face that the consideration for the purchase was the conveyance of another lot, and that this lot so given in exchange was the separate property of the husband. According to the opinion, these were the only facts shown material to the question of gift, and it was substantially held that standing alone and admitted they showed a gift from the husband to the wife. We may freely concede for all the purposes of this case that where there is nothing shown but the direction of a husband that a deed from the vendor shall be made to the wife, even where the purchase is made with community funds, a prima facie presumption exists, regardless of the amendment to section 164, Civ. Code, that a gift to the wife was intended, and we do not construe anything in the opinion of Hamilton v. Hubbard, supra, as going further than this. If it did, it would be opposed to the general current of authority in this state. The well-settled rule is, as stated in Nilson v. Sarment, 153 Cal. 524, 530, 96 Pac. 315, 317, 126 Am. St. Rep. 91, "where a husband purchases property with community funds, and directs the conveyance to be made to his wife, with the intent to make it her separate property, the deed will operate to vest the property in her as her separate estate." The "intent" to make it hers, her separate property, is a material factor in such a case, and while such intent may, and possibly must, be inferred where there is no other evidence than that showing the mere direction by the husband, it may also be shown not to have existed by any competent evidence.

In the case at bar there is, in our opinion, other evidence that fairly and reasonably warrants an inference on the part of the trial court to the effect that no gift was intended. The indirect evidence by which the presumption of separate property may be controverted may consist in part of inferences (Code Civ. Proc. § 1957), deductions "which the reason of the jury" (or trial judge) "makes from the facts proved" (section 1958, Code Civ. Proc.). The sole reason for the giving of the direction and the joining of his wife as one of the grantees was the suggestion to plaintiff by his son that he should put the community property to be acquired in the husband and wife's name "together." Nothing was said by anybody indicating any idea of making any gift or changing the status of any property. The community funds from which the purchase was to be made were on deposit in a bank account to the credit of both husband and wife, and it is not unreasonable to infer that the plaintiff attached no greater significance to the placing of the real property to be acquired in the name of both himself and wife than he did to the deposit of community funds to the credit of such an account. There was apparently no express understanding with his wife that she was to acquire or did acquire any interest in the property, other than such interest as a wife has in the community property. She knew nothing of the fact that she was named as a grantee until she read it in the newspaper. During the 12 years that elapsed from the conveyance to her death, the whole property was treated by the parties as community property. The plaintiff had the sole management and control thereof, collected all the rents, and used the same as community property, and deposited all savings therefrom to the credit of the bank account already referred to. Plaintiff testified positively that he never intended to make a gift of the property or any interest therein to his wife. All this afforded sufficient legal basis, in our judgment, notwithstanding the presumption created by the fact that the wife was named as one of the grantees, for a conclusion on the part of the trial court that no gift was intended and that no gift was in fact made. We do not mean to say that a different conclusion on the part of the trial court would have been without sufficient support in the evidence, but simply that the conclusion arrived at is not without such support. Where different inferences may reasonably and properly be drawn from facts legally proved, the conclusion of the trial court thereon is binding on an appellate tribunal, and the question of the weight to be given to the testimony of the plaintiff as to his actual intent was under the circumstances appearing here exclusively for the trial court.

There is nothing in the claim that the evidence of the plaintiff to the effect that he never intended to make a gift of the property or any interest therein to his wife was incompetent. It is well settled that, under our system, a witness may be examined as to the intent with which he did a certain act where that intent is a material thing in the action. A jury or trial judge is not bound, of course, to believe the witness when he says he did not have a certain intent, and may find in the circumstances, actions, and language, an entirely different intent, but the testimony of the witness "is competent and relevant and not immaterial." See Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 125, 94 Pac. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61; Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 93 Cal. 497, 499, 29 Pac. 50; Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 114, 57 Pac. 791; Bertelsen v. Bertelsen, 7 Cal. App. 258, 261, 94 Pac. 80. It is said by learned counsel for defendant that the admission of such evidence is in effect permitting a party to impair "an executed gift" by his own declaration "made after its consummation." Manifestly this is not so. The question to be determined was whether there was any "executed gift," and, the intent of the alleged donor being a material factor in the determination of that question, his own evidence as to his intent was admissible under the rule already stated. This must be so unless a parol showing that the name of the wife was inserted in such a deed from a stranger by the husband's direction conclusively establishes such intent, which we think we have shown is not the rule.

The objection to the last question asked plaintiff as follows: "Did you give the property or any portion thereof to your wife?"—should have been sustained. It called simply for the conclusion and opinion of the witness as to the effect of the facts already testified to by him. The witness answered that he never did. But we are satisfied that the error must be held harmless in view of his other competent testimony that he never intended to make a gift. The objectionable evidence practically added nothing additional, and could not have affected the result.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Charles Kimic against the San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban Railway Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Oneal & Richardson, for appellant. L. B. Archer, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban Railway Company (hereinafter designated as the Interurban Company) is a corporation operating a street railroad over certain streets of the city of San Jose. Its route is, in part, over San Carlos street. At the intersection of San Carlos and Tenth streets its line is crossed by that of the San Jose and Santa Clara County Railway Company (hereinafter designated as the Santa Clara Company), operating a line of street railway along Tenth street. Plaintiff was a passenger on a car of the Interurban Company. This car was proceeding westerly along San Carlos street, and as it crossed Tenth street, it was struck by a car of the Santa Clara Company, running southerly along Tenth street. The force of the impact hurled plaintiff from the car on which he was riding, and he suffered injuries for which he sought, by this action, to recover damages from both corporations. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against both defendants for $7,000. Motions for new trial were denied upon plaintiff's complying with an order of the court requiring him to remit $600 of the amount of the judgment as a condition of the denial of said motions. The defendants present separate appeals, upon different records, from the judgments and orders made against them, respectively. The appeals here to be considered are those of the San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban Railway Company from the judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

That the evidence was ample to warrant the jury in finding plaintiff's injuries to have been the result of negligence on the part of the Interurban Company is not questioned. Nor does this appellant challenge the correctness of the instructions under which the issues were submitted to the jury.

The complaint averred that: "By reason of said injury plaintiff has been compelled to employ doctors, a nurse, and additional assistance in his home, and to purchase medicine; and the said plaintiff has been compelled to pay therefor the sum of about $1,000." This allegation was denied by the answer. Plaintiff took the stand as a witness in his own behalf, and was asked, "Mr. Kimic, what expenses were you put to for medical attendance, medicines, etc., in consequence of this injury?" The appellant objected to the question on the ground "that it is too indefinite. He might be asked as to what money he actually expended or paid out." The objection was overruled. It is now contended that this ruling was erroneous; the argument being that it contravened the rule that under an allegation of payment alone with no averment that liabilities were incurred, although not paid, evidence of the mere incurring of liability is not admissible.

Donnelly v. Hufschmidt, 79 Cal. 74, 79, 21 Pac. 546; McLaughlin v. S. F. & S. M. R. Co., 113 Cal. 590, 45 Pac. 839. But the question did not call for a statement of anything but actual expenditure. The witness was asked to state the "expenses" to which he had been put. "Expense" is defined as "the laying out or expending of money or other resources" (Standard Dict. See, also, 12 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. [2d. Ed.] 394; Cent. Dict.); to "expend" is "to pay out or lay out." (Stand. Dict.) A statement of the expenses to which one has been put is therefore a statement of actual payments made. The question just referred to was answered by plaintiff as follows: "Oh, I suppose somewhere in the neighborhood of $500 or $600." The appellant moved to strike out the answer as not responsive, "and on the further ground that it is too indefinite to afford any evidence of moneys expended." The motion was denied, and an exception noted. The first ground of the motion—I, e., that the answer was not responsive—is plainly without merit. As to the other ground, we may assume that this answer, if standing alone, would not have been sufficiently definite and certain to serve as the foundation of a finding that plaintiff had expended any specific sum. Galveston, etc., Co. v. White (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 186; Town of Salida v. McKinna, 16 Colo. 523, 27 Pac. 810. The fact that evidence fails in itself to amount to proof of what was intended by the offering party is generally regarded as no ground for striking it out. Metz v. Willitts, 14 Wyo. 511, 85 Pac. 380; State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 195; Walker v. Lee, 51 Fla. 260, 40 South. 881; Maloy v. State, 52 Fla. 101, 41 South. 791. A party is often unable to completely develop a fact material to his case by a single question and answer. If one part of the testimony is not sufficient in itself, its defects may be supplied by further examination.

But whatever view may be taken of the propriety of the ruling it is clear from the record that it resulted in no prejudice to appellant. After giving this answer, the plaintiff went on to testify that: "This $500 or $600 includes doctor, nursing, medicine, and increased expenses of my household. I cannot give a more definite statement of the amount. I paid the nurse $35 a week for four weeks. I have paid the physicians over $100, and I have not paid the physicians all yet." These subsequent statements furnished a basis for a finding that some part, at least, of the $500 or $600 had actually been expended by plaintiff. The jury were instructed that: "Plaintiff cannot recover for the expenses of care and nursing and doctors' bills in this case which he has not paid; that any damages allowed him on these accounts must be for money actually paid out." There were further instructions to the effect that plaintiff could recover "only such actual damages as the evidence shows to a reasonable certainty he has sustained, and that: "The elements of damages consisting of expenses of care and nursing and doctors' bills * * * are subjects of direct proof, and are to be determined by the jury upon the evidence they have before them. These elements of damages cannot be inferred, but must be proved by direct evidence." If the jury accepted and followed these instructions, as we are bound to assume they did, no consideration could have been given by them to any item of alleged expense not shown by direct proof, to a reasonable certainty, to have been actually paid.

The only remaining point made by appellant is that the damages are excessive. The amount allowed to plaintiff, after deducting the $600 remitted, is $6,400. What will be a proper and reasonable compensation for the damages occasioned by injuries to the person is a question committed to the sound discretion of the jury. "Their verdict * * * will never be disturbed unless the amount of the damages is obviously so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool and dispassionate consideration of the jury." Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 513; Morgan v. S. P. Co., 95 Cal. 501, 30 Pac. 601; Lee v. S. P. Co., 101 Cal. 118, 35 Pac. 572; Howland v. Oakland C. S. R. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983; Clare v. Sac. Elec., etc., Co., 122 Cal. 504, 55 Pac. 328. In considering an attack upon a verdict as excessive, the appellate court must treat every conflict in the evidence as resolved in favor of the respondent, and must give to him the benefit of every inference that can reasonably be drawn in support of his claim.

In this case, it appeared that the plaintiff was, at the time of the accident, over the age of 60 years. He was in the business of selling wall paper. He testified that the collision hurled him from the car upon which he had been riding. He picked himself up from the gutter, where he had fallen, got on his hands and knees, and fell again. There was a terrible pain in his back, "as though a knife was being stuck into it." His hands were lacerated and cut by broken glass. With the aid of two passers-by he walked to his home, a distance of six blocks, and was at once put to bed. A swelling on the left side, over the kidneys, appeared. It was six or seven inches across in one direction, eight or nine inches in the other, and four or five inches deep. After some days, about a quart of black blood was drawn from this by his physicians. He remained in bed four weeks, and during this time was attended by a nurse. The trial took place about six months after the accident. The plaintiff testified that up to the time of the trial, he had not been able to sleep well. He woke up at least every hour. The swelling had not entirely disappeared. "The muscles of my back are still in a painful and weakened condition, and there is a drawing sensation. I can walk with the assistance of a cane; my back pains me and I am tired and fatigued. I feel a pain over my kidney, and am annoyed in my urinating. * * * I am too nervous now to take much interest in my business. I cannot attend to my business. Since the accident I have not been able to carry large bundles of paper up and down a ladder." The gross profits of his business before his injury had been $10 to $12 per day. He had not been able to earn that amount since. Of the physicians called by plaintiff as witnesses, one testified that a shock to the nervous system, producing neurasthenia, might result from an injury similar to the one suffered by plaintiff. He was unable to state whether any permanent effect had been produced in this case. Another expressed the opinion that the injuries would probably be permanent. A third that in his opinion Kimic was, at the time, suffering from neurasthenia, which the witness declared to be a progressive disease, and one that could be caused by the shock of a railway injury. In old age the probabilities, the witness stated, were "rather against a recovery."

In the face of this testimony it cannot be successfully urged that the jury were not warranted in finding that there was a "reasonable certainty" (Cordiner v. L. A. Trac. Co., 5 Cal. App. 400, 91 Pac. 436; Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 113, 117, 91 Pac. 522), that plaintiff's injuries had permanently affected his nervous system to such an extent as to seriously interfere with his comfort and happiness, as well as to restrict or destroy his ability to conduct his business. If this be so, the question of excessive damages is answered. Indeed, appellant virtually concedes that, if injuries of a permanent nature were shown, the amount awarded was not so large as to exceed the limits of the discretion confided to the jury. But the contention that the injuries were not permanent can be sustained only if we read the testimony in the light of inferences less favorable to plaintiff than it can reasonably bear, or if we regard his testimony and that of the physicians above referred to as overcome by the very considerable volume of contrary testimony. By following either course, this court would be invading the province of the jury.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Petition by D. A. Learned, executor of the estate of Gennis H. Learned, deceased, for settlement of his final account and distribution to him of the entire personal property. The petition was opposed by Clara D. Learned Garden and others. From a decree of distribution in accordance with the petition, and from an order denying a new trial, opponents appeal. Affirmed.

Budd & Thompson (E. I. Jones, of counsel), for appellants. J. M. Kile and J. A. Plummer, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal prosecuted by the opponents to D. A. Learned's petition for settlement of his final account as executor of the estate of Gennis H. Learned, deceased, and for the distribution to him of the entire personal property of said estate. There was a judgment and decree of distribution in accordance with the prayer of D. A. Learned's petition, and the appeal is taken therefrom, as well as from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

Gennis H. Learned died testate in 1903, and D. A. Learned was appointed executor of her last will. After due administration the said D. A. Learned took distribution of the entire property of the estate of Gennis H. Learned which had then come into his possession. He was finally discharged, and the estate was fully settled and closed, May 31, 1904. In June, 1908, D. A. Learned petitioned for the reissuance of letters testamentary in the estate of Gennis H. Learned, deceased, alleging that said Gennis H. Learned was at the time of her death an heir of her sister, Deborah H. Lee, who died intestate in March, 1903, and whose estate at the date of D. A. Learned's second petition for letters testamentary was in process of administration in the superior court of this state in and for the county of San Joaquin. The appellants here are not seeking to set aside the decree of distribution in the estate of Gennis H. Learned, made in 1904; but they contend that the interest of Gennis H. Learned's estate in the estate of Deborah H. Lee (which relates to personal property) should not be distributed under the terms of Gennis H. Learned's will, but should be treated as if she had died intestate. This contention is based upon the theory that, by failing to comply with the terms of the mutual will executed by Gennis H. Learned and D. A. Learned, the latter had forfeited his right to take under that will.

By the terms of said will everything owned by D. A. Learned and Gennis H. Learned was declared to be community property, and all personal property was bequeathed to the survivor, who was named as executor or executrix, as the case might be. All realty was devised to the survivor, with remainder in fee to four of their children in severalty; the exact portion of each child being described in the will. By the decree of May 31, 1904, D. A. Learned took distribution of an undivided one-half interest in the real property, to which, by the terms of the will, he was given a life estate, with remainder in fee to his four children. The theory of appellants is that the probate court could not have taken jurisdiction of the property thus distributed, unless either (1) an undivided one-half interest in the realty had become Mrs. Learned's separate property before her death; or (2) the effect of the mutual will was such as to confer jurisdiction upon the court to distribute the devised community land (citing Estate of Rowland, 74 Cal. 523, 16 Pac. 315, 5 Am. St. Rep. 464).

It does not appear upon what theory the probate court made the decree of 1904. The declaration in the will that all the property was community property was not binding upon the court; but that question was by that court to be determined in accordance with the mode whereby the property was acquired. Estate of Granniss, 142 Cal. 4, 75 Pac. 324. There was separate property in the estate of Gennis H. Learned, and of this the probate court undoubtedly had jurisdiction. Having acquired jurisdiction of the estate, the court had the right to make final distribution, and any erroneous judgment might have been corrected on appeal. But, the judgment construing the will and making the first distribution having become final, we cannot now consider an impeachment of the decree by the will itself. Section 1903, Code Civ. Proc. Nor are appellants contending for such impeachment. If the appellants here had felt that the first decree was not in accordance with the terms of the will, they, as interested parties, could have prosecuted an appeal and could have sought its correction. Having failed to do so, they are now bound by the decree. Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 558, 51 Pac. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 145. We cannot say, further, that respondent, by accepting the results of the first decree rendered by the probate court, put himself entirely outside the benefits of the will with reference to personal property clearly bequeathed to him. If the appellants had equities in the land, they could assert them by proper proceedings; but here they are seeking to obtain a part of the separate personal estate of Mrs. Learned, which, by the unequivocal terms of the will, is bequeathed to D. A. Learned. This is fully illustrated by the following provision of the will: "We hereby give, devise and bequeath, each to the other, as the survivor may be, all and singular all the personal estate, wheresoever the same may be found or situated, belonging to either of us, and also a life estate in and to all and singular the real property of which either of us may die seized or possessed." The above provision applies with no ambiguity to the separate property of Gennis H. Learned. Whatever may have been the court's interpretation of the will at the time of the first distribution thereunder, there can be no doubt that this clause was properly construed when the second decree was made. Indeed, appellants do not say that under the terms of the will D. A. Learned was not entitled to all of the interest derived from the estate of Deborah H. Lee; but they are seeking to prevent him from taking personalty bequeathed to him, because he accepted a decree with reference to the realty inconsistent with the will, and, as they allege, dealt with said realty in a manner not warranted by the testamentary provisions.

It will be seen, however, that, although the will executed by the Learneds is mutual in form, it is in effect the separate will of each of them. There is nothing to indicate that it was the result of such mutual agreement, or based upon such consideration as would deprive the survivor of his right of revocation. See section 1279, Civ. Code. The survivor, if, through an erroneous interpretation by the court, he took distribution of an interest different from that intended by the testatrix, would not, after such disposition of the property had become fixed by lapse of time and lack of appeal, be bound to retain such dominion over the property as would permit of its distribution upon his death according to the identical will executed by himself and wife. But, even if there were such compulsion upon him, it would have been asserted with reference to the real property and not as against the personalty. The only interest which Mrs. Learned attempted to devise to these appellants was a remainder in real property. If they attempted to secure that interest, and without fraud on the part of Mr. Learned (and none is alleged) he secured such rights adverse to them as they neglected to question at the proper time, they cannot atone for their neglect, and repair the result of their laches, by obtaining an interest in property of a different character from that left to them by the terms of the will.

All of the rulings of the trial court which were adverse to the appellants were evidently based upon the theory that the decree of 1904 was conclusive as against appellants. We think the court was correct in this idea of the law. Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 86 Pac. 183, 90 Pac. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105; Code Civ. Proc. § 1333. In their opposition appellants do not allege that they have lost any of their rights. There is no specification of fraud. They simply seek to show that respondent has so acted with reference to a part of his property that he cannot conscientiously accept that which is clearly bequeathed to him. We do not see how, upon reason or authority, such a contention may be upheld.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by William B. Pringle against William Wilson. From a judgment for defendant, on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pringle & Pringle and W. S. Andrews (Henry E. Monroe, of counsel), for appellant. Jacob Samuels and Oscar Samuels, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered against him upon an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to his complaint. The facts, as averred by plaintiff, were these:

On March 23, 1905, the defendant was the owner of a lot in the city of San Francisco located on the southerly line of Post street and running through to the northerly line of Union Square avenue. The lot was covered by two separate brick buildings, one of which faced on Post street and the other on Union Square avenue. On the day named said defendant, Wilson, by a written lease, demised and let the said premises to plaintiff for the term of six years and four months, commencing on the 1st day of May, 1905, to and including the 31st day of August, 1911, for a total rental of $76,000, payable monthly in advance in installments of $1,000 each on the 1st day of each month during said term. The agreement between the parties contemplated the making of certain alterations and improvements upon the premises, and for this purpose the lessee was by the lease granted permission to take possession on the 1st day of April, 1905. The lease contains a great many provisions which are not necessary to be set forth here. The main controversy between the parties arises over the construction of clauses thirteenth and fourteenth, which read as follows:

"Thirteenth. That in the event of the partial destruction of the premises hereby demised by fire, earthquake, or any other cause, beyond the control of the party of the first part, this lease shall not be thereby invalidated or voided, but the lessor shall proceed to at once make the necessary repairs to said premises and to complete the same within a reasonable time, and that during the time of said repairs said lessee shall pay a proportional rental for such portion only of the premises as he may use and enjoy; but if said premises be totally destroyed, then and in such event this lease shall terminate, and the parties hereto shall be freed from all liability hereunder.

"Fourteenth. That, as a condition precedent to the taking effect of this lease and the vesting of the leasehold interest hereby created, said party of the second part (lessee) agrees, upon the delivery of the possession of said demised premises as herein provided, to forthwith proceed to make improvements upon and alterations to the said demised premises, in accordance with plans and specifications therefor to be prepared by the said party of the second part, or his architect, and to be acceptable to and approved by the said party of the first part (lessor), or his architect, and thereafter, with due diligence, to prosecute to a completion the improvements and alterations thus mutually agreed upon; and the said party of the first part agrees that at the expiration of the original term hereby created, viz., the term expiring on the 31st day of August, 1911, he will repay unto the said party of the second part the actual cost of said alterations to and improvements upon the demised premises by said party of the second part made, all as aforesaid, provided that if the amount thereof exceed the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars, said party of the first part will pay unto the said party of the second part the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars, and no more; and the said party of the second part agrees at the expiration of said term aforesaid, and at the time of said repayment, to produce original vouchers for any and all moneys by him expended as aforesaid, and reimbursement of which is by him sought from the said party of the first part; provided, however, that if said party of the second part shall elect to exercise his option for a renewal of this lease for a further period of five (5) years as in the next specific agreement provided, then and in such event no liability shall rest upon the said party of the first part to reimburse said party of the second part for any part of the money by said party of the second part expended for such improvements or alterations."

It may be well to refer also to clause 15, which provides that the term may be extended for a further period of five years from and after the 1st day of September, 1911, if the lessee shall so desire, "said election of the party of the second part (lessee) to be announced by written notice of the exercise thereof to be given by the said party of the second part at least four months prior to the expiration of the original term herein created." The rental payable during the additional period of five years is fixed at the rate of $1,250 a month.

The complaint alleges that pursuant to the terms of the lease the plaintiff proceeded diligently to make the contemplated alterations and improvements, all with the approval of the defendant, and in so doing he expended more than the sum of $5,000. On the 1st day of May, 1905, he entered into possession of the property and remained in possession thereof until the 18th day of April, 1906, upon which date there occurred a severe earthquake, followed by a conflagration which totally destroyed the buildings upon the property so leased. It is further alleged that the plaintiff has produced and exhibited to the defendant original vouchers showing that he expended more than $5,000 in making said alterations and has demanded of the defendant said sum, and that the defendant has refused to pay any part thereof. The complaint asks judgment for $5,000, with interest and costs.

The demurrer was on the ground of want of facts sufficient to state a cause of action, and was sustained without leave to the plaintiff to amend. No point is made of the refusal of leave to amend. Plaintiff has in his complaint set out his case as well as it can be stated, and, if the facts set forth do not show any right of action, the court below was justified in entering judgment upon the sustaining of the demurrer. Stated as briefly as it may be, the question is: What is meant by the provision of the lease that "the said party of the first part agrees that at the expiration of the original term hereby created, viz., the term expiring on the 31st day of August, 1911, he will repay unto the said party of the second part the actual cost of said alterations to, and improvements upon the demised premises by said party of the second part * * *"? The contention of the respondent is that the expiration of the term referred to in this language is the ending of the period of time first named in the lease; i. e., the period of time running from the 1st day of May, 1905, to and including the 31st day of August, 1911. The appellant, on the other hand, claims that the expiration of the term is its end or termination in any manner, or, at least, in any manner that may be provided for by the language of the lease itself. Under clause 13 it is provided that the lease shall terminate in the event of the total destruction of the building by fire or earthquake, and such termination, it is claimed, vested in the lessee the right to repayment of such sum, not exceeding $5,000, as he had expended in making the alterations.

We need not enter into a prolonged discussion of the distinction, if there be any, between the phrases "expiration of the term," and "termination of the term." Ordinarily, it appears the former phrase is taken to mean an ending of the term by the lapse of the time provided in the lease for its duration. 18 Cyc. 1506; Stuart v. Hamilton, 66 Ill. 253; Finkelmeier v. Bates, 92 N. Y. 172;

Reed v. Snowhill, 51 N. J. Law, 162, 16 Atl. 679. This is the meaning that has been given to the expression as it is used in unlawful detainer statutes giving to the lessor certain rights where the lessee holds over after the expiration of the term. Oakley v. Schoonmaker, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 226; State v. Burr, 29 Minn. 432, 13 N. W. 676; Stuart v. Hamilton, supra. Such, too, is the construction given by this court to section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that the tenant is guilty of unlawful detainer when he continues in possession "after the expiration of the term for which it is let to him. * * *" Silva v. Campbell, 84 Cal. 420, 24 Pac. 316. There are, on the other hand, cases giving to the words "expiration of the term" the construction contended for by appellant. Wrotesley v. Adams, 1 Plowd. 187; Marshall v. Rugg, 6 Wyo. 270, 44 Pac. 700, 45 Pac. 486, 33 L. R. A. 679.

The question is not, however, what this expression might mean if it stood alone, or if it were used in some connection other than that appearing here. We must determine the sense in which the words were used by the parties to this lease, and to so determine we must look to the instrument as a whole. In the first place, it will be observed that the covenant to repay itself contains words of definition and explanation. The party of the first part agrees to repay the cost of alterations "at the expiration of the original term hereby created, viz., the term expiring on the 31st day of August, 1911." The italicised words furnish a strong indication that the parties used the words "expiration of the original term" as meaning its ending by lapse of time. The "expiration" of the term is the time or occasion of its "expiring," and such "expiring" will, as the lease declares, take place on the 31st day of August, 1911. The appellant attempts to explain this additional descriptive phrase by suggesting that it was inserted to distinguish the first term from the optional term to begin on September 1, 1911. But this purpose had already been accomplished by the use of the word "original" to qualify "term."

Again, the obligation to repay is not absolute. It is conditional upon the lessee not electing to take a renewal of the lease. Such election is, under clause 15 of the lease, to be evidenced by written notice to be given at least four months prior to the "expiration of the original term herein created." Here the phrase "expiration of the original term" is undoubtedly intended to mean the termination of the original term by lapse of time. The lessee certainly could not give notice of an election to renew four months before an ending of the term which might occur by destruction of the premises, or in any other manner that could not be foreseen. The parties, accordingly, must have contemplated that the event upon which the obligation to repay depended would not be ascertained until at or near the end of the five year and four month period, and this furnishes strong support for respondent's contention that the term "expiration of the original term" in clause 14 was used in the sense of ending by lapse of time.

The use of the phrase "expiration of the original term" in clause 15 aids in a further manner in the interpretation of clause 14. It is a familiar rule of construction that, other things being equal, words used in a certain sense in one part of an instrument are deemed to have been used in the same sense in another. As we have seen, the language in question, as found in clause 15, was clearly used to mean the end of the period of time first fixed. The words "expiration of the term" occur in two other parts of the lease, and it cannot be said to be clear that in either instance they were intended to convey a different meaning. In the latter part of clause 14 the lessee agrees "at the expiration of said term aforesaid" to produce original vouchers for any and all moneys by him expended as aforesaid. This is immediately followed by the proviso that no repayment should be made in the event of an election by the lessee to exercise his option of renewal, and a reading of the two provisions together would seem to indicate that the agreement to furnish vouchers had reference to the time when the lessee's right of occupation would cease by reason of his failure to notify the lessor of his election to hold the premises for an additional term; i. e., to the end of the first period of five years and four months. Paragraph 7 of the lease requires the lessee "at the expiration of the said term to surrender the premises in the same condition as by him received, reasonable use and wear thereof, etc., excepted." Whether the phrase is here used in the sense of ending by lapse of time, or by termination in some such way as voluntary surrender, may be open to doubt. Two cases dealing with this question are cited, and they are in conflict. Marshall v. Rugg, supra; Reed v. Snowhill, supra. But certainly the clause did not bind the lessee to surrender the premises in good condition in the event of a destruction of the buildings and consequent termination of the lease. No support for appellant's construction can be derived from clause 7.

If, however, the foregoing considerations could leave any doubt as to the meaning of clause 14, we think clause 13 plainly shows that the obligation to repay shall not exist in the event of the total destruction of the premises. That clause provides that, "if said premises be totally destroyed, then and in such event this lease shall terminate, and the parties hereto shall be freed from all liability hereunder." It is probably true, as is in effect conceded by the parties, that this clause was not intended to end liabilities which had accrued before the destruction of the premises. It does, however, by its express terms, end all liability not then accrued under the terms of the lease. Appellant seeks to limit the meaning of this provision by construing its last word "hereunder" as referring only to liability under the particular clause (13). The word "hereunder" may, it is true, refer to an entire instrument, or to only a particular part of the instrument in which it appears. In re Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451. As here used, however, the word would seem necessarily to refer to the entire lease. The clause releases both parties from all liability. But no liability was cast upon either party by clause 13 itself in the event of a total destruction. The only liabilities mentioned were those existing in the case of a partial destruction, which is not covered by the latter part of the clause. To read the word "hereunder" as contended for by appellant would therefore make it meaningless. Again, the principal, if not the only, liability provided for in the lease as a whole on the part of the lessor (after the lessee shall have gone into possession) is the liability to repay the cost of alterations. Why should it be held that this is not terminated by the occurrence of an event which, under the agreement, is to free both parties from all liability?

It is useless to go into a further analysis of the provisions of the lease. It seems clear to us, upon a reading of the instrument in its entirety, that the court below properly held that the obligation to repay was ended with the total destruction of the buildings. The appellant seeks to overcome this construction by insisting upon the inequitable results that would follow from its adoption. If the language used by the parties is clear and unambiguous, its effect cannot, of course, be varied for the mere reason that it appears to evidence an improvident or unfortunate bargain. But, in fact, the supposed hardship does not inhere in the interpretation we have put upon the lease. It may well be assumed that the rent for the original term was fixed at a lower rate than it would otherwise have been because of the fact that the lessee was improving the premises at his own cost. During that term the lessee, and he alone, would have the benefit of the improvements. At the end of that term they would pass into the possession of the lessor, who would then pay for them. But if the building, with these improvements, should cease to exist, where is the injustice in saying that the landlord shall not pay for what he cannot enjoy? If it be a hardship to compel the lessee to forego reimbursement for alterations to another's building, it must be remembered that the lessor would suffer in equal measure if compelled to pay the cost of improvements which could never come into his possession. The appellant supposes a destruction of the premises on the day preceding the expiration of the term, and asks whether this extreme case would not, on respondent's construction, subject the lessee to a burden which he could not have intended to assume. But the hardship is no greater than that which would, on the opposite construction, have been suffered by the lessor if the buildings had been destroyed at the very beginning of the first term. In that event the landlord would have been called on to pay an amount far exceeding the rent received by him under the lease.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPENCER v. COLLINS et al. (S. F. 5,074.)
(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 22, 1909.

1. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE.

Under Civ. Code, § 35, providing that if a contract be made by a minor whilst over 18 years old, it may be disaffirmed by him, except in immaterial cases, upon restoring the consideration to the person from whom received, or paying its equivalent, if a minor over 18 years old had paid the full value of services rendered him under a contract, and before his majority disaffirmed it, the other parties could recover nothing.

2. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where an infant, who had contracted with attorneys to represent him in a certain matter, and subsequently hired another lawyer to do the work, met one of the former attorneys while with the lawyer he had later hired, and the former attorney asked the other lawyer what he was doing, and he answered that he was representing his client, the infant, and the former attorney asked the infant what he intended to do about the contracts, and the infant stated, according to one version, that he denied them, and that he did not intend to fulfill them, and according to another version that he disaffirmed the contracts, a disaffirmance as to the attorney present was sufficiently shown.

3. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—NOTICE TO ASSIGNEE.

Notice of an infant's rescission of his contract, should be given to the party with whom he contracted, and not to an assignee.

4. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—EFFECT ON ASSIGNEES.

Where a firm of attorneys who had contracted with a minor to render services in securing his share of an estate for a certain portion of it, in turn procured a loan through another person in payment of which they assigned him an interest in the contract, the third person took the interest subject to the possibility of its being repudiated by the infant.

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 159*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—NOTICE TO PARTNER.

A partner is an agent of a partnership in the transaction of its business under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 2429; and, as notice to an agent is notice to the principal, under the direct provisions of section 2332, notice of an infant's disaffirmance of his contract with a firm of attorneys, given to one of them, was sufficient notice to the other partner.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 293-295; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

6. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—RETURN OF EQUIVALENT OF CONSIDERATION—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to sustain a finding that an infant before disaffirming a contract had paid the other parties thereto the equivalent of the consideration which he had received.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 571*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—SERVICES OF ATTORNEY.

While the testimony of experts is admissible to prove the value of attorney's services, their opinions are not essential, and are not binding upon the jury, who may apply to the testimony their own experience and knowledge of the character of such services, and are especially not binding upon the court in cases tried without a jury.

8. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—WORK DONE AFTER NOTICE.

A person who has notice that his contract with an infant for services has been disaffirmed cannot recover for services performed thereunder after the notice.

9. INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—DISAFFIRMANCE—RETURN OF EQUIVALENT OF SERVICES RENDERED.

Under Civ. Code, § 35, providing that, if a contract be made by a minor whilst over 18 years old, it may be disaffirmed by him, except in immaterial cases, upon restoring the consideration to the person from whom received, or paying its equivalent, a minor who has received only attorneys' services under a contract could disaffirm by returning the reasonable value of the services.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Henry A. Melvin, Judge.

Action by William Crane Spencer against M. C. Hassett and others. From the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter H. Robinson, M. C. Hassett, and F. J. Hambly (Henry V. Morehouse, of counsel), for appellants. Chickering & Gregory and Howell C. Moore, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. In 1884 Abner Coburn, a resident of the state of Maine, died in that state, leaving a will whereby he disposed of an estate valued at $11,000,000. By this will the residue of the estate, consisting of stocks, bonds, and other personal property, as well as real property in Maine, North Dakota, and elsewhere, was given to various relatives of the decedent. Among those named in the residuary clause were Alonzo C. Marston, a nephew of the testator, and Abner Paul Marston, son of Alonzo. The will gave to Abner Paul Marston, who is one of the defendants in this action, three fifty-fifths of said residue. Whether this share was to come into the possession of Abner Paul on his attaining his majority, or at a later period, was a question in dispute between Abner Paul and Alonzo.

Abner Paul Marston was born on October 4, 1878. In July, 1898, he was therefore of the age of 19 years and 9 months. At that time he was residing at San Jose in this state. H. V. Morehouse and F. J. Hambly were engaged as partners in the practice of the law at San Jose. On July 8, 1898, a written agreement was entered into whereby Abner Paul Marston employed Morehouse & Hambly as his attorneys, authorizing and empowering them to attend to all legal matters necessary to protect his rights, and to settle his estate upon his arriving at the age of 21 years. By this writing he agreed, upon the turning over of said estate to him and the settlement of the accounts of the trustees appointed to carry out the terms of the will, to pay to said Morehouse & Hambly the sum of 10 per centum of the appraised value of his said estate, and further agreed to advance to said Morehouse & Hambly, on or before the 24th day of July, 1898, the sum of $1,250, to be used by them in making a trip to North Dakota and Maine and examining the condition of his property. By this writing he assigned to said Morehouse & Hambly, out of the estate devised and bequeathed to him, 10 per centum of its appraised value. The instrument was also executed by Morehouse & Hambly, who agreed therein to take charge of the aforesaid business of said Marston, and to take all steps necessary to preserve his property and estate, and fully inquire into and investigate its condition, and make a full and correct report thereof to him.

On July 18th the parties executed a second writing, similar in its main features to the one just described, with the exception that the proportion assigned or to be paid to Morehouse & Hambly was fixed at 15 per centum, instead of 10 per centum as in the earlier agreement. Prior to the execution of either of these writings one S. W. Boring had been appointed guardian of the person and estate of the minor, and the guardian joined in this second agreement. After Abner Paul Marston came of age, he compromised with his father the differences between them. The courts of Maine construed the will in accordance with the contention of the son, who thereupon, through the defendant George H. Collins, received from the trustees acting under the will of Abner Coburn the interest bequeathed to him, consisting of property worth at that time something over $230,000. He had theretofore conveyed all of this property to Collins, who took the same as trustee to pay the debts of the younger Marston, to make certain payments to Alonzo C. pursuant to the compromise above mentioned, and to turn over the residue to Abner Paul Marston. Collins refused to recognize the claim of Morehouse & Hambly to any share of the estate.

The partnership agreement between Morehouse and Hambly provided that the former should have a two-thirds and the latter a one-third interest in the business of the firm, and this agreement applied to the contracts just mentioned. After various partial assignments by Morehouse and Hambly, Morehouse assigned his remaining interest to the plaintiff, William Crane Spencer, who brought two actions against Abner Paul Marston, and Collins as his trustee, to recover Morehouse's share of the 10 and 15 per cent. proportions of the estate provided for by the respective writings. In these actions M. C. Hassett, Hambly, Jettora W. Hyde, and George E. Whitaker were made parties defendant, under an allegation that they claimed an interest in the subject of the litigation. Jettora W. Hyde was an assignee of Hambly's interest. Hassett and Whitaker had each received an assignment of a portion of the interest claimed by Morehouse & Hambly. By cross-complaints, which were substantially similar to the original complaints in the two actions, these defendants sought to recover the shares claimed by them under the contracts in question. The actions were, by consent of the parties, consolidated and tried together, and the court made findings, from which it drew the conclusions of law "that the plaintiff is not, nor are any of the defendants who have cross-complained against the defendants George H. Collins or Abner Paul Marston, the owner of any interest in any of the property conveyed to the defendant Collins, nor entitled to recover anything from either of said defendants Marston or Collins, but that said defendants Marston and Collins are entitled to recover costs against said plaintiff and against said cross-complainants." Judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff and the unsuccessful defendants, with the exception of the defendant George E. Whitaker, appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Among the findings was one to the effect that the contract of July 8th was canceled by the contract of July 18th, and that no services were rendered under the first-named contract by Morehouse & Hambly. The appellants acquiesce in the correctness of this finding, and limit their claims on these appeals to such rights as they may have under the agreement of July 18th, i. e., the 15 per cent. contract.

At the time this agreement was made Marston was a minor over the age of 18 years. The court found: "That on or about the 2d day of October, 1899, said defendant Abner Paul Marston, having theretofore employed other counsel, disaffirmed the said contract bearing date July 18, 1898, and discharged the said Morehouse and Hambly from his employ." It was further found that said Morehouse and Hambly had, prior to the 2d day of October, 1899, received from Marston sums aggregating $5,062.55, and that "the sums thus received were the full value and equivalent for all services rendered by them under said contract of July 18, 1898, up to the time of the disaffirmance of said contract by the said minor." Section 35 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "In all cases other than those specified in sections thirty-six and thirty-seven, the contract of a minor, if made whilst he is under the age of eighteen, may be disaffirmed by the minor himself, either before his majority or within a reasonable time afterwards; or in case of his death within that period, by his heirs or personal representatives; and if the contract be made by the minor whilst he is over the age of eighteen, it may be disaffirmed in like manner upon restoring the consideration to the party from whom it was received, or paying its equivalent." Sections 36 and 37 deal with matters not material here. Under the finding of the court that Marston had on October 2d, two days before attaining his majority, disaffirmed the contract, and the further finding that he had theretofore paid to Morehouse and Hambly the full value and equivalent of all services rendered by them up to the time of the disaffirmance, the only possible conclusion of law was, therefore, that drawn by the trial court, namely, that Morehouse and Hambly, or those claiming under them, were not entitled to any recovery as against the minor or his trustee.

Both findings, i. e., that of disaffirmance and that declaring the receipt by Morehouse and Hambly of the full value and equivalent of all services rendered, are attacked by the appellants. On the issue of disaffirmance there was evidence which the trial court was entitled to accept, to the effect that on October 2, 1899, Abner Paul Marston, who had theretofore retained Howell C. Moore as his attorney, met Morehouse in a saloon in San Francisco. He came out of the saloon with Morehouse, and on the sidewalk met Moore. Morehouse stated to Moore that he had heard some strange reports, and asked Moore what he was doing. Moore said he was representing his client, Marston. Morehouse then asked Marston what he intended to do about the contracts, and, according to Marston's account, the latter said "that he denied them; that he did not intend to fulfill them; answered to that effect." Moore's testimony was that in answer to Morehouse's reference to the contract Marston had said: "Well, I disaffirm that contract." That the declaration of Marston, whether we accept his own version, or that given by Moore, constituted a sufficient disaffirmance so far as Morehouse is concerned is not open to question. (We are not at this point, of course, considering the necessity of restoring the consideration as a condition of complete disaffirmance.) A contract (or conveyance) of a minor may be avoided by any act or declaration disclosing an unequivocal intent to repudiate its binding force and effect. Page on Contracts, 86; Hastings v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 195; Drake's Lessee v. Ramsay, 5 Ohio, 251; Singer Mfg. Co. v. Lamb, 81 Mo. 221. Under this rule, which is thoroughly well settled, it may be questioned whether express notice of disaffirmance to the adverse party is required, provided the act or declaration of repudiation is in its nature public and unequivocal. Thus it has been held that the deed of a minor, at all events of a minor remaining in possession, may be disaffirmed by his subsequent conveyance to a third party. 22 Cyc. 556, and cases cited. But if we assume that the party contracting with the minor, and every such party, is entitled to some form of notice of the election to disaffirm, we are satisfied that notice to Morehouse was all that was required to terminate the rights of all the appellants.

In Downing v. Stone, 47 Mo. App. 144, the court held that notice of rescission should be given to the party with whom the infant contracted, not to an assignee. This, we are satisfied, is the true rule, and the one that is necessary for the full protection of the minor in his right of disaffirmance. Applied to the facts of the case at bar, it disposes of the contention that the disaffirmance was ineffectual for want of notice to the plaintiff, to Jettora W. Hyde, to Whitaker, or to Hassett. With reference to the last named, a somewhat fuller statement of the facts may be required. By the original agreement, that of July 8, 1898, Marston undertook to advance to Morehouse & Hambly $1,250 to be used by them as expenses in traveling to North Dakota and Maine. The court found that Marston was unable to raise this sum of money, and enlisted the assistance of Morehouse in securing it. After several unsuccessful efforts Morehouse and Marston applied to Hassett, who arranged to secure a loan of $1,250 from one Costello. Marston, having decided that he wished to accompany Morehouse on the trip, requested Hassett to secure $2,500, and Hassett did obtain a loan of this sum from Costello. As a condition of the making of the loan, it was required that a promissory note be given signed by Morehouse, Marston, Boring as guardian, and Hassett, and further that Hassett "should receive a five per cent. interest in a fifteen per cent. contract to be drawn running to said Morehouse and Hambly, and that said Morehouse & Hambly simultaneously therewith should assign to said Hassett a five per cent. interest therein; that in the event that Morehouse & Hambly could not make a trip East or attend to the matters pertaining to the estate of said minor, that said Hassett should make such trip and attend to the interests of said minor." In accordance with this agreement the instrument of July 18th was drawn and signed by Abner Paul Marston, Boring, his guardian, Morehouse and Hambly. Attached to it was an assignment from Morehouse and Hambly to Hassett of one-third of their interest in the "foregoing contract" in consideration of services and other accommodations to be given to said Morehouse and Hambly. The Costello note was ultimately paid by Marston. It is now argued that, inasmuch as the transfer to Hassett of a 5 per cent. interest in the estate of the minor was made pursuant to an agreement with the minor himself, the resulting writings are to be construed as defining an agreement between the minor and Hassett, and that this agreement could not be disaffirmed without notice to the latter. The argument, however, overlooks the fact that in compliance with Hassett's own wishes a definite agreement for the rendition of services by Hassett to the minor, or payment for such services by the minor to Hassett, was not made. The transaction, as finally reduced to writing, must under familiar principles be deemed to express the actual intent of the parties, and that intent was that Marston should make an agreement for 15 per cent. with Morehouse & Hambly, and that Morehouse & Hambly should assign a portion of that interest to Hassett. Hassett accordingly took whatever interest he had in the agreement, not directly from the minor, but from Morehouse & Hambly, to whom the minor granted it by his contract. Hassett, therefore, stands in the same position as any of the parties claiming an interest by assignment from Morehouse and Hambly. Each of such parties, accepting a transfer of an interest in a contract made with a minor, took that interest subject to the possibility of its being repudiated by the minor.

The position of Hambly is different. But he and Morehouse were partners; and, while that fact is not recited in the agreements, it is clearly shown by the evidence that the contracts in question were partnership transactions. Morehouse testified that he and Hambly became partners on January 1, 1898, and, that under the terms of their association, Morehouse's interest was two-thirds and Hambly's one-third. Upon the dissolution of the partnership in August, 1900, their interests in these contracts were divided in this proportion: As a partner, Morehouse was an agent of the partnership in the transaction of its business (Civ. Code, § 2429; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309), and, accordingly, upon the principle that notice to an agent is notice to the principal (Civ. Code, § 2332), notice of disaffirmance to Morehouse was sufficient notice to his partner Hambly.

The only matter that remains to be considered is whether the minor, before the time of disaffirmance, had paid Morehouse & Hambly the equivalent of the consideration which he had received. The only consideration which was to pass to the minor under the agreement of July 8, 1898, was the performance of professional services by the attorneys with whom he was contracting. The services performed under the contract are fully detailed in the testimony of Mr. Morehouse, and may be briefly summarized as follows: Shortly after the execution of the agreement Mr. Morehouse went with Marston to Fargo, N. D., and there made investigations into the status of Marston's property rights in that state. This occupied three days. From there he went to Maine, and was similarly engaged for five days. Upon his return there were frequent interviews between Marston and Morehouse concerning the former's property rights. In addition to these services Morehouse & Hambly assisted the minor in obtaining loans of money from various persons. It appears that Marston was a young man of improvident and somewhat dissipated habits, and that he was constantly pressed for funds. Each of the loans which he succeeded in getting was obtained only upon the condition of paying very heavy commissions, and in most, if not in all, instances the net proceeds, after the deduction of all expenses, were equally divided between the minor and his attorneys. In this way Morehouse & Hambly received from the minor, prior to his declaration of disaffirmance, over $6,000. The testimony of Hambly himself was that this amount was credited, or might be credited, upon the claims of Morehouse & Hambly against Marston for services. The finding of the court that $5,062.55 had been received by Morehouse & Hambly is therefore fully sustained by the evidence. The court found, as has been stated, that this amount was the full equivalent for all the services rendered by the attorneys under their agreement. The court was fully authorized to so find. It is argued that the finding is unsupported because there was no testimony of the value of the services. The position of the appellants is, apparently, that, before a court can find the value of professional services, it must have before it the testimony of experts to the effect that certain services are of a certain value. But this is not the law. The testimony of experts is of course admissible to prove the value of attorneys' services. Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 73, 7 Sup. Ct. 408, 30 L. Ed. 586; Louisville, etc., Co. v. Wallace, 136 Ill. 87, 26 N. E. 493, 11 L. R. A. 787. But the opinions of the experts in such cases are not binding upon the jury, who may apply to the testimony "their own experience and knowledge of the character of such services." Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. Ed. 1028; Forsyth v. Doolittle, supra; Estate of Dorland, 63 Cal. 281; Schlesinger v. Dunne, 36 Misc. Rep. 529, 73 N. Y. Supp. 1014. "Expert evidence, after all," it is said in the case last cited, "is merely the opinion of the witnesses offered, and the court or jury may exercise an independent judgment in determining how far it will follow the opinions expressed." If the jury may form a judgment as to the value of services in opposition to the opinions of experts, it necessarily follows that the testimony of experts is not essential. And so it has been held in cases tried before a jury (Bourke v. Whiting, 19 Colo. 1, 34 Pac. 172; Gibbons v. Missouri Pac. R. R. Co., 40 Mo. App. 146), as well as with respect to issues determined by a court or referee (Noftzger v. Moffett, 63 Kan. 354, 65 Pac. 670; Dempsey v. Schawacker, 140 Mo. 680, 38 S. W. 954, 41 S. W. 1100). If this doctrine is applicable to jury trials, there is much more reason for applying the doctrine in cases tried before a court. The value of attorney's services is a matter with which a judge must necessarily be familiar. When the court is informed of the extent and nature of such services, its own experience furnishes it with every element necessary to fix their value.

No time need be spent in giving reasons for our conclusion that the evidence of the character and amount of the services here rendered fully supported the finding that they had been adequately recompensed. The court may have well concluded that time and labor expended in obtaining for a minor large loans, on the terms and under the circumstances here shown, was not a service calling for compensation under the terms of the contract. The amount received by the attorneys was sufficient to allow them a liberal payment for all other services rendered.

After the notice of disaffirmance Morehouse went to Maine again, and did some work there in connection with Marston's estate. Whether this trip was intended primarily in his own interest or for the benefit of the minor, he was not, of course, entitled to payment for work done after he had received notice that the minor repudiated the agreement.

The appellants take the position that a payment of the value of what the minor had received is not a restoration of the consideration received by him or a payment of its equivalent within the meaning of section 35 of the Civil Code. The argument is that, where there is an express contract between the parties for personal services, the only consideration that a court can look to is the consideration agreed to be paid, and that, therefore, the minor's right of disaffirmance was conditional upon his paying to Morehouse and Hambly what he had agreed to pay them, viz., 15 per cent. of his estate. This argument is obviously unsound. Carried to its logical conclusion, it means that a minor can disaffirm a contract wholly executory only by performing it. The right of disaffirmance, if the position be well taken, would be absolutely worthless. The fallacy of the argument lies in the assumption that the consideration to be restored is what the minor had agreed to do, i. e., the consideration received by the adverse party. All the minor is obliged to restore is what he received from the other side. That, in this case, consisted of services. The services themselves not being capable of restoration, the minor was required to return their equivalent, which consisted of the reasonable value of such services.

The foregoing discussion is sufficient to dispose of the case. It will not be necessary to refer to the additional facts shown by the record, although the respondent bases upon them further reasons for sustaining the action of the court below.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 781*)—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—SETTLEMENT WITH ONE DEFENDANT.

Where, in a suit against two defendants, the venue is changed on the motion of one of them, from which order plaintiff appealed, the fact that plaintiff had agreed to release one defendant on receiving $375, no part of which was shown to have been paid, did not entitle the other to a dismissal of the appeal, on the ground that a moot question only was presented.

Where an action is brought against two defendants residing in different counties, one of them, whose residence was in a county other than that in which the suit was brought, in order to procure a change of venue to the county of his residence, must show that none of the defendants were residents of the county where the venue was laid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by S. Bloom against the Michigan Salmon Mining Company and another. From an order changing the place of trial from San Francisco to Sonoma county, plaintiff appeals, and defendant Michigan Salmon Mining Company moves to dismiss. Motion denied. Order reversed.

S. Bloom, in pro. per., and L. W. Juilliard, for appellant. James M. Allen and James C. Sims, for respondents.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought for the purpose of dissolving a copartnership alleged to exist between the plaintiff and the defendant Grant, said partnership being in regard to the ownership, working, and development of the Red Hill and Cash hydraulic placer mines, situated in Siskiyou county, and to have it adjudged that the contract made by said Grant with the defendant corporation (under which the corporation is alleged to be in possession of the mining property, and claiming to own the same, and is alleged to be working same) is void as to this plaintiff, and that the said corporation be required to account for the value of all the minerals extracted by it from the said mine. The complaint prays that a receiver be appointed, and that it be decreed that the contract made between defendant Grant and the defendant corporation is void. On motion of defendant Grant, accompanied by a demand and affidavit of merits as to Grant, the place of trial of the action was ordered changed from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Sonoma; that being the county in which said Grant resides, and in which he resided at the time of the commencement of the action. This appeal is from the order changing the place of trial to Sonoma county.

Defendant Michigan Salmon Mining Company moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appeal now presents only a moot question, because the plaintiff has settled with defendant Grant. The notice is accompanied by a copy of an agreement made between plaintiff and defendant Grant, dated December 10, 1906, by the terms of which it appears that upon the payment of the sum of $375 to plaintiff by defendant Grant, at the times and in the manner specified by said contract, the plaintiff will release defendant Grant from all claims and demands of every kind, including the matters embraced in said litigation. It is not made to appear, by affidavit or otherwise, that defendant Grant has ever paid to the plaintiff the said $375, or any part thereof. It is further expressly stated in said agreement that the plaintiff reserves all rights against the defendant corporation. If the complaint is true, the plaintiff is entitled to relief against the corporation. But be this as it may, we cannot decide the merits of the controversy, nor as to whether or not the settlement with Grant would of itself release the defendant corporation, on this motion to dismiss the appeal. The plaintiff is seeking relief against both defendants. The allegations in regard to the agreement of settlement are as to one defendant. The motion is therefore denied.

As to the order changing the place of trial, the record does not show anything as to the place of residence or the principal place of business of the defendant corporation; nor is there any affidavit of merits made by or on behalf of said corporation. So far as the record shows, the defendant corporation may have no defense to the said action on its merits. The burden was upon the moving party to show that none of the defendants are residents of the county in which the action was brought. Hearne v. De Young, 111 Cal. 376, 43 Pac. 1108. The principal place of business of a corporation is its residence within the meaning of the Code as to the change of place of trial. Jenkins v. Cal. Stage Co., 22 Cal. 538; Cohn v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 71 Cal. 489, 12 Pac. 498; McSherry v. Penn. C. G. M. Co., 97 Cal. 641, 32 Pac. 711.

The order is therefore reversed.

SCALLY v. W. T. GARRATT & CO.

(Civ. 586.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 21, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 15, 1909.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 38*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—ELEMENTS OF DAMAGES.

The fact that a child 12 years old was so injured as to destroy his ability to pursue musical studies, on lines for which he possessed peculiar talent, may be considered in fixing the damages.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A reviewing court may not invade the province of the jury as to damages in a personal injury action, unless it clearly appears from the face of the record evidence that the sum assessed could not have been given except under the influence of passion or prejudice.

3. DAMAGES (§ 185*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EVIDENCE OF DAMAGES.

In a personal injury action, there can be no direct evidence of the amount of damages sustained, or the amount of money which will compensate for the injury, so that it is sufficient to show the jury the extent of the injury, and the amount of the verdict is to be determined by the exercise of intelligent discretion.

4. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A child 12 years old was so injured as to permanently impair his ability to pursue in the future an occupation requiring the exercise of his natural physical power. His right arm and hand grew smaller from atrophy, and physicians did not believe that the difficulty could ever be remedied. For two years after the accident he suffered from the effects of his injuries, and physicians testified that he would probably continue to suffer pain. The disability prevented him from pursuing his musical studies, on lines for which he possessed peculiar talent. Held, that a verdict for $7,500 was not excessive.

5. DAMAGES (§ 215*)—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for personal injuries, that the jury, if believing that plaintiff "sustained the injuries complained of" through the negligence of defendant, without negligence on his part, should find for plaintiff, and assess his damages in such sum as under the circumstances he ought to recover, etc., must be construed as allowing compensatory damages only, for one sustains such damages only as amount to an actual loss to him, and, when so construed, it correctly states the rule declared in Civ. Code, § 3333, providing that the measure of damages for breach of an obligation not arising on contract is the amount which will compensate for all detriment proximately caused thereby, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 96*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE.

The proximate cause of an injury to a child 12 years old, while at work under an employment prohibited by St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, is the negligence of the master in employing the child; the injury having been received through no fault of the child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

7. DAMAGES (§ 215*)—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for injuries to a child 12 years old, while at work under an employment prohibited by St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18, that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the master, and an instruction directing the jury to assess plaintiff's damages in such sum as under the circumstances he ought to recover for the damages sustained, etc., did not authorize the jury to consider punitive damages.

8. DAMAGES (§§ 26, 32*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES.

One suing for a personal injury may recover for the suffering he has endured from the injury, and for such suffering in the future as the evidence with reasonable certainty discloses he will endure therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 40, 41, 69, 71; Dec. Dig. §§ 26, 32.*]

9. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS—"WILL"—"MAY."

An instruction in a personal injury action that the jury in assessing the damages may consider the character of the injury, if any, sustained by plaintiff, the pain and suffering, if any, endured, and "which will be endured," if any, as the result of the injuries, if any, etc., properly limits a recovery for the suffering endured, and for such suffering as the evidence discloses he will endure in the future, since the word "will" as employed in the instruction must have been understood in its proper sense as referring to the unconditional existence of the fact, and not in the sense of "may," which imports a mere possibility.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Donald Scally by Mary Scally, his guardian ad litem, against W. T. Garratt & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Naphtaly & Freidenrich, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The prayer of the complaint demands a judgment for $15,000, and the jury returned a verdict for $7,500. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum so awarded. The defendant presents this appeal from said judgment, and from the order denying it a new trial. The appellant claims to be entitled to a reversal of the judgment and order for the reasons: (1) that the damages assessed by the jury are so excessive as to justify the conclusion that the verdict was reached through passion or prejudice; (2) that the court erred to the prejudice of the appellant in the giving of certain instructions.

1. The evidence discloses these facts: The defendant, at the time of the accident through which the plaintiff sustained his injuries, owned and operated a foundry in the city of San Francisco, and was engaged in the manufacture of machines, nuts, bolts, tools, and other mechanical appliances. The plaintiff, a lad then under the age of 12 years, was employed to work in said foundry by the defendant in either the latter part of the month of June or the first part of the month of July, 1905. At that time the plaintiff measured about 4 feet and 8 inches in height and weighed approximately 80 pounds. Prior to his employment by the defendant the plaintiff was without any experience with machinery of any character. At first he was placed by Mr. Griffin, a foreman of defendant, in charge of a machine, the operation of which involved no particular danger of accidents to the operator. On this machine he worked for about two weeks, when he was put to the operation of a machine used for the purpose of "squaring off the tops of faucets." This machine consisted, among other contrivances, of a very small cutter, and the plaintiff testified that, in its manipulation, he was not required to place his hands anywhere near the knife or cutter. After working on this machine for little less than a week, he was "put to wrapping," at which, with other odd jobs in the nature of errand work around the foundry, he was employed for about three weeks, when he was put to work on the machine, in the operation of which he received the injuries complained of. This machine was used for cutting, squaring, and finishing nuts, tools, and other mechanical appliances. It contained cutters, circular in form, about 2½ inches in diameter, and were necessarily very sharp.

The plaintiff testified: "There were two of these cutters on each side, and they were forced together, and the material which was to be squared was cut as it run between them; it cut both sides at the same time. Those knives were located, I guess, about 6 inches above the bed of the machine." The machine was run by electricity. There were belts connected with each of the wheels attached to the machine, and they extended up to a wheel where there was a revolving shaft. The power was turned on by means of a "shifter," which was located above the machine, and at a point to the front of the operator, from the point at which he stood when operating the machine. The plaintiff was not of sufficient height to operate the machine without a platform upon which to stand, and this platform was placed in front of the machine; it having been built for the special purpose of enabling the plaintiff to operate the machine on which he was at first put to work. The plaintiff further testified: "When I was put to work on this machine, Mr. Griffin showed me how to run the material through. The material that was cut was stuffing nut and fusible plug. They were run in between the knives on a kind of a platform that they screwed them down to. That is the appliance or projection appearing in the middle or center of this machine. Then they were forced into the knives. All that Mr. Griffin said to me at the time he placed me to work on this machine, for the first time, was to show me how to operate it. He said, whenever you are going to cut a screw down on this projection, to be careful and screw it down tight, because he said you would spoil the material if you did not; it would leave the sides crooked, and they would not mill straight. That was practically all that was said during that conversation when I was first placed at work upon that machine. * * * Mr. Griffin told me to put all the defective plugs or nuts on the lid or shelf connected with the rear of the machine; he told me not to mill the defective material. I put it over on this shelf or lid. He did not tell me how to put it over there. And then I started to operate the machine. In operating it I came in contact with defective material, which I placed on the lid or shelf just as he told me. I placed it there by reaching over the machine; right over the cutters like that [showing] with my right hand. * * * During the first two days that I was put to work on that machine, I discovered quite often material which could not be used, and which I was instructed not to use. That material I placed upon that lid in the manner which I have indicated, by putting my right hand over the knife or cutter. * * * I was never told by Mr. Griffin, or anybody else connected with the establishment, to get off that platform in front of my machine, and go round to the rear of the machine and place the material on the shelf or lid in that manner, and then go around to the front again. To do it in that way would occupy some considerable time. I was never told to do it in that way. The clothes in which I worked was a pair of overalls and a dark shirt. When I went there to be employed by W. T. Garratt, I told my parents I was going there to wrap. The shirt I wore while working in that factory was a dark shirt with white stripes. It was calico, I guess. The sleeves were not very loose. The accident happened this way: I had just finished my lunch, and went to work on the machine. I was told to fix some stuffing nuts at the side, and was working on them for a while, when I found a defective nut, and reached over the top of the knives to put it on this lid or shelf as I was told to do, and my arm got caught. I don't know whether it was the sleeve or the arm itself; it happened so quickly. The cutters tore into my arm, and then I was taken down to the Receiving Hospital, to the Harbor Emergency down near the water front."

With reference to the effect of the injuries he sustained, the plaintiff testified: "The arm and hand is smaller than the other arm and hand which was not injured. I have no power at all in the thumb or forefinger—no sensation—can't feel anything in those fingers, and can't use them at all; can't bend them except as indicated. There is no sensation at all in the middle finger." He said that prior to the accident he had been "taking music lessons upon the violin" but that since his arm and hand were injured, "it is impossible for me to further manipulate the violin"; that it is with great difficulty that he can now handle a pen so as to write; that in cold weather he still suffers "terrible pain in that arm."

The mother of plaintiff saw the injured arm and hand the day following that upon which the accident happened, when the attending physician was dressing the wounds, and she declared that "the arm was in an awful condition; that the flesh was all chopped away, just like it had been chopped off with a knife or something." She said that the boy had been unable to take lessons on the violin after the accident, and that, after some practice, he got so that he could write by holding a pen between his thumb and little finger. For about a year after he was hurt, she continued, he suffered from occasional fainting, spells when the weather was cold.

Dr. Stoney, who was called in and attended the plaintiff immediately after the accident occurred, had died before the trial of this action, and Drs. Haber and Buckley, at the request of plaintiff, made an examination of the injured arm and hand and the muscles of that member. Dr. Haber testified, in part, as follows: "When I refer to the arm which I say was slightly smaller, I mean the arm between the shoulder and the elbow. The forearm, between the elbow and the wrist was considerably smaller. The muscles were atrophied, and some of them in a degenerated condition. By atrophy I mean the muscles, due to the injury to the nerve supply [ing] them, degenerate, and do not perform the functions that they should. They cannot perform those functions because the nerve supply is shut off. There is a nerve located in the arm, part of the brachial system which supplied the forefinger and the thumb. That nerve originates in the plexus; that is, in the brachial plexus. Those are the nerves which originate just above the shoulder in the neck. That nerve supplies the muscles in the upper arm, in the forearm, the muscles of the hand, and also the sensation of some parts of the skin. It supplies or controls the muscles which bend the finger or flex the finger—all of the fingers in part and entirely of the index and middle fingers. It supplies some of the muscles of the thumb. * * * From my examination of this arm, and hand and fingers, and from the test that I have made of the hand and fingers, I will state that the nerve has been injured, but not entirely destroyed. Some of the muscles supplied by that nerve are active; others are not. From my experience as a doctor, I do not think it will be possible for the boy at any time to recover the use of the thumb and finger. I have observed weakness in that finger and hand. There are other signs of an injury to the nerve and to the artery. Those signs are the hand has not developed as the other hand is; it is smaller, two of the fingers are shorter, and not as large in circumference. * * * I do not think it will ever be possible for plaintiff to perform any manual labor in that arm or hand. I do not think it would be possible for him to play upon the violin with any degree of success with his hand and arm in its present condition."

Dr. Buckley corroborated generally Dr. Haber as to the condition in which the lad's arm, hand, and the muscles of the injured member had been left by the injuries sustained by the accident. He said that it was his opinion that the plaintiff would never be able to use the injured hand again to any advantage; that it would be impossible for him to play on any musical instrument such as a violin; that "the boy is suffering from wasting of the inner side of the forearm, and also suffering from a general defect of the arm." Dr. Buckley said that the atrophied condition of the arm was due to the injury to the whole nerve. This witness declared that "from my experience as a physician and surgeon, the injuries received by plaintiff, as indicated by his present condition, must have caused him great suffering. Whenever you have an injury to the nerve, you are sure to have a great deal in the track of that ever afterwards, and the slightest cold or changes of temperature are very apt to produce it."

The plaintiff and his mother and father testified that for two years previously to the time he was injured, he had been a pupil of a teacher of violin music, and had acquired such proficiency as a performer on that instrument as that he was able to, and did on several occasions, play in public.

The foregoing statement embraces, in substance, all the important facts established by the evidence. There are, as stated, but two points urged on this appeal. The sufficiency of the evidence to justify a verdict in favor of the plaintiff is not challenged, the only claim with regard to the evidence being, as seen, that the damages awarded by the jury are so excessive as to compel the conclusion that they were given under the influence of passion or prejudice. Section 657, subd. 5, Code Civ. Proc.

We see nothing in the record from which this court would be warranted in declaring that the jury, in the rendition of their verdict and in arriving at a conclusion as to the amount at which they assessed the damages, were influenced by any other motive than a conscientious consideration of the facts which were adduced before them. The testimony discloses and establishes beyond all peradventure that the boy was so seriously injured as to permanently impair his ability to pursue, during the balance of his life, an occupation requiring the exercise of his full, natural physical power, that for two years after the accident he suffered from the effect of his injuries, and that his condition at the time of the trial, which took place over two years after the accident, was such as to justify Drs. Haber and Buckley in testifying, by way of a professional prognosis of his injuries, that, during the remainder of his life, he would in all probability continue to suffer pain from said injuries. The fact that the plaintiff will forever be prevented, by reason of the impairment, or, in truth, complete destruction, of his ability to pursue the musical studies, on lines for which, evidently, he possesses peculiar talent, is a matter of no little importance, and was a proper item for the consideration of the jury in the fixing of such compensation for the great loss he has sustained through the negligence of the defendant as would be fair and just. As a result of his injuries, his right arm and hand have grown smaller from atrophy than his left arm and hand, and the doctors hold out no hope that the difficulty can ever be remedied or corrected in any perceptible degree. The necessary result is that the plaintiff is not only seriously handicapped permanently in the great struggle for existence, but a laudable ambition to acquire proficiency in the particular musical line to which his genius in that respect directed him is absolutely destroyed and thwarted when he is yet far removed from the threshold of man's estate. As is well suggested by counsel for the respondent, in replying to cases cited by appellant where damages were held to be excessive for the loss of two fingers or some like injury, "the injuries here complained of were vastly more serious than would have resulted from a mere fracture of the arm or a fracture or amputation of the fingers." No reviewing court has any right to invade the province of a jury in cases of the nature of the one here by cutting down or diminishing the amount of damages awarded, unless it clearly and distinctly appears from the face of the record evidence itself that the sum assessed as the compensation for the injuries sustained is so far beyond a reasonable and just admeasurement of damages, under all the circumstances appearing, as to imperatively force upon the court the fact that such damages could not have been given except under the influence of passion or prejudice.

All the cases say, as is said in Clare v. Sacramento Electric Power & Light Co., 122 Cal. 506, 55 Pac. 327, that: "In cases of this character, there can be no direct evidence of the amount of damage sustained, or the amount of money which will be a compensation for the injury, but it is sufficient to show to the jury the extent of the injury, and the amount of their verdict thereon is to be determined by the exercise of an intelligent discretion; and, unless the amount of the verdict is such as to indicate that it was given under passion or prejudice, it will be sustained." In other words, as is well said in Graham & Waterman on New Trials: "The court may set aside a verdict as excessive, in a proper case, where it appears that the amount could only have been arrived at through passion or prejudice. But it cannot, on the mere opinion, judgment, or feeling of the judges, fix the sum the plaintiff ought to have. It is no part of its duty to assess damages in cases of this kind. This duty the law confers upon juries. Nor is this court any better qualified than a jury to determine such amount. Attainments in the law do not aid at all in the discharge of such a duty; there is no reason to suppose the judges possess such experience in matters of this kind, or are so peculiarly endowed by nature that their judgments upon such questions are more unerring than those of juries." Again, the same authors, at page 451 of their work, say: "It is clear that the reason for holding the parties so tenaciously to the damages found by the jury in personal torts is that in cases of this class there is no scale by which the damages are to be graduated with certainty. They admit of no other test than the intelligence of a jury, governed by a sense of justice. It is, indeed, one of the principal causes in which the trial by jury has originated. From the prolific fountain of litigation numerous cases must daily spring up, calling for adjudication for alleged injuries, accompanied with facts and circumstances affording no definite standard by which these alleged wrongs can be measured, and which, from the necessity of the case, must be judged of and appreciated by the view that may be taken of them by impartial men. To the jury, therefore, as a favorite and almost sacred tribunal, is committed by unanimous consent the exclusive task of examining those facts and circumstances, and valuing the injury, and awarding compensation in the shape of damages. The law that confers on them this power, and exacts of them the performance of the solemn trust, favors the presumption that they are actuated by pure motives. It therefore makes every allowance for different dispositions, capacities, views, and even frailties in the examination of heterogeneous matters of fact, where no criterion can be supplied; and it is not until the result of the deliberations of the jury appears in a form calculated to shock the understanding, and impress no dubious conviction of their prejudice and passion, that courts have found themselves compelled to interpose." See, also, Bonneau v. North Shore R. R. Co., 152 Cal. 406, 93 Pac. 106, 125 Am. St. Rep. 68; Lee v. S. P. R. R. Co., 101 Cal. 118, 35 Pac. 572; Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 368; Wheaton v. N. B. & R. Co., 36 Cal. 590; Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 513.

The records in the cases referred to and relied upon by the appellant were no doubt such as to justify the appeal courts in reducing the amount of damages returned by the juries upon the facts established therein, but we perceive nothing in said cases which requires or would justify the cutting down of the damages here awarded upon evidence disclosing a much different state of facts from that upon which the higher courts felt constrained in those cases to hold the damages to be so excessive as "to shock the understanding and impress no dubious conviction" that they were the result of passion or prejudice. As was said by the late learned Justice McFarland, in the case of Morgan v. S. P. Co., 95 Cal. 501, 508, 509, 30 Pac. 601, 602, 17 L. R. A. 71, 29 Am. St. Rep. 143: "Cases are cited where verdicts for less than the amount awarded in the case at bar have been set aside; but there are many cases where verdicts for larger amounts have been allowed to stand. Two cases exactly alike are not to be found." See the following cases where the appeal courts refused to interfere with the damages awarded for the loss of limbs, either one or both: Galveston Ry. Co. v. Abbey, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 211, 68 S. W. 293; Kalfur v. Broadway Ferry, 34 App. Div. 267, 54 N. Y. Supp. 503; Williamson v. Brooklyn Heights Ry. Co., 53 App. Div. 399, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1054; Robinson v. C. P. R. R., 48 Cal. 410—$10,000 for loss of an arm; Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Connolly (Neb.), 109 N. W. 378. In Stewart v. Long Island Ry. Co., 54 App. Div. 623, 66 N. Y. Supp. 436, where the plaintiff obtained a verdict for $18,000, for an injury to his arm by which the member was permanently disabled, the court, refusing to disturb the verdict, says: "Further, I give much weight to the fact that the learned and acute trial justice refused to disturb the verdict." See, to same effect, Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019; Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 141, 57 Pac. 774; Reeve v. Colusa Gas Co., 152 Cal. 99, 92 Pac. 89; Smith v. Whittier, supra. In Reeve v. Colusa Gas & Elec. Co., 152 Cal. 110, 92 Pac. 94, Mr. Justice Shaw, who wrote the opinion, very aptly says: "It is impossible adequately to describe the suffering and misery—past, present, and future—inflicted upon the plaintiff as a consequence of the injury. The verdict is large, the amount of damage was a question for the jury, subject to the supervision and correction of the trial court, and, having been passed by the latter without disapproval, it is not for us to say, under the circumstances, that it is excessive." See Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. (Cal.) 103 Pac. 190.

We think that common experience justifies the observation that either the loss of, or an injury to, an arm in such manner as to permanently disable it, thus rendering it practically useless to one compelled to earn a livelihood by manual labor, is worse and of infinitely greater disadvantage to the person so injured than would be the loss of a leg. In this case, if the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff be true, and it must, in view of the verdict, be so accepted by this court, the consequence of the injury inflicted upon the plaintiff by the defendant's negligence is, as we have before said, to permanently incapacitate him, to a great extent, for the performance of manual labor, or for the exercise of any other employment in which the full normal power of both arms and hands is required. And, as the New York court says, in Vredenburg v. N. Y. Cen. & H. R. R. Co., 58 Hun, 607, 12 N. Y. Supp. 18, where the plaintiff was given damages in the sum of $6,500 for an injury to her right arm, so it is true here, "If the jury believed the testimony introduced by the plaintiff respecting the extent and permanency of her injuries, we can very well see how the verdict was made as it was"; the judgment therein being affirmed.

2. The instructions given by the court, which it is claimed misstate the rules by which the jury were authorized to be guided in considering the evidence and assessing the damages, read as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that plaintiff sustained the injuries complained of in his complaint, as amended, through the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, without negligence on his part, then you should find for the plaintiff, Donald Scally, and assess his damages in such sum as you believe, under all the circumstances of this case in evidence, the plaintiff ought to recover, not exceeding the amount claimed in his complaint, as amended, to wit, $15,000." "If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Donald Scally, is entitled to a verdict against said defendant, you must assess the amount of damages at a sum not to exceed the amount prayed for in his complaint, as amended, and in so doing you have a right to consider the character of the injuries, if any, sustained by plaintiff; the pain and suffering, if any, endured, and which will be endured, if any, as the result of said injuries, if any, sustained by him; the effect of such injuries, if any, upon said plaintiff; the permanent character of said injuries, if any, if such injuries are permanent; and what, before the injuries complained of, was the health and physical condition of the plaintiff. From all those elements you will resolve what amount will fairly compensate the plaintiff for the injuries sustained by him, if any, provided you find in favor of the plaintiff."

Counsel for the appellant call our attention to several California cases in which it is held that instructions, phrased in language in some respects similar to that of the instructions complained of here, were erroneous. In illustration of the pertinency of this contention, and for the purpose of showing the similarity of the two instructions, counsel in their brief, parallel certain language of an instruction given in the case of Trabing v. Cal. Nav. Co., 121 Cal. 143, 53 Pac. 646, which they intimate was condemned by the Supreme Court as not containing a correct statement of the law, with the italicized portion of the first quoted of the foregoing instructions given in the present case. In the case cited, the instruction, among other declarations, contained the following: " * * * Then I charge you your verdict will be in favor of plaintiff for such damages as under all the circumstances of the case disclosed by the evidence appearing to be just, not exceeding," etc. But the court in that case does not, in its criticism of said instruction, go to the extent which the intimation of counsel would indicate. In fact, the court approved the instruction as involving a correct declaration of the law in abstract form. What the court did hold, however, was that in that particular case, where there was an entire absence of any ground upon which the infliction of punitive or exemplary damages, claimed by the plaintiff, could be justified, there having been no evidence introduced showing that the corporation defendant itself committed the tort, and none showing that it ratified the act of its agent resulting in the tort, the instruction was too general, and therefore misleading. The court said: "The instruction would apply to almost any conceivable case, whether the action was against the principal or the agent who actually committed the tort, and whether the facts did or did not justify exemplary damages." If the trial court in that case had clearly instructed the jury that, under the facts as established by the evidence, they should not consider the question of exemplary damages, as such question was not involved there, the instruction which appellant declares that the court condemned would have been proper in that case, for then, from the whole charge, it would clearly appear that the jury were properly restricted by the court in the matter of the assessment of damages to the consideration of the single question what amount, "under all the circumstances of the case disclosed by the evidence," appeared to constitute just compensation for the damages sustained.

In the case at bar, no such negligence was imputed to the defendant as would warrant the infliction of a punishment by way of damages in excess of the amount which would, in the judgment of the jury, constitute just compensatory damages. Nor was any claim made by the plaintiff that punitive or exemplary damages should be imposed. Besides, the court in plain and perspicuous language instructed the jury that if the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injuries, if any, sustained by plaintiff, their verdict must be in favor of plaintiff "for such damages as you shall find from the evidence he has sustained, not exceeding the amount claimed in plaintiff's complaint." Thus it clearly appears that the court distinctly told the jury that they were, in case they found the plaintiff's injuries were proximately due to defendant's negligence, to return only such amount as would in the estimation of the jury adequately compensate plaintiff for whatever damages he had thus sustained, and if the language of the instruction is susceptible of being understood at all it must necessarily be understood as expressly limiting the jury to the consideration of the proposition of what, if any, actual damages the plaintiff had suffered by reason of the accident, or in other words, as excluding from consideration by the jury any question of "damages" in the nature of punishment. The fact is, in strictness, it would seem in cases of personal tort that characterizing as "damages" the sum which may be allowed in certain cases in excess of that which may be awarded as compensation for the damages actually sustained is rather misleading, if not involving altogether a misnomer, for such "damages," so called, amount only to a punishment or a fine which the law says ought to be imposed in cases where the negligence is the result of wanton carelessness; such fine, somewhat in analogy to the action of quidam, to go to the party who has been injured and brought the suit. As applied to the defendant, the phrase "exemplary damages" is appropriate enough; but as to the injured party, it could not be said that he could sustain "exemplary damages." It would obviously be absurd to so say. He could manifestly sustain such damages only as amounted to an actual loss to him; and, when the court explained that the plaintiff was entitled to such damages as the jury might find from the evidence that he had sustained, it must have thus been made clear to the jury that what the court meant, when it subsequently told them that they should "assess the damages in such sum as they believe from the circumstances of this case in evidence the plaintiff ought to recover," was that they were at liberty to allow actual damages only. As so understood, the instruction correctly states the law, and conforms to the rule as declared in section 3333 of the Civil Code, which reads: "For the breach of an obligation not arising upon contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate for all detriment proximately caused thereby, whether it could have been anticipated or not."

But counsel for appellant contend that the instructions upon the subject of the employment by a person, firm, or corporation of a child under the age of 12 years in manufacturing establishments, etc., contrary to the law of this state (St. 1905, p. 11, c. 18), of necessity submitted to the jury the question of exemplary damages, and that therefore the instruction of which we are speaking, considered in the light of the former, was erroneous, in that, necessarily, among the "circumstances" which the jury were therein told that they could consider in fixing the damages was the fact, if they found it to be a fact, that the plaintiff in this case, when employed by the defendant, was under the age of 12 years. The instructions with regard to the employment of a child under the age of 12 years, in violation of the statute, in substance declare that the proximate cause of an injury sustained by such child, while performing the duties required by his employment in one of the establishments mentioned by the statute, such injury having been received through no fault of the child, would be the negligence of the defendant, or, in other words, such negligence would be negligence per se. This is a correct statement of the law, and, when considered with the rest of the charge of the court, cannot be construed to mean that the question of punitive damages was thus opened up for investigation and determination by the jury.

The instruction given by the trial court and condemned by the Supreme Court in Fries v. Am. Lead Pencil Co., 141 Cal. 613, 75 Pac. 165, is radically different from the one assailed here. It reads in part: "* * * Then it would be your duty to give the child such amount of damages as you feel it is entitled to, not exceeding the amount prayed for in the complaint." In its criticism of this instruction the Supreme Court says: "To say that the jury may award such damages as they feel the plaintiff is entitled to is the equivalent to telling them that they may give play to their emotions of sympathy for the injured child, emotions which, eminently proper in themselves, can have no just place in fixing an award of actual damage." In the instruction in the case at bar the court said to the jury, as we have seen, that the negligence of the defendant being shown, and no fault of the plaintiff appearing, they should "assess the damages in such sum as you believe, under all the circumstances of this case in evidence, the plaintiff ought to recover, not exceeding," etc. In other words, the jury were not here told, as in the Fries Case, that they could give expression or full vent to their feelings, which in effect meant their sympathies, or at least could easily be so interpreted, in fixing the damages, but that they were to arrive at a sum which they believed, from all the circumstances in evidence, the plaintiff ought to receive as a fair and just compensation for the loss or damages sustained by him by reason of the injuries received through the negligence of the defendant.

The specific objection to the second instruction complained of is that the court, in setting forth the elements which the jury should take into account in assessing the damages, declared that, in addition to the immediate effect of the injuries sustained by plaintiff, they should consider "the pain and suffering which will be endured, if any, as the result of said injuries," etc. The vice of the instruction, it is insisted, is involved in that portion thereof in which the jury were thus told that any pain and suffering, if any, which the plaintiff will endure in the future as the result of his injuries constitute a proper element to be considered in fixing the damages; the argument being that this language authorized the jury to fix the damages, so far as the future effect of plaintiff's injuries was concerned, not alone upon what the evidence might show, with reasonable certainty, would be his future suffering, etc., but also upon what the jury might, by means of mere speculation or conjecture, conclude that the extent of his future pain and suffering might be. We do not so understand the language of the instruction. That plaintiff was entitled, not only to such damages as the evidence established that he had suffered, but also to such further damages as the evidence disclosed that he would suffer in the future, is a proposition no one will dispute. If, therefore, the evidence here disclosed with reasonable certainty the extent of the suffering, if any, plaintiff would endure in the future as the result of his injuries, the plain duty of the jury was to consider such evidence in fixing the amount of the damages. And, all that the instruction in effect declares is that, if the evidence was such as to enable them to ascertain and determine what the future pain and suffering of the plaintiff will be, then they should consider the same as one of the basic elements upon which they should assess the damages.

The instruction here is not like that condemned in the case of Melone v. Sierra Rail- way Co., 151 Cal. 113, 91 Pac. 522, et seq. In that case the trial court instructed the jury that an element of damages "was the pain and anxiety that he suffered or may suffer by reason of his injuries." This instruction was declared to be erroneous because the auxiliary verb as therein employed necessarily expressed the idea that the jury could indulge in speculation or conjecture as to whether and to what extent the complaining party would suffer in the future as the result of his injuries. Counsel for the appellant see no distinction between the two instructions, contending that the words "may" and "will" are used interchangeably, and are commonly so understood. Colloquially these auxiliary verbs may be so used and understood, but in grammatical construction they perform entirely distinct offices, and therefore convey essentially different meanings, the one importing a mere possibility or vague or indefinite speculation as to the existence of some fact or thing, the other the unqualified or unconditional existence of some fact or thing; or, in other words, the one meaning an existence in possibility, and the other an existence in actuality. A sick patient, for illustration, would much prefer to have his physician say, "You will recover," to the expression of the doubtful prognosis, "You may recover." Nor can it be assumed that the word "will" as employed in the instruction under review was so used by the court and understood by the jury as an auxiliary verb in any other than its true grammatical sense. The instruction here and the one in the Melone Case are therefore totally dissimilar, and obviously, as stated, convey entirely different meanings.

The cause seems to have been carefully and fairly tried; and, as before declared, the evidence abundantly supports the verdict and the amount of damages returned. In fact, when the youth of the plaintiff, and the dangerous machine upon which he was put to work without previous experience in its manipulation, and without having been specially warned with regard to the danger involved in its operation, are considered, we think, in view of the seriousness and permanency of the effect of plaintiff's injuries, the defendant was very considerably and liberally treated by the jury.

The negligence of the defendant is not disputed on this appeal, nor is there any claim here of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

No reason has been disclosed why the judgment and order appealed from should not be allowed to stand. They are, therefore, for the reasons herein given, affirmed.

WHITE v. MITCHELL. (Civ. 584.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Aug. 24, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 15, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 177*)—EQUALIZATION BOARD—LIMITATION OF SESSIONS.

Notwithstanding Municipal Corporation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1906, p. 880) § 774, providing with reference to cities of the fifth and sixth class that the board of equalization shall continue in session until the returns of the assessors shall have been rectified, and an ordinance of the city of Woodland that members of the board shall receive the sum of $5 per day, an ordinance of the trustees of such city, requiring the work of equalization to be completed within two weeks, was authorized by Municipal Corporation Act, § 773, providing that such trustees shall provide by ordinance a system for the assessment, levy and collection of all city taxes not inconsistent with the provisions of the chapter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 420; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 177*)—EQUALIZATION BOARD—COMPENSATION OF EQUALIZATION BOARD.

An ordinance of the trustees of a city, limiting the meetings of the board of equalization to two weeks, was valid as an exercise of the power of the trustees to fix the compensation of the members of the board.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1015*) — CLAIMS—PASSAGE BY BOARD—EFFECT.

Where the board of trustees of a city approved a claim, and ordered a warrant drawn in favor of a member of the equalization board for 15 days' services, in violation of an ordinance of the city limiting the sessions of such board to two weeks, and the excessiveness of the claim appeared on the face of the proceedings, the allowance of the board was not conclusive on the auditor, but it was his duty to refuse to issue a warrant therefor.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a member of the city's board of equalization was erroneously allowed pay for more than two weeks' services on the board in violation of an ordinance limiting the sessions of the board to two weeks, and applied for mandamus to compel the issuance of a warrant for the amount of the claim as allowed, he was not prejudiced by admission of evidence that members of the board were dilatory, and could have completed it in 12 days or less, where he was allowed compensation for 12 days.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County;
N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Application by W. S. White for a writ of mandate to compel J. R. Mitchell, as president of the board of trustees of the city of Woodland, to draw a warrant for 15 days' service by relator on the said board of equalization, at the rate of $5 a day. From an order denying the writ, relator appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Anderson and M. S. Ish, for appellant.
E. B. Mering, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The board of trustees of the city of Woodland approved a claim and ordered a warrant drawn in favor of appellant for 15 days' service as a member of the board of equalization of said city at $5 per day, and respondent refused to issue the warrant, claiming that under an ordinance of said city the work of equalization must be completed within the limit of two weeks. Application was made to the superior court of Yolo county for a writ of mandate to compel respondent to draw said warrant. The appeal is from the order denying the writ.

The basis for appellant's contention is found in section 774 of the general municipal corporation act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1906, p. 880) and an ordinance of the said city of Woodland adopted in 1907, fixing the compensation of the members of the board of equalization. The former provides that the board "shall continue in session from day to day until all of the returns of the assessor have been rectified," and the latter, that each member "while in actual attendance upon the meetings of the board of equalization" shall receive "the sum of $5.00 per day." Since appellant was in actual attendance as a member of said board for 15 days, it is admitted that he would be entitled to the writ were it not for an ordinance in force adopted by the board of trustees in 1890, providing "that said meetings may be held from time to time, as in such notice specified, for the period of two weeks, if necessary, and no longer." While the Legislature in the said municipal corporation act provided for cities of the fourth class that the "sessions of the board shall be held from time to time, as in its notice specified, for the period of two weeks, and no longer," there is no such limitation prescribed as to cities of the fifth and the sixth class. The direction as to these, already noted, is that the board shall remain in session until all the returns are rectified, but that necessarily implies that the sessions should continue only so long as is necessary to accomplish this purpose. It was certainly not intended that this work should be indefinitely prolonged, and thereby the city be put to unnecessary expense. In the absence of any other legislation on the subject the board of equalization would probably be authorized to determine the length of time necessary to rectify the returns, and their determination, in the absence of fraud, would be conclusive. But there is certainly nothing unreasonable in the view that such regulation has been committed to the said members of the board of equalization, but acting in the capacity of the board of trustees, and thereby constituting the local legislative body. They have the necessary knowledge, and the question is one of legislative control within the restriction, of course, that any limitation should not be unreasonable. There is nothing before us to show that two weeks was not ample time in which to rectify all the returns, and we think that the ordinance in question is not inconsistent with the grant of power by the Legislature to the board of equalization, and is authorized by the general law found in section 773 of the said municipal corporation act, providing that "The board of trustees shall have the power and it shall be their duty to provide by ordinance a system for the assessment, levy and collection of all city taxes not inconsistent with the provisions of this chapter."

But, again, appellant concedes that the board of trustees have authority to limit the number of days for which the members of the board of equalization shall receive compensation for their services. This concession necessarily leads to an affirmation of the judgment, because the practical effect of the ordinance is to limit the compensation of the members, and the only question before us is its validity to that extent. The situation is entirely the same as though the trustees had enacted one ordinance providing that "each member of the board of equalization while in attendance upon the meetings of said board shall receive five dollars per day but the sessions shall continue two weeks, if necessary, but no longer." This method of limiting the period of compensation is just as effective as though it had been expressly provided that the members should be paid for a period no longer than two weeks.

Since we are really concerned with the validity of said ordinance only as it relates to and affects the compensation of the said members of the board of equalization, we need not discuss the difficulties that may arise, as suggested by appellant, if said ordinance should be held operative for all purposes. In response, however, to the criticism of appellant that the ordinance is impracticable and unreasonable because it extends "the time two weeks for the taxpayer to make his first appearance, and thus making it possible for all the work to fall on the last day of the two weeks, and thereby making it impossible for the work to be completed in two weeks, and it deprives the taxpayer of the right to know with certainty the date he must appear, for it gives the assessor authority to notify him that he has the whole of two weeks in which to appear, at the same time it compels the board to adjourn as soon as their work is completed, and this even though only a day is found necessary in order to complete it," it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the ordinance to prevent the assessor from giving notice that the board will remain in session for two weeks, if necessary, but that each taxpayer who desires to be heard must be present on the first day, and from day to day, if required, until the returns are rectified. It is presumed that this course is pursued by the assessor, and thus, as admitted by appellant, two weeks is ample time in which to complete the work.

It might be conceded, as claimed by appellant, that the acts of the board while in session beyond the two weeks' limit are not void, and that the ordinance is subject to the provisions of section 3885 of the Political Code, declaring that "No act relating to assessment * * * is illegal * * * because the same was not completed within the time required by law," and it would not disturb the conclusion we have reached that the members of the board are bound by the terms of the ordinance as to their compensation. Third parties, not injured by the failure of the board to comply with the requirement of said ordinance, could not thereby be excused from a public duty, nor be relieved of a public burden. There is a great difference between the case of a taxpayer seeking to avoid the payment of his just taxes by reason of the technical violation of the law on the part of the revenue officers and the case of the latter trying to profit by their own remissness. Payne v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. 122; Buswell v. Supervisors, 116 Cal. 351, 48 Pac. 226.

Cases are cited by appellant to the point that "when the board passed upon the claim of the petitioner, and ordered a warrant drawn for $75, it was within the scope of their powers to decide, and they did decide, the necessity and quantity and quality of the service, and their judgment was final and cannot be set aside, except upon proper allegations and proof of fraud." But in the case at bar it appeared upon the face of the proceedings that the board had allowed compensation in excess of that authorized by the law, and therefore the finding was not conclusive. The rule is as stated in Walton v. McPhetridge, 120 Cal. 443, 52 Pac. 733, that "If illegal claims are allowed by the board, it will be the duty of the auditor to refuse to draw warrants therefor, and the auditor ought not to draw his warrant for an illegal demand, even though allowed by the board; and, if he does so knowingly and willfully, he is personally responsible, and may be made to refund the money thus illegally paid."

Objection was made by appellant to certain evidence tending to show that the members of the board were dilatory in their work, and that they could have completed it in 12 days or less, but, conceding the ruling of the court to be erroneous, it was without prejudice, as under the ordinance they were entitled to compensation for only 12 days, and it is found that petitioner is entitled to the sum of $60, and that said sum is due him from said city of Woodland. It may be said, though, that if such evidence is to be regarded, it appears that petitioner had expressed his determination to coerce the municipality into the payment of a sum of money for services unnecessarily prolonged, and therefore an added reason is shown for looking with disfavor upon his application.

At any rate, we think the court was justified in denying the writ, and the order is affirmed.

J. S. POTTS DRUG CO. v. BENEDICT et al.
(S. F. 4,980.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1909.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 80½*)—ASSIGNMENT—EVIDENCE.

In an action for the balance of the consideration for the assignment of a leasehold, evidence held to show prima facie the execution of the lease by the owner to plaintiff, and the subsequent existence of the leasehold estate which was assigned, as well as the lessor's consent to the assignment.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—CONTRACTS—AUTHORITY—EVIDENCE.

The execution of a lease and its assignment by the proper officers of a corporation under the corporate seal was prima facie evidence that the instruments were executed under proper authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1729; Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 76*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—ASSIGNMENT CONTRARY TO LEASE—EFFECT.

The assignment of a lease, which provides that it shall not be assigned without the lessor's consent, is not void; such unauthorized assignment being merely a breach of covenant, giving the lessor the right to forfeit the lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 225, 228; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 79*)—TERM OF YEARS—NATURE OF INTEREST.

A leasehold of a term is a chattel real, and is personal property, so that its assignment would be governed by the rules applicable to the sale of personal property.

5. SALES (§ 201*)—TRANSFER OF TITLE—DELIVERY—NECESSITY.

Delivery is not essential to the consummation of a contract of sale and the passing of title, if the chattel is identified, unless the contract specifically makes delivery essential.

6. SALES (§ 199*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—DELIVERY—INTENTION OF PARTIES.

Whether the parties intended to make delivery essential to the passing of title is to be determined from their intention as expressed in the written contract of sale; and, if the contract shows a manifest intention, either way, it controls.

7. SALES (§ 215*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—TIME TITLE PASSES.

Words of assignment or sale in the present are not conclusive on the question as to whether there was a present passing of title, but must be construed with the whole contract, though, unless, when so construed, the contract as a whole is inconsistent with a present sale, present words of transfer necessarily import a present transfer of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 574, 575; Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes.

8. PROPERTY (§ 7*)—OWNERSHIP.

The ownership of property may be in one person, and the right to its use and possession be in another; the owner holding the property subject to the rights of the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Property, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

9. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 79*)—TERMS—ASSIGNMENT—CONSTRUCTION—TIME TITLE PASSES.

Plaintiff was lessee of certain premises for a term of five years extending from 1904, with privilege of renewal, and on April 17, 1906, executed a written assignment thereof, which provided that plaintiff "does by these presents, sell, convey, assign, transfer and set over" to defendants "a certain indenture of lease [describing the lease], to have and to hold the same * * * from April 12, 1906, and for all the remainder yet to come of said term of said lease, to wit, ten years from the 15th of September, 1904, provided, however, that" plaintiff "may occupy said premises pursuant to said lease, notwithstanding said assignment, until June 15, 1906, and shall in any event pay the rent reserved * * * to the lessor to said 15th day of June, 1906," at which time plaintiff shall deliver up possession to defendants who will thereupon take possession and thereafter pay the rent. A memorandum of agreement made the same day recited the execution of the assignment, and provided that defendants thereby agreed to pay plaintiff on July 15, 1906, a further sum, and plaintiff agreed to pay the rent up to June 15, 1906, and deliver possession to defendants on that date. Held, that the assignment transferred plaintiff's leasehold absolutely and unconditionally as of the date of the transaction, subject merely to its right to occupy the premises until June 15th, and title thereto vested in defendants as of that date, under Civ. Code, § 1140, providing that title to personalty passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer and the subject-matter is identified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 247, 249; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

10. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 79*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—DISCHARGE BY IMPOSSIBILITY OF PERFORMANCE—DESTRUCTION OF SUBJECT-MATTER.

Absolute impossibility of performance such as results from the destruction, without the promisor's fault, of the subject-matter of the contract excuses performance, where it appears that the parties contracted on the basis of its continued existence; so that, where an assignment of a lease transferred the assignor's interest unconditionally as of its date, but provided that he might occupy the premises and pay rent until a certain date, when he should deliver the premises to the assignee, the contract was upon the basis of the continued existence of the premises, and the assignor could recover the price though the premises were destroyed before time for delivery of possession, and though delivery of possession is treated as a condition precedent to payment.

11. SALES (§ 150*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—LOSS OF PROPERTY.

In the absence of agreement to the contrary, after title passes the property is at the risk of the buyer, though possession has not been delivered; but, where there is a more agreement to sell, loss of the property falls upon the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 354; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the J. S. Potts Drug Company against C. S. Benedict and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gavin McNab, F. H. Gould, and R. P. Henshall, for appellant. Seth Mann and Bishop & Hoefler (Alfred J. Harwood, of counsel), for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendants, given upon granting defendants' motion for a nonsuit, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover the sum of $15,000, as a balance due from defendants, on account of the sale, assignment, and delivery by plaintiff to defendants of a certain lease.

The evidence showed the following facts: On April 17, 1906, plaintiff was the lessee of the premises numbered 815 Market street, being a store and basement in the building of the California Academy of Sciences (a corporation), under a lease executed to plaintiff by the owner of said building, said Academy of Sciences, in the year 1904, for the term of five years, with the privilege of five more, at the rent of $350 a month for the first five years, and $400 a month for the second five years. One of the terms of the lease was that there should be no transfer thereof except with the approval of the board of trustees of the lessor. Nothing further appears as to the terms of the lease. It had been executed in duplicate, and one copy was in the possession of plaintiff. Plaintiff and defendants had apparently been negotiating for the sale by plaintiff to defendants of plaintiff's leasehold interest in these premises, and the necessary papers had been prepared. On the day named, April 17, 1906, defendant Scott came to the premises for the express purpose of closing up the transaction. He then had in his possession and produced these papers. One of such papers was a formal assignment, bearing date April 12, 1906, and signed "J. S. Potts Drug Company, by J. S. Potts, President, by J. A. Logan, Secretary," with the seal of the corporation attached. It stated that the J. S. Potts Drug Company, for and in consideration of $5, and other valuable considerations to it passing and received, "do by these presents, sell, convey, assign, transfer and set over unto the said C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict a certain indenture of lease [describing the lease already referred to], to have and to hold the same unto the said C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, their successors and assigns, from the 12th day of April, 1906, and for and during all the remainder yet to come of said term of said lease, to wit, ten (10) years from the 15th day of September, 1904; provided, however, that the said J. S. Potts Drug Company may occupy said premises pursuant to said lease, notwithstanding said assignment, until June 15, 1906, and shall in any event, pay the rent in said lease reserved to the lessor up to the said 15th day of June, 1906, and that at the said date the said J. S. Potts Drug Company will deliver up possession to the said C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, or their assigns, who will thereupon take possession and thereafter pay said rent." Attached to this assignment was what purported to be the written consent of the California Academy of Sciences, bearing date April 17, 1906, signed by its president and secretary, with its seal attached. In this it was stated that the Academy of Sciences "hereby gives its written consent to the foregoing assignment, and accepts C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, described in said assignment, as tenant and lessee under the said lease described in said assignment, in place and stead of the J. S. Potts Drug Company." It was further stated therein that said lease should be modified in several respects, in that Scott and Benedict may assign the lease to a bank, and that the premises may be used for banking, trust, safe deposit, or mercantile purposes; that Scott and Benedict may sublet the premises, or any part of such premises; that they may make alterations in the premises to fit them for banking purposes, providing the same be done under the supervision and to the satisfaction of the lessor's agent; and that they may at any time before the termination of the lease remove certain fixtures.

There was also a memorandum of agreement reading as follows:

"Memorandum of agreement, made this 12th day of April, 1906, between the J. S. Potts Drug Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of California, the party of the first part, and C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, the parties of the second part;

"Witnesseth: That for and in consideration of a certain assignment of lease, this day executed by the party of the first part to the parties of the second part, the parties of the second part have paid to the party of the first part the sum of one thousand five hundred (1500) dollars, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and the parties of the second part hereby promise and agree to pay to the party of the first part, on the 15th day of July, 1906, the further sum of fifteen thousand (15,000) dollars, and in consideration of the premises, the party of the first part agrees to pay the rent of said premises up to the 15th day of June, 1906, and to deliver possession thereof to the parties of the second part, or their assigns, on said 15th day of June, 1906.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals, in duplicate, the day and year first above written, the party of the first part executing the same by its president and secretary, thereunto duly authorized.

"J. S. Potts Drug Co.

"J. S. Potts, Pres.

"J. A. Logan, Secty.

"C. S. Benedict,

"C. S. Scott."

The signatures to this paper were proved to be genuine, and there was attached the seal of the plaintiff corporation, the president and secretary of which had been duly authorized to execute both assignment and agreement. The transaction was then and there completed between the parties, by Mr. Logan, secretary of plaintiff, acting for plaintiff, and Mr. Scott, acting for himself and Mr. Benedict. The papers already referred to were mutually examined by Mr. Logan and Mr. Scott; Mr. Scott gave to Mr. Logan a check for $1,500 (which was subsequently cashed by plaintiff); Mr. Logan delivered to Mr. Scott the assignment, and also the duplicate of the agreement, retaining the original thereof, and, according to his evidence, also delivered to him the indenture of lease executed by the Academy of Sciences to the plaintiff. On the next day, April 18, 1906, the demised premises were entirely destroyed by fire, the building of which they constituted a part being entirely destroyed, with the exception that some portion of the rear was left standing, and this portion was subsequently removed with the aid of dynamite. Actual possession of the premises by plaintiff was thus terminated, and defendants never went into actual occupancy. No part of the $15,000 has even been paid by defendants.

No point is made here in support of two of the grounds upon which the motion for nonsuit was based, and it is clear that neither finds any support in the record. The evidence did make a prima facie case both on the question of the execution of the lease by the Academy of Sciences to plaintiff, and the consequent existence of the leasehold estate which was the subject of the transaction, and on the question of the assent of the lessor to the making of the assignment. Each instrument was signed by the proper officers, and had the seal of the corporation attached, and this afforded prima facie evidence that they were executed under the proper authority. Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543, 596, 99 Am. Dec. 300; Underhill v. Santa Barbara, etc., Co., 93 Cal. 300, 314, 28 Pac. 1049; Purser v. Eagle Lake, etc., Co., 111 Cal. 139, 142, 43 Pac. 523. Nor would the assignment of the lease have been void if such consent had not been obtained from the lessor. "It seems to be the law that where there is a clause in a lease that it shall not be assigned without the previous consent of the lessor, and there is a breach of the covenant not to assign, the lessor has only the option to forfeit the lease for the breach of the condition, and that the assignment is not void, but passes the term, and the only remedy is for breach of the covenant; and it has been held that the assignment is voidable only at the option of the lessor or his representatives." Garcia v. Gunn, 119 Cal. 315, 319, 51 Pac. 684.

The remaining grounds of the motion for nonsuit were: First, that there was a fatal variance between the allegations in the complaint and the proof, in that plaintiff alleged an unconditional, completed, executed assignment of the lease, while the proof showed that the sale or assignment of the lease was a conditional one, uncompleted and unfilled; and, second, that under the terms of the contract the delivery of the demised premises on June 15, 1906, was a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to recover the $15,000. Upon the facts stated it appears plain to us that the transaction of April 17, 1906, was an absolute, unconditional contract of sale of plaintiff's leasehold interest in the demised premises, and that the title thereto then vested in defendants, subject only to the right of plaintiff to occupy such premises until June 15, 1906, if it so desired. The subject of the transaction between the parties in this case was the estate of plaintiff in the demised premises created by the lease from the Academy of Sciences to it. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 436. Such estate, being one for years, was not real property, but was a chattel real, and, under the law, must be regarded as having been part of the personal estate of plaintiff. "An assignment of a term for years is therefore governed generally by the rules applicable to the sale of personal property." Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 435; Jeffers v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 113 Cal. 345, 353, 45 Pac. 680. The important thing to bear in mind in this connection is that it was this estate in the demised premises that was being negotiated about, with a view to its sale by plaintiff to defendants. Our Civil Code provides that "the title to personal property sold or exchanged, passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing itself is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not." Section 1140. There is nothing new or startling in this; it being in full accord with the settled law independent of statute. Benjamin on Sales, § 3. A delivery of possession of property sold is not essential to the consummation of the contract of sale, and the consequent passing of title, in the case of a specific identified chattel (Benjamin on Sales, §§ 308, 315; Tyson v. Wells, 2 Cal. 122; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 1045), unless the parties by their contract have made such delivery essential.

The question here is whether the parties agreed upon a present unconditional transfer of plaintiff's leasehold interest—its estate in the demised premises. Their intention in this regard is to be here ascertained from the written instruments duly executed and delivered. "The agreement is just what the parties intended to make it. If that intention is clearly and unequivocally manifested, cadit questio." Benjamin on Sales, § 309. In Elgee Cotton Cases, 22 Wall. 180, 187, 22 L. Ed. 863, it was said by the United States Supreme Court: "It must be admitted there is often great difficulty in determining whether a contract is itself a sale of personal property so as to pass the ownership to the vendee, or whether it is a sale on condition, to take effect or be consummated only when the condition shall be performed, or whether it is a mere agreement to sell. It is doubtless true that whether the property passes or not is dependent upon the intention of the parties to the contract, and that intention must be gathered from the language of the instrument." Defendants' position in this regard necessarily must be that the executed writings show that it was intended by the parties that delivery of actual possession of the demised premises on or before June 15, 1906, should be a condition precedent to the consummation of the actual sale of the leasehold interest, and the consequent passing of title, or, as put by learned counsel for defendants, "that there was to be no transfer of the leasehold interest until the time specified for the delivery of possession." It seems impossible to us to find any such intention expressed in the writing.

It must be conceded that the actual words of assignment used show an intention to effect a present transfer of the leasehold interest as clearly and emphatically as any words the parties could have adopted. As we have seen, the language used in the assignment is that the plaintiff company "do by these presents, sell, convey, assign, transfer and set over unto the said C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, a certain indenture of lease," describing it and describing the premises thereby let. The words "indenture of lease" must of course be taken as meaning the estate created by the lease referred to. It is true that the mere fact that words of assignment in presenti are used is not necessarily conclusive on the question of consummated sale. The words "must be construed in connection with the rest of the contract, which must be taken as a whole and such construction placed on it as the language used in the entire instrument calls for." Anderson v. Read, 106 N. Y. 333, 344, 13 N. E. 292. Notwithstanding the use of such words, therefore it may appear that the idea of a present transfer is utterly inconsistent with other controlling features of the transaction evidenced by other provisions, in which event they will be construed, in connection with such other provisions, as not importing a present transfer. See McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 461, 462; Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; Anderson v. Read, supra. But unless affected by other provisions, such language necessarily imports what it says, viz., a present transfer. It is simply, as said in Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., supra, "not conclusive" where other features of the transaction show that it cannot be taken as meaning a present transfer, or, as said in Anderson v. Read, supra, where this is shown by "the whole of the language used in the contract and the circumstances of the transaction."

In the case at bar, the words importing a present transfer of the leasehold interest are followed, in the habendum and tenendum clause, by this language: "To have and to hold the same" [the leasehold interest in said premises under said lease] unto the said C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, their successors and assigns, from the 12th day of April, 1906, and for and during all the remainder yet to come of said term of said lease mentioned therein, to wit, ten (10) years from the 15th day of September, 1904." (The italics are ours.) This confirms and emphasizes the previous words of present assignment of the leasehold interest, and negatives any theory of reservation by the assignor of any right of property as to any portion of the term. It states as clearly as it can be put in the English language that the assignees and their successors and assigns are to have and hold the assigned property from the 12th day of April, 1906, "during all the remainder yet to come of said term."

We fail to find anything in the other language of either the assignment or memorandum of agreement, or in any of the circumstances of the transaction, that is necessarily inconsistent with the theory of a present transfer of the leasehold interest. The proviso in the assignment in no way refers to the property assigned, the leasehold interest, but is carefully confined by its terms to the mere occupancy of the demised premises for a limited period, the payment by the assignor of the rent for such time, and the subsequent delivery up of possession of such premises to the assignee. The proviso is: "Provided, however, that the said J. S. Potts Drug Company may occupy said premises pursuant to said lease, notwithstanding said assignment, until June 15, 1906, and shall in any event pay the rent in said lease reserved to the lessor up to said 15th day of June, 1906, and that at said date the said J. S. Potts Drug Company will deliver up possession to the said C. S. Scott and C. S. Benedict, or their assigns who will thereupon take possession and thereafter pay said rent." Learned counsel for defendants say that "the property in the term of years could not pass to the defendants while the 'use and possession' were retained by the plaintiff," but we cannot perceive that this is so, or that there is any difference in this regard favorable to defendants' theory between the case of the assignment of a leasehold interest and the case of the sale of a horse, in which latter case counsel say the vendor may retain the use and possession, and the proprietary interest be vested in the vendee. In either case the right to the use and possession of the thing sold is most important to the vendee who acquires the title, and if by the contract of the parties such right is retained by or given to the vendor for a considerable period of time, the value of the vendee's property may be much impaired, but he may nevertheless be the legal owner of the thing itself, even though the right to the possession is postponed for a time. It cannot be the law as to any kind of property that parties may not agree that the ownership of the property shall be in one, and that the right to the use and possession for a time shall be in another. In such a case the legal owner simply holds the property subject to such right in the other party. The question in any such case is simply whether they have so agreed. Now, as we have said, the proviso in this regard is carefully limited to a mere right of occupancy of the demised premises for approximately two months, a matter not necessarily inconsistent with the theory of present transfer of the title to the leasehold estate. The fact that it is stipulated that plaintiff may occupy, "pursuant to said lease, notwithstanding such assignment," does not render the provision necessarily inconsistent with such theory. To the contrary, these words imply the understanding of the parties that the title to the leasehold is transferred, but that notwithstanding such transfer the grantor may continue to occupy the demised premises until June 15, 1906, in accord with the provisions of the lease as if no such transfer had been made. Whether this provision be a reservation, or, as claimed by plaintiff's counsel, a grant of a privilege by defendants to plaintiff, is immaterial in this connection. If a reservation, it was clearly intended only as a reservation of the mere right of occupancy of the demised premises for a limited time, and not as a reservation of the title to the estate for any portion of the term. Of course, there is nothing in conflict with the theory of present transfer in the fact that the assignor, retaining or being granted the privilege of occupancy to June 15th, agreed to pay the rent to that date, and, at the end of the stipulated time, to "deliver up possession" to the owners, who will thereupon enter into possession and thereafter pay the rent. We are satisfied that the language used by the parties in this instrument is not reasonably susceptible of any other construction than that the parties intended to effect thereby a present transfer of the title to the leasehold interest, and there is nothing in the memorandum of agreement executed at the same time to indicate otherwise. It follows that by the execution and delivery of the assignment, defendants became the owners of such leasehold interest.

As we have stated heretofore, this is an action to recover the balance of the agreed purchase price of said leasehold interest.

Learned counsel insist that even if there was a completed sale and passing of the title to defendants, plaintiff cannot recover, because the delivery of possession of the demised premises was made by the parties a condition precedent to the payment of this balance of the purchase price. We have already stated the language of the agreement in this behalf. While it is earnestly insisted by counsel for plaintiff that the provision for delivery of such possession was not a condition precedent to the payment of the price, but was a mere personal covenant on the part of plaintiff, it may be assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that it was such a condition precedent. So assuming, it must nevertheless be held that, by reason of the destruction of the demised premises, without fault on the part of plaintiff, performance of this condition on its part was excused, and the money was payable. The general rule applicable is the one stated in the quotation from 9 Cyc. 631, contained in defendants' brief, as follows: "Where from the nature of the contract it is evident that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the person or thing to which it relates, the subsequent perishing of the person or thing will excuse the performance. Thus where the contract relates to the use or possession or any dealing with specific things in which the performance necessarily depends on the existence of the particular thing, the condition is implied by the law that the impossibility arising from the perishing or destruction of the thing, without default in the party, shall excuse the performance, because, from the nature of the contract, it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the subject of the contract." This rule is fully discussed in Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 570, and in 1 Beach on Modern Law of Contracts, §§ 217, 234, 237. The cases cited by learned counsel for defendants are not in conflict with this rule, which appears to be universally accepted. It is based, as stated in the authorities, upon the proposition that in such cases a condition is implied that the impossibility arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance. Where, as was the case in Wilmington, etc., Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 1, 32 Pac. 705, cited by counsel, the party has expressly agreed to pay to the owner the sum of $3,500, in the event that a lighter rented to him is "lost" while in his possession and cannot be redelivered, and the loss occurs, and the owner sues to recover the $3,500, it is obvious that the stipulation was not entered into on the basis of a continued existence of the lighter, and that the rule has no application. It does not apply, either, where performance of the contract is possible, "although the obligor himself may have become wholly unable to perform." Wilson v. Alcatraz, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 182, 188, 75 Pac. 787. "If a thing is possible in itself to be done—possible in the nature of things to be done—a positive contract to do it is binding, though some unforeseen contingency, accident, or calamity may prevent its performance by the promisor." American Note, Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) p. 598. "The impossibility must consist in the nature of the thing to be done, and not in the inability of the party to do it." Wilson v. Alcatraz, etc., Co., supra. But absolute and inherent impossibility of performance, such as an impossibility caused by the destruction without fault on the part of the promisor of the thing to which the promise relates, is always an excuse where it is evident that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the thing. As applied to a stipulation for the mere delivery to the vendee of a specific article sold, the situation under this rule is clear. As stated in Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 570, quoting Blackburn, J., in Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826, 32 L. J. Q. B. 164: "Where a contract of sale is made, amounting to a bargain and sale, transferring presently the property in specific chattels, which are to be delivered by the vendor at a future day, there, if the chattels without the fault of the vendor perish in the interval, the purchaser must pay the price, and the vendor is excused from performing his contract to deliver, which has thus become impossible." The liability to pay the price in such a case, notwithstanding failure to deliver possession, rests upon the fact that the purchaser was the owner of the property at the time of its destruction. It is elementary in the law of sales that, in the absence of special agreement to the contrary, the risk accompanies the title, and that when a present unconditional sale is actually consummated, and the title has passed, the property is thenceforth at the risk of the buyer, so far as accidental destruction by fire, etc., is concerned, even though possession thereof has not been delivered. See Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 308; Tyson v. Wells, 2 Cal. 122, 124; Girdner v. Beswick, 69 Cal. 112, 116, 10 Pac. 278; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 1045, note; Rail v. Little Falls, etc., Co., 47 Minn. 422, 50 N. W. 471; 1 Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 207; 3 Page on Contracts, § 1370; 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1413. Where there is a mere agreement to sell, and title therefore has not passed, the loss falls on the vendor for the same reason. In such a case the vendor is excused from the performance of his contract, under the rule we have discussed, by reason of the destruction of the thing, but he cannot retain money already paid on account of the proposed purchase, or recover moneys remaining unpaid. See Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, 9 Am. Rep. 65; Gould v. Murch, 70 Me. 288, 35 Am. Rep. 325; Smith v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 91 Cal. 323, 331, 27 Pac. 738, 13 L. R. A. 475, 25 Am. St. Rep. 191.

In the case at bar, it is too plain for discussion that the parties contracted for the delivery of possession of the demised premises on June 15, 1906, on the basis of the continued existence of such demised premises. Under the rule we have discussed the plaintiff was excused from such delivery as a condition precedent to its right to recover the price agreed to be paid for the leasehold interest, the title to which had already passed to defendants at the time of the destruction of the demised premises. The case is doubtless a hard one on the facts, so far as defendants are concerned, if those facts are as shown by the evidence given on behalf of plaintiff. They are compelled to pay a large sum of money for property which was entirely destroyed, without having received any substantial benefit therefrom. It is, however, no harder on them than it would have been had there been no reservation of possession of the demised premises, and they had been given actual possession thereof on April 17, 1906, nor is it harder on them than it would have been on the plaintiff had the sale not been consummated on that day. It is simply the case of an owner of valuable property being deprived thereof by reason of its destruction by fire.

In view of what we have said, it is apparent that there is no force in the contention that there was a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof, in that plaintiff alleged an unconditional, completed, executed assignment of the lease, while the proof showed that the sale or assignment of the lease was a conditional one, uncompleted and unfulfilled. The point in this connection appears to be that no delivery of the property sold was shown; the complaint in the first count being in the form of a common count for goods sold and delivered, and in the second count alleging that on April 17, 1906, "plaintiff sold, assigned, and delivered," etc. As we have seen, the subject-matter of the assignment was the leasehold interest, the estate for years. This, we are satisfied, must be held to have been delivered to and accepted by defendants by the execution and delivery by plaintiff and the acceptance by defendants of the assignment of lease. BURNE v. LEE. (L. A. 2261.)

1. FRAUD (§ 31*) — ACTIONS — ELECTION OF REMEDY.

One induced by fraud to enter into a contract may elect either to rescind by restoring what he has received thereunder, or to affirm without restoring the consideration received, and sue for damages caused by the fraud.

2. FRAUD (§ 35*)—ACTIONS—WAIVER OF RIGHT OF ACTION.

One who, after discovery of the fraud which induced him to make a contract, assents to a new agreement concerning the subject-matter of the contract, thereby waives his claim for damages caused by the fraud.

3. FRAUD (§ 35*)—RIGHT OF ACTION—WAIVER.

Plaintiff purchased from defendant one-half the capital stock of a corporation, upon defendant's agreement to receive plaintiff as a partner in consideration of the transfer of real estate, the stock being deposited with defendant as security, and each party being entitled to receive a sum per week for services. Plaintiff claimed to have discovered that the representations inducing the purchase were false, and demanded the return of the price and rescission of the contract, which defendant refused, but, instead, agreed that all the corporate property be sold, and plaintiff be paid from the proceeds the price of the stock purchased, remainder to go to defendant; plaintiff under the agreement continuing to hold the stock until the sale, with all his rights under the original agreement. After discovering the fraud plaintiff brought an action against defendant, alleging the above facts and praying a decree that, under the agreement, he and defendant are substantially partners, and that the corporation be dissolved and defendant required to account as a copartner, and that the corporate property or the stock be sold pursuant to the second agreement. Held, that the new agreement superseded the original agreement of sale, and operated as a waiver of plaintiff's right to damages for fraud in selling the stock, so that he could not subsequently maintain an action therefor.

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 629*) — DISSOLUTION — "CAPITAL STOCK."

Civ. Code, § 309, prohibits corporate directors from dividing, withdrawing, or paying to stockholders any part of the capital stock, but provides that nothing therein shall prevent a division or distribution of capital stock remaining after paying all debts on dissolution of the corporation. Held that, while the stockholders could not authorize anything the directors could not do, and the term "capital stock" meant the actual capital or property used in the business, and not the nominal capital, an agreement, made upon plaintiff's alleged discovery of fraud by defendant in inducing plaintiff to purchase half the capital stock of a corporation, and demand for rescission of the contract of sale, by which defendant agreed to sell the corporate property and return to plaintiff the purchase price, keeping the remainder himself, could be legally carried out under the latter part of the section by dissolving the corporation after paying all debts, winding up its affairs, and dividing the proceeds under the agreement; and hence it would be assumed that such method was contemplated by the agreement.

was contemplated by the parties and will be followed.

6. CONTRACTS (§ 54*)—CONSIDERATION—WAIVER.

Defendant's agreement to sell all the corporate property, including his own interest, and return to plaintiff, from the proceeds, the price paid for his half interest in the capital stock, upon plaintiff's discovery of alleged fraud in inducing him to buy the stock, was a sufficient consideration for plaintiff's consent thereto, thereby waiving his right to damages for the fraud.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by Joseph G. Burne against Henry Lee. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank G. Finlayson, for appellant. S. J. Parsons and O. P. Widaman, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal taken by appellant on the judgment roll. The action was for damages growing out of alleged misrepresentations of defendant to appellant in the sale of corporate stock.

The complaint alleged that on October 8, 1906, the defendant, who was the owner of 60 shares of stock, being the entire amount subscribed for, or issued, of the capital stock of the West Coast Planing Mill Company, a corporation, offered to sell plaintiff 30 shares thereof for $2,500, and with intent to defraud plaintiff and to induce him to purchase said stock, made certain representations as to the value of said shares and the net profits of the corporate business; that, believing said representations, plaintiff purchased said stock; that said representations as made were untrue in this: That the corporation was not on the 8th day of October, 1906, as represented by defendant, or at any other time, making any profits, and that said shares were in fact worthless and valueless; that said plaintiff discovered that said representations were untrue on November 10, 1906; that, if the facts as represented by defendant were true, said shares of stock would have been of the value of $8,000, and plaintiff asked judgment for damages in that amount.

The answer of the defendant consisted of denials and the interposition of an affirmative defense. As to the latter it was alleged that prior to the commencement of the present action, which was brought on December 4, 1906, the plaintiff brought an action on November 23, 1906, against the West Coast Planing Mill Company and the present defendant and others, his complaint being verified; that in said action the plaintiff set forth the written agreement for the purchase by plaintiff from defendant of the 30 shares of stock of the West Coast Planing Mill Company made October 8, 1906, which recited that the plaintiff purchased from defendant a one-half interest in "the business known as the West Coast Planing Mill Company" for $2,500, and defendant agreed to receive plaintiff into partnership as an officer and business manager of the said business; that defendant was to transfer to plaintiff one-half of the stock of the aforesaid company; that in lieu of a cash payment for said 30 shares of stock plaintiff transferred to defendant a house and lot in the city of San Diego, which was to be sold by defendant, and from the proceeds thereof defendant was to take out the purchase price of $2,500, and, in addition, plaintiff deposited the said stock with defendant as additional security for the payment of such purchase price; and that each of the contracting parties should be entitled to draw not to exceed $25 per week for services rendered.

It is then stated that in the complaint in said latter action plaintiff further alleged that subsequent to the 8th day of October, 1906, and prior to November 17, 1906, plaintiff discovered that the representations made by defendant to induce said sale of the interest in said business and said shares of the stock were false; that he then demanded from defendant the return of said $2,500, offering to surrender all interest in said business and in and to said stock, and to rescind said agreement of October 8, 1906, relative to its purchase; that defendant refused to cancel said agreement, or return said $2,500 to plaintiff, but, instead of said cancellation, the defendant offered and proposed to plaintiff that the property belonging to said Pacific Coast Planing Mill Company should be sold at a price satisfactory to defendant, and that out of the proceeds, after paying all expenses, plaintiff should be paid the sum of $2,500, and the remainder of said proceeds should go to the defendant. The answer then proceeds to aver that on said November 17, 1906, an agreement to that end, in writing, was entered into between plaintiff and defendant, which provided as follows: "That the said parties hereby agree, they being the owners of the majority of the stock in the corporation known as the 'West Coast Planing Mill Company' to wit—That the property belonging to said corporation shall be sold at a price satisfactory to the party of the first part, said price to be in excess of the sum of twenty-five hundred (2500) dollars with all expenses of selling said property added; and the proceeds of said sale to be divided as follows: After paying all expenses of sale, then the sum of twenty-five hundred (2500) dollars shall be paid to the party of the second part, and the residue or remainder shall be paid to the party of the first part in full for his interest in said corporation."

It is then averred that in said former action it was further alleged by plaintiff that, until the sale as provided for in the agreement of the 17th day of November, 1906, it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that plaintiff should continue to be the owner and holder of said 30 shares of stock; that he is now the owner and holder thereof, and entitled to the interest in said business as provided for in the agreement of the 8th day of October, 1906, and entitled to act as business manager of the corporation as provided in the agreement of the last date, with the right to draw a salary not exceeding the sum of $25 a week, and as a partner with defendant in the said business plaintiff is entitled, under the terms and conditions of the agreement of October 8, 1906, to an equal voice with the said defendant in the management and control of the business of the said corporation. It is then further alleged in the answer that the said action so first begun by plaintiff is still pending and undetermined, and in it the plaintiff prayed that it be decreed that under the agreements of October 8, and November 17, 1906, the plaintiff and defendant are to all intents and purposes copartners in the business conducted in the name of said defendant corporation; that said copartnership is the substantial and beneficial owner of the assets and property of said corporation; that the said corporation be dissolved; that defendant be decreed to render an accounting to plaintiff as copartner; that the property and assets of said copartnership be sold to carry out the terms and provisions of the agreement of November 17, 1906, between plaintiff and defendant, or in lieu thereof it be decreed that all of the issued stock of said corporation be sold for the purpose of carrying out the terms and conditions of the agreement of November 17, 1906. Defendant further averred in said answer that he was willing and ready to carry out the terms and conditions of the contract between himself and plaintiff of November 17, 1906.

The plaintiff demurred to the sufficiency of the answer in as far as it set forth the affirmative matters of defense to which we have referred, which demurrer was overruled. Upon the trial the court found, among other things, in favor of the defendant as to the facts alleged in the affirmative defense, and entered a judgment in his favor based thereon.

This appeal, as we have said, is taken on the judgment roll alone, and the only question presented for determination is as to the validity of the ruling of the court on the demurrer to the affirmative defense interposed by the answer. We do not perceive any error in the ruling of the court in that respect. When the pleadings in this case are crystalized, they amount to this: The plaintiff brings an action for damages against defendant for deceit practiced in the sale of certain corporate stock under an agreement made October 6, 1906. The defendant answers, and asserts that after the discovery of the alleged deceit by plaintiff, and after negotiations looking to a rescission of the agreement of sale of October 6th, and as a result thereof, a new contract was entered into between the parties on November 17, 1906, relative to the subject-matter of such stock and the sale thereof, and the interests of the respective parties in the business represented by it, which operated as a condonation or waiver of the alleged fraud, and that prior to the commencement of the present suit, and after discovery of the alleged deceit and offer of rescission, and subsequent to the making of the contract of November 17, 1906, the plaintiff brought an action, which is still pending and undetermined, in which, relying upon the original contract of October 6th and the subsequent contract of November 17th, he sought in a court of equity a decree for practically a specific performance of the latter contract.

Now, it is well settled that when a party has been induced by fraud to enter into a contract, he may elect either to rescind the contract by restoring whatever he has received under it, or he may affirm the contract retaining whatever advantage he may have acquired, and still have his action for damages for deceit practiced upon him in making the contract. This rule is, however, subject to limitations which apply whether the contract, to which the charge of fraud is addressed, is an executed or executory contract. One of these limitations is that when a party claiming to have been defrauded enters, after discovery of the fraud, into new arrangements or engagements concerning the subject-matter of the contract to which the fraud applies, he is deemed to have waived any claim for damages on account of the fraud. The rule is clearly expressed in Schmidt v. Mesmer, 116 Cal. 267, 48 Pac. 54, where it is said: "If, after his knowledge of what he claims to have been the fraud, he elects not to rescind, but to adopt the contract and sue for damages, he must stand toward the other party at arm's length; he must on his part comply with the terms of the contract; he must not ask favors of the other party, or offer to perform the contract on conditions which he has no right to exact, and must not make any new agreement or engagement respecting it; otherwise he waives the alleged fraud."

This is but a reiteration of the general rule upon the subject, and while some of the limitations there referred to, and which apply more particularly to executory contracts, have no application in our consideration of the sufficiency of the affirmative defense set up by the answer of defendant, because here the contract of sale of the stock is to be treated as executed, others of them do. It is apparent from the matters alleged in the affirmative defense that subsequent to the discovery of the alleged fraudulent representations made by defendant when the original contract of October 6th was entered into for the purchase of the stock, and the acquirement by plaintiff of the other rights connected with the business of the corporation, that the plaintiff did not elect to stand upon the original contract and pursue his legal rights flowing from the assumption of that position, but entered into negotiations with the defendant looking to a rescission of the original contract. Of course, if the mere effort to effect a rescission or compromise had both been ineffectual, it would not have disturbed plaintiff's rights to subsequently stand on the contract and sue for damages for the fraud. But it appears from the answer that, while these negotiations for obtaining a rescission did not eventuate in that exact result, still, as the outgrowth of the efforts of plaintiff to accomplish it, a new, and what may be called a "compromise," agreement was entered into between the parties under which the claim of plaintiff against the defendant was to be settled. By making this new agreement it is quite apparent that plaintiff cannot now stand upon the original contract of October 6th. That contract was abandoned, or rather superseded, by the new contract of November 17th and by voluntarily entering into the latter the plaintiff is deemed to have waived any right for damages which he might otherwise have had, had he stood upon the original contract. The rights of plaintiff upon the discovery of the alleged fraud, and before he opened up any negotiations with the defendant, were clearly defined in law. He might have stood on his original contract and sued for damages for the deceit, or he might have rescinded the contract, and had defendant consented thereto, the plaintiff would then have had no right of action over for the deceit. Neither of these things, however, was done. Plaintiff did not stand on his original contract, and his effort at rescission resulted in a new agreement relating to the corporate stock, in which the defendant obligated himself to make a disposition of the entire business of the corporation and the repayment from the proceeds of the purchase price paid by plaintiff for his shares of the stock. Under this agreement, it was not the sale of the plaintiff's interest in the business represented by his ownership of one-half of the issued stock of the corporation from which repayment of the purchase price of his stock was to be made, but was to be a preferred payment which might necessitate the application of the entire proceeds of sale towards its payment. Obviously, this new agreement, entered into as a result of the ineffectual effort to obtain an actual rescission by consent upon the discovery of a fraud by plaintiff, was open to the claim of defendant that it was a compromise and adjustment of all the rights of plaintiff springing from the contract of October 6th; that it superseded that contract, and resulted in a waiver of any claim for damages for deceit which plaintiff otherwise might have had. This being true, the answer setting up the affirmative defense, based upon the making of the contract of November 17, 1906, with its attendant circumstances, and the pendency of the action in which plaintiff was seeking to enforce this latter contract, was not subject to any valid objection that its allegations did not constitute a defense. The matters alleged were intended to, and sufficiently did, plead the defense of a waiver by plaintiff of a right to maintain any action for damages for deceit by virtue of the agreement of November 17, 1906, made subsequent to the discovery of the alleged fraud, and the validity of which, and his rights under it, the plaintiff was then asserting in an action previously commenced, and then pending, against defendant for that purpose.

It is further insisted by plaintiff that the agreement of November 17, 1906, is not available to defendant as a waiver here and extinguishment of the obligation of defendant to pay any damages for the deceit practiced by the former in the sale of the stock. In that regard, it is claimed that the agreement was illegal and void, as being a contract to sell the property of a corporation and divide the proceeds among the stockholders, which is prohibited by section 309 of the Civil Code, as construed in Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300, 99 Am. Dec. 365, and Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 378, 20 Pac. 401, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520. The Code provision declares that "The directors must not * * * divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, * * *" and it is insisted that, as it is the declared purpose of the agreement of November 17th to sell all of the property of the corporation and divide or apply the proceeds between plaintiff and defendant, as stockholders therein, according to the stipulation in the agreement, the contract is brought within the prohibition of the Code section and is void. Of course the inhibition of the section, while directly applying to the directors of a corporation, applies equally to stockholders. What the directors cannot do in that respect the stockholders cannot do or authorize done. Kohl v. Lilienthal, supra. And by the term "capital stock" used in the section is meant the actual capital—the property used in the conduct of the business—as distinguished from the shares or nominal capital of a corporation. Excelsior W. & M. Co. v. Pierce, 90 Cal. 131, 27 Pac. 44.

Now it is not necessary to enter into any particular consideration of the section relied on by appellant, or to discuss the cases cited, because it is quite apparent that there is nothing in this contract which necessarily brings it within the inhibition of the section.

We are not now dealing with an actual sale of corporate property, or any distribution of the capital stock thereof, where from the facts in the concrete case it is to be determined whether or not the law has been violated. We have here simply a contract between the owners of the stock in the corporation (of the whole of it as the pleadings disclose, or, as the contract recites, of a majority of it), whereby it is agreed that all the property belonging to the corporation shall be sold and the proceeds disposed of in a certain manner. The agreement does not provide for a method whereby this shall be accomplished, but if it can be accomplished in any legal method, it must be assumed that that method was in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, and will be pursued. The very section of the Civil Code relied on by appellants (section 309) while prohibiting a division or distribution among the stockholders of any part of the capital stock, declares further that "nothing herein prohibits a division or distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after payment of all debts upon its dissolution or the expiration of its term of existence." As the owners of all the capital stock, and hence beneficially interested in all the property of the corporation after satisfaction of the claims of its creditors, the contracting parties may obtain a dissolution of the corporation, wind up all its affairs, dispose of its property, and, being entitled to the proceeds, be able to carry out the terms of the agreement. This would be one method of carrying out their contract; and, as it is a legal one, and one which it is possible to pursue, the contention of the appellant that the contract is in violation of the prohibitory legislation of the Civil Code is disposed of.

It is further claimed that it does not appear that there was any consideration for the asserted waiver of the right of plaintiff to damages for the deceit. We do not think this point well taken. The contract of November 17, 1906, being, as we have seen, a legal contract as far as any prohibitory legislation against it is concerned, the promise of the defendant to sell all the property of the corporation, which included, of course, his own interest in it, for the primary and possibly the sole benefit of plaintiff, was a sufficient consideration.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Will contest by Annie Budan and others against Edith Budan and others. From a verdict and judgment in favor of the latter, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Lamy & Putnam, for appellants. W. H. Spencer, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is a contest of a will (after its admission to probate) on the ground of unsoundness of mind of the testator and undue influence. The case was tried before a jury, and from a verdict and judgment in favor of respondents, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, the contestants appeal.

The points made for reversal are:

1. It is insisted that the court erred in sustaining objections to questions asked by contestants of Dr. W. M. Stover, a witness called in their behalf. The doctor—a physician—had treated the testator professionally at the San Luis sanitarium from November 25, 1907, to December 7, 1907, the date of his death. He testified, preliminarily, that he had made a diagnosis of the testator's case; had treated him continually during the above period, and during that time had observed his actions, conduct and demeanor. He was then asked by the attorney for contestants the nature of the disease from which the testator was suffering, and its duration; whether while under the control of the doctor the testator was rational or irrational; whether in his opinion he was competent to transact business during the period he was treating him; and whether he had mental capacity sufficient, on October 5, 1907 (the date of the making of the will), to have made a will and to have known and understood its tenor and purport. Objections of respondents to all of these inquiries were sustained by the court, and, we think, properly. Dr. Stover was not called as an expert; no questions as such, or hypothetical questions, were put to him. He was the attending physician of the testator; and, while no preliminary inquiries were made by the respondents to show directly, that all the information which the physician could have obtained, on the matters concerning which he was interrogated, was information acquired in attending the testator in his professional capacity as his physician, and was necessary to enable him to prescribe, or act for his patient, still we think this clearly appears to be the fact, upon a fair and reasonable consideration of the testimony of the physician as to his professional relations to, and treatment of, the testator. Under such circumstances the contestants had no right to make the inquiries because "a licensed physician * * * cannot without the consent of his patient be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Code Civ. Proc. subd. 4, § 1881. In conformity with this provision of the Code the objections to the inquiries were properly sustained.

2. One of the witnesses for respondents was a trained nurse who commenced to work at the sanitarium under Dr. Stover, and attended the testator as a nurse for three days prior to his death. She was in his room in attendance upon him every hour of the day during that period, sometimes remaining with him a few minutes, and at other times remaining for an hour or so. He talked with her on different subjects, but principally about his physical condition and going to the hospital; of his property matters; of his family, and their conduct towards him. She testified that, as a nurse, it was her duty to observe the symptoms, both physical and mental, of patients committed to her charge, and report them to the attending physician. She was asked and permitted to testify, over the objection of contestants, that she had formed an opinion of the mental soundness of the testator during the period he was under her care, and was of the opinion that he was of sound mind. It is insisted that it was error to permit this testimony because the witness was not an "intimate acquaintance" whose opinion, respecting the mental condition of a person, may be received under subdivision 10, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc. It is often a difficult matter to determine whether a witness, whose opinion is sought to be had of the mental condition of another, is an intimate acquaintance of his, within the purview of the section, or not. What the meaning of the term "intimate acquaintance" is has not been clearly defined. To be such an acquaintance necessarily requires a familiarity with the mental temperament of the person the soundness of whose mind is in question. But this familiarity is not to be measured exclusively by an acquaintanceship for any particular length of time. Time must, of course, enter as an element, but not as the controlling element. One who has known a person for years may not have had sufficient opportunity for observation to be capable of forming an opinion as to his mental condition at any given time. On the other hand, a person may have been so closely connected with another, and his opportunities may have been so favorable for observation of his conduct and demeanor, that he is qualified to speak of his mental condition, though the period of observation may have covered only a short time. So, as the circumstances must vary upon which the question of who is an "intimate acquaintance," within the meaning of the Code section, must be determined, and as no fixed rule on the subject can be laid down, the matter is necessarily left under the authorities to the discretion of the trial court, and when that discretion does not seem to have been abused, the appellate court will not interfere with the ruling of the trial court on the subject. Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 406, 29 Pac. 1101; Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 573, 35 Pac. 317; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 360, 75 Pac. 1093; Huyck v. Renzie, 151 Cal. 411, 90 Pac. 929. The witness, whose right to express an opinion is challenged, was a trained nurse, whose duty it was to take note of the mental and physical condition of the testator during the time she had him in charge, and who did so. She had conversations with him daily on various subjects, and from her relation to him as nurse, had favorable opportunities to become, at least to some extent, intimately acquainted with him. Under these circumstances it cannot be said that the court abused its discretion in holding her to be qualified under the Code provision referred to, and to permit her to give her opinion of the mental condition of the testator.

3. It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions asked by contestants, and in giving certain others requested by respondents. The court did not err in refusing to give contestants' instruction as to the phase of insanity known as senile dementia, because the record does not show any evidence of the testator being affected with that phase of insanity, or that it was an issue in the case. The court instructed the jury at the request of respondents that: "Evidence which consists of mere repetition of oral statements is subject to much imperfection and mistake; that the party giving such testimony may have misunderstood what was said, and it frequently happens that * * * a witness by unintentionally altering a few expressions really used gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party did say." It is claimed that this instruction comes within the ban of Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 283, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124, as being an invasion by the court of the province of the jury to determine all matters of fact, the credibility of witnesses, and to pass upon the effect and weight of the evidence. This instruction is not exactly like the one involved in Kauffman v. Maier, and other cases, where the jury were cautioned as to the accuracy of oral testimony as to admissions. No caution is contained in the instruction in question. Conceding, however, without deciding, that the instruction comes within the ban of Kauffman v. Maier, still it would afford no reason on this appeal for reversing the cause because it was given. From the record before us it does not appear that there was any testimony in the case whatever of any oral statements made by any one. Hence the appellant is only complaining of an instruction given as erroneous in the abstract. But this is no ground for reversal. It must appear that giving it was prejudicial to the appellant, and that there was some testimony in the case to which the jury might have applied the erroneous instruction. As the record does not show anything of the kind, the appellant could not be injured because the instruction was given, even if it should be declared erroneous. There are other points in the case which are of so little merit that we do not discuss them.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re SNOWBALL'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1708.)
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1909.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 646*)—RES JUDICATA—PRIOR PROCEEDINGS.

Determination of an issue as to the fitness of the mother of certain children to act as their guardian in a prior application for appointment is res judicata on a subsequent application between the same persons, except as to evidence of facts occurring since the former order.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—EVIDENCE—EXCLUSION—PREJUDICE.

Where certain facts offered to prove a mother's alleged abandonment of her children, as a defense to her application for guardianship, were insufficient as a matter of law to establish abandonment, objectors to her appointment were not prejudiced by the exclusion of such evidence.

3. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 17*)—ABANDONMENT BY PARENT.

In the absence of proof that a mother intended to bring about final separation from her minor children, evidence of mere temporary absences accompanied by statements not indicating an intent to surrender parental rights, and the fact that she placed the children in care of another while she was away, was insufficient to establish abandonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parent and Child, Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 11*)—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—VALIDITY.

Under Civ. Code, § 241, declaring that a guardian of the person or estate of a child may be appointed by a will or deed if the child be legitimate by the father with the written consent of the mother, or by either parent if the other be dead or incapable of consent, a testamentary appointment by the father of a legitimate child having a surviving mother without the mother's consent is invalid.

5. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 10*)—RIGHT TO APPOINTMENT—PRIORITY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, gives to the surviving mother of infants a primary right to be appointed their guardian, which should be recognized in the absence of proof compelling a finding of her unfitness.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Petition by Leutie C. Snowball to be appointed guardian of the persons and estates of Aldanita Ann Snowball and Carmen Snowball, minors, to which Winnette Squires filed objections, and prayed that she be appointed guardian of their estate. From an order granting the petition of the mother, Leutie C. Snowball appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 104 Pac. 446.

R. H. Countryman, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Aldanita Ann Snowball and Carmen Snowball are minor children of Milton S. Snowball, now deceased, and of the respondent Winnette Squires, who, after having been divorced from Milton S. Snowball, was married to Lowell Squires. Each of the children is under 14 years of age. Milton S. Snowball died in January, 1908, leaving a will, under the terms of which his children were named as beneficiaries. On June 15, 1908, Leutie C. Snowball (sister of Milton S.) filed her petition praying that she be appointed guardian of the persons and estates of the said minors. Mrs. Squires, the mother of the children, filed a petition on her own behalf, in which she asked that she be appointed as guardian of the estate of each of the minors. Both petitions were set for hearing at the same time, and such hearing resulted in an order granting the petition of Winnette Squires and denying that of Leutie C. Snowball. From this order Leutie C. Snowball appeals.

In her pleading the appellant alleged that Winnette Squires was not a fit or proper or competent person to have the care or custody of either of said minor children. The court found this allegation to be untrue. It appeared that on the 17th of February, 1908, some four months prior to the commencement of the present proceeding, Leutie C. Snowball, the petitioner herein, had filed in the superior court a petition asking that she be appointed guardian of the persons of the said minors. Opposition to this application was filed by Winnette Squires. The matter came on for hearing on the 24th day of February, 1908, at which time the petitioner amended her petition by inserting an allegation that "Winnette Squires, the mother of the said minors, is incompetent, and not a fit and proper person to act as their guardian." This allegation was denied by Mrs. Squires, and thereupon, evidence having been introduced, the court made findings to the effect, among other things, that the mother was competent and a fit and proper person to act as guardian of the children, and entered a judgment that the amended petition of Leutie C. Snowball be denied. The proceedings upon this former application having been offered in evidence and shown to the court upon the hearing of the petitions in this proceeding, the court, upon the objection of the respondent, excluded certain testimony offered by the petitioner for the purpose of showing unfitness on the part of the mother. If this ruling had gone so far as to preclude the petitioner from showing, by any character of testimony, the alleged unfitness of Mrs. Squires, it would undoubtedly have been erroneous. The doctrine of res adjudicata cannot apply to successive applications for guardianship of minors to the extent of precluding the court, upon the later application, from a consideration of such circumstances as may have occurred since the rendition of the prior order. If the person appointed guardian should, after appointment, develop or exhibit traits of character indicating an inability to properly perform the functions of guardianship, the changed conditions may, of course, be shown to the court with a view to invoking its power to make new provision for the custody or care of children. See Beyerle v. Beyerle (Cal.) 100 Pac. 702. Here, however, the objection of respondent and the rulings of the court were carefully limited so as to preserve the right of appellant to prove Mrs. Squires' unfitness by any fact or circumstance which had not occurred or existed prior to the hearing of February, 1908. Her fitness to act as guardian at the time of that hearing had there been made an issue. That issue had been found in her favor, and the court had upon such finding denied the application of Miss Snowball for letters of guardianship. This was an adjudication of the rights of the parties (Ex parte Miller, 109 Cal. 643, 42 Pac. 428) at the time of the proceeding. That the order took the form of a denial of relief to petitioner made it none the less a determination, upon the merits, of her claim, and an adjudication, binding in every subsequent litigation between the same parties, as to every fact necessarily found as the basis of the order. Estate of Harrington, 147 Cal. 124, 81 Pac. 546, 109 Am. St. Rep. 118. The order of February, 1908, denying appellant's petition, conclusively determined, therefore, as between the parties, the fitness and competency of the mother at that time. To hold otherwise would mean that a party defeated in an effort to establish a superior right to be appointed guardian of minors could, notwithstanding the adverse finding of the court on material issues, present the same issues and retry them in any number of subsequent proceedings. It may be that, where it is claimed that the circumstances have changed since the making of the first order, evidence of facts antedating that order may be admissible, in connection with later occurrences, as a basis for the contention that all of the facts, taken together, show unfitness. But no such question was presented here. The appellant offered to show on the issue of unfitness only matters which had taken place before the earlier hearing, and, in effect, to relitigate in this proceeding, the very issue which had already been decided against her.

The first application was for guardianship of the persons only, the second for guardianship of persons and estates. The court permitted the appellant to offer any testimony she had on the new issue presented; i. e., the fitness of respondent to act as guardian of the estates of the minors.

The appellant made an offer to prove certain facts which, as she claimed, tended to show that the respondent had abandoned the children, and had thereby forfeited her right to guardianship. Civ. Code, § 246, subd. 4. All of said facts occurred prior to the guardianship proceedings of February, 1908. An objection to the offer was sustained. Regardless of whether the appellant was precluded by the judgment in the earlier proceeding from showing matters which might have been there litigated (Rucker v. Langford, 138 Cal. 611, 71 Pac. 1123), we are satisfied that the appellant was not injured by the ruling for the reason that the facts alleged were not sufficient to show an abandonment. In order to constitute abandonment, "there must be an actual desertion, accompanied with an intention to entirely sever, so far as it is possible to do so, the parental relation and throw off all obligations growing out of the same." Gay v. State, 105 Ga. 599, 31 S. E. 569, 70 Am. St. Rep. 68; Shannon v. People, 5 Mich. 71. There must be more than a mere temporary absence or neglect of parental duty. State v. Davis, 70 Mo. 467. There was nothing in the offer here made which would justify the inference that the respondent ever intended to bring about a final separation from her children. At most, there was an offer to prove temporary absences, accompanied by statements, which do not in any way evidence an intent to surrender parental rights. While respondent was away from her children they were in the care of a Mrs. Chambers. In the absence of proof of the circumstances under which the children were placed with Mrs. Chambers, the fact that the respondent allowed them to remain with her is not enough to establish an intent to throw off the obligations of a mother.

The court properly declined to consider the will of Milton S. Snowball, whereby he undertook to appoint the appellant as guardian of his children. Unsupported, as it was, by the written consent of the mother of the children, the attempted appointment was void. Civ. Code, § 241; In the Matter of Baker, 153 Cal. 537, 96 Pac. 12. In view of what we have said regarding the offer to prove abandonment, we need not discuss the appellant's position regarding the effect of abandonment by the mother on her right to control a testamentary appointment by the father.

The point that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of fitness on the part of the respondent is without merit. There was testimony which fully authorized the conclusion reached. The mother had the primary right to be appointed (Code Civ. Proc. § 1751) and, in the absence of proof compelling a finding that she was not fit to act as guardian, this right was properly recognized. In re Campbell's Estate, 130 Cal. 381, 62 Pac. 613; Guardianship of Saltier, 142 Cal. 412, 76 Pac. 51.

There was no substantial error in admitting or rejecting evidence.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 150*)—RIGHT TO APPEAL—INTEREST—INDIVIDUAL OR REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY.

Where testator bequeathed all of his estate to his executrix in trust for minor children, the trust to terminate at majority, the executrix in her individual capacity had no sufficient interest to entitle her to appeal from an order making a family allowance to their guardian for their support, but she was entitled to appeal in her representative capacity because of her duty to protect the estate from depletion by an extravagant family allowance.

2. INFANTS (§ 78*)—GUARDIAN AD LITEM—"PROCEEDING"—"CASE."

An application for a family allowance for infant beneficiaries of an estate is a "proceeding" and a "case" within Code Civ. A family allowance to infant beneficiaries of an estate may be made before exempt property and homestead have been set apart for the use of the family.

5. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where, on an application for a family allowance to minor children from their father's estate, the mother testified that the children were in her custody, and that $20 a month for each child would be a reasonable sum for their support, questions as to whether the children went to school before they were in her custody, how much her present husband earned, and whether he had not been incapacitated from earning anything, was unable to support the family, and whether he had consented that the children be received in his family, etc., were not proper cross-examination.

6. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 194*)—FAMILY ALLOWANCE.

Since a family allowance for minor children must be paid to their guardian, or for necessities, and not to the guardian ad litem, the poverty of the mother having custody of the children is immaterial except as a circumstance justifying an increase of the allowance.

8. COSTS (§ 260*) — IMPROVIDENT APPEAL — DAMAGES.

Where an executrix without personal interest appealed from a proper order granting a family allowance to testator's minor children, which was subsequently affirmed, damages in the sum of $50 would be awarded in favor of the children against the executrix personally, to be paid to their general guardian, because of such appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Milton S. Snowball, deceased. From an order making family allowance to two minor children of deceased, Leutie C. Snowball, individually and as executrix, appeals. Affirmed with damages.

See, also, 104 Pac. 444.

R. H. Countryman, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by Leutie C. Snowball in her own behalf and also in her capacity as executrix of the estate of Milton S. Snowball, deceased, from an order of the superior court making a family allowance to the two minor children of said deceased. The order in question directed the executrix to pay to said children, or to the guardian of their estates, the sum of $40 per month for their support and maintenance during the administration of the estate, and until further order. The two children, Carmen and Aldanita Snowball, are, respectively, seven and nine years of age. The estate is of the probable value of about $12,000, and by the terms of the will of the deceased it is all given to the two children, but is to be held during their minority in trust for their use by Leutie C. Snowball, who is their aunt. The estate is not indebted except to the amount of $500.

The appellant, in her own behalf, has no sufficient interest in the matter at issue to entitle her to maintain an appeal. She has no personal interest in the estate, and hence she is not a party aggrieved. As executrix she has, abstractly speaking, a duty to perform in protecting the estate from depletion by an extravagant family allowance. She is therefore as executrix technically a party aggrieved, and as such she has a right to maintain the appeal. It is difficult, however, to deduce from this duty a sufficient motive for taking an appeal from an order allowing $40 a month for the support of two small children out of an estate of $12,000, all of which belongs to them. The order was made on the petition of Mrs. Winnette Squires, the mother of the children. Before filing the petition, she obtained an order appointing herself as guardian ad litem of the minors for that purpose. This was alleged in the petition and denied in the answer thereto. Upon the hearing, the order appointing her guardian ad litem was admitted in evidence over the appellant's objection. This is assigned as error, the objection being that there is no legal authority for appointing a guardian ad litem to carry on such proceedings in behalf of minors. The objection is without merit. "A guardian ad litem may be appointed in any case, where it is deemed by the court in which the action or proceeding is prosecuted, or by a judge thereof, expedient to represent the infant * * * in the action or proceeding." Code Civ. Proc. § 372. An application to obtain a family allowance is a "proceeding" and a "case" within the meaning of this provision. Although not necessary to do so, it may be expedient, and it is within the discretion of the court to appoint a guardian ad litem for that purpose. The objection is immaterial for another reason. The court may make such order of its own motion without a petition from any person. Leach v. Pierce, 93 Cal. 619, 29 Pac. 235; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1465, 1466. It could be made on the petition of any person on behalf of the children. Estate of Garrity, 108 Cal. 468, 38 Pac. 628, 41 Pac. 485. It was therefore immaterial whether a guardian ad litem was appointed or not and the proof of the order was useless and harmless.

Appellant indirectly suggests that a family allowance cannot be made until after the exempt property and a homestead has been set apart for the use of the family. The point is settled to the contrary of this contention. Estate of Garrity, supra, 103 Cal. 467, 38 Pac. 629.

The mother of the children testified in their behalf that she was their mother, that they were at the time in her custody, and that $20 a month for each child would be a reasonable sum for their support. On cross-examination the witness was asked whether the children went to school before they were in her custody, how much per month her present husband earned, whether he had not been for a year past incapacitated from earning anything, whether he was able to support the children, whether he had received them in his family, or had consented to her custody of them, whether she had not been assisted by friends, whether she had supported the children herself, how she had been herself supported for the past year, and whether she had not abandoned the children in 1904 and again taken them into custody in February, 1908. The rulings of the court sustaining objections to these questions were correct. The questions were not proper cross-examination. Inasmuch as the money allowed by the terms of the order appealed from must necessarily be paid to the guardian of the children, or for necessities for their use, and not to the guardian ad litem, the fact of the mother's poverty, suggested by the questions, was utterly immaterial, at least from the standpoint of one who apparently desired to reduce the allowance. Where the mother is properly in custody of the children, such poverty might be taken into consideration as a circumstance from which the allowance might be increased where the children were so young as to require some one to care for them, as is the case here.

If, as counsel suggests, the mother has also been appointed general guardian of the children, she will be under bond and subject to the direction and supervision of the court in the expenditure of any moneys she may receive on their account, and it must be presumed that it will be used for the children's benefit and not for her own personal behoof. The children are the interested persons. The appellant was allowed to make all proper inquiry as to their necessities. The court did not err in compelling appellant's counsel to cease useless inquiry into the minute details of the cost of clothing previously supplied to the children. More than sufficient latitude was given him on that subject.

We do not find any question in the record of sufficient importance to have justified the executrix in going to the expense of taking this appeal. Personally she had no right of appeal. No allowance should be made to her, or to her attorney, out of the estate, for services or expenses in connection with the appeal. It is a proper case for the imposition of damages.

The order appealed from is affirmed, and $50 as damages is awarded in favor of the said children against the appellant personally to be paid to their general guardian.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.

Supplemental Opinion.

PER CURIAM. In the opinion filed herein August 30, 1909, it is said that Leutie C. Snowball has no interest in the estate sufficient to entitle her, in her own right, to maintain an appeal, and that her appeal as executrix was the only one to be considered. Under the facts as stated in the briefs and apparently conceded by the appellant, this was correct. Since the filing of the opinion, our attention has been called to the fact, shown by the record, that the will of the deceased gives her a contingent remainder in one-half of the estate, to become absolute only in the event that the two children should both die childless before reaching the age of twenty-one years. The point is of no importance to the case. [1] Her personal interest adds nothing to the merits of the appeal and presents no additional points for consideration. We make the correction merely to avoid any prejudice to her from the inaccurate statement, in the event of her contingent interest becoming absolute in the future.

A. J. Morganstern, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is denied for the reason that so far as we can see the complaint in the justice's court, under which petitioner is in custody, clearly states a public offense under the laws of this state. In view of the statement in the petition for the writ to the effect that a difference of opinion exists among the courts of this state as to the right of a court on habeas corpus to determine the question whether a complaint in a court of limited or inferior jurisdiction states facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, it appears proper to say that the rule in this state in that regard is correctly stated in Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 770, 96 Pac. 804, in which case it is plainly pointed out that the rule is different from the one applied to courts of general jurisdiction, as in Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605. An examination of the opinion in the case of Tobias Watkins, 3 Pet. 193, 7 L. Ed. 650, cited in the Greenall Case, will disclose grounds for this distinction.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by the Lompoc Valley Bank against H. S. Stephenson and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Denis & Loewenthal, for appellants. Wm. G. Griffith, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. June 10, 1905, the plaintiff loaned to one Hobson the full sum of $2,800, for which he executed his promissory note payable September 1, 1906. At the same time and place that the loan was made, and before the delivery of the note to plaintiff, the defendants signed the following guaranty indorsed thereon: "The payment of the within note and interest is hereby guaranteed. Dated June 10th, 1905." Part only of the loan has been repaid, and this is an action in the usual form against the guarantors to recover the unpaid balance. In defense of the action the defendants pleaded a failure of consideration. The substance of their plea was that their contract of guaranty was executed upon the express consideration that the plaintiff would indemnify them or protect them from any liability upon their guaranty by taking a first mortgage on personal property of Hobson of greater value than the amount of his note, which they failed to do. At the trial the superior court excluded the evidence in support of this plea and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Defendants, appealing from the judgment, contend that this ruling was erroneous. We do not think so. The loan of the money was a valuable and adequate consideration for the guaranty of repayment, and what defendants offered to prove by parol was not a failure of consideration, but a contemporaneous oral agreement which would convert their absolute agreement in writing into a merely contingent agreement. This cannot be done. Want of consideration or failure of consideration may be proved in a proper case, but, in the absence of fraud or mistake, parol evidence cannot be permitted to vary the terms of a written contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

4. TRIAL (§ 377*)—REOPENING CASE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

It cannot be held that the trial court committed an abuse of discretion in allowing plaintiffs to reopen their case and introduce further evidence, after the case had been submitted and before any decision rendered; it not being suggested that defendant was deprived of any opportunity to reply to the additional evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; Frank T. Nilon, Judge. Action by William Land and another against Alice K. Johnston. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Tuttle & Tuttle, for appellant. Tabor & Tabor, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial in an action brought by plaintiffs to obtain a decree adjudging that plaintiffs are the owners of certain waters running in the north or east branch of a ravine in Placer county known as "Mormon Ravine," to the extent of 25 inches, miners' measure, and restraining defendant from interfering with, diverting, or using any of said waters in such a way as to prevent the flow of such quantity of water to the heads of plaintiffs' ditches. The judgment was in favor of plaintiffs, and restrained defendant to the extent asked in the complaint.

There is some question whether we have jurisdiction of this appeal. The order denying defendant's motion, for a new trial was a written order signed by the judge, and this, the record shows, was filed with the clerk of the superior court on June 1, 1907. The appeal was not taken until June 1, 1908. Reliance was apparently placed upon a stipulation of the parties that the defendant should have five days after notice of the entry of the order denying the motion for a new trial within which to serve and file a notice of appeal from such order. Such notice was not given until May 27, 1908, and the appeal was taken within five days thereafter. But the time within which a notice of appeal may be filed is fixed by law, and cannot be enlarged by stipulation of the parties or order of court. Statutes limiting the time of appeal are jurisdictional and mandatory. See Williams v. Long, 130 Cal. 58, 62 Pac. 264, 80 Am. St. Rep. 68. The time within which a notice of appeal may be given is expressly excepted by section 1054, Code of Civil Procedure, from the cases in which the time allowed by the Code may be extended. If it were not for the act providing a new and alternative method of appeal, approved March 20, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 753, c. 410), which went into effect a few days before the order denying a new trial was filed, we do not see why subdivision 3 of section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that an appeal from various specified orders, including an order denying a motion for a new trial, must be taken within 60 days after the order "is made and entered in the minutes of the court or filed with the clerk" would not preclude consideration by us of the appeal. The act of 1907 referred to above, however, provides that the notice of appeal may be filed at any time after the rendition of the order, but must be filed within 60 days after notice of the entry thereof; provided, "that if no notice * * * be given the notice must, nevertheless, be filed, under any circumstances, not later than six months after the entry of the judgment, order or decree." The record does not affirmatively show the date of entry of the order, but only the date of filing. No point is made by respondents in regard to this matter; they apparently being desirous of abiding by the terms of the stipulation given by them. We think that, in view of the condition of the record, we are warranted in assuming that the order was not entered on the minutes of the court more than five days prior to the filing of the notice of appeal.

There being no appeal from the judgment, but only an appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial, no question of the sufficiency of the pleadings, or of the findings to support the judgment, can be considered by us. It is urged that certain findings of fact are unsupported by the evidence. The plaintiffs' claim in this action is based on the alleged facts that plaintiffs' predecessor appropriated this water in the year 1857 for mining and agricultural purposes, that plaintiffs and their predecessors in title have continuously used the same for such purposes from that time down to the present, that at the time of such appropriation the land now owned by defendant, and for which, as a riparian owner, she claims the right to use the water, was unoccupied public land of the United States, not claimed by any person, and that it so continued until May 5, 1865, when the right of the Central Pacific Railroad Company under the act of July 2, 1862, attached. Their theory is that the railroad company, defendant's predecessor in title, thus subsequently acquiring this land from the United States, took it, under the express terms of the grant, subject to their appropriation so far as any riparian rights are concerned. Broder v. Natoma Water Co., 101 U. S. 274, 25 L. Ed. 790; S. Yuba Water Co. v. Rosa, 80 Cal. 333, 22 Pac. 222; Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214, 31 Pac. 41. The trial court found that the appropriation was made by plaintiffs' predecessor, one Boles, in the year 1857, as alleged, and it is not claimed in appellant's brief that this finding is not sufficiently sustained by the evidence. Nor is there any claim in the brief that the evidence was insufficient to sustain a conclusion that both the land of defendant and the place immediately below the same where Boles' diversion of the water was made were then and for several years thereafter unoccupied public lands of the United States, unclaimed by any one.

There was an issue on the question whether plaintiffs and their predecessors had continued to use the waters from 1857 to the present, or had abandoned their rights under the appropriation, and the findings of the trial court in favor of plaintiffs on this question are attacked as not being sufficiently supported by the evidence. We are satisfied that the most that can be said for defendant on this contention is that the evidence was substantially conflicting. Mere temporary nonuse by Boles of the water during one year, some time subsequent to the appropriation, without any intent to abandon his right, which is the most that can reasonably be claimed to be shown by evidence without conflict, would not be sufficient to establish an abandonment of the acquired right. See Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 126, 42 Pac. 453.

It is urged that the evidence shows that Boles on January 8, 1874, conveyed all his rights in this water to Lyman Crary and others, with whom plaintiffs have not connected themselves in title; but an inspection of the instrument of conveyance shows that Boles reserved such an interest in the water and water rights for irrigation purposes as entitles him and his successors in interest to the use of all thereof except such as may be needed and used by Crary and others for mining purposes. Any use for mining purposes of this water appears to have been abandoned long ago.

There was no error in the admission of evidence given by Boles as to the fact of his use of the water after 1865, or as to an arrangement made by him with Mr. Kelley in 1863, by which he authorized Kelley to use some of the water. The evidence was material and relevant upon the issues of abandonment and nonuse. It cannot be held that the trial court committed an abuse of discretion in allowing plaintiffs to reopen their case and introduce further evidence, after the case had been submitted and before any decision had been rendered. It is not suggested that defendant was deprived of any opportunity to reply to the additional evidence.

No prejudicial error was committed in the matter of evidence relative to the question presented by the pleadings whether the land now owned by defendant and the land where Boles' appropriation was made constituted, at the time of such appropriation, public land of the United States, unoccupied and unclaimed.

We find in the brief of appellant no sufficient reason urged for a reversal of the order.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Carrie Harper against H. H. Goldschmidt. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. E. Gibson and G. W. Crouch, for appellant. Bert F. Mull and E. B. Coil, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by plaintiff for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of realty, which contract, as pleaded in the complaint, was evidenced by the following written memorandum or receipt: "Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 11, 1907. Received of H. H. Goldschmidt one hundred dollars, part payment on lot numbered 3, block — Harper's Magnolia Place. Terms: Total price five thousand two hundred and fifty dollars; balance to be paid as follows: $1,400.00 cash on delivery of contract, less $250.00 discount as Com. on sale, $1,250.00 in 6 months from date—$1,250.00 12 months from date, $1,250.00 18 months from date and interest at seven per cent. semiannually. This receipt is issued subject to the conditions in the regular form of contract and deed given for lots in the herein mentioned tract. Geo. C. Peckham & Co. By Geo. C. Peckham." Plaintiff averred the tender to defendant of the contract mentioned in the receipt and the due performance of all of the terms and conditions upon her imposed by the contract, with defendant's refusal to accept the contract and to pay the moneys due thereunder. A general demurrer to this complaint was interposed and sustained. From the judgment which followed plaintiff appeals.

The principal question presented upon the appeal is whether, under the circumstances here indicated, a vendee who has not signed the contract of sale, and who has done no more than pay $100 upon the purchase price, accepting a receipt therefor, can be compelled specifically to perform. Appellant answers this question by saying that under our statute of frauds and the sections of the Code relating to specific performance, and the decisions of this court construing the statute and the Code, specific performance should be decreed. Respondent makes answer that under our statute of frauds, and the sections of the Code dealing with specific performance and the decisions of this court expounding the statute and the Code, no action will lie, and the defendant is not bound. That such a contrariety of opinion should exist upon a proposition which should be well settled, not only excites surprise, but demands an exposition of it resolving all uncertainty.

Upon the statute of frauds appellant points out that section 1091 of the Civil Code reads as follows: "An estate in real property, other than an estate at will, or for a term of years not exceeding one year, can be transferred only by operation of law, or by an instrument in writing, subscribed by the party disposing of the same, or his agent thereunto duly authorized"—that section 1971 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribes that: "No estate or interest in real property, other than for leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning it, or in any manner relating thereto, can be created, granted, assigned, surrendered or declared, otherwise than by operation of law, or a conveyance or other instrument, in writing, subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning, surrendering or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized by writing." From the language of these sections he argues that when in section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in sections 1624 and 1741 of the Civil Code, it is declared that contracts within the statute of frauds are invalid unless they, or some note or memorandum of them, "be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent," the "party to be charged" is the vendor and not the vendee. And it is said that such is the construction put upon the statute in this state by the cases of Joseph v. Holt, 37 Cal. 254, Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213, and Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 170, 32 Pac. 983, while in other states this construction receives support in Wisconsin (Hubbard v. Marshall, 50 Wis. 322, 6 N. W. 497); in Nebraska (Gardels v. Kloeke, 36 Neb. 493, 54 N. W. 834); in Michigan (Mull v. Smith, 132 Mich. 620, 94 N. W. 183); in Montana (Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Pac. 695, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17); and in New York (Boehly v. Mansing, 52 Misc. Rep. 382, 102 N. Y. Supp. 171).

Upon the proposition that specific performance is a road open to the vendor under the circumstances here presented, it is said that the vendee who has not signed may prosecute such an action against the vendor who has signed. This being admitted, reference is made to section 3386 of the Civil Code, which declares that: "Neither party to an obligation can be compelled to specifically perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance"—and to such authorities as Wharton on Contracts, where (volume 1, § 2) it is said, "The parties to a contract, therefore, must both be bound," and the language of our adjudications, such as that in Doe v. Culverwell, 35 Cal. 295, where the well-established principle is enunciated that, "To be obligatory on either party, a contract must be mutual and reciprocal in its obligations." Upon these principles, it is argued that, as the contract is admitted to be enforceable against the vendor, and as it could not be so enforceable without mutuality of obligation, it must be equally enforceable against the vendee.

The English Statute of Frauds and Perjuries of Charles II, to which the similar statutes of all our states owe their origin, used the phrase "party to be charged" in precisely the same manner and to the same effect as it is now used in our sections of the Code. A glance at the English cases will establish that the "party to be charged" did not mean the vendor, nor yet the vendee, but it meant the person charged in court with the performance of the obligation—the party defendant. 1 Sugd. Vendors, c. 4, § 3, par. 2; Thornton v. Kempster, 5 Taunt. 736; Allen v. Bennett, 3 Taunt. 169; Seaton v. Slade, 7 Ves. Jr. 265. It was not the vendor alone whom the statute of frauds and perjuries sought to protect, but the vendee equally. For, as is well said by Ruffin, C. J., speaking for the Supreme Court of North Carolina: “The danger seems as great that a purchase at an exorbitant price may by perjury be imposed on one who did not contract for it as that by some means a feigned contract of sale should be established against the owner of the land. Hence the act in terms avoids entirely every contract of which the sale of land is the subject, in respect of a party—that is, either party—who does not charge himself by his signature to it, after it has been reduced to writing.” Simms v. Killian, 34 N. C. 252.

In 1830 the state of New York changed the language of the English statute, and enacted the following: “A contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of any real property, or an interest therein, is void unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration in writing, be subscribed by the lessor or grantor, or by his lawfully authorized agent.” In 1850 the state of California passed an act concerning fraudulent conveyances and contracts (St. 1850, p. 267, c. 114, § 8), which declared: “Every contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale of any lands, or any interest in lands, shall be void, unless the contract, or some note or memorandum thereof expressing the consideration, be in writing, and be subscribed by the party by whom the lease or sale is to be made.” This was an express and admitted adaptation of the New York statute. In turn a similar statute was adopted by the states of Wisconsin, Nebraska, Michigan, and Montana—all of the states upon whose decisions appellant leans to support his contention. It must be apparent that the language of the courts in construing a statute which requires only that the contract shall be signed by the vendor can have no weight, either by way of reasoning, or authority, in a case where a statute requires that the contract must be signed by the party to be charged. Such is the situation touching the last two of the cases from this state, relied upon by appellant. Joseph v. Holt, supra, was decided under the law expressed in the Statutes of 1850. Its language is: “To take a contract for the sale of land out of the statute of frauds a mere note or memorandum in writing, subscribed by the vendor or his agent, containing the names of the parties and a summary statement of the terms of the sale, * * * is all that is required.” This language is strictly true with reference to the statute as it then stood. So, in Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213, the same remark is applicable to the court's language when it states: “The statute only requires that the memorandum of sale of real property shall be signed by the vendor, or his agent. Act concerning Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 8, 9.”

As an essential of every contract there must be an agreement and meeting of minds. Thus the agreement must precede the signature to the contract, however speedily thereafter such signature may follow. Before the statute of frauds an oral agreement could be proved against either party. The statute of frauds in no way interfered, or attempted to interfere, with the antecedent oral agreement, but, in effect, declared a rule of evidence that such agreement could not be proved unless the essentials of it had been reduced to writing and signed by the party to be charged. By the English statute the party to be charged was either of the parties against whom enforcement of the contract was sought, but by the statute of California, until the reversion to the English statute, which took place in 1873-74, and by the statutes of New York, Wisconsin, and the other states whose law in this regard is like the early law of California, the statute of frauds was satisfied if the vendor of the property alone signed the contract. There was no such requirement as to the vendee, and, consequently, against him, proof of its acceptance could rest in parol. Hence the repeated declarations from the courts of those states—like the declarations above quoted from the early decisions of this state—to the effect that the statute is satisfied if the memorandum be signed by the vendor. The statute was satisfied, because all that it required was that the vendor alone should sign; hence the inapplicability of the decisions of those states to our existing law. Guthrie v. Anderson, 47 Kan. 383, 28 Pac. 164. But in all of the states, like California to-day, where the statute requires the signature of the party to be charged, when effort is made to charge the vendee, it is uniformly held that the signature of the vendor plaintiff is not sufficient, but that the signature of the defendant vendee is absolutely essential, saving in the exceptional class of cases where the conduct of the vendee has amounted to such a performance, or part performance, of the contract as to relieve the contract from the necessity of his signature.

Nor is there any weight to the objection of lack of mutuality which follows this interpretation of the law. Such objection was early made by Lord Chancellor Redesdale in Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Sch. & Lef. 13. It was considered a valid objection by Chancellor Kent in Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 484, but, as pointed out in Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458, the courts refused to hold it tenable. Says Parsons (Parsons on Contracts, §§ 9, 10): “The difficulty, therefore, cannot be that the contract is not mutual, but that one of the parties has not obtained the evidence which the statute requires him to produce to bind the other." In Chitty on Contracts (8th Am. Ed. 4) note, it is said that the reason why a party may sue on a contract, although it may be void against him for want of his signature under the statute of frauds, is that the signature is prescribed as "necessary evidence of a contract," and not as an essential or constituent part of the engagement itself. In equitable theory the requirement of mutuality of remedy is satisfied when the nonsigning plaintiff enters suit, since by the very bringing of his action he binds himself to abide by the decree of the court in chancery, and so empowers that court to decree specific performance against him. The commencement of his action is his offer to perform, and the precise situation is met and covered by the provisions of section 3388 of the Civil Code, which declares that, "A party who has signed a written contract may be compelled specifically to perform it, though the other party has not signed it, if the latter has performed, or offers to perform it on his part, and the case is otherwise proper for enforcing specific performance." Bird v. Potter, 146 Cal. 286, 79 Pac. 970. The decision of this court in Scott v. Glenn, 98 Cal. 168, 32 Pac. 983, must be construed by the light of this principle of mutuality of remedy, where the party not signing seeks the aid of the court. In Scott v. Glenn, the action was by the nonsigning vendee to recover the portion of the purchase price paid by him on the vendor's failure to perform. The vendor, by cross-complaint, alleged due tender of the deed, and demand and refusal of the payment of the balance due, and asked judgment that plaintiff be compelled to accept the deed and pay the balance of the purchase price. It was there insisted that the contract was void against the vendee plaintiff because not signed by him. The court said that the vendor was the party to be charged, as he was in the original action, and that his signature to the contract, taken in connection with the delivery thereof to the vendee and a partial payment thereunder, bound both parties. This was sufficiently accurate, perhaps, for the circumstances of the case, but, in fact, while by the original action the vendor who had signed was the party to be charged, by the cross-complaint the vendee, who had not signed, was the party to be charged; and, since the vendee had sought the aid of the court for a recovery growing out of this contract, he made the remedy mutual, and bound himself by his action to abide the judgment of equity upon the whole matter.

But where, as in this case, the contract is wholly executory, and the evidence of it amounts to nothing more than a receipt signed by the vendor, and the alleged part performance is nothing more than the payment of a small amount of money by the nonsigning vendee, and the acceptance of a receipt therefor, no case can be found which holds such to be sufficient part performance to relieve from the statute of frauds. In precise point upon this matter is Guthrie v. Anderson, 47 Kan. 383, 28 Pac. 164. The statute of Kansas, in which state the case arose, is identical with our own. The necessity of the signature of the party to be charged was pointed out, together with the inapplicability of the decisions of states such as New York and Wisconsin, whose laws differ from our own. It was shown that the statute is satisfied, and the nonsigning defendant is held, where the contract has been executed upon the part of the vendor, or lessor, by the giving of a deed or lease which has been accepted by the vendee or lessee. Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 229, 55 Am. Dec. 330; Wilkinson v. Scott, 17 Mass. 249; Wood on Frauds, §§ 222, 223. In such a case the contract has been wholly executed by the one party, and the acceptance of the deed or lease is consistently held to be a sufficient part performance to charge the other party. So, also, in case of executory contracts, where the nonsigning vendee enters into possession, or exercises dominion in other ways over the land, it is held that this amounts to such a part performance as will bind the nonsigning vendee. But where the act of the vendee is no more than the payment of a small amount of the purchase price, and the acceptance of a receipt for that amount, leaving all of the rest of the contract executory, both upon his part and upon the part of the vendor, no case has been pointed out which holds such acts to amount to a part performance which will bind the vendee. "His refusal to complete the contract after paying part of the purchase money is no fraud upon the seller but his loss." Fry, Spec. Perf. § 567. It is held, therefore, that in this case there was no such part performance as the law contemplates.

The questions here presented arose properly, and were properly decided upon demurrer. "Whenever it appears upon the face of the declaration, bill, or complaint, that the agreement sued upon is within the statute of frauds, and fails to comply with the requirements thereof, the appropriate mode of taking advantage of the defect is by demurrer." 9 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. p. 704, and cases.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Myrick & Deering and Weldon & Held (James W. Scott, of counsel), for appellant. Chas. E. Wilson and John W. Preston, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order settling the final account of the appellant J. S. Corrigan as administrator of the estate of George S. McPhee, deceased.

Alta McPhee, daughter and heir of the deceased, filed written objections to the account. Thereupon the court made an order referring the account and the objections to C. M. Mannon, as referee, directing him to examine and state the account, to try the issues raised by the objections and make findings thereon, and to report the same, together with the testimony taken by him. Pursuant to this order, the referee, after hearing the evidence, reported the same, with his statement of the account and his findings upon the issues, to the court. The statement and findings, with certain exceptions not necessary to note, were approved and adopted by the court as its findings, and thereupon the order appealed from was made.

The appellant at considerable length urges the point that the findings of the referee and his conclusions of law were not separately stated. We think the point is without merit. The objections are separated into paragraphs, each stating the objection to a single point or feature of the account. The report of the referee is also divided into paragraphs, each of which refers to a specified paragraph of the written objections and states the finding with respect thereto, with his recommendation concerning it. The recommendation is in each case a conclusion of law, and it is distinctly stated and sufficiently separated from the statement of the fact to be clearly intelligible. Furthermore, it has been repeatedly decided that findings of fact and conclusions of law are not required in a proceeding for the settlement of an administrator's account. Estate of Levinson, 108 Cal. 455, 41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479; Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 63 Pac. 838; Rochat v. Gee, 137 Cal. 501, 70 Pac. 478; Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 613, 35 Pac. 345, 639. And it is not made to appear that either in the court below or in the presentation of his appeal the appellant has been in the least prejudiced by the manner of stating the findings and conclusions of law.

McPhee died on April 21, 1899. Corrigan was appointed administrator of his estate on June 9, 1899. He took charge of the estate and had the appraisement made on July 1, 1899. McPhee owed debts amounting to about $3,000 and left an estate worth from $25,000 to $30,000, of which over $17,000 was personal property, readily convertible into money. The real estate consisted chiefly of a large body of timber land. At the time of his death he was carrying on a country store at Westport, and had a large number of men engaged in cutting timber on his land and making it into railroad ties at a fixed price per tie. One Shelton was also then engaged in making a road for McPhee upon said lands to afford access to the ties. The agreement was that he was to receive $1.50 for each rod of road constructed. The goods in the store were appraised at $4,013. There were 24-500 ties on hand, some in the woods and some at Westport, all of which were appraised at $3,762.74. The store was in charge of T. H. Smith. After McPhee's death, Smith kept the store open, apparently without directions from any one, until Corrigan was appointed. Upon Corrigan's appointment he continued the sale of goods at the store as usual, under Corrigan's direction, until October 19, 1899, selling goods during that period to the amount of over $1,000, and buying new goods to the amount of $333.23. It seems that Smith, with Corrigan's consent, also had the men continue cutting timber and making ties upon McPhee's land, and had Shelton continue the construction of the road for a short time. The men thus engaged bought goods at the store and the wages due from their work were settled by a credit upon the accounts for the goods sold to them in the same manner as was the custom before McPhee's death. On October 19th the goods remaining in the store were sold by Corrigan at private sale to Smith and one Bates for $3,111, which was $133.80 below the appraisement. Of this price $1,431 was paid in cash and the balance, $1,680, was settled by a release from Smith of a claim for that sum made by him against the estate of McPhee. This claim had not been, and never was, presented and allowed as the law required. As a part of this contract of sale, it appears that Smith and Bates were to cut timber upon the McPhee lands, and make the same into ties. In pursuance of this arrangement, they made ties to the number of 7,555. These ties were mingled with those appraised as belonging to the estate, and others bought by Corrigan from third persons, and were shipped to San Francisco and sold by Corrigan at private sale. All this was done without any order or authority from the court. No order to sell the personal property was ever made, and none of the sales made were ever reported to or confirmed by the court.

The above transactions occurred in the years 1899 and 1900. No account was filed by the administrator until September 24, 1906, at which time the account now under revision was filed in response to a citation issued at the instance of the heir, Alta Mc-

Phee. It purports to show the foregoing transactions as having been done on behalf of the estate and as a part of the administration thereof. The items of receipts and expenses in carrying out the making and sale of the ties and in the conduct of the store are set forth in the account without regard to the inventory or appraisement. All of the items, however, are not given. The wages of the men who were making the ties were settled by the store accounts and in many instances only the balances for or against the administrator are given. These accounts with the men were inextricably confused, and neither the administrator nor Smith, who managed the affairs, were able to make a clear explanation thereof. The account is not accompanied by any report or explanation of the transactions to which the items relate.

The referee found that the unauthorized attempt of the administrator to carry on the business at the store and the making of ties out of the timber belonging to the estate entailed a loss to the estate. He accordingly rejected all the items on both sides of the account relating to the making of these ties and the sale thereof and the business thus carried on, including the sale of the ties appraised as well as those subsequently made and purchased. It was impossible from the account or from the evidence to distinguish the sales of ties belonging to the estate at the death of the deceased from the sales of those made or purchased after his death. The administrator was charged with the stock of merchandise and ties on hand at the time of the appraisement at the appraised value. The referee also found that the administrator had appropriated all the money of the estate received by him, in excess of the debts and expenses, to his own use, and on this account charged him legal interest thereon, with annual rests.

The appellant claims that the men engaged in making the ties and road were working upon contracts for an agreed number of ties, and, as to the road, upon a contract to build a road of a specified length, that these contracts were uncompleted at McPhee's death, that the men had the right to complete the work contracted for and to hold the estate for the contract price, and that for this reason the charges for money paid for work done on these alleged contracts after McPhee's death should have been allowed. There was no satisfactory evidence that the contracts were of this character. The proof was that the men making the ties were to fell the trees and make them into ties at 9 and 10 cents per tie according to size. There is no evidence that any specific number of ties had been contracted for. The employment was therefore terminable at any time. The employees had no interest in the timber and the employment was ended by the death of McPhee. Civ. Code, § 1996. A few trees had been felled before McPhee's death which were not made into ties at that time, but these were all worked up by the men before the administrator took charge, and the ties thus made, only 500 in all, constituted a part of the 24,500 ties which on July 1, 1899, were appraised as a part of the property of the estate. There is no evidence to show how much was due the men for the work done after McPhee's death upon these trees. The total amount could not have exceeded $50. There is no controversy over this trifle, and it appears probable from the evidence that it was paid by credits upon the sales of goods at the store made to the men before the administrator was appointed. These sales amounted to $144.65. The contract for the road was for a stated price per rod. There is no evidence that it was in writing nor of its terms. It was a road made into the timber lands, to be used in getting out the ties. There is no evidence that any specific length was contracted for, nor that its construction was continued for any definite distance or time after McPhee's death. It appears to have been substantially completed at that time so far as was necessary to get out the ties then made. The subsequent work thereon, if any, was apparently done to get at the ties made afterwards and without authority. The evidence on this entire subject is extremely vague and unsatisfactory, and it would not justify us in disturbing the decision of the referee.

The action of the referee in charging compound interest upon the money of the estate converted by the administrator to his own use was proper under the evidence, and the law as declared in the decisions of this court. Estate of Stott, 52 Cal. 406; Estate of Clark, 53 Cal. 359; Estate of Clary, 112 Cal. 293-295, 44 Pac. 569; Gassell v. Gassell, 147 Cal. 513, 82 Pac. 42. There are many other cases to the same effect.

The widow of the deceased survived him about eight months. There was evidence that in her lifetime, after McPhee's death, she told the administrator to use the money of the estate in his own business. This necessarily was before the time for the settlement of the estate had arrived. The referee did not charge interest until after the expiration of one year from the time of the qualification of the administrator. At that time, in the condition in which the estate was left, it should have been ready for final settlement. Even if we suppose that her consent would have authorized him to use the money, it would not have excused him from paying simple interest during the first year of the administration. As the settlement of the estate was delayed by him, without cause or excuse, for many years after her death, a charge of compound interest against him upon the money thus used was right and just. The evidence was sufficient to raise the inference that the money of the estate in his hands at the end of the first year was at that time or before all converted by him to his own use, and that the other moneys of the estate were converted as soon as received. He testified in a somewhat vague way that he frequently had on hand, or could have obtained on demand, as much as $1,000 or $1,500. It does not appear, however, that this was money of the estate, or that it had been kept separate from his own funds, or that it was not money he kept on hand for use in his own business. Under these circumstances the charge of compound interest on all the moneys of the estate in his hands was justifiable.

We have considered and discussed all the points made by the appellant in support of his appeal. The appeal was taken and the record prepared in pursuance of the provisions of the act of 1907 providing a new and alternative method for the preparation of records to be used on appeal. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953b, 953c, as added by St. 1907, p. 750, c. 408. The record presented upon this appeal is deficient in many particulars. The papers, records, and files of the estate were offered in evidence, including the inventory and appraisement. A number of books kept by McPhee during his lifetime and by Smith as agent after his death were offered in evidence. None of these is produced as a part of the transcript. If the administrator made any report accompanying his final account, it is not given. We have presumed that the matters which would have been disclosed by these omitted portions of the evidence would not affect the soundness of the decision of the referee, and, as we have affirmed that decision, it is not necessary to go further than this. We wish, however, to call the attention of the appellant to the point that, if upon our consideration of the evidence before us we had been of the opinion that the referee and the court below was in error, it is not improbable that we would have been compelled to affirm the order because of these omissions of evidence from the record. This much we think it proper to say because of the fact that the new method of preparing records on appeal is to some extent untried and many questions concerning it and the proper method of dealing with records when so presented remain uncertain. We have also been at the pains of reading the typewritten transcript filed with the clerk in pursuance of the method authorized by the statute referred to. That statute provides that upon such appeals "the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Code Civ. Proc. § 953c. If the court had paid no attention to any parts of the record except such portions as the appellant printed in his brief in the present case, it would have been unable to comprehend any of the points in the case, and the order appealed from must of necessity have been affirmed upon the ground that no error had been shown.

The order is affirmed.

FLEET et al. v. TICHENOR. (L. A. 2,080.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1909.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 100*)—PLEADING—PROOF OF ACTS CHARGED.

In slander actions, the substance of the precise words alleged or so many of the words as charge the particular act alleged must be proved, and it is not enough to prove other words which would give an impression similar to that of the words alleged, or justify an inference of a charge of the particular act or offense.

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 100*)—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

The complaint in slander alleged that defendant told another that plaintiff entered her house and stole some jewelry, and that in using such words defendant meant to charge plaintiff with committing a felony, to wit, burglary, which those who heard her understood. The person to whom the alleged statement was made testified that defendant asked him to discover whether plaintiff had some of defendant's jewels about her; that defendant told witness where she left the key to her house, and that the key was removed, the door unlocked, and the jewels taken; and that plaintiff alone knew where the key was, and took the jewels. Held that, as the evidence did not show that defendant charged that plaintiff "entered" or was in her house at all, it did not sustain the allegation as to the charge of burglary, nor did it sustain a charge of "stealing" the jewelry; both the charges of burglary and theft only being shown by inference which was insufficient.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 107*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—WANT OF MALICE.

In slander for charging that plaintiff entered defendant's house and stole jewelry, a question whether defendant was moved in anything she said about plaintiff by a desire or purpose to injure plaintiff was admissible to show absence of actual malice so as to avoid punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 305; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 109*)—EVIDENCE—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION.

In slander for charging that plaintiff entered defendant's house and stole jewelry, a question whether defendant was moved in anything she said of plaintiff by a desire to injure her was admissible under the defense of privileged communication.

5. EVIDENCE (§ 151*)—ADMISSIBILITY—INTENT.

As a rule a witness may be examined as to his intent in doing an act where the intent is a material element in the action, though the jury need not accept as true his statement as to his intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 440; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—FACTS OTHERWISE SHOWN.

In slander for charging that plaintiff entered defendant's house and stole jewelry, error in excluding a question whether defendant was moved in anything she said of plaintiff by a desire or purpose to injure her, admissible to show want of malice, and under the defense of privileged communication, did not prejudice defendant where she testified fully as to her reasons for making the statement, and her testimony wholly negated any ill will toward plaintiff, and her whole testimony showed that the excluded evidence could not have affected the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4194-4199; Dec. Dig. § 1057.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Slander by Bessey Fleet and another against Adelaide Tichenor. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Byron Waters and E. C. Denio, for appellant. Thomas Fitch and William A. Alderson, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action for damages for slander. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $1,000, and judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

Two points are made for reversal.

1. The complaint alleged the making of certain charges by defendant against plaintiff Bessey Fleet to different persons at different times. The trial court held the evidence insufficient to make a case for the jury except as to one of the charges, and the specific charge upon which the verdict and judgment must rest is stated in the complaint as follows, viz.: "That on an occasion in the month of June, 1905, at said city of Long Beach, in the hearing of Dr. J. M. Holden, a physician residing in said city, defendant spoke of and concerning plaintiff, Bessey Fleet, the false, malicious, and scandalous words following, to wit: 'Mrs. Fleet entered my house and stole some of my jewelry, and still has it'; and, also, 'that in using the words alleged * * * defendant meant and intended to charge said plaintiff with the commission of a felony, to wit, burglary, and defendant was so understood by those in whose hearing she so spoke as above alleged.'"

The only evidence given on the trial to substantiate the allegation as to the making of this statement is that of Dr. J. M. Holden. So far as material to the question presented, he testified that Mrs. Tichenor came to his office, knowing that he was Mrs. Fleet's physician, and suggested that she thought he might be able to ascertain, when treating Mrs. Fleet, whether she had any of her jewels secreted about her person. On that occasion she told him what jewelry had been stolen from her house. He further testified: "Well, she told me where she left the key, in a clothes bag or clothes basket, something like that, where her soiled linen was kept. The key was kept in the bottom of that receptacle, and the key had been removed from this, and the door opened, the jewelry taken, and the door locked again, and the key put back in such a manner that she herself did not notice that it had been disturbed until a day or two afterwards. She asked if I had noticed anything when treating Mrs. Fleet, or if I could not make arrangements to make examination or to find out about her person, if I could find any of the jewels secreted about her. Mrs. Tichenor told me that the property consisted of jewelry. * * * Q. * * * What did she say as to Mrs. Fleet in connection with the burglary? * * * A. Mrs. Tichenor made the out and out statement it was Mrs. Fleet that had taken the jewels. I remember asking her if she really thought so, or believed so, and she said she knew it. * * * I think she made the remark that Mrs. Fleet was the only one that knew where she kept the key." Learned counsel for defendant claims that the evidence of Dr. Holden does not constitute evidence of the slander charged, in that it does not show the speaking of words either literally or substantially the same as the words charged in the complaint to have been spoken by defendant, and that, therefore, there was a complete failure of proof. This point was made on the trial by motion to strike out the evidence of Dr. Holden, and also on motion for nonsuit.

We are satisfied that this contention must be sustained, if we are to follow the rule laid down by text-writers and decisions generally. The ancient rule that in actions of this character all the precise words alleged must be proved has been somewhat relaxed, it is true, but not to an extent sufficient to sustain the judgment in this case. It is now, and long has been, the generally accepted rule that, where the defendant is charged with the speaking of certain specified slanderous words, it is sufficient to prove the substance of the precise words alleged, but by this is meant, according to the overwhelming weight of authority, not that it is sufficient to show the speaking of other words which would produce an impression similar to that which the words alleged would produce, but, as was said by Justice Taggart in the opinion rendered by the district court of appeal in this case: "Substantial proof of the words only is required as distinguished from a literal proof of the words alleged in the complaint, as was the original rule. The rule is not that the substance of the words alleged must be proved, but that the words alleged in the declaration, or enough of them to amount to a charge of the particular offense alleged to have been imputed, must be substantially proved." In other words, so many of the words alleged in the declaration "as constitute the sting of the charge" (Smith v. Hollister, 32 Vt. 708), or so many of such words alleged as contain "the poison to the character and constitute the precise charge of slander averred" (Lewis v. McDaniel, 82 Mo. 577), must be substantially proved. It is almost universally declared that it is not sufficient to prove equivalent words, but the rule has been held in a few exceptional cases to be complied with where the proof shows words synonymous with and carrying the same specific idea as those alleged, as for instance where the words "set fire to" were alleged the proof showed the word "burnt," and it was held sufficient. See Merrill v. Peaslee, 17 N. H. 540. See, also, Zimmerman v. McMakin, 22 S. C. 372, 53 Am. Rep. 720. Here the specific words alleged were: "Mrs. Fleet entered my house and stole some of my jewelry, and still has it." So far as the intimation of a burglarious entry is concerned, nowhere in the evidence of Dr. Holden does it appear that defendant told him that Mrs. Fleet "entered" or "went into" or "was in" her house at all, and the utmost that his testimony shows in this regard is that in a conversation with him she made certain other statements from which, if believed, the inference must be drawn that Mrs. Fleet had been in the house. Nor does it appear anywhere in his evidence that defendant told him that Mrs. Fleet "stole" any of her jewelry, or that she used any word or words in that connection synonymous with "stole," and that her alleged taking of the jewelry was a stealing thereof is only an inference to be drawn from the statement in the course of the conversation of various other specific facts. This is not substantially proving the specific words alleged to have been spoken and for the speaking of which plaintiff claims damages. No case cited and none we have been able to find goes to the extent of holding that, where a recovery is sought for the speaking of certain specified slanderous words, the allegations of the complaint are sustained by proof of different words which do no more than establish a basis for an inference that the defendant intended to make against the plaintiff a charge similar to that embodied in the words alleged. As stated in Haub v. Friermuth, 1 Cal. App. 556, 82 Pac. 571: "Neither is he required to prove all of the words set forth in the complaint unless all are essential for establishing the slanderous charge, but he must prove enough of them to sustain his cause of action. In actions for slander the rule that the probata must correspond with the allegata is eminently applicable. The plaintiff is not entitled to a recovery upon proof of words not set forth in his complaint, or upon a failure to prove the slanderous words which he has alleged. It is unavailing that the evidence is such as will authorize a jury to find that defendant intended to charge the plaintiff with the crime. Their function is to determine whether he spoke the words alleged in the complaint." This rule is sustained by practically all the authorities, and the few that we cite are only examples of the general course of decision. Roberts v. Lamb, 93 Tenn. 343, 27 S. W. 668; Gray v. Elzroth, 10 Ind. App. 587, 37 N. E. 551, 53 Am. St. Rep. 400; Estes v. Estes, 75 Me. 478; Comerford v. West End Co., 164 Mass. 13, 41 N. E. 59; Kimball v. Page, 96 Me. 487, 52 Atl. 1010; Schmisser v. Kreilich, 92 Ill. 347; Smith v. Hollister, 32 Vt. 695; Linville v. Earlywine, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 469; Newell on Slander & Libel, p. 804; 13 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 63; 25 Cyc. 485.

We cannot see that it avails plaintiff in this connection that she further alleged "that in using the words alleged * * * defendant meant and intended to charge said plaintiff with the commission of a felony, to wit, burglary, and defendant was so understood by those in whose hearing she so spoke as above alleged." Without proof that she spoke the words alleged, this allegation has no application. As was said by the district court of appeal in this case: "Under the liberal rule relative to the allowance of amendments to pleadings in most jurisdictions a variance may easily be corrected, if the evidence is objected to upon its introduction, and thus the apparent hardship of the rule may be relieved from in all cases where a probable cause of action exists. Ranson v. McCurley, 140 Ill. 626, 31 N. E. 121. There need not be a failure of justice even though the discovery of the variance is not made until the reversal of the judgment, if the case be otherwise a proper one. Kenney v. Parks, 137 Cal. 527, 70 Pac. 556; Code Civ. Proc. § 355. And thus injustice need be done to no one having a cause of action by maintaining in its integrity the rule that the defendant shall be answerable only for the words spoken by him and that the jury may find a verdict for damages only upon the slanderous words spoken."

2. The trial court sustained objection to two questions asked the defendant as to whether or not she was actuated in anything she had said or done by any wish or desire or any design or purpose to injure plaintiff. The questions were proper, both to show absence of actual malice for the purpose of avoiding exemplary damages and under the defense of privileged communication; and the court erred in overruling them. The general rule is well settled that under our system a witness may be examined as to the intent with which he did a certain act, where that intent is a material thing in the action. A jury or trial judge is not bound, of course, to believe the witness when he says he did not have a certain intent, but may find in the circumstances, actions and language an entirely different intent, but the testimony of the witness "is competent and relevant, and not immaterial." See Walker v. Chanslor, 153 Cal. 118, 125, 94 Pac. 606, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 455, 126 Am. St. Rep. 61, and cases cited. But we are satisfied that these errors were not prejudicial to defendant's case. She testified very fully as to her reasons for going to Dr. Holden and various other parties, and her testimony was utterly irreconcilable with the theory of the presence of any feeling of ill will towards plaintiff or any desire on her part to injure her in the slightest degree. It is manifest upon a review of the evidence actually given by the defendant that the further express statement by her to the effect that she had no desire or intent to injure plaintiff could not have changed the views of the jury or affected the result. See Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 439, 451, 82 Pac. 45.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 129*)—DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

Where the memorandum of default attached to a complaint in an action against two defendants recited that, "defendants [naming them] having demurred, etc., and said defendant having failed to answer, etc., the default of said defendant is hereby entered," but the judgment on demurrer recited that "defendants [naming them] having demurred, etc., and said defendants having failed to answer," etc., it sufficiently appeared that the word "defendant" was intended to include both defendants.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 530*)—CONSTRUCTION—PARTIES.

In case of doubt regarding the signification of a judgment or any part thereof, the whole record may be examined, and though the word "defendant" is written in the body of the judgment, it will be construed as referring to and including all of the defendants named in the caption.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic, Gulf & Pacific Company against Susie D. Wright and another. From a default judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jellett & Meyerstein and Maxwell McNutt, for appellants. Corbet & Selby, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a default judgment entered by the clerk of the superior court in an action upon a promissory note.

The whole contention of appellants is based upon an obvious clerical misprision in the memorandum of default attached to the complaint, and is supported by an argument more ingenious than persuasive. This memorandum recited that: "In this action the defendants, Susie D. Wright and Frank V. Wright, having demurred to plaintiff's complaint on file herein, and said demurrer having been overruled by order of court, with leave to defendant to answer, and said defendant having failed to answer within the time allowed, after due notice of overruling said demurrer had been given, the default of said defendant in the premises is hereby duly entered herein." The "judgment on demurrer" contains these recitals: "In this action the defendants, Susie D. Wright and Frank V. Wright, having demurred to plaintiff's complaint on file herein, and said demurrer having been overruled by order of court, with leave to defendant to answer within 10 days, and said defendants having failed to answer within the time allowed, after due notice of overruling said demurrer had been given, and the default of said defendants in the premises having been duly entered according to law," etc. If there is any uncertainty in the memorandum as to whether the default of one or both of the defendants was entered it is entirely removed by the language of the judgment. By any fair and reasonable construction of these two instruments the conclusion is reached that when the word "defendant" appears it was intended to include both defendants. But it is proper also to consider the entire judgment roll including the complaint and the demurrer, and thereby the matter is settled beyond peradventure. The rule is undoubtedly as stated in section 45 of Freeman on Judgments, as follows: "In case of doubt regarding the signification of a judgment or of any part thereof the whole record may be examined for the purpose of removing the doubt. * * * On the other hand, though the word "defendant" is written in the body of the judgment, it will be construed as referring to and including all the defendants named in the caption." See, also, 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1070, and cases cited. Regarding, then, for the purpose of the decision the memorandum of default as a part of the judgment roll, no irregularity appears of sufficient gravity to justify a reversal of the judgment.

We deem it unnecessary to consider the contentions of respondent that this memorandum is not properly a part of the judgment roll; that there is an "amended default," unobjectionable in form, attached to the complaint, apparently as of the same date as the memorandum of which complaint is made, that no evidence appearing to the contrary, the presumption is that the default as actually entered was correct, and, furthermore, that there is an order and finding of the court to the effect that there was a clerical misprision on the part of the clerk, and directing that the record be corrected so as to speak the truth, as we view the position of appellants as entirely without merit and involving at most a mere irregularity which could not possibly have prejudiced their substantial rights.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1116*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MATTERS TO BE INCLUDED.

The sustaining of a demurrer to an information cannot be reviewed, where the information and the grounds of demurrer are not contained in the bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2924; Dec. Dig. § 1116.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

J. J. Cusick was informed against for criminal libel. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the information, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and F. H. Greeley, for the People. W. H. Carlin and Waldo S. Johnson, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant was informed against by the district attorney of Yuba county for the crime of criminal libel alleged to have been committed upon one W. C. Wilkins. A demurrer upon the ground that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense, and that said information "does not substantially or at all conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code," was sustained by the trial court, and the defendant ordered discharged, and his bondsmen released. It is from the judgment upon the demurrer that this appeal is taken by the people.

Upon the oral argument of the cause before this court, the point was made for the first time that, as the bill of exceptions does not contain the information and the grounds of the demurrer, the ruling of the court below cannot be reviewed. The transcript contains the information, the demurrer, minutes of the arraignment, and a purported bill of exceptions, which, as respondent declares, does not embrace either the information or the demurrer or the grounds thereof. We are, therefore, without any properly authenticated record from which we can determine whether the court erred in its ruling on the demurrer. This case is substantially similar in all respects to the cases of People v. Long, 121 Cal. 494, 53 Pac. 1097, and People v. Druffel, 3 Cal. App. 731, 86 Pac. 907. In the former case the Supreme Court says: "Sections 1172 and 1174 of the Penal Code provide for exceptions and for a bill of exceptions to this very ruling. It may well be held that these provisions are exclusive of any other mode of obtaining a review, even when there is a judgment roll. But, however that may be, there can be no possible doubt about it in a case like this, where there is no other mode provided for a record upon appeal."

The Attorney General undertakes to differentiate the present case from those we have cited; but we fail to perceive any ground for any distinction between them. In both this case and the cases referred to the appeals are by the people from the order or judgment sustaining the demurrers. The only distinction between the cases, which is no distinction at all so far as the question here is concerned, is that in the cases cited the accusatory pleadings were indictments and the trial courts, in each case, upon sustaining the demurrer, ordered a resubmission of the case to another grand jury, while here the pleading is an information, and the defendant was ordered discharged upon the allowance of the demurrer.

There being no legal record before us from which it can be ascertained whether the order or judgment sustaining the demurrer was erroneous, the judgment appealed from must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PRESTON v. CENTRAL CALIFORNIA WATER & IRRIGATION CO. (Civ. 606.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 23, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 353*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—COMPLAINT.

A complaint alleging "that between the 1st day of January, 1907, and September 1st following, a lumber company sold and delivered to defendant lumber, materials, and merchandise, on which there became due to the lumber company a balance of $5,475.57," and that the claim had been duly assigned to plaintiff for a valuable consideration and was unpaid, was good as stating a cause of action in indebitatus assumpsit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 337*)—BREACH—NONPAYMENT—PLEADING.

A complaint alleging that the sum claimed or a part thereof had not been paid sufficiently alleged a breach of the contract declared on.

3. PLEADING (§ 126*)—ANSWER—DENIAL—NEGATIVE PREGNANT.

A denial that defendant became justly or otherwise indebted to H. for a balance on account for labor and services rendered defendant by H. between March 1, 1907, and September 1, 1907, or at any other time, for the sum of $413.56, involved a negative pregnant, and was fatally defective.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON DEMURRER.

In an action for the price of goods sold, it was harmless error to overrule a special demurrer to the complaint that it was uncertain whether the action was brought on an express or implied contract, where defendant not only answered by a mere negative pregnant as to the indebtedness, but also at the trial, made no attempt to disprove the claims sued on, nor is it an objection to this holding that the trial court would probably have rejected any evidence to disprove such claims under the answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 256*)—SUPPORT IN FINDINGS—PLEADINGS.

A complaint containing several counts in assumpsit averred that plaintiff "claims interest" on the amounts alleged to be due. A special demurrer was filed, but not to such allegation, nor did the answer deny that plaintiff was entitled to interest on the claims. The court found generally that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and that all the allegations and denials of the answer were untrue. Held, that a judgment allowing interest was amply sustained by the findings, though the allegation in the complaint as to interest was not in the form of an allegation of fact.

6. TRIAL (§ 53*)—SCOPE OF EVIDENCE—EFFECT OF ADMISSION—ASSIGNMENTS.

Where, in an action on several assigned claims, each of the assignments contained an itemized account of the indebtedness, and the assignments, when introduced in evidence, were not specifically limited to the purpose of proving the assignments of the claims to plaintiff, the court was properly authorized to consider them as evidence of the indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 432*)—CLAIMS—ASSIGNMENTS—AUTHORITY OF MANAGER—EVIDENCE.

Since the manager of a corporation ordinarily controls its administrative affairs to the extent of performing acts within the ordinary scope of its business without express or direct authority from the board of directors, assignments of claims for freight by a railroad corporation, and for merchandise by a mercantile corporation by the managers thereof, constituted prima facie proof of authority in such managers to execute the assignments on behalf of the corporations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by C. W. Preston against the Central California Water & Irrigation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jellett & Meyerstein and H. J. Miller, for appellant. W. O. Bradley and E. C. Farnsworth, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff inaugurated this action to recover the sum of $8,445.43, and interest, alleged to be due for goods sold and services rendered by the assignors of plaintiff. The plaintiff secured judgment for the sum sued for, together with interest, and the defendant prosecutes this appeal from said judgment and from the order denying it a new trial. A general and special demurrer to the complaint was interposed by the defendant and overruled by the court.

The special demurrer assails the complaint on the ground of uncertainty, charging that from its averments it cannot be ascertained whether the "lumber, materials, and merchandise," etc., mentioned in the complaint, were sold at agreed prices or the amounts alleged as being due therefor were the reasonable value thereof. Similar criticism is directed against those counts of the complaint alleging the performance of certain services for which recovery is sought. In other words, it is insisted that the averments of the complaint are uncertain, in that it cannot be determined therefrom whether the action is for recovery upon express contracts by which the prices to be paid for the goods sold and the services performed were fixed and agreed upon or upon implied contracts for the reasonable value of the goods and services.

The claim is also made that the complaint is obnoxious to the objection that its averments throughout involve mere conclusions of law. The complaint sets out in as many distinct counts a number of different and distinct claims in various amounts, and alleges the assignments thereof to the plaintiff by the original owners of said claims. The first count of the complaint alleges, after declaring the defendant to be a corporation, "that between the 1st day of January, 1907, and the 1st day of September, 1907, the Exeter Lumber Company sold and delivered to said defendant lumber, materials, and merchandise upon which there became due to said Exeter Lumber Company a balance of five thousand four hundred and seventy-five and 57/100 dollars." Assignment of said claim to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration and its nonpayment are alleged. The averments of the other counts are, mutatis mutandis, in identical language with that of the first count. As to the first and seventh counts (the latter being the claim of S. Sweet Company), the answer merely denies the assignments of the claim therein set out to the plaintiff by the original owners thereof, while, as to the other counts, the answer makes a futile attempt to tender an issue upon the question of the alleged indebtedness, and denies the assignments of the claims therein pleaded.

1. Counsel for appellant claim, among the other contentions mentioned, "that [adopting the language of their brief] while we are aware that it has been repeatedly held in this state that even under our Code a common count is not obnoxious to a general demurrer, it is apparent that the averment with reference to the Exeter Lumber Company's claim is not cast in the form of a common count." But there is in our opinion nothing in this point. It may be conceded that the complaint is not to be indorsed as an exemplar of model pleading, yet it is clear that its averments are in the form of an indebitatus assumpsit or a common count. Nor do we think that the complaint is obnoxious to the other objections pointed out by and insisted upon under the special demurrer. As we have said, the complaint is by no means a perfect pleading in an action indebitatus assumpsit in form, and, while there is no doubt that its averments could be construed as involving in a measure conclusions of law, we think they are sufficient to meet one of the essential requisites of all good pleading, to wit: That the matter pleaded must be clearly and distinctly stated, so that it may be fully understood by the adverse party, the counsel, the jury, and the judges, and especially (as regards the complaint) that the defendant may be enabled to plead the judgment, which may be rendered in the cause, in bar of any subsequent action for the same cause. Gould's Pleading, § 51, c. 3. Here the complaint states that between certain designated dates the defendant became indebted to the assignors of plaintiff in certain sums for goods and merchandise sold and delivered and for services rendered to the defendant, and that no part of such sums has ever been paid. It is difficult to conceive how the defendant or any person of ordinary intelligence could misapprehend these averments, or how a denial of them would not tender an issue of fact of which a judgment could be predicated so clear, definite, and certain as to constitute an obvious and readily perceivable bar against any subsequent action which might be instituted for the same causes.

But we are not without direct authority in California upholding a complaint in an action indebitatus assumpsit in form whose averments are identical with those contained in the complaint in the present case. In the comparatively recent case of McFarland v. Holcomb, 123 Cal. 84, 55 Pac. 761, the complaint alleged "that William A. Holcomb was at the time of his death indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $7,500 as a balance due to plaintiff for nursing, boarding, lodging, counseling, advising, and taking care of the said William A. Holcomb almost continuously from the 29th day of November, 1870, down to the 4th day of November, 1895, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California." To this complaint a demurrer, both general and special, was interposed, the latter for uncertainty, and the special demurrer sustained. The court, reversing the judgment entered after demurrer sustained, has this to say: "Under the system of pleading at the common law, it was requisite that the declaration in an action of assumpsit upon an executed consideration should show that the consideration for the promise by the defendant was sufficient to support his promise, and it was sufficient to aver that the consideration was executed at his request; but this averment was unnecessary when the consideration as well as the promise were implied from the nature of the transaction set forth in the declaration—as in an action for goods sold and delivered to the defendant, or for money loaned to him by the plaintiff. Fisher v. Pyne, 1 Man. & G. 265, note. Under our system of pleading, where only the facts which constitute the cause of action are to be alleged, it is not requisite to aver either the consideration or the promise, when they are implied as a legal conclusion from the facts which are alleged. While counsel and advice are frequently given without any request, and may be of no benefit to the party to whom they are given, yet a complaint which shows that the plaintiff rendered services to the defendant which were received by him in person, and were presumptively at his request, and of which he has enjoyed the benefit, states facts from which the liability of the defendant therefor is presumed, and is good as against a general demurrer. In the present case the nursing of the decedent by the plaintiff, and his acceptance from her of his board and lodging during the time specified, was a consideration sufficient to support the promise for compensation therefor which is implied in law, and to render him liable therefor."

In the case of Aydelotte v. Billing, 8 Cal. App. 673, 97 Pac. 698, the same proposition as the one here having been under review, similar objections to the complaint as those urged here were rejected upon the authority of McFarland v. Holcomb, supra. A petition for a rehearing was filed in this court in the first-mentioned case, and, in denying it, it was said through Mr. Justice Burnett, after setting out the averments of the complaint in the last-mentioned case: "It will thus be seen that the action was for services performed, that there was no allegation that they were performed at the instance or request of Holcomb, or that there was any promise to pay. The Supreme Court, however, held that the complaint stated a cause of action. If that case is not directly in point here, or if it is to be overruled, the decision to that effect must come from the Supreme Court." A petition for a rehearing in Aydelotte v. Billing was denied by the Supreme Court.

In the case at bar, as we have seen, the complaint alleges that the sums claimed or any part thereof have not been paid, and this has often been held to be a sufficient allegation of the breach of the contract declared upon. Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 Pac. 891; Knox v. Buckman Contracting Company, 139 Cal. 598, 73 Pac. 428; Richards v. Lakeview Land Co., 115 Cal. 642, 47 Pac. 683. In the last-cited case the complaint, as here, contained several different counts. In each of the counts in said complaint, except the first, fifth, and seventh, there was an averment that the amount claimed "has not been paid, or any part thereof." In the first count the only averment as to nonpayment was that "there is now due and owing from said defendant to the said plaintiff" the amount stated in said count. The fifth and seventh counts upon the subject of nonpayment contained similar averments. These were held to be mere conclusions of law, and not an averment of fact. Each of the remaining counts, in which it was alleged that the amount claimed "has not been paid, or any part thereof," was held to be a sufficient averment of the breach of the contract, the failure to pay constituting the breach.

2. The point that the complaint is uncertain and ambiguous because it cannot be told therefrom whether the several claims therein set forth arose from an express or an implied assumpsit is, we think, without substantial merit. While it would undoubtedly be the better method of pleading a contract upon which an action is brought to clearly state the nature of the same—that is, whether the action is on an express contract or upon a quantum valbat or quantum meruit—we are unable to perceive upon what principle of logic the strict observance of that rule should be held to be indispensably necessary in such an action to the statement of a cause of action impregnable against the objection of a special demurrer. The mere denial that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum alleged to be due would certainly raise the only important issue in the case, to wit, whether the defendant was or was not so indebted, and such issue would necessarily be thus tendered whether the alleged indebtedness was the result of an express or an implied contract. As was said in the case of Manning v. Dallas, 73 Cal. 420, 15 Pac. 34, where a complaint similar to the one here was considered, though not on demurrer: "Under the complaint the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if he had performed services for the defendant, such sum as defendant had agreed to pay him for his services, or, if no price was fixed, then such sum as his services were reasonably worth." But, while, as we have intimated, the special demurrer should perhaps have been sustained, if for no other reason than to compel pleaders to adhere to the very first rules of good pleading, we think the error of the court in overruling it could not have operated prejudicially against the defendant, in view of the answer and the trial. The averments of the answer addressed specifically to each of the counts of the complaint do not raise an issue of fact, because they do not involve direct denials of the existence of the several claims declared upon. The answer "denies" each of the counts of the complaint in the form in which the denial is interposed to the count alleging indebtedness to one B. E. Hooper, which is as follows: "Said defendant denies that the defendant became justly or otherwise indebted to B. E. Hooper for a balance on account for labor and services, or labor or services, rendered said defendant by said B. E. Hooper between the 1st day of March, 1907, and the 1st day of September, 1907, or any other time, in the sum of $413.56." It is at once apparent that the foregoing denial involves a negative pregnant, the denial being in the precise sum alleged in that count of the complaint, and therefore an admission of an indebtedness of any lesser amount. Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 638; Towdy v. Ellis, 22 Cal. 650; Estee's Pleadings, § 3174. Moreover, there was no evidence offered by the defendant to prove that the claims pleaded in the complaint did not exist and were not paid. Certainly it cannot be said that, having failed to deny that it was indebted to the plaintiff in some sum of money, and having made no effort to disprove the existence of the claims counted upon, the defendant suffered any injury. Our Code expressly declares that "the court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error or defect in the pleading or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." Code Civ. Proc. § 475. In the case of Gassen v. Bower, 72 Cal. 555, 14 Pac. 206, it is said: "Where a pleading is demurred to for ambiguity, we think that, if the party was not misled to his prejudice, the ambiguity cannot be said to 'affect the substantial rights of the parties.' And we do not think that in this case the appellant was misled." In Rooney v. Gray Bros., 145 Cal. 753, 79 Pac. 523, it is said: "When a case has been tried and a judgment rendered on the facts, in order to warrant a reversal upon the ground of error in overruling a demurrer interposed upon the ground of uncertainty in the complaint, it must appear that some substantial right of the demurrant has been affected, some prejudicial error, as distinguished from abstract error, suffered by him, or he has no room for complaint." See, also, Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 532, 38 Pac. 410 et seq.; Rooney v. Gray Bros., 145 Cal. 753-758, 79 Pac. 523; Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234-237, 90 Pac. 936; Peterson Bros. v. Mineral King, etc., 140 Cal. 624-627, 74 Pac. 162; Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 86-89, 94 Pac. 424. In the case at bar, under the pleadings, there was nothing to prevent the defendant from attempting to disprove the claims set out in the complaint. It is no answer to the claim that the defendant sustained no substantial injury to now say that no issue upon the indebtedness was raised by the pleadings, and that the court would most likely have sustained objections to any evidence which might have been offered to negative the claim of indebtedness. The fact remains that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings of the court in favor of the plaintiff, and that the defendant made no effort either by the pleadings or proof to deny or disprove an indebtedness to plaintiff arising out of all the claims counted upon. In other words, we do not think that the defendant could have been misled to his substantial injury through the conceded inartificiality of the averments of the complaint, nor that, having gone to trial without tendering an issue upon the fact of indebtedness, and having failed even to offer proof against the existence or breach of the contracts out of which the several claims pleaded in the complaint are alleged to have arisen, it is in a position now to complain.

3. It is claimed that there is no finding as to interest, and that, therefore, the judgment, to the extent that it awarded interest on the several claims set forth in the complaint, is without support from the findings. This contention arises from the nature of the allegation as to interest and of the findings of fact. The complaint in each of the counts avers that the plaintiff "claims interest" on the amount alleged to be due. This, it is said, is not the averment of a fact, and that as the court does not make a specific finding as to interest, but only finds generally that "all the allegations and averments of said plaintiff's complaint are true," and that "all the allegations and denials of the answer of said defendant are untrue," the judgment is without a prop upon which to rest so far as interest is concerned. The special demurrer to the several counts of the complaint is not, as we have seen, addressed to the allegation upon the subject of the interest claimed upon the several pleaded claims from the time they became due and payable. And the answer does not deny that the plaintiff is entitled to interest on said claims, and thus the defendant admits the truth of the averments as to interest, although it cannot be denied that they do not involve high-class pleading.

4. It is lastly claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, and that the court committed prejudicial error in its rulings admitting in evidence the several assignments by the original owners of the claims. Neither point is well taken. As to the findings, the court based its decision upon the admission of the answer; that is, the court assumed, as we have held that it was justified in doing from the nature of the averments of the answer upon the question of indebtedness, that there was no issue before the court with the exception of that tendered by the denials as to the assignments. Besides, each of the assignments contained an itemized account of the indebtedness; and, while the specific purpose for which the assignments were introduced was, no doubt, to prove the fact of the assignments of the claims to plaintiff, yet they were not specifically limited to that purpose, and therefore it was proper for the court to consider them for all the purposes of the case, and consequently as evidence of the indebtedness. We think the findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence and the admissions of the answer.

5. Nor was it error for the court to admit the assignments in evidence for the purpose of showing the transfer of the claims to the plaintiff. It was shown that the assignment by the Visalia Electric Railroad Company of its claim to plaintiff was executed on behalf of said company by James H. Crossett, the manager of that corporation. It was further proved that the assignment of the claim of S. Sweet Company, a corporation, was executed by Mr. Levis, its general manager, and to this assignment was attached the corporate seal of the corporation. It will not be doubted that the manager of a corporation may for such corporation perform any act within its ordinary business transactions and affairs. And it cannot be questioned that an assignment of an account for transporting freight by the manager or superintendent of a railroad corporation, or for merchandise sold by a mercantile company, involves anything beyond the transaction of the ordinary affairs of such corporation or mercantile company. The objection to the introduction of these assignments was upon the ground that there was no evidence disclosing the authority of the parties executing the assignments to thus act for the corporation. We think that the proof of the execution of the instruments by the managers of the corporations amounted to at least prima facie proof of the authority in the managers to execute them upon behalf of the corporations they represented, and that it was incumbent on the defendant to overcome the effect of such proof if it could do so.

In McKiernan v. Lenzen, 56 Cal. 61, objection having been made to the reception in evidence of an assignment of an account executed by the manager thereof on behalf of the corporation upon the ground that power in said manager to perform that act for the corporation was not shown, the Supreme Court thus disposes of the point: "No formal objection has been made to the assignment by him. The sole objection is that he had no power to make it at all. * * * In respect to the management of its business, a general managing agent and superintendent is the representative of the corporation, and may do in the transaction of its ordinary affairs what the corporation itself could do within the scope of its powers." In Jennings v. Bank of California, 79 Cal. 323, 328, 21 Pac. 852, 854, 5 L. R. A. 233, 12 Am. St. Rep.

145, it is said: "The officers who transact the ordinary business of a corporation are presumed to have authority to do all acts which are usual and incidental thereto." The following authorities affirm the rule as thus stated: Greig v. Riordan, 99 Cal. 316, 33 Pac. 913; Seely v. S. J. L. M. & L. Co., 59 Cal. 22; Bates v. Coronado Beach Co., 109 Cal. 160, 41 Pac. 855; Waterman on Corporations, § 30. The cases cited by the appellant upon this proposition are not in point. Two of these were where the secretary of a corporation undertook to perform some act for the corporation which was not within his authority as such officer. Besides, there should be a distinction between a secretary of a corporation and the manager or managing agent thereof as to the presumption of power to do or perform any act within the ordinary affairs of the corporation. Ordinarily a manager of a corporation has control of the administrative affairs of such corporation to the extent that he may perform many acts within the ordinary transaction of its business affairs without express or direct authority from the board of directors; while the secretary is, ordinarily, a mere ministerial officer under the control of the manager and the board of directors, and whose authority does not extend to the transaction of the ordinary affairs of the corporation upon his own independent volition and judgment.

Our conclusion is, as is apparent from the foregoing views, that, while there is much in this record justifying criticism, particularly as to the pleadings, there is nothing so serious as to warrant a reversal of the judgment and the order. The judgment appears to be just and the appeal here has been, as is obvious, pressed on ultra technical lines.

For the reasons herein set forth, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MUIHLY. (Cr. 99.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Aug. 21, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 404*)—DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE.

About 40 days after a homicide, a silk handkerchief was found under manure in the barn on the premises where deceased and accused resided, and an old shoe was found some hundred yards from the house, as well as pieces of overalls, on all of which were discovered traces of blood, though it was impossible to determine whether it was human blood, but the articles were not shown to have been in defendant's possession. It appeared that many others had used the barn, and, while accused frequently wore blue overalls, the only positive evidence to identify the pieces found was that they were obtained from the granary where they were left by teamsters by accused's mother-in-law for rugs. The shoes were two sizes smaller than those worn by accused, and his mother-in-law testified that they had been hers, but an expert testified that they were run over in the same manner as accused's shoes. On the day of the autopsy the coroner took a bunch of keys from decedent's pocket, and afterward handed them to another, who locked the door of the building in which decedent was shot and on unlocking it the next morning, saw a small spot resembling blood on the doorkey. Held, that accused was not sufficiently connected with the above articles to admit them in evidence.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 166*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—MOTIVE.

In a murder prosecution, the state offered to show as motive evidence of the deed made by decedent to accused of an undivided one-half interest in a tract upon which they both lived, and a sale for taxes of a part of the land assessed to decedent and its nonredemption, as well as the testimony of a witness to a conversation with accused a month before the killing while the latter was plowing his field which had been previously used for a melon patch, wherein witness asked accused why decedent was not raising melons there now, and accused replied with an oath, "No, he wouldn't," and had told accused that he raised melons there, but he did not know in what year. That accused also said that decedent never would raise any more melons there. Held, that such evidence was admissible as having some possible connection with the killing, though it was equally consistent with innocence.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 758, 807*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In a homicide case, a requested instruction that statements made by accused out of court should be received with caution and the jury might consider that there was danger of mistake or misapprehension of witnesses, misuse of words, failure of the party to express his meaning, the infirmity of memory of witnesses, and that the rule applied where only a part of accused's declarations were put in evidence could have been refused as argumentative and invading the province of the jury.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 758*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF TESTIMONY.

In a homicide case, an instruction that verbal statements by accused out of court should be received with caution, which was only a part of an instruction requested by accused in view of the fact that the witnesses differed materially as to what accused said after the homicide and at the inquest relating to the case, was erroneous and prejudicial in requiring the jury to view with caution accused's evidence, which denied his guilt, instead of the testimony of others as to his statements; accused being entitled to have the credibility of his testimony determined by the jury alone.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—PRESUMPTION—DISREGARD OF INSTRUCTION.

The appellate court cannot assume that the jury disregarded an instruction in a homicide case, so far as it was objectionable as being on the weight of the evidence so as to make it harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

T. H. Muhly was convicted of manslaughter, and, from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Ernest Klette and Frank Kauke, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was charged with murder and convicted of manslaughter, and the appeal is from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence claimed to be inculpatory was entirely circumstantial, some of it equivocal and of doubtful propriety, and all capable of reconciliation with the innocence of the accused. That an atrocious murder was committed is indeed clear, and is not disputed, but the guilty participation of appellant must have been a matter of grave doubt even to the jurors who rendered the verdict. Otherwise the conviction of manslaughter with a recommendation to the mercy of the court seems unaccountable.

It appears that the deceased, James H. Bethel, for a number of years had resided on his premises in the foothills of Madera county, where he kept a wayside saloon or roadhouse. At the time of the homicide, and for several years prior thereto, appellant and the deceased were the owners as tenants in common of a tract of land of 160 acres on which were located a dwelling house, the said saloon, and other buildings. For the preceding year defendant and his wife had been residing on said premises, and deceased had been taking his meals with them at said dwelling house, but he occupied as a sleeping apartment a portion of the saloon building. The house and saloon, about 170 feet apart, were situated on the same side of a public road passing across the premises, the other buildings being on the other side of the road and some distance from the residence. From the statements made the next day by defendant, from the testimony of his wife at the trial and the description of the scene of the homicide given by various witnesses, these facts are deduced: On the evening of February 28, 1908, the deceased ate supper as usual with defendant, and a short time thereafter the former went from the dwelling house to the saloon. About the time he reached the porch thereof, as near as can be determined, two shots were fired from a shotgun, one of which struck the head and face of the deceased and the other the wall of the saloon building. Thereupon the skull of the deceased was crushed by blows inflicted by some blunt instrument, from the effect of which he died—presumably instantaneously. According to the statement of defendant, which harmonizes with the testimony of his wife, he was in the kitchen at the time the first shot was fired, and he thereupon stepped outside the door, heard a sound as of some one scuffling and some words spoken by deceased, and then the second shot was fired. The defendant went back to his work in the kitchen, and later in the evening went over to the saloon, to inquire concerning the shots. He found Bethel's body lying on the ground at the corner of the saloon porch. Early the next morning the defendant notified a neighbor of the occurrence, and about 10 days thereafter the former was arrested and charged with the crime.

A brief recital of substantially all the circumstances which might have been considered by the jury as evidence of defendant's guilt will show the rather feeble foundation for the verdict, and emphasize the importance of examining with care certain rulings during the trial and an instruction given by the court which are assigned as error by appellant. The most significant circumstance in this connection is the disappearance of defendant's shotgun, which there is some evidence to show was probably used in the perpetration of the crime. Diligent search for this gun was made on the premises immediately after the homicide and at various times, but without avail. Appellant made a statement at the coroner's inquest to the effect that the gun was taken down to the saloon on the day of the homicide to shoot quail, and that he had never seen it since. The coroner failed to reduce to writing all the testimony, and there is some discrepancy between the statements of the witnesses as to whether appellant said he or the deceased took the gun. Audie K. Wofford, a member of the coroner's jury, testified that appellant said that "Mr. Bethel came over in the forenoon and got the shotgun, at that time. He said it was loaded when he gave it to him." The same witness declared: "I have seen Mr. Bethel use this gun more than once. I saw him shoot quail with it there."

Appellant's wife testified: "Mr. Bethel came over to the house during the afternoon. Mr. Muhly was in and out as usual. I was out in the kitchen. I did not see what he did or speak to him. I do not know what he came for. He was in and out a good deal of the time. Sometimes he came for his tools and sometimes he came to get the shotgun to shoot quail." She further testified that "at the time of the shots Mr. Muhly was out in the kitchen. * * * When the shot was fired, I stood up and I heard the screech and another shot, and then I put the baby down, and I started into the kitchen. I stepped out of the kitchen door and saw Mr. Muhly. I don't know where the gun was on that night. Mr. Muhly had nothing to do with that gun after or immediately before supper that I know of. After supper was eaten and Mr. Bethel got up and Mr. Muhly was in the dining room Mr. Muhly did not have the gun that night or at any time. I have not seen the gun since." The jury undoubtedly discredited the foregoing statements. It cannot be said that this was entirely unjustified since the jurors are the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and of the credibility of the witnesses, but there appears to be nothing unreasonable in the explanation of this circumstance given by the defense, especially in view of the undisputed fact that at times the deceased had the gun in his possession and would shoot quail from the saloon porch. And whatever may be said as to the probability that appellant murdered Bethel, it is clear that the prosecution produced no evidence—presumably because of its inability to do so—that Muhly on the evening of the homicide used or had in his possession this shotgun. The evidence further shows that it was the invariable custom of the deceased to leave the door of his saloon unlocked while he was taking his meals at the residence. Witnesses also testified that he had trouble with the Indians, and that he said he "expected to be killed by the Indians." Therefore, granting that this gun was the instrument of death, the conclusion of defendant's guilt is no more probable than the view that while Bethel was at supper some one else took the gun from the saloon and, lying in wait for him, brutally took the life of the deceased.

The conduct and appearance of the defendant after the homicide probably also excited the suspicion and indignation of the jury. There is no doubt, however, that his infant child was seriously ill, and the wife, testifying as to what occurred immediately after the shooting, said: "I came back into the house and I went back into the front room, and he went back with me. After that he went back and finished up his work in the kitchen. I remained in the front room. Then after he finished up his work he came back in the front room. When he came back, there was something said with reference to the noise or shooting, and after a while he went out to see if he could not find out what was the matter. He went out the front door. I don't know how long he was out. It was not very long, when he came back I asked him what was the matter. He said, 'They have got him. He is lying there dead;' and I went to crying. I was frightened. Mr. Muhly did not go anywhere that night. He wanted to go and notify the coroner and sheriff, but I would not let him go. I was scared. I knew that grandpa was killed and I was afraid, and just did not let him go, that was all." The jury may have concluded that the defendant's delay in communicating with others was indicative of guilt, but who can say that an innocent man under the same circumstances certainly or probably would have pursued a different course?

Some of the witnesses testified that after the homicide the defendant appeared to be nervous and excited and one of them said: "He looked like kind of down—looked like he was guilty." Others testified that there was nothing unusual in his appearance. It would not be surprising under the circumstances of suspicion if the defendant, whether guilty or innocent, was somewhat agitated, and this mental perturbation would probably exhibit itself so as to be observed by others, but it is clear that testimony concerning the same is so largely a matter of opinion, and depends so much upon the temperament of the accused and of the observers as to be of very little value.

About 40 days after the homicide, while the defendant was in the county jail where he had been for one month, some parties under the direction of the district attorney engaged in making additional search of the premises found an old silk handkerchief buried under the manure in the barn. They also picked up at a short distance from the dwelling house a number of pieces of overall cloth. Some time in September another search was made and an old pair of shoes was found in a crevice of the rocks from 100 to 150 yards from the house. These articles were examined by a chemist who testified that there were traces of blood on each, but it was impossible to tell whether it was human blood or not. These articles were not traced to the defendant. It was not shown that he ever had any of them in his possession, and they were admitted over the objection of appellant. The evidence shows that the horses of other persons as well as those of appellant had been kept in the barn and numerous other parties had been there at various times. The defendant frequently wore blue overalls, but the only positive evidence to identify the pieces of cloth was to the effect that they had been obtained from the granary by defendant's mother-in-law for the purpose of making rugs and that they were never worn by defendant, but had been left in the granary by teamsters who frequently slept there.

The only evidence offered to connect defendant with the shoes was the testimony of a so-called expert that the shoes were worn or run over in a manner similar to those admittedly belonging to defendant. There seems no doubt, however, that the shoes were two sizes smaller than those usually worn by the defendant, and the mother-in-law—however strange it may seem—testified positively that the shoes were hers, and she tells how they happened to be in the place where they were found. The only circumstance, therefore, lending color to the contention that these articles were in possession of appellant at the time of the homicide was the fact that they were found on his premises some time thereafter.

In State v. McAnarney, 70 Kan. 679, 79 Pac. 137, it is said by the Supreme Court of Kansas that: "Testimony was received in regard to a shirt found outside and near defendant's house on the day after the alleged homicide, and on portions of which there appeared to be a pasty stuff of a reddish cast. Attention was specifically called to this testimony in the charge of the court. The shirt was not the one shown to have been worn by the defendant at the time in question nor to have belonged to him. It was found after the post mortem examination and after crowds of people had been about the premises for hours; but where it came from, how it came to be there, and what afterwards became of it do not appear. The connection between the shirt and the defendant, or between it and the supposed homicide, was not sufficiently shown to make the testimony respecting it admissible." The evidence of identification was stronger in the case of People v. Hill, 123 Cal. 574, 56 Pac. 443, than in the case at bar. A certain stick was found by a witness about an hour after the affray, and very near where the fight took place, and it appeared that the deceased was killed by being struck on the head with a stick, but the Supreme Court declared: "The court also erred in permitting the club which McClure found in the corral to be received in evidence and exhibited to the jury. There was no evidence identifying the stick as the one with which the defendant struck the deceased, or in any way connecting the defendant with it. But, as it is evident from the description of the physician that the blow could have been produced by any other large and smooth instrument, it was necessary that there should be some evidence identifying the stick as the one with which the blow was given before it could be offered in evidence. Otherwise the jury could only conjecture that it had been used by the defendant. See Taylor on Evidence, § 557." Of course, circumstantial evidence is admissible to trace the natural objects to the possession of defendant at the time of the homicide, but it must be admitted that here the jury "could only conjecture" that the said articles were upon his person at the time. Indeed, their probative force depends upon the conjecture, first, that these objects were in possession of defendant at the time of the homicide; and, second, that there was upon them the blood of the deceased.

On the day of the inquest an autopsy on the body was performed, and the coroner took a bunch of keys from the clothing of the deceased and placed them in his own pocket. In the evening he handed them to one Charles N. O'Neal. The latter put them in his pocket, and that evening he locked the door of the saloon with one of the keys, and on the next morning, on going to unlock said door, he saw what he took to be a small spot on the doorkey resembling a blood stain. The keys were received in evidence, leading the jury probably to conjecture that the defendant, after killing the deceased, obtained the keys from his pocket, and therewith opened the door of the saloon. In our opinion the foregoing objects should not have been admitted in evidence as the connection of defendant therewith was not sufficiently shown, and there was too much scope for prejudicial surmise in view of the well-known fact that "there is a general mental tendency, when a corporal object is produced as proving something, to assume on sight of the object all else that is asserted about it."

The only evidence offered to show motive for the homicide was testimony of a deed of an undivided one-half interest in the 160 acres of land made by the deceased to the defendant in the year 1904 and the sale of a portion of the land assessed to Bethel for the nonpayment of taxes and the fact that it had not been redeemed, and, furthermore, the testimony of the witness Peabody to a conversation with defendant about a month before the homicide when the latter was plowing in a field where there had been a melon patch for several years. The witness said: "I asked him how it was that Jim wasn't raising any more melons there." He replied with an oath and said: "No; he wouldn't; just that. He said Jim told him he raised about $200 worth of melons there on that piece of ground, but I don't know whether he raised them that year or the year before." He also said "he never would raise any more melons there, as near as I can recollect." The witness, though, admitted that the relations between him and defendant were not friendly. These circumstances may have had some connection with the killing and were properly admitted in evidence, but it is obvious that they are consistent also with the innocence of the accused.

The court was requested by defendant to give the following instruction: "You are instructed that it is the law that verbal statements, or as they are sometimes called extrajudicial statements—that is, statements made by the defendant out of court—are to be received by the jury with caution; and you have a right to consider that there is danger of mistakes from misapprehension of the witnesses, the misuse of the words, the failure of the party to express his own meaning, the infirmity of memory on the part of the witness attempting to relate all of the conversation, and this rule applies when only a part of the defendant's declarations at the time are written down or remembered and proven." The court gave only the portion in italics, and therefore the modified instruction is the court's and subject to the same exception as if given without any request therefor. People v. Wong Sang Lung, 3 Cal. App. 221, 84 Pac. 843; People v. Fitzgerald, 156 N. Y. 253, 50 N. E. 846.

The instruction was requested in view of the fact that the various witnesses differed materially as to what the defendant said the day after the homicide and at the coroner's inquest concerning certain features of the case. The admonition therein contained is justified by general experience, and is an elaboration of the principle announced for the guidance of the jury in Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4, that "the evidence of the oral admissions of a party (ought to be viewed) with caution." The whole instruction might well have been refused as argumentative and an invasion of the province of the jury, but, as given, it charged the jury to view with caution—not the evidence of the statements, but the statements themselves, thereby discrediting the defendant in the eyes of the jury. The prejudicial effect is seen from the fact that if the statements made by the defendant were to be believed he was entirely innocent. It is too clear for argument that the defendant was entitled to have his credibility determined by the jury without any adverse suggestion from the court. It is readily seen that by the modification of the court an instruction designed to afford to defendant the benefit of a friendly comment as to a universally conceded infirmity of human testimony is transformed into a hostile intimation that the defendant's statements concerning the transaction should be rejected as untrue.

It may be that this was the decisive factor in an admittedly close case. At any rate, the judgment cannot be sustained without virtually holding that the jury disregarded the instruction of the court, and that, as far as objectionable therefore it caused no injury to appellant. This we are unauthorized to do.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by the Ætna Indemnity Company against the Altadena Mining & Investment Syndicate and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal, Third District, by which the case was transferred to the Supreme Court pursuant to the following opinion, handed down July 12, 1909:

"This is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage, and is therefore a suit in equity. The appeal was properly taken to the Supreme Court, but was erroneously filed in this court, such error doubtless occurring through the fact that the entitlement of the court on the back of the transcript an briefs is printed as follows: 'In the District Court of Appeal of California, Third Appellate District.' It ought to be pretty well understood by the profession by this time that, under section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, this court is without appellate jurisdiction of suits in equity by direct appeal. The case will have to be transferred to the Supreme Court, and such is the order."

Thereupon, on July 13, 1909, the case was retransferred by the Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed.

E. W. Holland, for appellants. J. B. Curtin and H. F. Peart, for respondent.

HART, J. This is a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed to secure the payment of a promissory note for the sum of $6,000. The appeal is from the judgment foreclosing said mortgage upon the judgment roll alone.

The facts as found by the court are as follows: On the 6th day of July, 1904, the defendant Altadena Mining & Investment Syndicate (to which we shall hereafter refer as "the defendant," inasmuch as the action was dismissed as to the fictitiously named defendants) executed to M. F. Fillmore and J. J. Smith its promissory note for the sum of $6,000, and at the same time executed and delivered to said Fillmore and Smith, as security for the payment of said note, a mortgage upon certain lands and premises situated in Tuolumne county. Said mortgage was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tuolumne county. The indebtedness for which said note was given was incurred some time prior to the execution of the note, and, in the language of the finding upon that point, "was represented by bonds evidencing indebtedness." Fillmore and Smith, payees of the note, were members of the board of directors of the defendant at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage, but the court found that said Fillmore and Smith "did not vote or participate in said meeting when the execution of said mortgage was being considered or voted upon, but that the majority of the board of directors then remaining unanimously authorized the execution of said note and mortgage, and that the said board of directors in causing said note and mortgage to be executed by said corporation were not procured so to do by either said J. J. Smith or M. F. Fillmore, or by both of them." Subsequently to the execution of the note and mortgage the action of the board of directors in authorizing their execution and in executing the instruments was ratified by the holders of more than two-thirds of the entire capital stock of said defendant, said act of ratification having been reduced to writing, and signed, acknowledged, and certified to, as required by law, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tuolumne county. Thereafter, said J. J. Smith and M. F. Fillmore assigned said note and mortgage to one A. I. Smith, who on the 23d day of February, 1905, assigned the same to Paul M. Nippert Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of this state, and which corporation is the designated agent of the plaintiff in this state, and thereafter said Paul M. Nippert Company assigned said note and mortgage to the plaintiff under the following circumstances: It appears, and the court so found, that at the time of the assignment of said note and mortgage to the plaintiff an action was pending in the superior court of the county of Santa Clara wherein one E. G. Northrup was plaintiff and the defendant herein was defendant, in which action said Northrup on the 17th day of February, 1905, recovered a judgment against the defendant in said action (the defendant in this) in the sum of $1,968, including costs. The said defendant, desiring to take an appeal from said judgment to the appellate court of the first district, applied to the plaintiff in this action to become the surety on the undertaking on appeal, and the plaintiff herein agreed to become such surety on such undertaking provided that the defendant in said action and herein would indemnify plaintiff against loss in the event the judgment in said action was affirmed on appeal, and thereupon, for the purpose of so indemnifying plaintiff, the said A. I. Smith on the 23d day of February, 1905, assigned said note and mortgage to the plaintiff. In accordance with this arrangement, plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant an undertaking on appeal in the sum of $300 to perfect said appeal, and a further undertaking in the sum of $3,950, the same being double the amount of said judgment, in order to stay execution thereon, the condition being that it would pay said judgment in case the same was affirmed on appeal. Thereafter, and on the 10th day of July, 1907, the said judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal of the First District, and therefore, at the time of the commencement of the present action, there was due said Northrup upon said judgment the sum of $1,968, including costs and interest. On the 5th day of September, 1906, in an action then pending in the superior court in and for Alameda county, in which said Northrup and others were plaintiffs, and the defendant herein and said J. J. Smith and said A. I. Smith and others were defendants, judgment was rendered and entered wherein and whereby the note and mortgage involved in the present controversy, together with the action of the stockholders of the defendant ratifying the action of the board of directors of said defendant in authorizing the execution of and in executing said note and mortgage, were set aside and canceled, and said "judgment has become and is now final." The plaintiff here was not a party to said action "and had no notice or knowledge of the entry of said judgment, but at the time that said note and mortgage were assigned to plaintiff, and at the time plaintiff became surety on said undertaking on appeal, it believed that said note and mortgage were in full force and effect, and that no officer or stockholder of said corporation Altadena Mining & Investment Syndicate or any person advised it to the contrary."

The court further found that at the time of the ratification by the stockholders of the action of the board of directors in the execution of the note and mortgage concerned here said J. J. Smith was the owner of 70,425 shares of the capital stock of the defendant. The decree in the Alameda county case adjudged that said Smith was not the owner of said stock or of any stock in defendant.

Upon the foregoing facts, as found by the trial court, the appellant urges the following contentions on this appeal, for which, it insists, the judgment must be reversed:

(1) That the court failed to make a finding, which is essential to the validity of the note and mortgage, that the "authorization or purported authorization of the note and mortgage was made at a regular meeting of the board of directors or at a special meeting regularly called for that purpose." That there is no finding that the note and mortgage or either of them were authorized by a majority of the board of directors.

(2) That the finding that the defendant was indebted to Smith and Fillmore is contradictory to and inconsistent with the recitals of the judgment of the superior court of Alameda county, setting aside and canceling the transaction by the board of directors of defendant resulting in the execution of the note and mortgage in dispute and setting aside the purported ratification of said transaction by the stockholders of the defendant.

(3) That the finding that at the time of the ratification by the stockholders of the action of the board of directors in the execution of said note and mortgage said J. J. Smith was the owner of 70,425 shares of the capital stock of the defendant is contrary to and inconsistent with the judgment of the superior court of Alameda county, heretofore referred to, by which it was adjudged, among other things, that said J. J. Smith was not the owner of said stock or any stock of the defendant, said judgment having been rendered more than one month prior to the commencement of this action.

(4) That the court failed to make a finding with reference to the resolution adopted by the board of directors authorizing the execution of the note and mortgage. That said resolution was set out in the answer and involved a material fact in defense of the action, inasmuch as by the terms of said resolution the note is made payable "out of money to be received from one Mr. Holmes," and that thus an "equity was created between the payor of the note and the payees," and that the respondent took the note subject to such equity. That the failure to find on such issue is fatal to the judgment.

(5) It is further insisted that the court's failure to find that the note was unpaid constitutes an omission to find upon a material fact essentially an issue in the case, and that for such failure the judgment must be reversed.

(6) The point is made that the action of the board of directors is void, or at least voidable, for the reason that the payees of the note were members of the board of directors at the time the note and mortgage were authorized to be executed, and at the time the same were executed and delivered to the said payees.

1. It will be convenient to first dispose of the second and third points of appellant in the order in which they are stated in the foregoing. The defendant, in its answer, pleaded in bar of this action the judgment of the superior court of Alameda county canceling the note and mortgage in controversy and setting aside the action of the stockholders ratifying the action of the board of directors in executing said note and mortgage. Upon motion, however, that portion of the answer pleading said judgment was stricken out on the ground that the plaintiff became the owner and holder of said note and mortgage prior to the rendition and entry of said judgment, and was not made nor was it a party to the action in which said judgment was rendered and entered, and it could not therefore be bound by it. The motion to strike out that portion of the answer was proper, and the consequence of the granting of said motion was manifestly to eliminate said judgment as an issue in the case, in so far as any effect it might be supposed to have as a bar or a defense to plaintiff's cause of action. But the court made a finding as to the rendition and entry and the effect, in a certain aspect of the case, of said judgment, and the presumption is that evidence of said judgment and its recitals was received into the record. As one of its conclusions of law, the court found that, in the event that the mortgaged property should sell for a sum in excess of the judgment herein, costs, attorneys' fees, etc., such overplus should be paid over to the defendant. It is thus made clearly to appear that the reception of evidence of the said judgment of the superior court of Alameda county was grounded upon the proposition that the note and mortgage, having by said judgment been canceled, were void as to any rights which the assignor of the defendant might claim thereunder, and that any overplus from the sale of the property after the satisfaction of the judgment, costs, etc., herein, would rightfully belong to the defendant. It is, therefore, readily to be perceived that the position of appellant that the findings as to the indebtedness of the defendant to J. J. Smith and Fillmore, and that Smith, at the time of the ratification of the action of the directors in executing the note and mortgage, by the stockholders, was the owner of 70,425 shares of the stock of the defendant, are contradictory to the recitals in the said judgment of the superior court of Alameda county, is, as a matter of law, entirely devoid of any foundation for its support. It is plain to be seen that there could be no inconsistency between the court's findings on the points under consideration and the recitals of the Alameda court's judgment unless the latter could be successfully pleaded and proved in bar of plaintiff's right of action, and, as we have shown, evidence of said judgment and its recitals was not admitted upon that theory.

The court, to briefly recapitulate, correctly held in its ruling on the motion to strike out that the Alameda county judgment could not under the circumstances as disclosed by the answer itself, operate as a bar to plaintiff's right to the relief demanded by the averments of its complaint; but at the trial, with manifest propriety—indeed, in response to the demands of justice and equity—the court received evidence of said judgment so that any excess which might be realized from the sale of the property over the amount necessary to indemnify the plaintiff against loss might be adjudged to belong to the party justly and legally entitled thereto; or, as the court concluded as a matter of law, in case the plaintiff was not compelled to satisfy the judgment rendered by the superior court of Santa Clara county in favor of E. G. Northrup and against the defendant here, the whole sum realized from the sale of the mortgage property, less the costs, attorneys' fees, etc., should be paid to said defendant.

2. The contention that the failure of the court to make specific findings as to whether the resolution authorizing the board of directors to execute the note and mortgage was adopted at a regular or a legally called special meeting is without substantial merit, as is, likewise, the point that there is no finding that such authorization was made by a majority of the board of directors. It appears from the findings that at the time the note and mortgage were authorized to be made said J. J. Smith and M. F. Fillmore, payees of the note, were members of the board of directors of the defendant, and the proposition that the court did not find that the said instruments were authorized to be made by a majority of the directors proceeds from a somewhat subtle if not hypercritical analysis and challenge of that portion of finding No. 4 which reads as follows: " * * * but at the time and at the meeting whereby said mortgage was authorized to be executed said J. J. Smith and M. F. Fillmore did not vote or participate in said meeting when the execution of said mortgage was being considered or voted upon, but that the majority of the board of directors then remaining, unanimously authorized the execution of said note and mortgage," etc. It is said that the language of said finding which we have italicized is so ambiguous that it fails to clearly disclose that a majority of all the members of the board of directors authorized the mortgage to be executed. The finding, it may be conceded, could have been more clearly phrased, but we think its language is clear enough to indicate that the court therein intended to find and does thereby find that a majority of all the board of directors were present and participated in the proceedings culminating in the authorization of the execution of the instruments. In other words, we think the finding must be construed to mean that, with Smith and Fillmore absent, so far as taking any part in the proceedings was concerned, the remaining members of the board transacted the business concerning the note and mortgage. This construction not only gives the finding its evident meaning, but harmonizes with the rule as it has been uniformly followed in California in the construction of findings of fact. In Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 744 (22 L. R. A. 257), it is said that "the findings of the court should receive such construction as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment; and when, from the facts found by the court, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court." And in Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986, the court declares that "any uncertainty in the findings is to be construed so as to support the judgment rather than defeat it." See, also, Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 342, 66 Pac. 309; Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 656, 77 Pac. 659; Gould v. Eaton, 111 Cal. 639, 44 Pac. 319, 52 Am. St. Rep. 201; People's Home Savings Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 Pac. 858. It is true that there is no finding which in express language indicates whether the meeting at which this transaction was conducted was a regular meeting of the board or a regularly called special meeting. But we think the presumption must be indulged that it was a lawful meeting of the board.

3. The point urged by appellant that the resolution authorizing the execution of the note and mortgage having been pleaded in the answer as one of the defenses against the action to foreclose the mortgage involves a material issue, upon which a finding should have been made, cannot be sustained. The necessary effect of the argument upon this point is that the resolution, having specifically designated a particular fund, or money to be derived from a particular source, out of which the note should be paid, its payment out of any other money or by any other means cannot be coerced. This proposition is devoid of any solid reason for its maintenance. In the first place, the resolution does not by its terms limit the right to compel the payment of the note to the contingency that there shall be received by the defendant certain moneys from said "Mr. Holmes." It provides as well for a mortgage to be executed upon the property of the defendant as security for the payment of the note. Besides, the note, as must essentially be the fact, is upon its face an unconditional promise to pay to the payees the sum set forth therein, and there is no provision in said note that it is to be paid only out of money to be obtained from a particular person or source. The plaintiff, so far as the findings disclose, took the note by assignment in the nature of collateral security—that is, for the purpose of indemnifying it against any loss it might sustain through having become the surety for the defendant on the appeal from the judgment obtained against it by Northrup. Assuming that the terms of said resolution could in any event affect the right of plaintiff to maintain this action, there is absolutely nothing in the record from which it may even be remotely inferred that the plaintiff had any knowledge of the contents of the resolution, by which the directors of the defendant authorized themselves to make the note and mortgage. As before declared, the judgment adjudging the whole transaction void and setting it aside could in no manner or degree bind the plaintiff; it not having been made a party to the action in which that judgment was given. It would seem, we may say in this connection, that it was intended that the plaintiff should know nothing of that action, for the defendant knew that the note and mortgage had been assigned to plaintiff for its (defendant's) benefit prior to the com-commencement of said action, and yet consented to a judgment declaring the note and mortgage void. We conclude upon this point that the resolution or its terms did not constitute a material issue in the case, and it follows, of course, that no finding with regard thereto was necessary or required.

4. The contention that the court committed a vital error by not finding that the note had not been paid is untenable. It is a well-established rule that where a complaint in an action on a promissory note alleges that the party declaring thereupon is the "owner and holder" of the note raises the presumption that such note has not been paid, and that the burden is upon the party defending against the note to prove that it has been paid, if such be his defense. Griffith v. Lewin, 125 Cal. 620, 58 Pac. 205; Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 434, 67 Pac. 681; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142; Thompson v. Thompson, 140 Cal. 546, 74 Pac. 21. The court finds, but denominates it as a conclusion of law, that "plaintiff is the lawful owner and holder of said note and mortgage," etc. But, although this finding or conclusion is designated by the court as a conclusion of law, it nevertheless involves the finding of a fact, and is sufficient as such to support the judgment in that respect. If the plaintiff is the lawful owner and holder of said note, then certainly the presumption is that it has not been paid. It is, moreover, to be presumed that, if the defendant had introduced proof sufficient to overcome the presumption of the nonpayment of the note, the court would have made a finding accordingly. Furthermore, if, as a matter of fact, the defendant introduced evidence addressed to the proposition that the note had been paid, it should have brought up such evidence by a bill of exceptions or a statement, and, having failed to do so, the presumption is that, if evidence was offered and received upon the point, such evidence was against it, the burden being upon it to prove the fact or overcome the presumption of nonpayment.

5. It is lastly contended that the note and mortgage are void because the payees were directors of the defendant at the time of the execution of the instruments; Smith being also secretary of the board of directors at said time. In support of this proposition, we are referred to the comparatively recent case of Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 365, 78 Pac. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42; but an examination of that case will readily disclose that it does not sustain the position of appellant here.

It is there held (we quote from the syllabi which correctly state the propositions as they are treated in the text) that "one who is president and director of a corporation occupies a beneficiary and trust relation thereto; and where he purchased its notes outright, and caused the corporation, by himself as president, to become an indorser thereof to himself individually, guaranteeing the payment of the notes without the authority, knowledge, or approval of the corporation, he cannot maintain an action to enforce the express contracts of indorsement, the making and enforcement of which are equally prohibited by law. Such contracts are a breach of trust, and voidable at the mere election of the corporation, if not absolutely void. * * *

The president of the corporation in that case had done, according to the evidence, the very thing which the foregoing declares cannot be lawfully done in a transaction between himself and the corporation; the relation between the two being essentially fiduciary in its nature. No one could have the temerity to dispute the soundness, justice, and equity of the rule as thus laid down. Here, however, the findings show a state of facts which marks a clear line of distinction between that case and the one at bar. As seen, it not only appears that the payees of the note took no part in the execution of the note and the mortgage, or in the proceedings of the board of directors leading thereto, but that the action of the directors in the matter was subsequently ratified by the holders of more than two-thirds of the entire capital stock of the defendant. In Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, supra, Mr. Justice Lorigan, who wrote the opinion, exhaustively examines and reviews a large number of the cases touching upon the proposition under discussion, and with most gratifying perspicuity points out the difference between that class of cases where an officer of the corporation as such deals with himself in his individual capacity concerning the property of the corporation, without the knowledge and consent of the corporation or the stockholders, and that line of cases in which an officer of the corporation prosecutes and consummates a transaction in his individual right with such corporation with the consent of the corporation, and without having himself taken part as an officer of the corporation in the transaction. Referring to the cases cited by the respondent in that case (the president of the corporation), the opinion says: "In none of these cases is it held that he could deal with himself, or that a contract made with himself without the knowledge of the other directors or the stockholders, or without the subsequent ratification or approval of the corporation (italics ours), could be sustained or enforced against the corporation. This marked distinction is plainly declared in a line from one of the cases cited by respondent (Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 590, 23 L. Ed. 328), where the court says: 'The defendant was not here both seller and buyer.'" The court then proceeds to specifically notice the cases cited by respondent, and, among others, the case of S. C. R. R. Co. v. Spreckels, 65 Cal. 193, 3 Pac. 661, 802, of which it is said: "No question of a director dealing with himself is involved. The plain point decided there was that the corporation having borrowed money from the director, Hihn, the latter was entitled to be repaid"; citing a large number of California cases to the point that "where the corporation has dealt with the director he may recover upon a quantum meruit. Not, however, that a director can recover upon an express contract made with himself without the knowledge or sanction of the corporation." (Italics ours.)

Of course, a director or other officer of a corporation cannot become interested as an individual in a transaction with such corporation involving the trust with which as such officer he is charged where his interest in such transaction is adverse to that of his beneficiary. Civ. Code, § 2230. A director of a corporation, like any other trustee, is bound to act in the utmost good faith toward his beneficiary. Civ. Code, § 2228; Schnittger v. Old Home, etc., Min. Co., 144 Cal. 606, 78 Pac. 9. But, as is declared by the Supreme Court in the last cited case, a person is not absolutely precluded from dealing directly with the corporation of which he is a director. "Any transaction between them is subject to rigid scrutiny and is voidable at the instance of the beneficiary for any violation of his duty as trustee, but is not ipso facto void. 'The mere fact that the creditor was a director of the company does not render the transaction fraudulent. There is nothing which forbids either members or directors of a corporation from making contracts with it like any other individual; and when the contract is made, the director stands as to the contract in the relation of a stranger to the corporation';" citing Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 229. In short, the sum of all the authorities is that, while transactions between a director of a corporation as an individual and the corporation will always be subject to severe scrutiny and required to be characterized by the utmost good faith, a director of a corporation may advance money to it, may become its creditor, may take from it a mortgage or security, and may enforce the same like any other creditor. 3 Thompson on Corporations, § 2368. The findings in the case at bar disclose no bad faith in the transaction resulting in the execution of the note and mortgage involved here. To the contrary, they show that the transaction was had in good faith and free from all taint of fraud. They further show, as we have seen, that the plaintiff accepted the note and mortgage as a security against loss as surety on the defendant's appeal in an action in which a heavy judgment had been obtained against it before any claim was made or effort put forth to show that the transaction was anything other than an honest one. While, as we have shown, the judgment of the Alameda superior court has no material relevancy to or bearing upon the merits of plaintiff's action here, it may be suggested that the circumstance appearing upon its face that said judgment was rendered and entered by consent of all the parties to the action of which it is the offspring furnishes some ground for suspecting that it was collusively procured for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's indemnity against loss.

In any event, we entertain no doubt that the judgment here is amply supported by the findings, and that it is just and involves a most equitable adjudication of the controversy.

The judgment appealed from is accordingly affirmed.

Ex parte GREY. (Cr. 186.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California,
Aug. 20, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 62*)—GOVERNMENTAL POWERS—DELEGATION AND AUTHORITY.

Where the charter of a city grants to the mayor and common council the power to appoint a board of plumbing examiners, such power cannot be delegated to the board of police and fire commissioners, or to any one else.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 124*)—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—CONFLICT WITH STATUTE.

Act March 9, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 58, c. 50), amending the act approved March 3, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 12, c. 14), made it unlawful for any plumber to work in any city until he had obtained from the board of health of said city a license to be issued after satisfactory examination by the board. Held, that the law was general, and applied to every board of health in every city in the state, and a city ordinance attempting to delegate to the board of police and fire commissioners the power to appoint a board of plumbing examiners to examine and license plumbers is void.

Application of G. L. Grey for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted.

Frank H. Benson, for petitioner. Cleveland L. Dam and George Appell, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. The petitioner is imprisoned under a complaint charging him with unlawfully practicing the trade of plumbing in the city of San Jose, in the county of Santa Clara, without first having obtained a certificate from the board of plumbing examiners authorizing him so to do, he being a journeyman plumber, contrary to the provisions of an ordinance of said city in relation to plumbing and drainage, a copy of which ordinance is set forth in the petition.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

It is claimed that the ordinance, in so far as it provides for the appointment of a board of plumbing examiners, and the issuance of a certificate by them, and the fixing of a penalty for the violation of its terms in this regard, is in conflict with the general laws of the state, and therefore void. This is the only question in the case which we deem it necessary to decide. The ordinance provides as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any master plumber or journeyman plumber to practice his trade in the city of San Jose without first obtaining a certificate from the board of plumbing examiners. To obtain such certificate it shall be necessary for each plumber to pass a satisfactory examination before the said board of plumbing examiners, showing his knowledge and ability to do work as a master plumber or journeyman plumber in accordance with the latest and most approved method of sanitary plumbing. Said board of plumbing examiners shall consist of the plumbing inspector and six other members, to be appointed by the board of police and fire commissioners, to be submitted. They shall all be practical plumbers, three to be journeyman and three to be employers, and each of the members of said board to pass an examination under the supervision of the board of police and fire commissioners. No person shall be eligible to an appointment on the board of plumbing examiners until he shall have first passed a satisfactory examination the same as provided in this section for obtaining a certificate for practicing plumbing." It will be seen that under the said ordinance the board of plumbing examiners shall consist of the plumbing inspector, and six other members to be appointed by the board of police and fire commissioners. This is the board of plumbing examiners authorized by the ordinance to give the certificate, and the failure to obtain such certificate is the omission which it is claimed constitutes a crime, and for which the prisoner is held in custody.

If the charter of the city of San Jose confers upon the mayor and common council the power to appoint a board of plumbing examiners, such power is by implication under the general power to enforce police or sanitary regulations, for there is no language in the charter directly granting such power. If we were to hold that the mayor and common council have such implied power under the charter, it is clear that such power cannot be delegated to the board of police and fire commissioners or to any one else. It is elementary that the common council of a municipal corporation in whom certain specific powers are vested by the charter cannot delegate the trust so vested in such common council to other parties not named in the charter; and it is not necessary to cite authorities to sustain such proposition. The board of police and fire commissioners consists of five members appointed by the mayor. The charter expressly gives said board of police and fire commissioners certain powers, but we look in vain for any authority given said board to appoint a board of plumbing examiners. The powers of such board relate to the police and fire departments, the maintenance of law and order, the protection of the buildings in said city from fire; the superintending of the laying and erection of electric telegraph and telephone wires; the maintenance of fire alarm and police telegraph and telephone stations and apparatus; and other similar matters. There is not a word in the charter in any way granting to the board of police and fire commissioners any authority as to the construction of buildings, the plumbing thereof, or as to any other purely sanitary matters. The charter provides for a board of health, to consist of five members, who shall each be a duly licensed physician. It states: "The board of health shall exercise a general supervision over the health of the city, with full power to use all measures necessary to promote the cleanliness and sanitary conditions thereof; to prevent the introduction into the city of malignant or infectious diseases, and to remove or otherwise dispose of any person or animal attacked by any such disease, and to adopt in reference to such person or animal any restrictions, regulations or measures deemed advisable. Said board shall adopt and enforce such forms and regulations as in their judgment will secure reliable vital and mortuary statistics; shall have the supervision of all persons engaged or appointed to carry out any of the powers conferred on said board."

The Legislature of the state passed a general law, approved March 9, 1887 (St. 1887, p. 53, c. 50), entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to grant to boards of health or health officers in cities and cities and counties the power to regulate the plumbing and drainage of buildings, and provide for the registration of plumbers,' approved March 3, 1885, by amending section 1 and 2 thereof." This act provides:

"Section 1. It shall not be lawful for any persons to carry on business or labor as a master or journeyman plumber in any incorporated city or in any city and county in this state, until he shall have obtained from the board of health of said city or city and county a license, authorizing him to carry on business, or labor as such mechanic. A license so to do shall be issued only after a satisfactory examination by the board of each applicant upon his qualifications to conduct such business, or to so labor. All applications for license, and all licenses issued, shall state the name in full, age, nativity, and place of residence of the applicant or person so licensed. It shall be the duty of the secretary of each board of health to keep a record of all such licenses, together with an alphabetical index to the same.

"Sec. 2. A list of all licensed plumbers shall be published in the yearly report of the health officer or board of health."

The act just quoted makes it the express duty of the board of health in any incorporated city to examine plumbers, and to issue a license to them if found qualified after such examination. The law is general, uniform in its operation, and applies to every board of health in every incorporated city and every city and county in the state. The ordinance of the city of San Jose attempting to delegate to the board of police and fire commissioners the power to appoint a board of plumbing examiners to examine and issue licenses to plumbers is in conflict with the general law, and hence void. In re Desanta, 8 Cal. App. 295, 96 Pac. 1027. See, also, People ex rel. Wilshire v. Newman, 96 Cal. 605, 31 Pac. 564. The general law provides the machinery by which a plumber may be examined and a license issued to him. It makes it unlawful for any person to labor as a journeyman plumber until he shall have obtained a license from the board of health of the city or city and county in which the labor is to be performed. It is not charged, nor even intimated, in the complaint in this case that the petitioner has not procured such license under the general law.

It follows that the prisoner must be discharged, and it is so ordered.

DINGLEY et al. v. BUCKNER, Sheriff.
(Civ. 608.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Aug. 21, 1909.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 55*)—GROUNDS—INJURY TO BUSINESS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 526, providing that an injunction may be granted when it appears by the complaint that plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and such relief consists in restraining the commission or continuance of the act complained of, or where the commission or continuance of some act would produce waste or great irreparable injury to plaintiff, a complaint averring that plaintiffs were in possession and entitled to the possession of the necessary appliances connected with a building, used in conducting a creamery business; that they purchased daily large quantities of cream from neighboring farmers, and manufactured the same into butter, and shipped it to the city, where it was sold daily to a large number of customers, and that under a writ of attachment defendant, as sheriff, took possession of the property described, and was about to close the building, whereby plaintiff's business would be destroyed and all the patrons would be lost and great damage would result, stated a good ground for injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 108, 109; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 118*)—PLEADING—ALLEGATION OF INSOLVENCY.

In an application for an injunction, an allegation of defendant's insolvency is not necessary where it appears in legal contemplation that the damage sought to be enjoined will be irreparable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 236; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 1*)—OFFICE OF WRIT.

The office of a writ of injunction is to restrain the wrongdoer, not to punish him after the wrong has been done or to compel him to undo it.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 136*)—IRREPARABLE INJURY.

While injunction is not a proper remedy for the recovery of possession of personal property, the court may interfere by way of interlocutory injunction to prevent irreparable mischief, though this may involve a change of actual possession, and hence, though defendant was in the possession of plaintiff's place of business, injunction would lie to prevent any further interference with the operation of the business, where the destruction thereof by defendant's acts was threatened.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ALLEGE ERROR.

Defendants could not complain on appeal because plaintiff received less than he was entitled to.

6. INJUNCTION (§ 172*)—MOTION TO DISSOLVE—PLEADING—DENIALS ON INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

While denials on information and belief are authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 437, as matters of pleading, and are sufficient to raise an issue, they are not such denials as will serve as the basis of a motion to dissolve an injunction on the ground that the equities of the bill are denied by the answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John J. Covert, Judge.

Action by W. E. Dingley and others against W. V. Buckner, as sheriff of the county of Kings. From an order dissolving a preliminary injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

F. J. Walker and M. L. Short, for appellants. H. Scott Jacobs, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order dissolving a preliminary injunction. The grounds upon which the motion for a dissolution was made were stated as follows: "(1) That said plaintiffs, or any of them, are not entitled to any injunction in the above entitled action. * * * (4) That there are no sufficient grounds for the retention of said injunction. (5) That said injunction was and is an abortive injunction." The second and third grounds stated are omitted, as they are covered by the first.

1. The facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient, we think, to justify the court in issuing the injunction. It appears by express averment that the plaintiffs were the owners, in the possession and entitled to the possession of the necessary appliances including a boiler and gasoline engine connected with a certain building, and all of which were used in conducting a creamery business and were necessary therefor; that plaintiffs purchased daily large quantities of cream from the neighboring farmers and dairymen, and manufactured said cream daily into butter and shipped it at least three times a week to the city of Los Angeles where the same was contracted to be delivered and where it was sold daily to a large number of customers. "That on the 22d day of September, 1908, the said W. V. Buckner, as sheriff of the county of Kings, and under a writ of attachment issued out of the superior court of this county in the case of M. Fraga v. J. H. Weger and C. K. Sorenson, * * * took possession of all of the said property described in paragraph 1 of this complaint, and threatens to, and is about to, and will, take possession and close said building in which said creamery business is conducted unless restrained by this court from so doing"; that by reason thereof "the whole of said creamery business will be destroyed, and all of the patrons of said creamery will be lost and all of the customers of said creamery for butter will be lost * * * and great waste and damage will result, and irreparable injury and mischief will result to plaintiffs not susceptible of computation or compensation in a suit at law, and all of plaintiffs' rights and interests would be destroyed."

The complaint presents one of the most unquestioned grounds for the application to a court of equity for the writ of injunction. No proceeding at law can afford an adequate remedy for the destruction of one's business. The action of claim and delivery might result in the recovery of the possession of the personal property taken or its value in case delivery could not be had, but the judgment would not include the most important element of loss involved in this proceeding. Section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "an injunction may be granted in the following cases: (1) When it appears by the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and such relief or any part thereof, consists in restraining the commission or continuance of the act complained of either for a limited period or perpetually. (2) When it appears by the complaint or affidavit that the commission or continuance of some act during the litigation would produce waste, great or irreparable injury to the plaintiff." Not only a part but virtually all of the relief demanded here consists in "restraining the continuance of the act complained of," to wit, the possession of said property and thereby an interference with the operation of the plant and the consequent destruction of the business. It is no answer to say that plaintiffs might go out into the market and replace the said personal property. It would be just as legitimate to argue that they might lease other premises or go into some other business. If the fundamental rights of the individual to liberty and the possession of property are to be regarded, plaintiffs obviously could not be precluded by a trespasser from conducting that particular business at that particular place and with the appliances of their own choosing. If authority should be deemed necessary for a proposition so manifest, we find it in the three cases cited by appellants: Watson v. Sutherland, 72 U. S. 74, 18 L. Ed. 580; North v. Peters, 138 U. S. 271, 11 Sup. Ct. 346, 34 L. Ed. 936; and Bolsa Land Co. v. Burdick, 151 Cal. 254, 90 Pac. 532, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275. In the first of these a bill in equity was filed by one Sutherland to enjoin the further prosecution of certain writs of fieri facias as levied by the sheriff Watson, and so to prevent irreparable injury to himself, to wit, the destruction of his business as a merchant. The answer, among other things, set up the defense that the action of trespass furnished a complete and adequate remedy at law, as the complainant could easily obtain in the market property of the same description, quantity, and quality which would suit his purpose as well as those levied upon. The court, however, in reply to this, declared: "How could Sutherland be compensated at law, for the injuries he would suffer, should the grievance of which he complains be consummated? * * * Commercial ruin to Sutherland might, therefore, be the effect of closing his store and selling his goods, and yet the common law fail to reach the mischief. To prevent a consequence like this, a court of equity steps in, arrests the proceedings in limine, brings the parties before it, hears their allegations and proofs, and decrees, either that the proceedings shall be restrained, or else perpetually enjoined. The absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law affords the only test of equity jurisdiction, and the application of this principle to a particular case must depend altogether upon the character of the case as disclosed in the pleadings. In the case we are considering, it is very clear that the remedy in equity could alone furnish relief, and that the ends of justice required the injunction to be issued." And similarly in the North Case, supra, in response to the contention that either the action of trespass or replevin furnished an adequate remedy, it is said: "It does not need argument to show that neither of these actions would afford as complete, prompt, and efficient a remedy for the destruction of the business, which, with the goods levied upon, constituted the appellee's entire estate and pecuniary resources, as would be furnished by a court of equity in preventing such an injury." In the Bolsa Land Company Case it was held by our Supreme Court that "an injunction will lie, at the instance of the owners of an inclosed tract of land used as a game preserve, to restrain a large number of persons who were acting under an agreement and conspiracy between themselves from entering upon the land and committing continuous trespass thereon," and that these acts "constituted such an invasion of plaintiff's asserted rights as to have justified the continuance of the preliminary injunction." In fine, the rule as to the remedy at law is as stated in Story's Eq. Jur. § 33: "It must reach the whole mischief and secure the whole right of the party in a perfect manner at the present time and in future; otherwise equity will interfere and give such relief and aid as the exigency of the particular case may require."

In reply to the criticism of respondent that there is no allegation of the insolvency of defendant, it is sufficient to say that this is a false quantity where it appears in legal contemplation that the damage is irreparable. Wharf & Lighter Co. v. Simpson, 77 Cal. 286, 19 Pac. 426; Kellogg v. King, 114 Cal. 378, 46 Pac. 166, 55 Am. St. Rep. 74. None of the cases cited by respondent, as we understand them, is at all opposed to the foregoing views.

2. The contention that the injunction was "abortive" is based upon the consideration that the act which was sought to be enjoined, to wit, the taking possession of the personal property, had already been accomplished, and the temporary injunction had the effect of changing such possession, and to that extent was a mandatory injunction and should not have been issued, and also that it permitted "a sort of joint possession between the sheriff and appellants—a thing absolutely unheard of in legal procedure." In support of the first ground are cited Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543, 35 Pac. 156, 563; Hatch v. Rancey (Cal. App.) 100 Pac. 190, and San Antonio W. Co. v. Bodenhamer, 133 Cal. 248, 65 Pac. 471. In the Stewart Case the question was whether an appeal bond operated to stay execution of an injunction, and in that connection the court took occasion to state what as a general rule is true that: "The office of a writ of injunction, as its name imports, is peculiarly a preventive and not a remedial one. It is to restrain the wrongdoer, not to punish him after the wrong has been done or to compel him to undo it." In the Hatch Case the wrong had been entirely consummated more than a year before the action was brought and hence it was not a case for injunction. The San Antonio Water Company Case was an action involving real property and under the facts was properly decided. It is also true, as stated therein, that injunction "is not a proper remedy for recovery of possession of personal property." It is just as true, however, as affirmed in said decision, that the court may interfere "by way of interlocutory injunction for the protection of legal rights and the prevention of irreparable mischief although this may involve a change of the actual possession. 2 High on Injunctions, §

1106." It is clear that here the wrong was a continuous one, and, as we have seen, the action was to prevent any future interference with the operation of the business and the possession of the said personal property was merely incidental to the primary purpose of the action. It would certainly be intolerable that equity should refuse to interfere to prevent the destruction of one's business for the reason that the despoiler has acted so speedily as to take possession of the appurtenances of said business before the owner is aware of his purpose or can move to circumvent it. Neither could respondent complain because the injunction provided that "the said sheriff shall be permitted to hold possession of said property by placing a keeper in possession thereof subject to the above restrictions." Plaintiffs, under the showing made, in our opinion should have been allowed to conduct the business without the presence of the keeper, but it surely does not lie in the mouth of defendant to complain because plaintiffs received less than they were entitled to.

3. Under the circumstances, we think the court should not have dissolved the injunction. By the dissolution, the purpose of the action was defeated and the continuance of the injunction in force could not have prejudiced the rights of the plaintiff in the attachment suit.

In High on Injunctions, § 1511, it is said: "If the continuance of the injunction, even admitting defendant's answer to be true, cannot prejudice or impair his rights, and on the other hand its dissolution might seriously impair the rights of complainant, the motion to dissolve upon the coming in of the answer should not be allowed." And, again (section 1512): "It is also held that where the injunction is not merely ancillary to some other or principal relief sought by the action, but is itself the principal relief desired and its dissolution would be equivalent to a dismissal of the action, if a reasonable doubt exists in the mind of the court whether the bill is sufficiently negated by the answer, it is proper to refuse a dissolution, and continue the injunction to the hearing." If the material allegations of the complaint had been positively denied by the answer under the rule, the action of the court below could not be disturbed. But the denial of plaintiffs' ownership is only on information and belief, and the answer admits that defendant took possession of the property. Therefore we have a case for the principle announced in Porter v. Jennings, 89 Cal. 445, 26 Pac. 967: "Certain allegations of the complaint are denied upon information and belief. While denials in this form are authorized by section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure as matters of pleading, and are sufficient to raise an issue, yet they are not such denials as will serve as the basis of a motion to dissolve an injunction on the ground that the equities of the bill are fully denied by the answer. Judge Story says: 'Such negation affords no presumption against the plaintiff's claim, but merely establishes that the defendant has no personal knowledge to aid it or disprove it.'"

As we view it, we think it was an injustice to plaintiffs to dissolve the injunction, and the order is therefore reversed.

GRAY et al. v. TIMES-MIRROR CO.
(Civ. 546.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Aug. 21, 1909.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—WANT OF PROSECUTION.

Nisi prius courts have inherent power to dismiss pending actions when not diligently prosecuted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. § 140; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—WANT OF PROSECUTION.

Where plaintiffs' attorneys, for more than 13 months after defendant had sent them copies of the papers, pleadings, etc., to replace the destroyed record, and offered to stipulate that such papers, etc., might be substituted in place of the record, failed to proceed to have the record restored, the court properly dismissed the action for want of prosecution; that a large amount of business had accumulated in the office of plaintiffs' attorneys, being no excuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 140, 141; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

3. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—WANT OF PROSECUTION—EXCUSES—ILLNESS OF JUDGE.

That the presiding judge of the department to which the action was assigned was too ill to tend to his judicial duties was not a reasonable excuse for plaintiffs' delay in securing an order for restoration of a destroyed record, since the signing of the order on presentation of proper stipulation of attorneys would have been a mere formal act, which could have been performed at any time by any of the 12 judges of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

4. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—WANT OF PROSECUTION.

It being the duty of plaintiffs to take all steps necessary to secure a decision on a demurrer to the complaint, that they could not force a decision on the demurrer did not excuse their lack of diligence in securing a restoration of the record which had been destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. § 142; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

5. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—WANT OF PROSECUTION.

The party moving to dismiss for want of diligence in prosecuting an action need not affirmatively show the extent of the inconvenience or injury he has suffered, or may suffer, by the delay, since the law will presume injury from unreasonable delay.

6. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 60*)—WANT OF PROSECUTION.

That defendant did not protest against plaintiffs' delay in prosecution was no answer to a motion to dismiss for such delay.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by C. F. Gray and another against the Times-Mirror Company. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames and Ames & Manning, for appellants. Hunsaker & Britt, for respondent.

HART, J. The court below rendered and caused to be entered a judgment dismissing this action on the ground that plaintiffs had not prosecuted the same with reasonable diligence. This appeal is by the plaintiffs from said judgment on a bill of exceptions.

There is no dispute with regard to the facts; and, as they are fully and accurately narrated in the brief of counsel for the respondent, we shall here state them in the language of said brief:

"The action is one to recover damages claimed to have been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the publication by defendant of an alleged libelous article in the Los Angeles Sunday Times July 3, 1904. The complaint was filed September 20, 1904. After defendant had filed a demurrer, an amended complaint was filed February 7, 1905, to which defendant filed a demurrer February 15, 1905, which was sustained May 11, 1905. A second amended complaint was filed May 25, 1905, to which defendant demurred June 3, 1905. This demurrer was under submission and undisposed of April 18, 1906, on which day all of the pleadings and records in the cause were destroyed by the general conflagration of that date.

"September 23, 1906, the attorneys for defendant received from Mr. Ames a letter dated September 22, 1906, requesting copies of the papers in the action, together with a stipulation that they might be substituted in place of the destroyed originals. In this letter the writer, among other things, said: 'All the public court records and all of my private record papers in the case of Gray et al. v. The Times-Mirror were destroyed by fire. Will you kindly send me copies of your papers, together with stipulation that they may be substituted in place of the destroyed originals? I have been unable to give this matter attention before this time on account of the terrible confusion incident to the loss of all papers in my office and the total loss of all our public records. Kindly send copies of all briefs and pleadings in the case. Please send bill for copies of papers, and I will promptly send check for the same.'

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

An early reply will be esteemed a great favor.' Immediately upon the receipt of Mr. Ames' letter directions were given to have a copy of the office files of Hunsaker & Britt of the papers in said action made for Mr. Ames; and on October 5, 1906, copies of all of the papers requested by Mr. Ames, including the briefs and a copy of all entries which had been made in the office docket or register of actions kept by Hunsaker & Britt relating to the proceedings in said cause were sent by mail to Mr. Ames, together with a letter dated October 5, 1906, in which, after stating that the copies had just been completed and compared, it was said: 'This copy was made by our office force, and there is no charge for it. We are also sending a copy of the entries in our register of actions. If you will take such portions of this copy as you desire to have substituted, and prepare the stipulation, we shall be pleased to sign it.' October 10, 1906, Mr. Ames wrote Mr. Hunsaker a letter in which he said: 'Many thanks for your kindness, courtesy, and promptness in forwarding these copies. As soon as I can examine them I will prepare a stipulation embracing such of the papers as are necessary to be filed in order to restore the record in our superior court, and forward same to you for signature.'

"Nothing further was done until November 14, 1907—13 months and 4 days after the date of the letter of Mr. Ames acknowledging receipt of the copies of the record—on which date Messrs. Ames & Manning mailed to Hunsaker & Britt the 'petition, papers, stipulation, and order restoring records' in the case, with the request that they sign the stipulation. November 21, 1907, Hunsaker & Britt wrote Messrs. Ames & Manning that they had inserted certain papers which had been omitted, which constituted a part of the record, and had modified the proposed stipulation for the restoration of the record by inserting the following clause: 'But by entering into this stipulation defendant does not waive its right to move to dismiss the action for the failure of plaintiffs to have prosecuted the same with diligence, or in any manner waive its right to move to dismiss the action for the delay of plaintiffs in instituting proceedings for the restoration of the record in said cause.' The stipulation as thus modified was filed and an order restoring the record made December 9, 1907. December 20, 1907, defendant served notice of its motion to dismiss the action, on the grounds that the plaintiffs had not prosecuted the same, and had not instituted or prosecuted the proceedings for the restoration of the record, with reasonable or any diligence, and that plaintiffs had not given an undertaking, as required by section 1 of the act entitled 'An act concerning actions for libel and slander,' approved March 23, 1872, as amended April 16, 1880, and that the record, as restored, fails to show that any such undertaking was given by plaintiff."

The reasons upon which resistance to the motion is urged are set forth in an affidavit made by Mr. Fisher Ames, counsel for the plaintiffs. They are as follows: "At the time of receiving said papers a large amount of business had accumulated in affiant's office, by reason of the holidays succeeding the fire and earthquake of April, 1906, and by reason of the unsettled condition of all business affairs in San Francisco, and the imperfect facilities of transacting business, and the difficulties under which the same could be transacted; that all of affiant's papers, documents, and memoranda, in all cases then pending, in which affiant was acting, or had acted, as attorney, were totally destroyed, and that it was extremely difficult, and in many instances nearly impossible, for affiant, to make any headway or progress in the transaction of legal business in which he was interested; that affiant acted with all possible dispatch in the transaction of business in his office, attending first, as it became necessary, to matters which were most pressing; that, owing to the prolonged ill health of the judge of this department, which began in the latter part of May, 1907, and continued until about the month of October, 1907, during which time the said judge was almost continuously absent from the bench by reason of sickness, affiant delayed the application to restore the records in this action until the said judge was restored to health, and had returned to the bench and resumed his judicial labors; that affiant deemed it proper that this matter should be heard by the said judge of this department for the reason that defendant's demurrer to plaintiffs' second amended complaint was pending before said judge and undecided, the same having been submitted to the court for consideration and decision on briefs duly prepared, served, and filed on or about the 12th day of April, 1906, a few days before the fire and earthquake."

Section 581a, Code Civ. Proc., added by St. 1907, p. 712, c. 376, § 2, and section 583, Code Civ. Proc., are not, as is readily observable from the statement of the facts, involved here. But that nisi prius courts possess inherent power to dismiss pending actions upon the ground that they have not been diligently prosecuted is a proposition repeatedly confirmed and well settled in this state. Kubli v. Hawckett, 89 Cal. 638, 27 Pac. 57; First National Bank v. Nason, 115 Cal. 626, 47 Pac. 595; Stanley v. Gillen, 119 Cal. 176, 51 Pac. 183; People v. Jefferds, 126 Cal. 296, 58 Pac. 704; San Jose L. & W. Co. v. Allen, 129 Cal. 247, 61 Pac. 1083; Mowry v. Weisborn, 137 Cal. 110, 69 Pac. 971; Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 75 Pac. 831; Marks v. Keenan, 148 Cal. 161, 82 Pac. 772; Bernard v. Parmelee, 6 Cal. App. 537, 92 Pac. 658; In re Heywood's Estate, 154 Cal. 312, 97 Pac. 825; Focha v. Focha's Estate, 8 Cal. App. 707, 97 Pac. 321.

The only question presented here for determination is, therefore, Did the court's order dismissing the action involve an abuse of discretion under the facts as the record discloses them? The facts constrain a negative answer to the question.

It is manifest that the most serious difficulty which could confront plaintiffs in properly proceeding to a prosecution of the action, after the destruction of the record in this cause by fire, was in the procurement of copies of the papers, pleadings, orders, etc., to be substituted as the record herein in lieu of the destroyed record; but, this difficulty having been readily overcome through the prompt assistance of the attorneys for the respondent, there was nothing remaining to be done but to secure a stipulation from the latter consenting to the substitution of the copies for the lost record, and then an order of the court restoring said record. On October 5, 1906, the attorneys for the respondent addressed to the attorneys for the appellants a letter in which they expressed a willingness to enter into a written stipulation authorizing the copies of the papers procured from them to be filed as the record in the cause. This letter was answered by Mr. Ames in a letter under date of October 10, 1906. There was then, it will be seen, nothing in the way to prevent the restoration of the record within a reasonable time after the time which would be required to prepare the stipulation, transmit it to the attorneys for the respondent at Los Angeles, and secure their promised signature thereto and its return. But counsel for the appellants, after having been assured that the stipulation assenting to the restoration of the lost record would be readily signed by counsel for the respondent, made no further move in the direction of restoring the record until the 14th day of November, 1907, a few days beyond 13 months subsequently to the date of the letter of Mr. Ames to the attorneys for the defendants, acknowledging the receipt of the papers, orders, etc., constituting the proposed substituted record, when the former sent to the latter for their signatures a stipulation consenting to the substitution of said papers and orders, etc.

There is nothing in the affidavit of appellants' counsel which suggests any valid excuse for this unreasonable delay; or, in other words, there is nothing therein from which this court would be justified in declaring that the court below, in refusing to accept the excuse offered by the appellants, abused its discretion. The fact that the general confusion and unsettled condition of affairs in San Francisco for some weeks or months after the occurrence of the great misfortune to that city had caused an unusually large amount of business to accumulate in the law offices of counsel for the appellants was, of course, a proper matter for consideration by the court in the determination of the motion to dismiss. But we do not hesitate to say that it was a matter entitled to no very great weight, since it is obvious that the very same reason could be urged in almost any case and, if valid, operate to interminably postpone the final disposition of such cause. In other words, we are unable to appreciate the logic of the plea that, because an attorney has other matters to which he prefers to give professional attention, he should be justified in neglecting, to the great inconvenience and detriment perhaps of the adverse party, some particular suit or action which he has instituted.

Nor is the fact that the presiding judge of the department of the superior court to which the action was assigned was too ill to attend to his judicial duties from May, 1907, until October of the same year a reasonable excuse for the delay in securing the order for the restoration of the record. There are, as this court judicially knows, 12 judges of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco. As counsel for the respondent well say in their brief, "the signing of the order upon presentation of the proper stipulation would have been a mere formal act, which could have been performed at any time by any of the 12 judges of the superior court" of said city and county. There was therefore no overruling necessity for the postponement of the matter until the judge to whose department the cause had been assigned for trial had been restored to health sufficiently to give attention to his official duties. And it may be suggested that, if the continued illness of a judge were a valid excuse for inactivity in pressing an action to issue or trial, the delay might be interminable, or at least involve an indefinite postponement of the prosecution of the action, since in such case whether it would or would not be brought to issue or trial would rest upon what might be the uncertain contingency of the recovery of the judge.

The demurrer to the second amended complaint was under submission and undecided at the time of the destruction of the record. This demurrer, by order of the court, was submitted upon points and authorities to be filed by the respective parties, the reply to the reply brief of plaintiffs having been filed on April 4, 1906, within 12 days after the respondent's counsel were served with a copy of the points and authorities of plaintiffs. It is clear that a decision on the demurrer could not well have been had until the restoration of the record, including the points and authorities addressed to the question raised by the demurrer. And even if the court could have done so, it would have been an idle act to have rendered a decision on the demurrer before the record was restored or competent secondary evidence thereof filed in lieu of the destroyed record (St. 1906, Ex. Sess. p. 73, c. 55) and, therefore, before it could be known that the record would be restored at all, or that there was any intention of restoring it, or that further steps would be taken to bring the cause to issue and trial. Counsel for plaintiffs declare that they could not force a decision on the demurrer. This proposition cannot be disputed, yet it was the duty of plaintiffs, the moving actors in the litigation, to take all the steps necessary to secure a decision on the demurrer. It was not the duty of the defendant to do so. San Jose L. & W. Co. v. Allen, 129 Cal. 247, 61 Pac. 1083; Kubli v. Hawkett, 89 Cal. 638, 27 Pac. 57; Mowry v. Weisborn, 137 Cal. 110, 69 Pac. 971. In the last-mentioned case the Supreme Court says: "It is true that the defendant may bring about a trial of the issue presented by his demurrer, but he is not under any duty to do so; his attitude in the case is involuntary, and quite different from that of the plaintiff; he is put to a defense only, and can be charged with no neglect for failing to do more than meet the plaintiff step by step. The plaintiff is the party charged with the duty of diligence in prosecuting the action, as the issues are presented. The case is at issue, whether it be an issue of law or an issue of fact, and when at issue the duty is upon the plaintiff to diligently pursue the action." In the case of In re Heywood's Estate, 154 Cal. 315, 97 Pac. 826, where a motion was made to dismiss certain appeals for want of prosecution, it is said: "Upon the hearing it was argued that it was the duty of respondents to restore the record, and that until they did so the appellants were justified in delaying the prosecution of the appeal. The contention is unfounded. * * * The appellant was endeavoring to overthrow those orders, and a restoration of the record thereof was by her considered necessary to enable her to do this. The duty was on her to effect a restoration of the records if she would escape the responsibility for unreasonable delay in the prosecution of her appeals. The final question, therefore, is, has she been sufficiently diligent in seeking such restoration, or, if negligent, is her neglect excusable?"

There is some discussion in the briefs of the proposition whether the respondent suffered any material inconvenience or hardship by the delay. The discussion is without force upon the only question which is involved here—whether the facts disclose an abuse of discretion by the trial court in the granting of the motion. We do not understand it to be necessary for the party moving to dismiss for want of diligence in prosecuting an action to affirmatively show the extent of the inconvenience or injury he has suffered, or may suffer, by reason of the delay. The law will presume injury from unreasonable delay. It is the policy of the law to favor and encourage a prompt disposition of litigation, and this policy is the outgrowth of sound and substantial reasons. The doctrine of laches as a bar to the assertion of stale claims and statutes of limitations rests upon the same reasons or principle. A party against whom an action is instituted is entitled to as speedy a disposition thereof as is consistent with his own and the rights of the plaintiff; and, if he who starts the law in motion does not with reasonable promptness pursue all the steps necessary to bring the litigation to an end, he should suffer the penalty of his default. It is no answer to say that the respondent did not, during the period of the delay, utter a word of protest against such delay. As we have said, it was the duty of the plaintiff to act and to act with reasonable promptness and diligence. It was not the duty of the respondent to make any move except such as the law requires it to make in response to the movements of plaintiff at the various stages of the litigation. As stated, the facts do not disclose, in our opinion, an abuse of discretion by the trial court in dismissing this action. Nearly all the cases cited by appellants are where the Supreme Court sustained the refusal of the trial court to grant the motion to dismiss for want of diligence in prosecuting the actions, merely holding that the facts failed to disclose an abuse of discretion. In Ferris v. Wood, 144 Cal. 429, 77 Pac. 1037, the judgment of dismissal was reversed because it clearly appeared that the facts in that case reasonably accounted for and excused the delay in serving the summons. But many of the cases relied upon by the appellants were reviewed by this court in Bernard v. Parmelee, supra, where it is said: "Each case must, as we have seen from all the authorities, rest upon its own peculiar circumstances, or, as it is expressed in First Nat. Bank v. Nason, 115 Cal. 626, 47 Pac. 595, 'each particular case presents its own peculiar features, and no iron-clad rule can justly be devised applicable alike to all.'"

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MOORE v. TROTT et al. (L. A. 2,103.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 8, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 3, 1909.)

1. DEEDS (§ 61*)—DELIVERY—DEPOSIT FOR DELIVERY ON DEATH OF GRANTOR.

A transfer of a fee-simple estate, subject to a life estate in the grantor, to a stranger to the grantor's blood may be effected by a deed delivered by the grantor to a third person with instructions to deliver it to the grantee at the grantor's death, if the delivery to the third person is absolute, so that the deed is beyond the power of the grantor to recall or control in any event.

2. DEEDS (§ 66*)—DELIVERY—DEPOSIT FOR DELIVERY ON DEATH OF GRANTOR—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where the instructions given a third person to whom a deed is delivered by the grantor for delivery to the grantee are in writing, the effect of the transaction depends on the construction of the instrument, and is a question of law.

3. DEEDS (§ 61*)—DELIVERY—DEPOSIT FOR DELIVERY ON DEATH OF GRANTOR.

A grantor delivered his deed to a third person, with directions to deliver to the grantee in case the grantor did not return from a hospital, where he was going for an operation, and requested the third person to keep to himself the name of the grantee until the delivery of the deed after the grantor's death. The grantor returned from the hospital and transacted various business matters, but his health rapidly declined, and in less than a month he died without communicating to the third person any other instruction. The grantor frequently stated that he wished the grantee to have the property described in the deed. Held, that the deed was not effectual, and a delivery by the third person to the grantee after the grantor's death was invalid.

4. ESCROWS (§ 7*)—DUTIES OF DEPOSITARY.

The depositary of a deed is the agent and fiduciary of both grantor and grantee, and where the prescribed condition for delivery is performed, he must deliver the deed to the grantee, and where it is not performed, he must return it to the grantor.

5. EVIDENCE (§ 385*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Declarations by a grantor, delivering a deed in escrow with written instructions made to a third person expressive of his intentions and wishes, were inadmissible to modify the reciprocal rights and duties of the grantor and the depositary as defined in the instructions.

6. DEEDS (§ 194*)—DELIVERY—PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE.

The presumption of delivery of a deed arising from possession of the deed by the grantee is overcome by evidence that the grantor delivered the deed to a third person for delivery on specified conditions, and that the third person, in violation of the instructions, delivered the deed to the grantee.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by Mary O'Connor Moore, administratrix of Pat Moore, deceased, against Mrs. George Trott and others. From an order denying a new trial after verdict for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Shipsey (Peter F. Dunne, of counsel), for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, C. U. Armstrong, and Thomas A. Norton, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to quiet title to certain lands formerly the property of Patrick Moore, deceased. The plaintiff is Moore's widow and administratrix, and the defendant Mrs. George Trott is the person named as grantee of said lands in two deeds which, on the 10th of May, 1906, were mailed by Moore to P. O. Tietzen, cashier of the bank at Santa Maria, under cover with the following letter: "Arroyo Grande, May 10, 1905. Mr. P. O. Tietzen. Dear sir and friend, I am sending you some deeds to lands that I have made to be delivered to the parties in case of my not returning from the California Hospital Los Angeles where I am going for to have an operation performed I also enclose you 1000 shares of Pinal Stock to be turned over to Annie Gray for the purpose of paying for her education at Berkeley and would like very much if you would take charge of it for her and see that she gets it all right. The Deeds that I am sending you, you will please lock them in your safe and in case I should die to immediately hand them to the parties named telling them to put them of record as soon as possible. The other Pinal reipt for stock I think is in your bank if so send it to me to the California Hospital and I will endorse and return to you as security for my indebtedness to your Bank. I am going to start today and I presume I will be there one or two days before they operate on me so if you mail that other certificate to me I will endorse and return it to you. you will please keep to yourself the names of the parties named in those deeds until you deliver them. After I pass in my checks and take flight for the other world from whence none return. Yours, Pat Moore." Immediately after mailing this letter Moore went to Los Angeles, where the contemplated operation was performed. Towards the end of May he was able to return to his home at Arroyo Grande, and to transact various business matters there and in San Luis Obispo, where he went to attend the June session of the board of supervisors, of which he was a member. But his health rapidly declined, and on the 18th of June he died, without ever having communicated to Tietzen any other instruction, oral or written, than those contained in his letter of May 10th. On June 22d Tietzen delivered the two deeds in question to Mrs.

Trott, who filed them for record on the 23d. The sole question in the case is whether these deeds were so delivered as to pass the title to the lands in controversy to the defendant Mrs. Trott, or whether they remained inoperative for want of delivery. It was found by the superior court: "That at the time said Patrick Moore delivered said deeds to the said P. O. Tietzen as herein found he parted with all dominion over said deeds, and each of them, and reserved no right to recall or any way control said deeds, or either of them. That said deeds were delivered absolutely." Upon this and other sufficient findings judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the order denying her motion for a new trial; her principal contention being that the finding here quoted is not sustained by the evidence.

It has been thoroughly established as the law of this state, by a series of decisions commencing with Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, that a valid transfer of a fee-simple estate, subject to a life estate in the grantor, may be effected by means of a deed delivered by the grantor to a third party with instructions to deliver it to the grantee at his (the grantor's) death, provided always—and this is the essential condition of the validity of such transfers—that the delivery is absolute, so that the deed is placed beyond the power of the grantor to recall or control it in any event. The finding of the superior court, it will be seen, fully supports its conclusion in favor of the validity of this transfer to Mrs. Trott, and it only remains to inquire whether the evidence in the record sustains the finding.

Moore at the time of his death was over 71 years of age. His first wife had died childless, and the plaintiff, to whom he had been married about two years, was without issue. His relation to the defendant was that of an old and intimate friend of herself and her parents. Annie Gray was a member of his own household, and the other persons named as grantees of different portions of his lands in the deeds placed with Tietzen were intimate and valued friends. Of his long-cherished design to make each of them a sharer in the estate he might leave at his death there can be no doubt, and it is equally clear from the evidence that he died in the belief that his purposes in this regard were fully effected by the deeds he had executed, and the instructions concerning them contained in his letter to Tietzen. But it is not enough that a man shall desire and intend that a stranger to his blood shall have and enjoy his real property after his death, for, unless he complies with the legal requisites of a valid transfer his wishes and intentions are unavailing, and his purpose is defeated. If, like Patrick Moore, he is unwilling to make a testamentary disposition which, if unrevoked, will pass the estate at his death, he must deliver his deed, absolutely and beyond his power to recall in any contingency, to a custodian whose duty it will be to keep it as long as the grantor lives, and then to deliver it to the grantee. Were these deeds so delivered? If Patrick Moore on his return from Los Angeles had demanded their return, could Tietzen have been justified in refusing to return them? If he could not have refused, it matters not that no such demand was made. The test of an effective delivery in such cases is the absolute relinquishment of the right of recall by the grantor in his instructions to the person charged with the duty of making the delivery. The transfer or attempted transfer of the estate being entirely gratuitous, the person named as grantee has no right beyond that which is voluntarily conferred, and the extent of that right is to be determined in every case where specific instructions are given by what passes between the grantor and his selected agent. The agent is of course bound to do what his instructions require him to do, no more, no less, and when, as in this case, his only instructions are in writing, the effect of the transaction depends upon the true construction of the writing. It is, in other words, a pure question of law whether there was an absolute delivery or not.

What, then, is the proper construction of Moore's letter? It seems very plain that Tietzen is authorized to deliver the deeds only "in case of my not returning from the California Hospital where I am going for an operation," and the implication that, if he does return, the deeds are to be at his disposal is clear. But counsel for respondent contends that a different intention is revealed by subsequent clauses of the letter. He relies greatly upon the direction to lock the deeds in Tietzen's safe, "and in case I should die to immediately hand them to the parties," etc. We think that this, so far from being inconsistent with our construction of the first part of the letter, is only corroborative of it. If Moore's intention had been to part with the deed, absolutely, he would not have directed their delivery "in case I should die," for he was sure to die at some time. He would more naturally have said when I die. It is apparent that he was not without some hope of obtaining relief, more or less permanent, from the contemplated operation; and, if he had returned from Los Angeles believing himself restored to health, and had demanded a return of the deeds from Tietzen, we can conceive of no ground upon which the demand could have been resisted. The concluding part of the letter to Tietzen, which counsel agree must be read without any period after the words "until you deliver them," neither aids nor weakens our construction of the first part. The directions to "keep to yourself the names of the parties named in those deeds until you deliver them after I pass in my checks," etc., while they certainly do consist with the idea of that death which is certain to come to every man, were entirely appropriate as referring exclusively to death as the result of the operation about to be performed.

Aside from the letter to Tietzen which, as above stated contained the only instructions ever given him as to the disposition of the deeds, it was shown by the testimony of numerous witnesses that Moore wished the persons named as grantees in his deeds to have the property therein described, and that his relations to those parties, and his condition and circumstances, made them the reasonable and meritorious objects of his bounty. There is, moreover, no reason to doubt that he died believing that his deeds in the hands of Tietzen would be sufficient to accomplish his purpose, but his purpose is defeated by the fact that the delivery was not absolute. A technical but inflexible rule of law governing the transfer of real property prevents his intention from being carried out.

We have examined the cases cited by respondent, but do not deem it necessary to review or even to cite them by title. Some of them are cases of delivery of deeds in escrow, which have but little application to a case of this character. In such cases the depository of the deed becomes the agent and fiduciary of both parties. If the prescribed condition is performed, he is obliged to deliver the deed to the grantee; if it is not performed, he must return it to the grantor. Howlin v. Castro, 136 Cal. 605, 69 Pac. 432, and Keyes v. Myers, 147 Cal. 705, 82 Pac. 304, were cases of delivery in escrow. Such cases as Gaston v. Portland, 16 Or. 255, 19 Pac. 127, in which it is held that the instructions under which a deed is delivered in escrow may be partly in writing and partly in parol, have no application, for the additional reason that in this case all the instructions were in writing. What Moore said to third persons, expressive of his intentions and wishes, cannot be held to modify the reciprocal rights and duties of Moore and Tietzen as defined by the letter of instructions. Such cases as Crocker v. Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269, and Sprague v. Walton, 145 Cal. 228, 78 Pac. 645, merely hold with respect to gifts of personal property that the intent with which the donor transfers the absolute control of the property to his donee is a question of fact, to be proved, like other questions of fact, by the surrounding circumstances, including the declarations of the donor. They might be in point if the question here was as to Moore's intention to give the land to Mrs. Trott. But of that there is no question. The only question is whether he did what was necessary to carry out his intention, and that depends upon the instruction he gave to Tietzen.

Counsel for respondent urges with apparent seriousness the proposition that, the deeds to Mrs. Trott having been found in her possession, there is a presumption of delivery to her at their date, which is not rebutted by the evidence in the case. We think this presumption is not only overthrown by the evidence, but that the specific findings of the court show that the only delivery was that made by Tietzen after Moore's death.

The order of the superior court denying a new trial is reversed.

TEAGUE v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF BELMONT HEIGHTS
et al. (S. F. 6,357.)

MANDAMUS (§ 74*)—CONSOLIDATION—PETITION FOR ELECTION—SUFFICIENCY—FINDINGS OF COUNCIL—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where a petition for an election to determine the question of the consolidation of municipal corporations was presented to the city council of one of the corporations, as required, and the council, after investigation, found that the petition was signed by the requisite number of qualified voters, the finding is conclusive upon the court in mandamus proceedings to compel the city authorities to give notice of the election, at least in the absence of a showing of fraud on the part of the council.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 151; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

In Bank. Mandamus by Albert Teague against the Board of Trustees of the City of Belmont Heights and others. Writ granted.

Stephen G. Long and Percy Hight, for petitioner. F. A. Knight, for defendants.

PER CURIAM. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the board of trustees and the city clerk of the city of Belmont Heights, a municipal corporation, to give notice of a city election to be held in said city on the 9th day of November, 1909, at which election shall be submitted the question of the consolidation of said city with the city of Long Beach, in the time and manner required by "An act to provide for the consolidation of municipal corporations," approved March 11, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 282, c. 184), and for such other orders in the matter as to the court may seem proper.

No sufficient reason has been assigned for declaring the act above referred to to be violative of any constitutional provision. The petition for a writ of mandate sufficiently shows that the proceedings thus far had in the matter of the proposed consolidation have been in strict accord with the provisions of that act. The evidence introduced on the hearing in this court sufficiently shows the truth of all the material allegations of said petition. It was sought to show herein that the petition presented to the city council of the city of Long Beach was not signed by a sufficient number of qualified voters of the city of Belmont Heights; the law requiring that such a petition be signed by not less than one-fifth of the qualified voters thereof. The city council, after investigation in that behalf, made its finding that it was signed by the requisite number. It is well settled that such a finding is conclusive upon the courts in a proceeding of this character, at least in the absence of a showing of conduct amounting to fraud on the part of the council. People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 342, 65 Pac. 749; People v. Loyalton, 147 Cal. 779, 82 Pac. 620. See, also, People v. Ontario, 148 Cal. 634, 84 Pac. 205; German S. & L. Soc'y v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 130, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067. There is no sufficient allegation of fraud in the answer, and no evidence was introduced that can be held to establish fraud.

Upon the facts alleged and shown, it is the plain legal duty of the defendants to give notice of the proposed election in the manner provided by the act, and to do all other acts in said matter of the proposed consolidation required to be done by the act of the Legislature hereinbefore referred to.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue forthwith, as prayed for in the petition.

BURGE v. JUSTICES' COURT OF CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.
(Civ. 581.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Aug. 25, 1909.)

1. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—WANT OF JURISDICTION—REMEDY AT LAW.

Want of jurisdiction is an insufficient ground for the issuance of a writ of prohibition if there be a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

2. PROHIBITION (§ 3*)—WANT OF JURISDICTION—OTHER REMEDY.

Prohibition does not lie to stay an action in justice's court because that court was without jurisdiction, in that the summons was served outside of the county in which the action was brought, where defendant defaulted, since his remedy was to move to quash the service of summons and to appeal if he failed.

Prohibition by Charles Burge against the Justices' Court of the City and County of San Francisco, naming, also, the several justices thereof. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Reversed.

county to obtain a writ of prohibition commanding the defendants to desist from further proceedings in a certain action. Defendants made default, and the court entered its judgment directing the permanent writ to issue as prayed for. The appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll.

It appears from the affidavit on which the writ was based that on June 1, 1908, one Sol Kahn brought an action in the justices' court in the city and county of San Francisco against affiant, petitioner herein, for the recovery of judgment against affiant for the sum of $57.50, alleged to be due said Kahn for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to affiant by said Kahn within two years preceding the 1st day of June, 1908, and that said sum is due and payable in the said city of San Francisco; that summons has been issued in said action, and copy thereof and of the complaint has been served on affiant in the county of Tuolumne, Cal.; that affiant never contracted in writing or otherwise or at all to perform the obligation set forth in the complaint filed in said action; that the said justices' court has threatened to enter judgment against petitioner and have execution issue thereon, and will do so unless prohibited by an order of this court; that "said acts of entering judgment and issuing execution are without or in excess of the jurisdiction over this petitioner; and said acts of said justices' court in proceeding to judgment and execution in said action will greatly injure your petitioner, and petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy herein in the ordinary course of law." The claim made by respondent is that the summons in such an action cannot be served outside the county where the action is brought unless the contract was made in writing, which the affiant shows was not the case here (Code Civ. Proc. § 848, as amended, St. 1907, p. 879, c. 478); and hence the justices' court was without jurisdiction. Want of jurisdiction is insufficient ground for issuing the writ, if there be a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1103. Where improper issue of summons or improper service thereof appears, the remedy of the aggrieved party is by motion to quash the service addressed to the court in which the action was commenced. History Co. v. Light, 97 Cal. 56, 31 Pac. 627; McDonald v. Agnew, 122 Cal. 448, 55 Pac. 324. If he fail, an appeal is available to him. S. P. Co. v. Superior Court, 59 Cal. 471; Baughman v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. 572, 14 Pac. 207, in both of which cases it was held that prohibition will not lie "unless the attention of the court whose proceedings are sought to be stayed has been called to the alleged excess of jurisdiction." See, also, Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 39 Pac. 604. In McDonald v. Agnew, supra, the court said: "But granting that defendant does not waive his objection to the service and the ruling of the justice thereon by demurring or answering, these cases (certain cited cases) show that he has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, by an appeal, and therefore prohibition will not lie."

So here petitioner had his remedy by moving to quash the service of summons, and, if unsuccessful, he had his appeal to the superior court. The affidavit shows that he failed to resort to the remedy given him at law, which was plain, adequate, and speedy, and hence he was disentitled to the writ.

The judgment is reversed.

1. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—MANSLAUGHTER.

Where the evidence shows that defendant and another were seized by two policemen and shoved along the street without cause, and that defendant was butted in the back with a club, and the other was bleeding from a cut, and the killing of the policeman occurred a brief space of time thereafter, it was not error to instruct that the jury, if they believed, from the evidence that defendant did the killing, they could find him guilty of manslaughter.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 171*)—EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

Where defendant admits that, if he did the killing, it was murder, he cannot object to the sustaining of an objection to a question asking a doctor as to the distance a person must have been from deceased as evidenced by powder marks on his face when he fired the shot, as such evidence was not material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 351-358; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

John J. Tansey was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

King & Kirk and Carl E. Lindsay, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

COOPER, P. J. The defendant was accused by the information of the crime of murder in the unlawful killing with malice aforethought of one McCartney in the city and county of San Francisco on the 3d day of September, 1907. The jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of manslaughter, and judgment was accordingly entered. This appeal is from the judgment and the order made by the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The main contention of the defendant is that the court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction: "The court instructs you that if, from all the evidence in the case and the law applicable thereto, you should be satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant here is guilty of any offense under the law, and within the information in this case, you may find him guilty as follows: You may find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree; or you may find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree; or you may find the defendant guilty of the crime of manslaughter." The argument is based upon the statement that the evidence clearly shows that the person who killed McCartney was guilty of willful and deliberate murder without any provocation or any extenuating circumstances, and that the only question for the determination of the jury was the question as to the identity of the defendant, or, in other words, whether or not defendant was the party who did the killing. It is said with much plausibility that the giving of such an instruction in a case where there is no question about the fact that the killing was deliberate murder, but the sole question is as to whether or not the defendant is the party who did the killing, would in many cases result in a compromise verdict, when, but for such instruction, the jury would never have agreed upon a verdict. It will be sufficient to decide such question when it is squarely presented by the record. In this case it is a sufficient answer to the contention to say that the record contains evidence which justifies the verdict of manslaughter. Indeed, if the jury believed defendant and the testimony he gave when upon the stand, it had the right to conclude that the killing was the result of sudden passion and in the heat of blood caused by the acts of deceased and the personal violence committed by deceased upon defendant. The defendant testified as follows: "As Bell and I were crossing Shotwell street on our way, two police officers met us. We were just walking along the street and were not making any noise or disturbance of any kind. The police officers got hold of us by the coat collars and shoved us along the street. The officer in the blue uniform had a hold of me and butted me in the back with something—I thought it was a club. The other officer hit Bell and shoved us along the street. I cannot say whether he used his club or fist. Bell was bleeding after he got down past Folsom street. I don't know whether it was from the nose or whether he was cut around the eye, but he was wiping off the blood from his face." It appears by the record that the killing was done within a brief space of time after the transactions thus narrated by defendant. The police officer was attempting to arrest the defendant and Bell, and it was then that the shots were fired by which the deceased met his death.

The jury might well have concluded that the defendant, having been shoved along and butted in the back with a club, was still angry, and that his passions had not cooled so as to make the crime deliberate murder. At least, the jury gave the defendant the benefit of the doubt and found the lesser offense, evidently based upon his testimony as to the assaults made upon him. Therefore the giving of the instruction under the circumstances of this case was not error.

It is claimed further that the court erred in sustaining objections made to certain questions asked of the witness Dr. Kusch in cross-examination relative to certain powder marks found on the face of deceased, the questions relating to the distance of the muzzle of the pistol from the face when the shots were fired in order to have produced such powder marks. It is sufficient to say that there is no theory of the case upon which the question as to the distance of the party who did the killing from the body of the deceased at the time the shots were fired could have been material. The defendant's counsel concede that the killing was murder, and there is no dispute as to the fact that powder marks were found upon the face of deceased in and around the wound. The shots killed the deceased and left powder marks upon his face; and whether the powder marks could have been left upon the face if the shots were fired from a distance could only have been material in case the evidence showed that defendant was at a distance from deceased when he was killed, and that shots other than those fired by defendant could have produced the death. Not only this, but the evidence does not show that the witness was qualified to give an opinion upon such question or questions that were asked him.

Other errors are assigned by defendant in sustaining objections to questions asked of certain witnesses, but they do not appear to be urged, and it is sufficient to say that we have examined them and find that there was no material error committed by the court which would justify a reversal of the case.

It therefore follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

A. D. Splivalo and Devoto & Richardson, for appellant. J. E. Riley, for respondents. F. V. Keesling, for respondent Koster.

COOPER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to grant an injunction restraining the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco from auditing, and the treasurer of said city from paying, a claim of defendant Repetti for the removal of garbage and refuse from the public school buildings and grounds in said city for the month of October, 1908.

It is the contention of appellant that the contract entered into by the board of education of said city with said Repetti for the removal of garbage and refuse, and which is the contract under which the claim arose, is void for the reason that Repetti is not a citizen of the United States, and that section 2 of article 16 of the charter of said city prohibits such contract. The section is as follows: "All deputies, clerks, assistants and other employés of said city and county must be citizens of the United States, and must during their respective terms of office or employment actually reside in the city and county, and must have so resided for one year next preceding their appointment." Repetti was not an employé of the city within the meaning of the section. He was an independent contractor, who procured his contract by making the lowest responsible bid after the board of education had duly advertised for bids. The board of education had the power to let the contract to a corporation or to any one else who would agree to do the work as an independent contractor. A statute like this, which restrains the right of a municipal corporation to employ certain classes of persons, must be given no broader construction than its plain words imply. A contractor, to whom a contract is let to construct a building, or a sewer, to pave a street, or to perform any other work for a definite sum is not an employé in the ordinary sense of the term. He ordinarily selects his own laborers, his own materials, and furnishes his own means of carrying out the contract. In this case Repetti was to receive a monthly sum for the removal of all the garbage and refuse from all the public school buildings and grounds in the city and county of San Francisco. He was to furnish his own men, his own wagons, and his own teams, and select his own time for doing the work, provided that he did it according to the contract. The horses he used were as much employés of the city as were the men who did the work of loading or driving the wagons. The men, horses, wagons, and tools used by Repetti were of his own selection.

It may be suggested that the complaint does not allege or show that the city and county of San Francisco or the plaintiff as a taxpayer would be injured by paying Repetti, who was a lower bidder than the appellant; nor does it in any way appear that appellant was injured because he does not allege that he could have made any profit out of the contract if it had been awarded to him.

The order is affirmed.

defendant was personally served with summons on May 13, 1908, and his default duly entered on June 13th of the same year after the 30 days had expired which were allowed him by law in which to answer. On July 16th he served and filed a notice, accompanied by affidavits, to be relieved of the default, claiming that it occurred through his mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. In the affidavit of defendant he states that he did not know that he had to file a written appearance or answer, and that he did not go to his own attorney, but went to the office of the plaintiff's attorney, had a conversation with plaintiff's attorney relative to the case, in which defendant stated that if plaintiff's attorney would appoint a day for the trial he, defendant, would be on hand with his attorney, and that plaintiff's attorney replied "All right." Defendant further averred that he relied upon such statement, and expected plaintiff's attorney to notify him when the case was ready for trial, and that, relying upon such statement, he took no further steps in the matter.

An affidavit was filed on behalf of the plaintiff, in which plaintiff's attorney denies that any such conversation ever took place, or that he ever in any way stated anything to cause defendant to believe that he would notify him when the case would be ready for trial. Plaintiff's attorney further states in his affidavit that defendant, after being served with the summons, came to his office, and assumed a belligerent attitude, informing the attorney that he would fight the case to a finish, whereupon plaintiff's attorney notified defendant that he did not care to discuss the matter with him; that defendant would have to file an answer and should get an attorney, whereupon defendant replied that he did not want a lawyer; that he would be his own lawyer. Defendant did not employ any lawyer nor take any steps in the case until more than two months after he was served with summons.

As has been said many times, a motion to set aside a default judgment rests largely in the discretion of the trial court. It is only in cases where it plainly appears that such discretion has been abused that this court will interfere. It is sufficient to say that in this case no such abuse of discretion appears. The defendant could read, and the summons expressly told him the time within which he must appear and answer. He let the time pass, and never even consulted an attorney. He was guilty of such carelessness and lack of diligence as could not be imputed to a prudent business man in a matter of material concern to himself. While courts are liberal in relieving parties of defaults caused by inadvertence or excusable neglect, and while they much prefer that a case should be heard on its merits, yet they do not act as guardians for incompetent parties or parties who are grossly careless as to their own affairs. There must be rules and regulations by which rights are determined and under which judgments become final. If this court should determine that the defendant, as matter of law, was entitled to relief in this case, there could scarcely be a default judgment that would not have to be set aside, provided the proper affidavits could be procured from the defendant. We must presume that the court believed the statements made in the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney, and that the defendant was told that he must file an answer and get an attorney. Where a party willfully slumbers upon his rights when he should be alert, and makes no efforts to protect himself, courts cannot patiently listen to flimsy excuses and the claim of ignorance of the law. It was the duty of defendant to read the summons, and not only to read it, but to heed it.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MONTEREY COAL CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SANTA CLARA COUNTY

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Aug. 25, 1909.)

CONTEMPT (§ 80*)—DENIAL OF PRIVILEGES AS LITIGANT.

Mandamus will not be granted to compel a court to change the venue of an action, though the motion must be ultimately granted, where petitioners are in contempt for violation of an injunction in the case and the court is proceeding to determine the matter on order to show cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 261-266; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

Petition by the Monterey Coal Company against the Superior Court of Santa Clara County, P. Gosby, as judge thereof, and others, for mandamus. Writ denied.

Francis M. Colvin, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner in this case asks for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court of Santa Clara county to grant the motion of the plaintiff for a change of venue in a certain action wherein one Lorenzo Fellers was plaintiff, and this petitioner, the Monterey Coal Company and others, were defendants. It is alleged in the petition that there was no conflict as to the showing made by the petitioner as to its residence in the city and county of San Francisco, and that the superior court announced that it would ultimately have to grant the motion for a change of venue to the city and county of San Francisco. It appears, however, from the petition, that, at the time of the commencement of the action of said Lorenzo Fellers against this petitioner, the Monterey Coal Company, and others, the superior court of Santa Clara county issued a preliminary injunction, enjoining the said Monterey Coal Company, its agents, servants, and employes, from doing certain things, and that prior to the motion for a change of venue the said petitioner, or its agents or employes, had been guilty of certain contempts of court in disobeying the order of injunction so issued by the court. It further appears that proceedings are now pending in said superior court upon an order to show cause, and an investigation is being made as to whether or not the said petitioner, its agents, servants, or employes, have been guilty of contempt.

The court will not be compelled by writ of mandate to grant an order for a change of venue while the petitioner is in contempt of court, and pending the hearing of proceedings in regard to such contempt. It is well settled that courts will not hear parties, or issue orders or other process in aid of litigants, when they are in contempt of court, until a reasonable time has expired, and the parties have been allowed to show cause, and either purged of the contempt or punished for such contempt. We will not compel the court to transfer the case. See Walker v. Walker, 59 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 476; Remley v. De Wall, 41 Ga. 476.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by the People ex rel. John P. Brown against the Pacific Grove High School District. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Willey, for appellant. Sargent & Bardin, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought by permission of the Attorney General to have it adjudged that the defendant is wrongfully and without right exercising the functions of a high school district. The case was tried before the court and findings filed. Judgment was entered, declaring defendant to be a de jure high school district, organized and existing under the laws of the state of California. From this judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions. We must therefore, under the well-settled rule, regard the findings of fact as supported by the evidence and absolutely true. We must also presume that all the rulings of the court upon the trial as to the admission or exclusion of evidence were correct. Our only duty in such case is to determine whether or not the findings are consistent and support the judgment. The complaint contains several allegations tending to show that the defendant was not legally organized as a high school district, but the court finds against the plaintiff upon each and every one of such allegations.

It is first alleged that there is not in the office of the school trustees of the district, or of the superintendent of schools of the county, or of the county clerk, any paper or entry or record of any kind showing that there was ever filed with the superintendent of schools of the county a petition to the board of school trustees of said district requesting that an election be called by the superintendent for the purpose of determining the question of the establishment of a high school in said school district, and, on account of the absence of such record, it is alleged that no such petition was ever filed or presented to the superintendent of schools. The court finds that the allegation is true as to the absence of any paper or record entry in the proper office, but further finds "that a petition was duly and regularly presented to the board of school trustees of said Pacific Grove school district, signed by a majority of the heads of families of said Pacific Grove school district as shown by the last preceding census, during the month of February, 1896, and that the whereabouts of said petition is unknown and that it is now lost, and that on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1896, the board of school trustees of Pacific Grove school district petitioned the county superintendent of schools of the county of Monterey, state of California, to call an election in said school district for the determination of the question of the establishment and maintenance of a high school in said school district, and that the whereabouts of said petition is unknown, and that said petition is now lost."

It is further alleged in the complaint that there is not in the office of the board of trustees, or of the county superintendent of schools or of the county clerk of the county any paper, record, or entry showing that the county superintendent of schools, within 20 days after receiving such petition, called an election in said school district for the determination of the question as to the establishment and maintenance of a high school in said district, or that the superintendent of schools appointed three qualified electors to conduct such election, or that the election was called by posting notices in five public places in said district, and publishing in a daily or weekly paper and so forth; and it is further alleged that in the absence of such record none of these things were done, that no such notice was given, and that no such qualified electors were appointed; but the court expressly finds "that within 20 days after receiving such petition of said school trustees Job Wood, Jr., the duly elected, qualified, and acting county superintendent of schools of the county of Monterey, did, to wit, on March 9, A. D. 1896, call said election of April 4, A. D. 1896, in said Pacific Grove school district, for the determination of the question of the establishment and maintenance of a high school therein, and did appoint three qualified electors thereof to conduct said election of April 4, A. D. 1896; that said election of April 4, A. D. 1896, was duly and regularly called by posting notices thereof in five of the most public places in said school district, and by publication in a weekly paper published therein for a period of five days immediately preceding said election; that said election of April 4, A. D. 1896, was conducted in the manner prescribed for conducting school elections, and that the same was held in conformity to law; that the ballots used at said election of April 4, 1896, contained the words 'For High School,' and the voters at said election of April 4, A. D. 1896, wrote or printed after said words on his ballot the word 'Yes' or the word 'No'; and that the election officers appointed to conduct said election of April 4, A. D. 1896, duly and regularly reported the result thereof to the said county superintendent of schools within 10 days subsequent to the holding thereof, to wit, on the day following said election of April 4, A. D. 1896." And in the same manner the court expressly found each and every fact which was necessary to exist in the calling of the election and creating said high school district. The court further found: "That said defendant claims, and for a period of over 10 years has continuously claimed, to be a regularly authorized and organized high school district, created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California providing for the organization, incorporation, and government of high school districts; and for a like period has performed all the acts required by law for the maintenance of a high school and a high school district. That said defendant claims, and since the year 1896 has claimed, to have been duly organized and created by virtue of an election held April 4, A. D. 1896, and also by virtue of another election, held on the 4th day of March, 1905, within said Pacific Grove school district, at both of which elections the question of maintaining a high school and a high school district * * * was carried by a majority vote of the electors of said school district."

In the conclusions of law the court states: "That, if any defect of any kind existed by reason of any defect in its organization, such defect was cured by operation of law, and particularly by reason of the provisions of subdivision 11 of section 1671 of the Political Code of the state of California." The section of the Political Code referred to provides as follows: "All proceedings for the formation and organization of high school districts and the establishment of county, city, city and county, union, joint union and district high schools had prior to the passage and approval of this act, are hereby validated and declared legal," and said high school districts and high schools are hereby declared to be legally formed, organized and established; and in all cases where high school districts and high schools have heretofore been, or may hereafter be formed, organized and established, the certificate of the county superintendent mentioned in subdivision 4 of section 1670 of the Political Code when filed with the county clerk, when the result of the election as therein declared is in favor of the establishment of the high school, shall after the expiration of one year from the date of such filing be conclusive evidence that such high school district and high school has been legally established."

In March, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 299, c. 140), the Legislature declared: "All proceedings for the establishment of high schools heretofore established in incorporated cities are hereby declared legal." It was held in Board of Education v. Hyatt, 152 Cal. 515, 93 Pac. 117, that such curative act was valid, and that the Legislature possesses the power to pass curative acts curing failure to comply with statutory requirements in the formation of high school districts.

We conclude that the judgment was correct, and it is hereby affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SPADONI. (Cr. 169.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Aug. 26, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—ACCOMPLICE TESTIMONY—CORROBORATION.

Testimony of an accomplice, on a prosecution for theft of horses, that he was hired by defendant to steal them, and did steal them and deliver them to defendant, is sufficiently corroborated, within Pen. Code, § 1111, requiring such corroboration by evidence which, in itself and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect defendant with commission of the offense; defendant, when the horses were found in his possession, soon after the theft, having given a false account as to where he got them, though on the trial he admitted he got them of the accomplice, the accomplice's wife having testified that shortly before the theft defendant called on him and asked him when he was going after the horses, and that soon after he brought home three horses and took them away after dark, another witness testifying that defendant, after being arrested, said he would be all right if B., the accomplice, didn't squeal, another testifying that shortly before the theft, defendant negotiated for purchase of horses from him, and soon after told him that he did not want to buy them, as he had made arrangements to get cheaper horses; and another witness testifying that defendant asked him to testify falsely as to where he got the horses.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Benito County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Bartolo Spadoni was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Zabala & Wyatt and Briggs & Hudner, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with grand larceny, committed by stealing three horses, and was tried and found guilty as charged. He moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

It appears from the record that one Dan Biscarro had been tried for the same larceny. He pleaded not guilty, but strong and convincing evidence was introduced against him, and he was found guilty. At the trial of this defendant in this case Biscarro was a witness, and confessed the crime, but testified: That he committed it at the instance of defendant and for him; that in its commission he was aided and abetted by defendant; that defendant had told him that he needed five or six horses, and asked him on several occasions to steal them for him; that finally he consented to do so, and stole and delivered to the defendant the three horses in question, receiving therefor from him the sum of $80. It was principally upon the testimony of this accomplice that defendant was convicted, and the chief point in the case is: Was that testimony sufficiently corroborated?

The horses were found in the possession of the defendant within three days after they were stolen. He at the time denied persistently that he had received them from Biscarro, and claimed to have received them from some mythical person whom he described with minute detail. In this connection he stated that one morning at about 8 o'clock, while hunting for hogs, he met this unknown person, and after some negotiations purchased the horses from him, paying therefor on the spot $225, which sum he had in his overalls. Furthermore, he went with the sheriff to a point on the county road five or six miles from his home, which he designated as the place "where he paid the man the money for them over the fence." At his trial defendant admitted that this whole story was false and that he received the horses from Biscarro. The wife of Biscarro testified: That she saw the defendant at her house about the middle of the month in which the theft was committed. That he came to the door, knocked, and Dan went out. "I heard him ask Dan when he was going after the horses. Dan told him he was not going, and Spadoni told him he wanted to see him up town. The day following Christmas Dan was home and had three horses in the barn. He took them away after dark on the 26th, maybe 8 or half past 8." Another witness, Joe Scattini, said that he had a conversation with the defendant in reference to his arrest, during which he asked him how he was getting along, and that the defendant replied, "I will be all right if that fellow (Biscarro) don't squeal." It was shown by the witness Bonifacio that shortly before the theft the defendant had negotiated with him for the purchase of his horses, and that he had considered the price demanded too high. The witness further stated: "About 15 days after that I asked him if he wanted to buy that team, and he said 'No.' He told me he had made arrangements to get cheaper horses."

We think the conclusion is irresistible that, eliminating the testimony of the accomplice, there is evidence in the record tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code. This view we think is sustained by cases in this state. In the case of People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 481, 24 Pac. 32, the defendant was convicted of arson, and it was contended that the testimony of the accomplice was not sufficiently corroborated. The accomplice testified that he had set fire to the house in the presence of the defendant and at his direction, and the house was in fact burned. The circumstances of corroboration in that case were these: Considerable ill will and bad feeling had existed between defendant and the owner of the cabin which was burned. The defendant had made contradictory statements concerning his whereabouts on the night of the fire, and there was also evidence tending to show that he desired the accomplice to leave that part of the country. It was held in that case that these circumstances tended to show defendant's guilty connection with the burning of the building. The court said: "The evidence is not strong; but although more is required by way of corroboration than to raise a mere suspicion (see People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480), yet the corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime, although it is slight, and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration. People v. Melvane, 39 Cal. 616; People v. Clough, 73 Cal. 351, 15 Pac. 5." In the case at bar, in addition to the testimony recited above tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, the accomplice testified that he was short of money just before undertaking the larceny, and upon requesting money from defendant he received from him an order on Joe Scattini for $5, which was paid. Scattini testified that he received the order, that it bore the defendant's signature, and that he paid it, but the defendant contradicted both of these witnesses and denied he ever gave the order. As before stated, the defendant, in speaking of this trouble with the witness Scattini, remarked that he would be all right if Biscarro did not betray him. Finally, for the purpose obviously of strengthening his original position—that he purchased the horses from a stranger at a named point five miles from his home—he asked witness Charles Margintini in effect if he would not testify that he saw him (defendant) leading the horses from that point towards his home.

Another case where evidence tending to corroborate an accomplice is considered is People v. Melvane, 39 Cal. 616. It is there stated: "We think this proof tended in some degree to connect the defendant with the burglary. The weight to be given the testimony was for the jury to decide; but, when money is stolen, proof that a part of it, on the following day, was found on the person of another in the vicinity, certainly tends, when not satisfactorily explained, to raise a presumption that he is the guilty party, and if an explanation is attempted by the accused it is for the jury to judge of its truth and plausibility. The corroborating evidence may be slight, and entitled to but little consideration. Nevertheless the requirements of the statute are fulfilled if there be any corroborating evidence which, of itself, tends to connect the accused with the commission of the crime." To the same effect is the case of People v. Cleveland, 49 Cal. 577. The syllabus correctly states the point therein decided, and reads as follows: "On a trial for stealing a horse, if the prosecution prove the larceny by an accomplice, further proof that, the next morning after the horse was stolen, the prisoner received him from the person who stole the horse from the owner, and immediately removed him to another place for pasturage, and gave an assumed name to the person with whom he left the horse for pasturage, is a sufficient corroboration of the evidence of the accomplice to sustain a conviction. Admissions made by a prisoner, which tend strongly to connect him with the larceny for which he is on trial, are a sufficient corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice introduced by the prosecution to sustain a conviction." See, also, People v. Grundell, 75 Cal. 305, 17 Pac. 214; People v. Clough, 73 Cal. 353, 14 Pac. 5; Ross v. State, 74 Ala. 532; Bowles v. State, 58 Ala. 335; People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 241, 33 Pac. 202.

A number of objections are made to the court's instructions. We have examined the objections and find them entirely without merit. The instructions as a whole gave the jury a full and fair statement of each and every phase of the law applicable to the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Buck, Judge.

Certiorari by Thomas Reagan against George H. Bahrs and others, as Civil Service Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment awarding the writ, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions to dismiss writ.

Percy V. Long and John T. Nourse, for appellants. Charles H. Forbes, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought a proceeding in certiorari in the superior court for the purpose of obtaining a judgment annulling an order made by the civil service commissioners, approving the appointment theretofore temporarily made by the board of public works of one P. Broderick to the position of superintendent of street repairs. Plaintiff's interest in the matter is based on the claim that the position of superintendent of street repairs is the same as superintendent of stone pavements, to which position he was entitled to be appointed when vacant, as being first in the list of eligibles on the civil service list, and that the creation of the office of superintendent of street repairs by the board of public works was a subterfuge. Plaintiff succeeded in obtaining a judgment annulling the order made by the civil service commissioners approving the temporary appointment of Broderick.

We think this judgment should be reversed. While the charter makes provision for a classified civil service, and lists of eligibles from which permanent appointments must be made, it also provides for temporary appointments good for 60 days only. Section 10 of article 13 of the charter is as follows: "To prevent the stoppage of public business, or to meet extraordinary exigencies, the head of any department or office may, with the approval of the commissioners, make temporary appointments, to remain in force not exceeding sixty days, and only until regular appointments under the provisions of this article can be made." It was under this section that the civil service commissioners acted. This proceeding was not brought until 7 months after the making of the order complained of, and 5 months after the term of the appointee under the order had expired. The force and effect of the order had expired, and the order had become functus officio before the action was brought.

The judgment annulling the order in an action against the civil service commissioners could have no beneficial effect on the rights of plaintiff. It would not bind or affect the board of public works in any proceeding that plaintiff might bring to enforce his claimed right to a permanent appointment to the position of superintendent of stone pavements, for such board is not a party to this action. For the same reason it would not bind or affect the rights of Broderick, or the auditor, or treasurer, in any proceeding brought to enforce Broderick's claim to his salary, for none of them are parties to this proceeding. The principles laid down in Burr v. Board of Supervisors, 96 Cal. 210, 31 Pac. 38, control this case. It was there sought, in an action brought by a taxpayer, to annul an order of the board of supervisors approving a claim against the county, upon which the money had in fact been paid before the action was brought. The court said: "Conceding that the action of the board of supervisors was unauthorized and in excess of its jurisdiction, and that the money was wrongfully and unlawfully obtained from the county treasury, I think the relief sought, and all relief that could be given in this proceeding, viz., the annulment of the order of the board allowing the claim, would be of no material or beneficial consequence to the petitioner or to the county. It would not restore to the county treasury the money obtained by McClatchy & Co., nor would the judgment be competent evidence in a suit by the county against McClatchy & Co., the county auditor, or the treasurer, as neither of them is a party to this proceeding. * * * 'The law neither does nor requires idle acts.' Civ. Code, § 3532. A court will not exercise a power for no material or useful purpose (Huntington v. Nicoll, 3 Johns. [N. Y.] 598), and will refuse a writ of mandamus if it appears that it can have no beneficial effect (People v. Supervisors, 12 Barb. [N. Y.] 222)."

The judgment is reversed, and the court directed to dismiss the writ.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Jake Zimmerman was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Allender, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TAGGART, J. Information charging crime of receiving stolen property. Verdict of guilty, and appeal is from the verdict, judgment, and an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. No appeal lies from the verdict in this state (Pen. Code, § 1237), but on the appeal from the judgment and order we may consider the matters here urged as error.

The testimony of the person from whom the goods were received shows that he was a shipping clerk for the corporation whose goods were stolen, but without authority to sell. During the year 1908 he carried away from his employer's place of business a large number of articles (approximately 500), which he sold to defendant in some 8 or 10 transactions, some of which were had at his own house and some at the house of defendant. These articles were all new, and he sold them to defendant for about 20 per cent. of their market value. The last of these transactions, prior to the date of the arrest of defendant, took place on December 14, 1908. On the evening of December 15, 1908, when leaving his employer's place of business, the witness again took some articles of similar character to those sold to defendant on December 14, 1908 (to wit, brass pipe fittings, gate valves, stop cocks, etc.), for the purpose of selling them to defendant, but was intercepted by some police officers who were watching his movements, and required to return to the place from whence he took the goods. The articles were then marked for identification in the presence of the secretary and manager of the corporation owner, and the witness was accompanied to the house of defendant by the officers, who concealed themselves while defendant purchased the articles from the witness, and then came forward and took the defendant into custody. Upon examining the premises of defendant other articles were found, among which were four two-inch valves, shown by the evidence to be some of the articles that defendant purchased from the witness on December 14, 1908.

The information alleges the crime to have been committed on December 15, 1908, but at the request of defendant the prosecution was required to elect the date as to which a conviction would be asked, and the district attorney named December 14, 1908. Evidence as to all the transactions was introduced, including that of December 15, 1908, the latter being objected to by the defendant. It is contended by appellant that it was prejudicial error for the court to admit evidence of the transaction of December 15, 1908, because the transaction was subsequent to the date on which the district attorney elected to prove the offense charged. In support of this contention People v. Willard, 92 Cal. 487, 28 Pac. 585, is cited. Accepting that case as correctly declaring the law in respect to the matters then before the Supreme Court, it may easily be distinguished from the case before us. The circumstances of the transaction of December 15, 1908, which were given in evidence, were merely those attending the arrest of the defendant. They did not constitute an offense, as the goods were taken to the defendant's house with the consent and at the request of the owner, and the jury were specially instructed by the trial court that proof of these acts did not constitute proof of the offense charged. In some of the cases in which the introduction of evidence as to transactions of similar character is considered solely with reference to the question whether or not the evidence of the other offense is intended to show guilty knowledge on the part of the defendant at the time of the transaction, it has been said that the facts to be admitted must contain some element of notice or warning, and therefore, if they relate to matters subsequent to the principal offense, are not admissible. Conceding this to be a proper deduction when guilty knowledge is the only matter being considered, when motive and intent are under consideration, it is said, a broader field is opened. People v. Harben, 5 Cal. App. 29, 33, 91 Pac. 393. Where the purpose is to show motive or system, the evidence is admissible if it have a direct tendency, in view of the surrounding circumstances, to prove motive or intent or other material fact, notwithstanding it has a tendency to prove a distinct offense also. There is a clear connection between the transaction of December 14th and that of December 15th, from which the jury might have logically inferred that if the defendant was guilty of one, he was guilty of the other. People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 341, 83 Pac. 43.

There was no error prejudicial to defendant in denying his request to introduce the record of conviction of the witness King. He (King) admitted his guilt, and this was the stealing which constituted the basis of the offense of receiving stolen property for which defendant was being tried. The record evidence, if introduced, would only have confirmed what the witness himself had already testified to without objection. We are unable to see how defendant was prejudiced by the exclusion of the evidence. The character of King's sentence had nothing to do with his credibility or defendant's guilt.

An ordinance of the city of Los Angeles requiring junk dealers to make reports to the chief of police of certain kinds of articles when purchased by them was introduced in evidence, and testimony given on behalf of the people to show that defendant was a junk dealer, and that he had not complied with the requirements of the ordinance in this respect. Defendant objected to the introduction of the ordinance, and urges that its admission was error because the affidavit of publication thereof is dated June 23, 1899, and there is no evidence to show that it continued to be a law of the city of Los Angeles on the 14th and 15th days of December, 1908. The ordinance was proved as required by subdivision 5, § 1918, Code Civ. Proc., and the prima facie showing made entitled it to be received in evidence. If the objection urged were good, the prosecution would be required to prove a negative, and, as the matter is one of record, this could only be established by the introduction of all the ordinances passed by the city since the date of the passage of the original ordinance, in order that the court might determine that the original ordinance had not been repealed. We are of opinion that the burden is upon the defendant to overcome the presumption raised by the introduction of an ordinance regularly passed. Merced Co. v. Fleming, 111 Cal. 46, 49, 43 Pac. 392; People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 250, 49 Pac. 186. No other objection to the introduction of the ordinance is urged.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Sept. 3, 1909. Rehearing Denied by
Supreme Court Oct. 28, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 132*)—DEFAULT—PREMATURE ENTRY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1015, provides for service of papers upon the attorney of a nonresident party. Section 407 provides that a summons shall direct an answer within 10 days if served within the county, and within 30 days if served elsewhere. Defendant filed a cross-complaint under section 442, and on December 23, 1908, served the same on plaintiffs' attorneys. On January 17, 1909, defendant served the cross-complaint on plaintiffs personally. On January 22, 1909, default was entered for failure to answer the cross-complaint. Another entry of default was made on January 29, 1909, and on February 2, 1909, judgment was entered on the default. Held, that the personal service was unnecessary and surplusage, and, whether plaintiff's attorneys resided in the county or elsewhere, plaintiffs were in default at least as early as January 22d, and if they resided in the county plaintiffs were in default after 10 days from December 23d, and the entry of default was not premature.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 132*)—DEFAULT—PREMATURE ENTRY.

If such personal service was necessary, the entry of default on January 29th was not premature.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 120*)—DEFAULT—ENTRY OF DEFAULT.

The entry of a default in the minutes of the court, on plaintiff's failure to answer a cross-complaint, did not render it invalid.

4. JUDGMENT (§ 131*)—DEFAULT—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

Plaintiffs cannot complain of the clerk's delay in entering a judgment for defendant on plaintiffs' default; the provision requiring it to be entered immediately being merely directory and for the benefit of the party obtaining judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by John G. Ritter and wife against F. Braash, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a default judgment for defendant on the cross-complaint, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion to strike the answer and cross-complaint, and from an order denying their motion to set aside the default entered thereon, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. Randall and Randall & Gaines, for appellants. C. Ibeson Sweet, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to cancel promissory note. Default judgment was entered on cross-complaint of defendant praying for judgment on the note. Appeal is by plaintiff from this judgment, from an order of the superior court denying his motion to strike defendant's answer and cross-complaint from the files, and from an order of the court denying his motion to set aside the default entered on the cross-complaint.

Complaint was filed December 3, 1908, demurrer thereto December 11th, and on December 18, 1908, demurrer was overruled.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

On December 23, 1908, an answer and cross-complaint separately stated but bound as one instrument, stated in the transcript to have been "duly verified," was served on the attorneys for plaintiff; their acceptance of service being as follows: "Received copy of within answer & cross this 23rd day of Dec., 1908, Randall & Gaines, attorney for plaintiff"—their residence not being given. On January 18, 1909, personal service of the answer and cross-complaint was made on both plaintiffs in Los Angeles county, and default for failure to answer the cross-complaint was entered by the clerk of the superior court on January 22, 1909. The record also shows a minute entry of such default by the court on motion of attorney for defendant on January 29, 1909, and on February 2, 1909, judgment was entered by the clerk on default for failure to answer the cross complaint, for the amount due on the note and for costs. On February 13, 1909, plaintiffs served notice that on February 19, 1909, they would move the court to set aside the default judgment and all subsequent proceedings for irregularity, in that the default was entered before the time to answer the cross-complaint had expired; also, that they would move the court to strike out the paper purporting to be an answer and cross-complaint because not signed and verified; and, also, for judgment on the pleadings, for the reason that no answer to the complaint was filed in the time allowed by law. On the day noticed the motion to strike out was denied and the motion to set aside the default continued to February 26th that plaintiffs might file affidavits in support of that motion, and on the last-named date the motion was denied. The affidavits filed appear to be framed upon the theory that they are intended to support an application for relief under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., instead of a motion on the ground of "irregularity" in entering default before the time for answering had expired; but treated as a showing under section 473 they are insufficient and without any showing on the merits. The complaint, which was verified, was not made a part of the showing on the motion; but, even if it had been, we are not prepared to say the court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

There was no "irregularity" in the entry of the default of plaintiffs for failure to answer the cross-complaint. Prior to the entry of the judgment they were regularly served with the cross-complaint. Under section 1015 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the service made on their attorneys on December 23, 1908, set the time running within which, under the provisions of section 442, Code Civ. Proc., they must answer or demur to the cross-complaint. Estate of Nelson, 128 Cal. 242, 60 Pac. 772; Rose v. Mesmer, 134 Cal. 459, 66 Pac. 594; Wood v. Johnston, 8 Cal. App. 258, 96 Pac. 508. Whether the attorneys resided in Los Angeles county or elsewhere, the plaintiffs were in default at least as early as the 22d day of January, 1909. If they resided in Los Angeles county, the time expired in 10 days after December 23, 1908. The second entry of default made on January 29, 1909, by the court, apparently based upon the service on the parties personally on January 18th in the county where the action was brought, was sufficient upon which to predicate the default judgment if personal service on the parties had been necessary; but such service was mere surplusage and without effect upon the question.

Whichever service is relied upon, however, the time for plaintiffs to answer had expired before their default was entered. The entry of default in the minutes of the court did not render it invalid or ineffective, and the delay of the clerk in entering the judgment on the default is not a matter of which plaintiffs can complain. The provision that it shall be entered immediately is merely directory and for the benefit of the party in whose favor the judgment is given, and the plaintiffs cannot invoke such failure for the purpose of annulling the judgment in defendant's favor. Edwards v. Hellings, 103 Cal. 204, 207, 37 Pac. 218.

We see no error in the rulings of the trial court, and judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

Beatty, C. J., and Melvin and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by W. Scott Smith against Joseph T. Bangham and others. Judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Tanner, Taft & Odell and John E. Daly, for appellant. Denio & Monk, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll alone from a judgment in his favor for $1. The action was based upon an alleged contract for the purchase of real estate, and the complaint contained two counts; one averring facts upon which plaintiff asserted his right to a specific performance of the contract, and the other seeking damages for its breach.

The court found that on December 26, 1905, the plaintiff and the defendant Joseph T. Bangham entered into a written contract, whereby Bangham, in consideration of the sum of $1, granted to plaintiff, or his assigns, "the right and privilege of exercising an option to purchase" the property in dispute "for the sum and purchase price of $17,000, * * * provided that the said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, shall exercise said option to purchase on or before February 26, 1906, by notifying me in writing of such exercise of option. Upon such notification within such time, I agree on demand to grant, sell and convey said real estate to said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, on the above terms, and agree to furnish and deliver within ten days after such notification, to said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, an unlimited certificate of title to said real estate * * * showing good marketable title of record to said real estate to be in me free and clear of all incumbrances and allowing the said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, a reasonable time after said delivery to examine said certificate of title. Said notification and the furnishing of said certificate of title within said reasonable time showing title as aforesaid, shall bind the said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, to purchase said real estate on said terms." The property referred to in the above instrument was the separate property of the defendant Joseph T. Bangham. On February 26, 1906, the plaintiff elected to exercise the option provided for, and to purchase the land in accordance with the terms and conditions named in the writing, and notified Bangham of his election. Bangham refused, and ever since has refused and neglected, to make, execute, and deliver a deed, or to furnish the certificate of title as provided in said contract.

The court finds that, in response to plaintiff's notification of his election to purchase, Bangham informed the plaintiff that he was unable to give title to the land, for the reason that his wife (the defendant Rowena Bangham) held a homestead on the property, and "positively refuses to release it." It is found that the consideration to be paid for the said land was adequate, just, and reasonable, and that "the price for the land at the time when plaintiff notified defendant Joseph T. Bangham that he elected to buy was a fair and adequate price for said land." It is further found that the contract was unjust and unreasonable, in this "that the only consideration paid therefor was the sum of $1," and that said sum of $1 was grossly inadequate and unjust for said option; that the said contract is also unfair and unjust in this, that plaintiff was thereby enabled to postpone indefinitely performance on his part. It is found that the defendant Rowena Bangham, the wife of Joseph T., had actual notice and knowledge of the entering into said contract by her husband, and that she did, after the date of said contract, make and file a separate declaration of homestead on said premises; that said declaration was made by her without the knowledge or connivance of her husband. The contract referred to in the complaint has never been recorded. It is further found that the defendant Joseph T. Bangham did not act in bad faith in his failure to perform the contract; that the land had increased in value to the amount of $5,000, as alleged in the complaint, but that plaintiff had not been damaged in any sum other than the sum of $1 on account of such failure. As conclusions of law the court found, with respect to the first count, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that the declaration of homestead filed by defendant Rowena Bangham is valid, and is not subject and inferior to the contract relied on. On the second count the conclusion of law was that plaintiff was entitled to recover of defendant Joseph T. Bangham the sum of $1 and interest thereon from the 26th day of December, 1905.

On these findings the plaintiff contends that he was entitled to a decree specifically enforcing the contract, and that if, for any reason, such contract should not be enforced, he should recover a judgment for $5,000, the increase in the value of the land.

The agreement signed by the parties on December 26, 1905, was a unilateral agreement, of the kind usually known as an option. By its terms Smith was under no obligation to purchase the land or to pay for it. He was granted the right or privilege of purchasing upon certain terms within a given time. Until he should have exercised this option he was in no way bound by the agreement. His election to accept and exercise the option within the time limited was, however, sufficient to bind him and to remove any objection to the enforcement of the contract on the ground of want of mutuality. Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63; Ballard v. Carr, 48 Cal. 74; Calanchini v. Branstetter, 84 Cal. 249, 24 Pac. 149; Thurber v. Meves, 119 Cal. 35, 50 Pac. 1063, 51 Pac. 536; Sayward v. Houghton, 119 Cal. 545, 51 Pac. 853, 52 Pac. 44; House v. Jackson, 24 Or. 89, 32

Pac. 1027. The option had at least the force of an offer to sell, and the acceptance of this offer before it had expired or had been revoked constituted a valid and binding contract from which neither party could recede. 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 601; Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458; Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249.

We think the finding of the court that the contract is unfair in that plaintiff was thereby enabled to postpone indefinitely performance on his part is based upon an erroneous construction of the terms of the agreement. The contract reads that upon notification of acceptance Bangham agrees "on demand to grant, sell and convey said real estate to said W. Scott Smith, or his assigns, on the above terms." It is argued that since the obligation is only to convey upon demand by Smith, the latter may indefinitely postpone the making of his demand, and thereby compel the defendant to be ready to convey to him at all times, without making himself liable for the purchase price. But the contract, reasonably interpreted, does not give him any such right of indefinite postponement. It is provided in the agreement that the notification of acceptance, and the furnishing of a certificate of title shall bind him to purchase the real estate "on the above terms." If, under the agreement, the exact time of conveyance and payment were to be fixed by the purchaser's demand, there can be no question that such demand would have to be made by him within a reasonable time. What would be a reasonable time is a question of fact, to be determined upon all of the circumstances of the case. So construed, the provision is in no wise inequitable or unfair.

It is found by the court that the consideration agreed to be paid for the land—i. e., the sum of $17,000—was fair and adequate. The plaintiff having bound himself by the acceptance of the option to pay this sum, we think the question whether or not $1 was an adequate consideration for the option is a false quantity. The plaintiff is not seeking in this action to enforce the option, but to compel compliance with the contract, which resulted from his exercise of the option. That contract was one whereby Bangham bound himself to sell the land, and Smith agreed to buy it, for the sum of $17,000. This is found by the court to be an adequate and fair consideration for the conveyance, and on an action by the vendee for specific performance of such contract the adequacy of the price paid for the option is not a material consideration. In Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328, 51 N. E. 580, the court said: "The consideration named in the written agreement is $1. As the parties agree to sell an option to buy for the sum of $1, there is no reason why such an express consideration is not an adequate one." See, also, Ross v. Parks, 93 Ala. 153, 8 South. 368, 11 L. R. A. 148, 30 Am. St. Rep. 47. Inadequacy of consideration alone (without fraud, or something in the nature of fraud) is never considered, even in equity, except as bearing upon the right to specifically enforce an executory agreement. It affords no ground for setting aside an executed sale. Here there had been such executed sale of the option, which passed by the writing of December 26, 1905, and the payment of the agreed consideration.

The real question, then, is whether the fact that the vendor's wife declared a homestead upon the property is a sufficient answer to plaintiff's demand for a conveyance. Specific performance will not be decreed against a vendor who is unable for want of title, to comply with his contract. Bell v. Bank of California, 153 Cal. 234, 239, 94 Pac. 889, and cases cited. If the homestead was valid as against a prior agreement to sell, the refusal of the wife to join in a conveyance fully justified the judgment denying specific relief. It may be remarked that neither the pleadings nor the findings disclose the time when the homestead was declared. It is found to have been after the execution of the contract (of option), but whether before or after plaintiff had notified Bangham of his election to purchase is not shown. We think, however, that the rights of the parties would be the same in either event. It has been said that an option to purchase land does not before acceptance vest in the holder of the option an interest in the land. Richardson v. Hardwick, 106 U. S. 252, 1 Sup. Ct. 213, 27 L. Ed. 145; Gustin v. Union School District, 94 Mich. 502, 54 N. W. 156, 34 Am. St. Rep. 361; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Kerr, 129 Fed. 723, 64 C. C. A. 251, 66 L. R. A. 569. On the other hand, there are cases holding that the grant, on a valuable consideration, of an option to purchase constitutes the grantee the equitable owner of an interest in the property. House v. Jackson, supra; Kerr v. Day, 14 Pa. 112, 53 Am. Dec. 526; Telford v. Frost, 76 Wis. 172, 44 N. W. 835; Wall v. R. Co., 86 Wis. 48, 56 N. W. 367. At any rate the option vests in the grantee the right or privilege of acquiring an interest in the land, and, when accepted, entitles him to call for specific performance. Hawralty v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 613; Kerr v. Day, supra; People's Street Ry. Co. v. Spencer, 156 Pa. 85, 27 Atl. 113, 36 Am. St. Rep. 22; Guyer v. Warren, 175 Ill. 328, 51 N. E. 580. Such right, when exercised, must necessarily relate back to the time of giving the option (People's St. Ry. Co. v. Spencer, supra), so as to cut off intervening rights acquired with knowledge of the existence of the option. A subsequent purchaser with notice of a valid and irrevocable option would certainly take subject to the right of the option holder to complete his purchase (Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. 220; Sizer v. Clark, 116 Wis. 534, 93 N. W. 539; Kerr v. Day, supra), and we see no reason why the declarant of a homestead should stand in any better position.

A declaration of homestead creates no new or additional title. It attaches certain privileges and immunities to such title as may at the time be held. If the husband, for example, owns a title subject to an outstanding equity, a declaration of homestead by the wife, at least where she has knowledge of this equity, does not destroy it. Her homestead claim is impressed upon the title that her husband had; i. e., the title subject to such rights against it as were known to her to be held by third parties. These conclusions seem to follow from the former adjudications of this court. In Gilbert v. Sleeper, 71 Cal. 290, 12 Pac. 172, the plaintiff's husband had entered into an agreement with the defendant Sleeper to exchange two tracts of land, and each entered into possession of the tract which he was to receive. Subsequently Gilbert conveyed to his wife all of his property, including the land which he had agreed to convey to Sleeper, and plaintiff filed a homestead upon all the land so conveyed to her. It was held that plaintiff's rights in the tract agreed to be conveyed to Sleeper were subject to the rights created by the agreement. "There was no error," says the court, "in refusing to admit in evidence plaintiff's declaration of homestead. Obviously she could not, by filing it, defeat or impair the previously existing rights of defendant." In Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. 55, 21 Pac. 429, action was brought to quiet title to land which one of the plaintiffs had agreed to convey to some of the defendants; such defendants having wholly failed to pay the purchase money, or to comply with any of the conditions of their contract. The defendants relied upon a declaration of homestead filed by one of them upon the land while in possession under this contract. This was held to constitute no defense to the action. The court said: "It is further urged that because a homestead was declared upon the property by Mrs. Dunlap, the action cannot be maintained. This cannot be so. Conceding, as claimed by the appellants, that a homestead may be declared upon land held under a mere contract to convey, such declaration did not give any new title, or tend in any way to strengthen or enlarge the one then existing. Therefore, when the equitable title created by the contract, and possession under it, was lost in the manner stated, the homestead fell with it. It would be a marvelous doctrine that the filing of a declaration of homestead could create a new title, or render a bad title good." In Hayford v. Kocher, 65 Cal. 389, 4 Pac. 350, certain premises were by mistake excluded from a conveyance of lands. The wife of the grantor, with knowledge of the mistake, filed a declaration of homestead upon the lands so omitted. This was held not to affect the pre-existing right of the grantee to have the conveyance reformed so as to carry title to such premises.

The fundamental basis upon which all these decisions must rest is the proposition that (except where the contrary is expressly declared by statute) a declaration of homestead is subject to all rights in the property known by the person filing the declaration to exist. And this principle, applied to the facts of the present case, requires the holding that the declaration of homestead, made by Mrs. Bangham with knowledge of the contract theretofore entered into with the plaintiff, was subject to his right to demand a conveyance of the land in accordance with his contract.

The authorities principally relied on by the respondent (Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 14 Pac. 198; Ontario Bank v. Gerry, 91 Cal. 94, 27 Pac. 531; Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 Pac. 549, 955) are not in point. These cases hold that a declaration of homestead by the wife is good as against a prior unrecorded mortgage executed by the husband, although the wife had knowledge of the existence of the mortgage. But this conclusion is based upon the express provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 1240, 1241, which provide that the homestead is exempt from execution or forced sale except " * * * (3) on debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and acknowledged by husband and wife, or by an unmarried claimant; (4) on debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." Here is an express statutory declaration that certain mortgages only shall be superior to the rights created by a declaration of homestead. As the mortgages in the cases cited did not come within the terms of the statute, they necessarily were inferior to the homestead. Here, however, we have no question of an attempt to subject the land to execution or forced sale from which it is specifically exempted. The question is merely whether antecedent rights in the property shall be cut off by a declaration of homestead, or, otherwise stated, whether such declaration shall enlarge the title owned at the time of its filing. For the reasons stated, we think this question must be answered in the negative.

On the facts as hereinbefore stated the plaintiff was entitled to a decree specifically enforcing the contract of conveyance made by the defendant Bangham. But the record discloses further facts bearing on the appropriateness of this remedy. It is found that the American Avenue Building Company, a corporation, claims and has an interest in the said premises, "by virtue of a written agreement to convey by defendant Joseph T. Bangham, made in good faith and for value." If this interest is superior to that of plaintiff, it would make it impossible for Bangham to comply with his contract to convey a good marketable title free and clear of incumbrances. But the court does not find the interest of the Building Company to be superior to that of plaintiff, nor does it find facts from which the respective priorities may be determined. A purchase for value, without notice of plaintiff's unrecorded contract, would not, under our statute, protect the subsequent purchaser, unless his conveyance was "first duly recorded." Civ. Code, § 1214. For all that appears, the Building Company's contract was never recorded. The facts as found do not therefore offer any impediment to a decree of specific performance. But the American Avenue Building Company is not a party to this action, and obviously its rights cannot be affected by any decree that might be rendered herein. A reversal of the judgment, with directions to the court below to enter a decree of specific performance, might result in plaintiff's obtaining a conveyance which would be valueless to him. Unless the plaintiff is willing to take and pay for Bangham's title, without regard to the validity of the Building Company's claim, the question whether an effective decree for specific relief can be made should be determined in an action in which every party having an interest in the property is represented. To this end a new trial should be ordered. If, upon such new trial, it should appear that specific performance cannot be decreed, the question of plaintiff's right to damages, as prayed by the second count of the complaint, will arise. The measure of damages in such cases is clearly defined by Civ. Code, § 3306. The difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate may be recovered only where there has been bad faith on the part of the vendor. Here the court came to the conclusion that the defendant Bangham did not act in bad faith. On this appeal on the judgment roll we cannot therefore direct the allowance of damages for any greater sum than that recovered. But the question of good or bad faith should be considered anew by the trial court in the light of our views on the main question discussed in this opinion. Accordingly the issue of damages, as well as the issues arising on the prayer for specific performance, should be retried.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The plaintiff should have leave to amend his complaint, and to bring in new parties, if so advised.

We concur: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. A dollar is not an adequate consideration for such an option as is here held to defeat the right of Mrs. Bangham to declare a homestead upon property occupied as such. It was a merely nominal consideration, and, as against a right so highly and so deservedly favored as the right of homestead, it should be disregarded by a court of equity.

MELVIN, J. I dissent. It does not appear from the record whether or not the declaration of homestead was made prior to the 25th day of February, 1906—the date upon which appellant notified respondent that he elected to buy the property—but under the rule favoring a construction in support of the regularity of a judgment we may assume that Mrs. Bangham had filed her declaration of homestead before appellant signified his willingness to pay $17,000 for the property. If, therefore, she could not make a valid declaration of homestead, the only thing which prevented her from doing so was the option for which plaintiff had paid the price of $1. In other words, to find that the declaration of homestead was ineffective, we must hold that the option which the purchaser might ignore and surrender, without the loss of more than the trifling sum of $1, was sufficient to deprive this woman of a right given her by the law under the Constitution of California. Article 17, § 1. It may be that after the acceptance of all of the terms of a sale contemplated under the provisions of a contract of this kind, and the offer of an adequate price, the wife of the owner of the property, if she knew all of the facts, would be powerless to declare a valid homestead upon it; but we are not here confronted by such a state of facts. Suppose that, instead of 60 days, a period of 10 years had been named as the time within which the option of purchase might be exercised. Might a husband, by the simple device of giving such an option, deprive his wife for a term of years of the right of securing a homestead given her by statutes passed under the solemn mandate of the Constitution? Such a result, it seems to me, was never contemplated.

In the opinion of the majority of the court, great reliance is placed upon the authority of People's Street Railway Co. v. Spencer, 156 Pa. 89, 27 Atl. 113, 36 Am. St. Rep. 22, to the effect that when an option to purchase is exercised, the right to buy the property relates back to the date of the original contract, so as to cut off intervening rights acquired by those having knowledge of the option. That was a case not involving any interpretation of the law relating to homesteads. The facts there considered showed that there had been a conveyance of property as security for a loan, but that the grantor took a lease for a nominal sum and an exclusive option of repurchase for the amount of the loan and interest. The court treated the transaction as one in which the railroad company never surrendered its equitable estate and, held that, upon the repayment of the loan with interest, the company's title became effective as of the date of the option. It was held that upon payment of the loan and interest the railroad company became the owner of the land as it was at the date of the original agreement "or of the insurance money which stood pro tanto in its place." The case is so dissimilar to the one at bar that I cannot see its appositeness.

Section 1238 of the Civil Code, gave Mrs. Bangham the right to declare a homestead upon her husband's property. This, I submit, existed independently of any adverse equitable title which she was not by statute compelled to recognize as paramount to it. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine expressed in the main opinion that: "The fundamental basis upon which all of these decisions must rest is the proposition that (except where the contrary is expressly declared by statute) a declaration of homestead is subject to all rights in the property known by the person filing the declaration to exist." The Code does not declare the instances in which a homestead is not subject to execution and forced sale, but does enumerate the four kinds of judgments which are superior to it. Civ. Code, § 1241. All other kinds of judgments not enumerated are ineffective because not specified in the statute, and the inference is inevitable that, without the barrier of the statute, no unexecuted judgment could avail against a homestead. By parity of reasoning we should deduce the rule that the homestead must prevail against all liens not by statute made superior to it.

Mr. Justice McFarland, in Ontario State Bank v. Gerry, 91 Cal. 97, 27 Pac. 531, 532, said: "But the doctrine that unrecorded deeds and mortgages are good except as against subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration does not apply to homesteads. Rights to homesteads are defined by the provisions of the Code which directly deal with that subject. 'The doctrine bearing upon conveyances made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors has no application to the creation of a homestead.' And a declaration of homestead is not a 'conveyance' as that word is used generally in the Code." And again in the same opinion he says: "There is no question about the morality of the transaction. It is simply a matter of statutory provision." In the case of Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 374, 51 Pac. 553, the homestead defeated the lien of an unrecorded mortgage, of which the wife who declared the homestead had actual notice, and this significant language is used in the opinion: "I have not overlooked the equitable considerations so persuasive in this case, and so ably presented by counsel for respondent, but they all proceed from the assumption that the case is one for the application of general principles of equitable cognizance, whereas it is hedged in and controlled entirely by legislative enactment." In Warner v. Warner, 144 Cal. 615, 78 Pac. 24, a homestead on the husband's separate property was held good as against an antenuptial agreement, wherein the wife had promised not to claim her husband's property "either as heir or otherwise." In Simonson v. Burr, 121 Cal. 582, 54 Pac. 87, it was decided that the question of fraud of creditors cannot be raised as against a homestead which one of the spouses had the right to declare.

Following the rule that a contract is to be construed most strongly against the person seeking to sustain it, I am still of the opinion that the contract in the case at bar was properly held to be unfair because under its terms plaintiff would be enabled to postpone indefinitely performance on his part, and I wish to repeat the language used as follows in the opinion heretofore rendered in Department 2: "While the contract provides that the option must be exercised by written notification prior to February 26, 1906, it also contains this language: 'Upon such notification within such time I agree on demand to grant, sell and convey said real estate to said W. Scott Smith,' etc. The contract further provides that Bangham shall within 10 days after notification furnish a certificate of title, that thereafter Smith or his assigns shall have 'reasonable time' to examine said certificate, and that 'said notification and the furnishing of said certificate of title within said reasonable time showing title as aforesaid, shall bind the said W. Scott Smith or his assigns to purchase said real estate on said terms.' Conveyance by Bangham 'on demand' being one of said 'terms,' the option might, if enforced, result in giving plaintiff the power to hold the land indefinitely, subject to his privilege of purchase, and without the expenditure of a dollar, by the simple expedient of omitting to demand from Bangham a conveyance of the title. The lower court properly declined to enforce the specific performance of a contract so inequitable and one in which the consideration was so inadequate. Civ. Code, § 3391, subd. 1. It follows also that such a contract, being of but little more dignity than a nudum pactum, would be no obstacle to the declaration of a homestead by Mrs. Bangham on her husband's property. As the court found appellant suffered no detriment other than the payment of $1 for the option, judgment in his favor for that sum on the second count was proper. Civ. Code, § 3306."

I am of the opinion that the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed.

LORIGAN, J. I concur in the foregoing dissenting opinion.

CORTELYOU v. IMPERIAL LAND CO. et al.
(L. A. 2,122.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 99*)—STOCK—ISSUE OF SHARES.

Corporations cannot issue shares of stock except for money paid or property or labor received, and hence an issue of stock by a corporation to a person without consideration, simply upon an agreement that he would sell certain of it and turn the proceeds over to the corporation, would be void unless an innocent party had acquired rights on the faith of the issue.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 107*)—STOCK—ISSUE OF SHARES—INTEREST OF BUYER.

If decedent, with knowledge that a corporation had issued all its shares of stock to its general manager under an agreement, void for want of consideration, that the manager should sell some of the stock and turn the proceeds over to the corporation, bought shares through the manager and consented that they should be evidenced by the certificates in the manager's hands, the shares, as distinct from the evidence of ownership, vested completely in decedent, who became a shareholder, and, where the manager subsequently transferred the stock to others, decedent's representative could compel the corporation to issue certificates for decedent's shares.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 119*)—STOCK—TRANSFER—RIGHT OF BUYER.

If the issue of stock by a corporation to its manager was valid as being on account of services theretofore rendered, and an incidental agreement of the manager to turn over to the corporation the proceeds from a sale of certain of the stock was not supported by consideration, and the agreement did not include any particular number of shares evidenced by any specified certificates, the shares, in the absence of fraud, became his property, and decedent, having bought shares of him, acquired the property thereunder, though the certificates remained in the manager's hands, so that, the manager having sold the shares to others, decedent's representative could compel the corporation to issue certificates to him for decedent's shares.

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—STOCK—TRANSFER—ACTIONS—PARTIES.

The manager having no interest in the property, and no trust relation existing between decedent and the manager, he was not a necessary party to a suit by decedent's representative to compel the issuance of certificates.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—STOCK—TRANSFER—ACTIONS—PARTIES.

The persons to whom the manager had sold decedent's stock and who occupied the possession originally held by the manager were proper parties defendant.

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 121*)—STOCK—TRANSFER—ACTIONS—LACHES.

A purchaser of corporate stock having a property right therein, the right to demand certificates therefor, which, under the law and by agreement, the corporation was required to furnish, could be enforced without reference to the lapse of time if no loss or injury had resulted to an innocent person by reason of delay.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by James G. Cortelyou, administrator of John G. Cortelyou, against the Imperial Land Company and others. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appealed to the District Court of Appeal, which was unable to concur in a judgment, and the cause was transferred to the Supreme Court. Reversed and remanded on an opinion of the District Court of Appeal.

M. M. Meyers and James P. Clark, for appellant. Edwin A. Meserve, Paul H. McPherson, and Walter Malins Rose, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case was originally before the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District for decision; but, that court being unable to concur in a judgment, the cause was brought here for further consideration. Accompanying the transfer of the case here are the several opinions of the judges of the District Court of Appeal. One of those opinions, signed by the majority of the judges of the District Court of Appeal, is as follows:

"Action in equity to establish the right of plaintiff as the administrator of John G. Cortelyou to 250 shares of the capital stock of the defendant Imperial Land Company, and to require the corporation to issue to the administrators certificates evidencing such ownership. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained with leave to amend, and upon failure to amend the complaint judgment went for defendants and against plaintiff, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

"While the complaint is not happily worded, the same may fairly be construed as alleging the following facts, namely: That one Cortelyou, deceased, plaintiff's intestate, purchased from defendant corporation, through one Ferguson, its general manager, 250 shares of its capital stock, paying therefor an agreed price, which it is averred was at the time the reasonable value thereof. That prior thereto the corporation had issued all of its shares of stock to Ferguson, its general manager, in payment for services rendered, but upon the agreement that certain of the stock so issued should be sold by Ferguson as treasury stock and the proceeds turned over to the corporation, and that certificates should be issued of such treasury stock in the same manner and with the same effect as though such stock had been retained in the treasury of the company unissued. That when Cortelyou purchased the shares of stock it was agreed that the stock should be held by one Chaffey as trustee and voted by him under a pooling agreement, but that when the full purchase price was paid the purchaser should receive a copy of the certificates of stock with the pooling agreement indorsed thereon; such copy of the certificates to be in form so as to enable the holder to transfer the same by indorsement. That no certificates were ever issued to Cortelyou as agreed; but the certificates evidencing the shares of stock purchased by Cortelyou continued to stand in the name of Ferguson. That long after the purchase by Cortelyou of the stock Ferguson assigned and transferred all the stock of the corporation in his name, including that of Cortelyou, to the defendants other than the corporation, who took the assignment of such certificates with full knowledge of Cortelyou's rights, and upon an agreement that when the voting pool was dissolved they would cause to be issued to Cortelyou his certificates for the stock so owned by him. It is alleged that the pooling agreement was, by mutual consent, dissolved; when is not made to appear. The demand for such certificates by plaintiff in his representative capacity is alleged, as is the refusal to issue the certificates as agreed. The prayer is that the right of plaintiff to this stock be established and the corporation be ordered to issue certificates therefor, and other allegations with reference to the rights claimed against the parties holding the certificates, not necessary to mention in connection with the consideration of the demurrer. The demurrer was a general one, and upon the grounds that the complaint disclosed a bar of the statute of limitations, a misjoinder of parties defendant, and that certain ambiguities existed, by reason of which it could not be determined how or in what manner the agreement to sell the shares had been made, or how the defendant could agree to sell the stock when all of the stock had been issued.

"Treating the complaint as averring that certain of the stock, including that purchased by Cortelyou, was issued by the corporation to Ferguson without consideration, simply upon the agreement that he should sell the same and turn the proceeds over to defendant, such issue is forbidden by the Constitution and statutes of this state, for corporations are forbidden to issue shares of stock except for money paid, property or labor received, and shares issued in violation thereof are void, 'and the parties receiving them do not thereby become shareholders' (Kellerman v. Maier, 116 Cal. 424, 48 Pac. 377); and the effect of which issue would be to leave in the treasury, subject to issue by the corporation, the stock so improperly issued as completely as though the void certificates had never issued. This, of course, presupposes that no innocent party should have acquired rights on the faith of the issue; but, notwithstanding the unwarranted character of the issue, if such an allegation be considered as made, Cortelyou, with knowledge of the fact that the stock was thus issued, bought the same and consented that it should be evidenced by the certificates thus in the hands of Ferguson. The shares, as distinct from the evidences of ownership, were by such purchase vested completely in Cortelyou, and he became thereafter a shareholder to the extent of his purchase, and, under his agreement, entitled to have transferred to him the evidences of ownership. Ferguson did not hold the property of Cortelyou after the sale. That property, which was the shares and personal property, passed with the purchase and payment of money. Upon the other hand, if we construe the complaint as alleging that the issue to Ferguson was valid, by reason of the same being on account of services theretofore rendered, the incidental agreement on the part of Ferguson to turn over to the corporation the proceeds from a sale of certain of the stock does not seem to be supported by any consideration. Nor does it appear that the agreement included any particular number of shares evidenced by any specified certificates, and whatever cause of action the corporation had against Ferguson by reason of such incidental agreement would be in the nature of an action for damages if he failed to carry out the same. The shares having been issued to him for an agreed consideration, in the absence of fraud, the same became the property of Ferguson. It seems to us, then, that, construing the complaint as we may, the facts set out are sufficient to show Cortelyou's acquisition of the personal property by the purchase, and whether Ferguson sold the same as his own, or as part of the treasury stock of the corporation, by the sale his interest in the shares, the subject of the sale, vested in Cortelyou. 'His interest in the subject-matter ceased upon the consummation of the sale as effectually as though he had in person assigned his shares to the plaintiff.' Tregear v. Etiwanda Water Co., 76 Cal. 537, 18 Pac. 658, 9 Am. St. Rep. 245. In the case last cited, it is held that where the owner of shares executes a mortgage in form sufficient to create a lien upon the shares of stock in a corporation, which mortgage is subsequently foreclosed and the property purchased at sheriff's sale, the purchaser takes all of the interest of the mortgagor and is entitled to have certificates issued to him, notwithstanding when he took the mortgage he permitted the certificates evidencing the ownership to remain in the possession of the mortgagor. We are unable to see why the same principle would not apply here, and that Cortelyou's representative, notwithstanding the retention of the certificates by Ferguson, might not have a decree as prayed for against the corporation. Ferguson, having no interest in the property, was not a necessary party to this proceeding upon the authority last quoted, the effect of which decision can only be to hold that no trust relation existed by reason of the mortgagor holding the evidences of the ownership in the shares of stock, for had such trust relation existed he would have been a necessary party to the proceeding instituted by Tregear against the water company. Our Supreme Court having held that he was not a necessary party, it must be held as determining that no trust relation existed. It does not follow, however, that the other defendants in this case, who occupied the position originally held by Ferguson, are not proper parties, for, as stated in the case last cited, 'a decree cannot bind one who is not a party to the action, and by making him a party he may frequently be bound and questions as to him determined which would otherwise remain open and subject to future adjudication.' In our opinion the complaint, then, constituted a cause of action, and there was no misjoinder of parties defendant.

"Eliminating, therefore, as we do, any trust relation as arising in this transaction between Cortelyou and the defendants other than the corporation, the only question remaining is as to the right of a corporation which has received the full value of its shares to refuse to issue certificates to its stockholders simply because they may have been guilty of laches in making application therefor. The demurrer admits that in the agreement between Ferguson and the corporation, through which the shares were originally issued, it was stipulated, in the event of a sale by Ferguson, 'that certificates should be issued of such treasury stock in the same manner and with the same effect as though such stock had been retained in the treasury unissued,' which is a reserved right of cancellation in event of sale. It is not averred that the shares sold to Cortelyou were in fact issued to Chaffey under any pooling agreement; but, on the contrary, it is alleged that the certificates 'continued to stand in the name of Ferguson.' Under this agreement between the corporation and Ferguson, no intervening parties having acquired an interest, it became the duty of the corporation, upon the sale to Cortelyou, to issue to him his certificates, unless the subsequent agreement between Ferguson and Cortelyou, that the certificates issued to Ferguson should represent Cortelyou's shares and should so stand in Ferguson's name until the pooling agreement was dissolved, would excuse the corporation from the further issue to Cortelyou during the existence of this pooling agreement. Assuming this, nothing appears in the complaint indicating that such time has elapsed since the dissolution of the pooling agreement as in equity would bar plaintiff from relief, were it even conceded that laches could be invoked by the corporation as a reason for the nonissuance of the evidences of ownership in property sold under the circumstances of this case. Cortelyou and his estate have, under the allegations of this bill, been continuously the owners of these shares ever since their purchase, entitled to dividends, and subject to all the liability of shareholders; and to say that the election to continue such relation without affirmative evidence upon the books, or by certificate, would destroy the property right, cannot be admitted. The property right existing, the right to demand the evidence from the corporation, which under the law and by the agreement it is required to furnish, is a right which may be enforced without reference to the lapse of time, if no loss or injury has resulted to an innocent person by reason of the delay. Cook on Stockholders, § 61; Helliwell on Stock & Stockholders, §§ 110-114.

"We are of opinion therefore that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, and for that reason the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings."

We are satisfied that the foregoing opinion correctly disposes of the matters presented for determination on this appeal.

We adopt it as the opinion of this court, and order that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 503*)—ACTIONS—VENUE.

Const. art. 12, § 16, provides that a corporation may be sued in the county where the contract is made, or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or breach occurs, or in the county of its principal place of business, subject to the court's power to change the place of trial as in other cases. Held that, where a complaint against a corporation, residing in S. county, for false representations in the sale of its stock to plaintiff by its agent, in F. county, did not show that the contract was made, or was to be performed, or that defendant's liability arose, or that its breach of contract, if any, occurred, in F. county, defendant was entitled to have the venue of the action changed to the county of its residence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, providing that in other cases than those specified in sections 392, 393, and 394, an action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside; the corporation being entitled to the same rights under such section as natural persons.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by J. C. Krogh against the Pacific Gateway & Development Company. From an order denying a change of venue, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ashley & Neumiller and Everts & Ewing, for appellant. Cartwright & Caslin, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and its principal place of business is the city of Stockton, San Joaquin county. The action was commenced in the superior court of the county of Fresno. Defendant appeared, and at the time of filing its demurrer filed an affidavit of merits, and made demand and moved the court that the place of trial be changed from Fresno county to San Joaquin county. The motion was denied, and defendant appeals from the order.

The action was commenced to recover damages for the false and fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by the authorized agent of defendant in the county of Fresno, relating to the sale of certain shares of the defendant corporation to plaintiff whereby he was damaged. The action is clearly a personal or transitory action. It does not fall within the provisions of either sections 392, 393, or 394, Code Civ. Proc., but does come within the provisions of section 395 of that Code, which provides that "in all other cases, the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action." Where commenced in the wrong county, the place of trial may be changed in the cases mentioned in section 397, as here, "when the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county."

The principal place of business of a corporation is its residence. Cohn v. C. P. R. Co., 71 Cal. 488, 12 Pac. 498; Buck v. City of Eureka, 97 Cal. 135, 31 Pac. 845; Trezevant v. Strong Co., 102 Cal. 48, 36 Pac. 395. The complaint alleges that in the month of January, 1906, in the county of Fresno, the defendant by its authorized agent, one Abrams, represented to plaintiff that defendant had entered into a contract with said Abrams and one Brandt, whereby upon the payment of a certain sum of money to Abrams and Brandt they would transfer to defendant certain valuable oil-bearing lands situated in San Benito county; that Abrams and Brandt and certain other persons had each subscribed for 25,000 shares of defendant corporation, and had each paid to defendant the sum of $5,000 therefor, and that the money so paid would be used to pay Abrams and Brandt for said land; that should plaintiff purchase 25,000 shares, and pay $5,000 therefor, the money so paid would be applied, together with the money paid by the other said subscribers, in the purchase of said land, and that defendant would thereupon proceed to develop said property by sinking wells, etc.; that "plaintiff, believing said representations and relying thereon, in the belief that they were true, thereafter subscribed for 25,000 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, and on or about January 10, 1906, paid to said corporation therefor the sum of $5,000." Then follow averments showing that said representations were false, and made to deceive plaintiff, and that in fact no money was paid to defendant, except as paid by plaintiff, and that defendant has never acquired any oil land, and has never developed any oil land, that said stock is of no value, and that defendant "has never issued to plaintiff a certificate of said stock."

Section 16, article 12 of the Constitution provides as follows: "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs; or in the county where the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." In Cohn v. C. P. R. R. Co., supra, it was held that: "In an action against a corporation for damages for breach of contract, the defendant is entitled to a change of place of trial to the county in which its principal place of business is situated, when the county in which the action was brought is not the one in which the contract was made, or was to be performed, or in which the obligation arose, or in which the principal place of business is situated." It cannot be said from any facts set forth in the complaint that the contract sued upon was made, or was to be performed, or that the alleged liability arose, or that its breach occurred, in Fresno county. But it does appear by the affidavit that the principal place of defendant's business is in San Joaquin county. The only contract shown by the complaint was made, and was to be performed subsequently to the representations made, at Fresno county. No obligation or liability or breach occurred at Fresno county so far as appears. The alleged representations made by Abrams may have induced plaintiff to subscribe for the stock, and pay his money to defendant for the same, but this took place, as appears from the complaint, after the representations were made, and not until then did any obligation arise, and defendant's alleged breach occurred still later.

In Trezevant v. Strong Co., supra, the construction placed upon the section of the Constitution, above quoted, in Lewis v. S. P. Coast R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 209, 5 Pac. 79, and National Bank v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 498, 24 Pac. 157, was followed. It was held, as in National Bank v. Superior Court, that "where a corporation is sued in any one of the counties mentioned in this section, it cannot demand a change of venue as matter of absolute right, but only as in other cases and for other reasons than that the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county." But even as held in these early cases, plaintiff has not brought himself within the provisions of the Constitution, and defendant is entitled to a change of the place of trial under the last clause of the section. But if we are mistaken in this view of the facts as shown, still defendant is entitled to the same right in the matter as would be accorded to a natural person (Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 Pac. 120); and, if defendant were a natural person, there could be no doubt of its right in the case. Lewis v. South Pacific Coast R. R. Co., supra, was distinctly overruled in Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern, etc., Co., in so far as it held that the provision of the state Constitution is not in conflict with the provision of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States. In Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern, etc., Co., the right claimed was under section 392, Code Civ. Proc., and the court said: "No conceivable ground can be suggested why a natural person should have the right of trial of an action involving an interest in land in the county where the land is situated, and the same right should be denied to a corporation." What is true of the rights of corporations arising under section 392 must be true of the rights of corporations arising under section 395. We see no escape from this conclusion.

Respondent has filed no brief in the case, from which we might infer that he concedes the correctness of appellant's position. Whether this be so or not, in fairness to the court respondent should have given us such assistance as he could if, after the appeal, he still believed the trial court was justified in denying the motion.

The order refusing a change of venue of the action is reversed.

1. VENUE (§ 62*)—MOTION FOR CHANGE—PARTIES.

The general rule that all the defendants who have been served or have appeared must join in the motion to change place of trial is subject to the qualification that the county in which the action is brought is the proper county for its trial, which depends on the character of the action or the residence of defendants; so that motion for change of place of trial to Y. county of an action brought in S. county for negligent acts committed in Y. county, which is one of the actions that Code Civ. Proc. § 395, provides must be tried in the county in which defendants or some of them reside (except that section 396 provides that it may be tried in the county where brought, in the absence of a demand for trial in the proper county), need not, on evidence that some of defendants reside in Y.

county, and none of them reside in S. county, be joined in by a defendant which is a foreign corporation not shown to have its principal place of business in S. county, as even though, under Const. art. 12, § 16, providing that a corporation may be sued in the county where the liability arose or where it has its principal place of business, it being a foreign corporation may be sued in any county, so that as to it S. county may be considered proper, it is not proper in the sense that it may demand to be tried there, and so prevent change by the other defendants of the place of trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. VENUE (§ 77*) — MOTION FOR CHANGE — WAIVER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 396, providing that, though the county in which an action is brought is not the proper county for trial, it may be tried there, unless defendant, when he answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits and a demand for change of place of trial, he does not waive his motion by filing prior to hearing thereof his amended demurrer, which amendment under section 472 he could make of course, and which relates to the time of filing the original.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 134; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. VENUE (§ 66*)—MOTION FOR CHANGE—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS—"ATTORNEY"—"COUNSELOR"—"ATTORNEY AT LAW."

Defendant's affidavit of merits for change of place of trial, averring that he has fully and fairly stated all the facts to his "attorney," C., is sufficient without further stating that C. is his counsel in the case; "attorney," "counselor," and "attorney at law," being used synonymously by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 275-299.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Uletta Pittman, administratrix of Charles E. Allen, deceased, against Harry J. Carstenbrook and others. From an order granting the motion of defendants, other than the Southern Pacific Company, for change of place of trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Devlin, for appellant. C. E. McLaughlin and R. T. McKissick, for respondent Pittman. W. H. Carlin, for respondents Carstenbrook and others.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order granting the motion of the defendants other than the Southern Pacific Company for a change of place of trial from the county of Sacramento, in which the action was brought, to the county of Yuba, the residence of two of said defendants.

Appellant contends that the order was erroneous for the following reasons: "(1) The defendant, Southern Pacific Company, had appeared in the case, filed a demurrer after having been previously served with summons and complaint, and did not join in the motion to change place of trial. Hence the motion should not have been granted. (2)

The moving defendants waived their motion to change place of trial by filing an amended demurrer before presenting their motion. (3) The moving papers were insufficient. (4) Sacramento county was the proper county in so far as the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, was concerned, and hence the other defendants could not remove the cause to the county of Yuba."

Appellant states the rule too broadly in the declaration "that all necessary defendants who have been served or who have appeared must join in the motion to change place of trial," although it is so expressed in some of the decisions. For instance, in Pieper v. Centinela Land Company, 56 Cal. 175, it is said: "Under these circumstances, all the defendants should have joined in the motion, and, as they did not do so, the motion was properly denied." While the decision was based upon the ground that Martin, the defendant, who did not join in the motion, was a necessary party, it can be justified upon the theory that it did not appear that the said Martin was not a resident of the county where the action was brought. The general rule as stated by appellant is subject to the qualification that the county in which the action is brought is the proper county for the trial of the action, and this depends upon the character of the proceeding or the residence of the defendant or defendants. It appears that the acts of negligence of which complaint is made were committed in Yuba county, and therefore, while it is not a local action, as far as appellant is concerned, the venue could have been laid in said Yuba county. Section 16, art. 12, Const. Cal. If it had been shown that its principal place of business was in Sacramento county, then, under this provision of the Constitution, plaintiff had the privilege of bringing the action therein, but it does not so appear, and we need not consider the question whether in that event, notwithstanding this privilege, the other defendants could have the cause transferred to the place of their residence. It has been so held in G. & S. Co. v. M. & F. H. Co., 107 Cal. 380, 40 Pac. 495, and in Fresno Nat. Bank v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 491, 24 Pac. 157. We are aware, however, of the more recent case of Grocers', etc., Union v. Kern, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 466, 89 Pac. 120, modifying the earlier decisions, and holding that no discrimination can be made in the change of venue between the corporation and the individual. The question, though, is foreign to the discussion, as treating appellant exactly as a natural person the case is one contemplated by section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure that: "In all other cases the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action." The evidence introduced shows that some of the defendants resided in Yuba and none of them in Sacramento. Therefore Yuba is the proper county for the trial, and Sacramento is not. There is no sort of contention about the residence except an intimation that the case should be treated as though the corporation were a resident of Sacramento county. But the affidavit of the moving parties is that appellant is a resident of Kentucky, and there is no counter showing even to the effect that it has its principal place of business in said Sacramento county. We must be governed, of course, by the showing made, and therefore it must follow that the respondents who resided in Yuba county had a right to invoke section 396, Code Civ. Proc., providing that: "If the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands, in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county." The decisions of the Supreme Court are in harmony with the views herein expressed. In O'Neil v. O'Neil, 54 Cal. 187, it is held that, where the action is to determine rights to real estate against several parties, each defendant is entitled as a matter of right to have the action tried in the county in which the real estate is situated, and it is said: "There is nothing in the provisions which require all the defendants to join in claiming such a right. * * * Each defendant may waive it for himself, but the waiver of one cannot be used to prejudice or destroy the right of another."

In McKenzie v. Barling, 101 Cal. 460, 36 Pac. 8, a personal action, one of the defendants who was a necessary and proper party was a resident of Fresno county where the action was brought. He did not join in the motion for a change of venue, and it was correctly held that Fresno was not an improper county for the trial within the rule as accurately stated therein: "Where in a case coming under section 395 of the Code any of the defendants reside in the county in which the suit is brought, a motion to change the place of trial to a county in which others of the defendants reside will not be granted unless all of the defendants join in the motion, or unless good reason is shown why they have not so joined." In Banta v. Wink, 119 Cal. 78, 51 Pac. 17, the action was for the purpose of having it adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided interest in all the property, business, proceeds, and profits of an alleged copartnership and for an accounting thereof, and it was held that it must be tried in the county in which the defendants or some of them reside at the commencement of the action, and it was stated that: "As defendants Wink and Banta did not reside in this state, they could not move for a change of venue, but that fact did not deprive the other defendants of the right to have the case tried in the county in which they, or some of them, resided at the commencement of the action. It is only when none of the defendants reside in the state that the action may be tried in any county which the plaintiff may designate in his complaint." In Greenleaf v. Jacks, 133 Cal. 506, 65 Pac. 1039, it was not shown that none of the defendants resided in San Luis Obispo county, where the action was brought, and therefore, being a personal action, it was held in line with the decisions cited that the motion for change of venue was properly denied. In the same case, appealed by another party, reported in 135 Cal. 154, 67 Pac. 17, it is held that, since the cause of action arose in San Luis Obispo county and some of the defendants resided therein, "It was the right of the plaintiff to bring and prosecute the action in that county and the consent of the resident defendants to change the place of trial to another county could not take away that right." In Wood, Curtis & Co. v. Herman Min. Co., 139 Cal. 713, 716, 73 Pac. 588, 589, it appeared, as here, that none of the defendants resided in Sacramento county, but some of them appeared voluntarily and requested that the trial proceed in said county, but the court said: "The consent of certain defendants not residing in the county where the action is brought could not take away from the defendants who did not reside there the right to have the cause transferred to the county of their residence. To hold otherwise would be a violation of the provisions of section 395."

The foregoing decisions make it perfectly clear that since the evidence showed that none of the defendants resided in Sacramento county and the moving parties resided in Yuba county, and the character of the action—it being personal or transitory—was such as to be properly tried in said Yuba county, the court below had no discretion, upon the showing made, but was compelled to grant the motion. It is unnecessary to consider the point made by respondents that it has been held that a foreign corporation cannot even demand or oppose a change of place of trial (Thomas v. Placerville G. Q. M. Co., 65 Cal. 600, 4 Pac. 641; Waechter v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé R. R. Co., [Cal. App.] 101 Pac. 41), since if we concede that no distinction should be made between foreign and domestic corporations, it does not aid appellant in view of what we have already noted as to its nonresidence in Sacramento county. We do not think it can be held that respondents waived their motion for a change of place of trial by filing their amended demurrer prior to the hearing of the motion.

The statute provides that the affidavit of merits and the demand in writing for the change of the place of trial be filed at the time the defendant answers or demurs (section 396, Code Civ. Proc.), and section 472, Code Civ. Proc., gives the defendant the right to amend the demurrer of course, and it would be a very harsh rule to hold that by following the statute the defendant waives a privilege conferred by the statute. The amended demurrer relates to the time of the filing of the original, and no more does one than the other manifest an intention to submit to the jurisdiction of the court. It has been held that the affidavit of merits may be amended even after the time for filing the original affidavit has expired and that the amendment relates back to the time of filing said original. Palmer & Ray v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 199, 28 Pac. 226. In the Wood, Curtis & Co. Case, supra, it was held that the defendants did not waive their privilege to have the place of trial changed by moving to strike out portions of the complaint. It is true that the privilege may be waived impliedly as well as expressly, but, in order to do so, there must be some act of the moving party tending to show his intent to invoke the jurisdiction of the court of first instance for the trial of questions of fact or of law. The filing of the amended demurrer does not indicate this intention, although it might just as well have been filed after the cause was transferred. The cases cited by appellant involve different facts, and, as we view them, are of no assistance here.

The objection to the affidavit of merits is that it avers that the defendants "have fully and fairly stated all the facts of the case in the above entitled action to their attorney, W. H. Carlin, of the City of Marysville," whereas it should "have stated that Carlin was their counsel in the case." The principal criticism seems to be that it does not appear but what Carlin was their attorney in fact, but upon reference to the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, tit. 5, c. 1 (sections 275-299), it will be found that "attorney," "counselor," and "attorney at law" are used synonymously, and it is undoubtedly true that in the court of common understanding there would be found no dissent from the opinion that the defendants intended to declare and did substantially declare that they had fully and fairly stated all the facts of the case to W. H. Carlin who was their attorney and counselor in said cause, etc. The affidavit seems to be in entire accord with the decisions. McSherry v. Penn. C. G. M. Co., 97 Cal. 637, 32 Pac. 711; Wood, Curtis & Co. v. Herman, supra. As suggested by respondents, we are not concerned with the wisdom of the choice of defendants as to their attorney, but, in answer to appellant's statement that it should appear that the facts had been stated "to some counsel who is skilled in the law," it may be declared that either the counsel from Marysville or the one from Sacramento will measure up to the requirement.

The fourth proposition of appellant has perhaps been sufficiently covered by the foregoing. At the risk of repetition, it is, however, submitted that while Sacramento may be regarded as a proper county, as far as appellant is concerned, for the trial of the action for the reason that, being a foreign corporation, it may be sued in any county of the state, it has no right to demand that it be tried therein. This follows from the consideration that the right to sue appellant in said county is a privilege accorded to plaintiff, and obviously cannot be urged to defeat the right of the other defendants to demand that the action be tried in the county of their residence which is the only proper county for them as well as for appellant. It must be plain that in any view appellant cannot resist the motion on the ground that Yuba is an improper county for the trial of the action. Even if it were a domestic corporation or a natural person, it could not do so under the showing made. There is really no question here of any discrimination between a natural and an artificial person or between a domestic and a foreign corporation, as in the final analysis the decision of the lower court simply means that in a transitory action certain defendants who reside in Yuba county are entitled to have the cause tried in that county as against a defendant not residing in the state.

We see no reason for disturbing the action of the trial court, and the order is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by the Aggler, Morrison, Hansen Company against A. C. Dauphiny & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry L. Ford and Adam Thompson, for appellant. Mahan & Mahan, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for the value of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, alleged to have been sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict for $336.30, on which judgment was entered. Defendant appeals from the judgment on bill of exceptions.

The defense on which defendant relies is set out in its answer, and may be thus summarized: That about August 26, 1904, the United Breeders Company and plaintiff, through their agent, one Andrews, gave to defendant the exclusive agency for handling and selling an article called "Baum's Stock Food" in the city of Eureka, Humboldt county, and territory north of said city in said county, and "let the said defendant have one-half car load of said Baum's stock food to sell," and as inducement to defendant to handle said products said Andrews, as such agent, "agreed that he would move (i. e., find sale for) all of said half car load that said defendant would send for"; that, relying on said promises, and that "defendant should be the exclusive agent for the handling and selling of said Baum's stock food (in the territory named), until all said merchandise in its possession was sold or removed," and that said Andrews as such agent "would move the entire half car load of said Baum's stock food" defendant "sent for a half car load of said Baum's stock food in the form of paper writing and manner as made and dictated by said Andrews, the agent of said Breeders Company and plaintiff, and that said stock food was thereafter delivered to the said defendant under the terms as aforesaid, which is the same half car of merchandise mentioned and referred to in plaintiff's complaint"; that it was agreed that said Andrews "should sell the same; and, as long as any of said Baum's stock food and products was in its possession, that the defendant should remain and be the exclusive agent for handling and selling the same in the said territory as aforesaid." It is then averred that the said Andrews did not sell all of said stock food as he agreed to do, but that defendant sold all it could so sell; that without defendant's knowledge or consent plaintiff and said United Breeders Company, through their agent, Andrews, and in violation of said agreement, established another agency in said territory, and placed said stock food on sale therein with their newly appointed agent, and thereupon defendant notified the said United Breeders Company and plaintiff that defendant still held some of said products, and offered it to them and called upon them to take it away; that defendant has paid for all of said merchandise that it has ever sold, and holds the residue subject to the order of said United Breeders Company and plaintiff.

There was evidence from which the jury might well have found that the facts were not as alleged by defendant, but were as claimed by plaintiff, namely and briefly: That plaintiff purchased from the United Breeders Company, and paid for a car load of said products, and took the agency for their sale in Humboldt county for one year; that, finding difficulty in handling all the products, plaintiff, through its agent, Andrews, sold to defendant half of this car load of the goods, and gave defendant the exclusive agency for one year for the territory mentioned in defendant's answer; that defendant purchased the goods from plaintiff, and not from the United Breeders Company, and had its dealings entirely with plaintiff in the matter; that it made payments to plaintiff on account of said sale from time to time, and that no agency other than defendant's was established in said territory until after the year had expired, and after defendant had notified plaintiff that it held the goods on hand subject to plaintiff's order and refused payment therefor. We do not feel called upon to recite the evidence in the case. Defendant's counsel say in their brief: "There was some evidence that the transaction was a completed sale. There was more evidence, however, that the transaction was a conditional sale, and the title remained in the plaintiff. The erroneous admission of the evidence complained of threw so much weight in the balance against defendant, that the jury brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiff." The record presents the usual conflict in the testimony found in most trials; and, as it was resolved in favor of plaintiff, this court cannot go behind the verdict of the jury thereon. The only question, according to defendant's concession, is whether the verdict was influenced adversely to defendant by the introduction of incompetent and irrelevant evidence.

Plaintiff first called the president of plaintiff company, who testified, without objection, to Andrews having made the sale, as plaintiff's agent, of half a car load of the stock food; that the order for the goods was dated October 26, 1904, and was in writing, signed by defendant, and sent in letter written by Andrews. This written order shows that the goods were the Baum's stock food, terms of sale 4 months "2% 10 das" (due in four months, 2% off if paid in 10 days.) It stated on its face that freight to San Francisco was to be deducted, and that defendant was to be allowed "$75.00 per month to pay salary to any salesman they [defendant] choose to select. The amount of said salary to be deducted from bill." The goods were to come from Chicago, and hence the agreement to deduct freight to San Francisco. The witness testified that after making these deductions, there remained due a balance of $336.30. Witness Morrison, vice president of plaintiff company, testified to the receipt of defendant's written order, and that the instructions to Andrews were to sell a half a car load of the goods, giving the purchaser the agency for "the territory of Eureka and north." "The time for which the agency was to be given was for one year, the same as we had the agency for. We allowed Mr. Dauphiny to retain that agency for the full term of one year." He testified that in March, 1905, defendant ordered a car load of the goods, but shortly after canceled the order. "When he canceled this second order, he informed us that he washed his hands of the whole matter. We did not place any other agency in this county during that period. We had the general agency for these goods for a year, and we sublet him the northern half of the county. We bought the goods and paid for them, and then sold him half of the goods and the agency for a year. The paper shown me is the receipt of the manufacturer where he was paid for a car load of goods." Andrews' letter inclosing the order was introduced over defendant's objection. We cannot see how this letter could have had any possible influence in the case one way or the other. Defendant admitted to have given the order through Andrews.

The deposition of Andrews was admitted in evidence, and the testimony which defendant claims was prejudicially erroneous came out in this deposition. The witness testified to his having sold to plaintiff, in October, 1904, a car load of the Baum products for the United Breeders Company of Chicago as its Pacific Coast representative; that the Breeders Company was to allow them to deduct the freight from their bill and allow them $75 per month for four months to pay the salary of a salesman, and gave them the agency for these products for Humboldt county for one year from date. "Mr. Aggler thought that this was a pretty large order, and suggested that I sell for them half of the car at Eureka, and allow the agent at that point half the salary for two months, being $75 per month, * * * and also give them the agency for Baum's products in Eureka and north of Eureka in Humboldt county, for one year from date." The witness identified a duplicate of the order given by plaintiff to the United Breeders Company of Chicago for this car load of goods, and testified to plaintiff having paid in full for the goods, exhibiting the receipt. The bill for the goods, as "Exhibit A," and the receipt showing payment, as "Exhibit B," were attached to the deposition, and returned as part thereof. The witness also testified to the circumstances and facts attending the order given by defendant, fully sustaining the claim made by plaintiff. It is not necessary to set out these facts. The objections now urged go to the competency and relevancy of the facts above narrated. It is claimed that neither defendant nor any of its officers were present or had anything to do with the transaction between plaintiff and the United Breeders Company. The court ruled that the evidence was admissible "upon the question whether A. C. Dauphiny & Co. took one-half the agency and one-half the order upon the same terms that Aggler, Morrison, Hansen Company took the whole products." And again the court remarked: "Of course, the real question is the transaction between the plaintiff and A. C. Dauphiny Company. It is simply to show the relations he sustained [referring to Andrews] to the company that was handling the stock food, as I take it."

It seems to me the evidence tended to rebut the defense set up in the answer which defendant later undertook to maintain by evidence introduced. Defendant claimed that the sale to it was by the United Breeders Company, and not by plaintiff, and this evidence tended to show that these identical goods were sold to plaintiff in the first instance by the Breeders Company, and could not have been sold by that company to defendant. Counsel for plaintiff stated in introducing the deposition that much of the deposition was in rebuttal, but he asked leave to introduce the whole deposition at that time. The testimony was also corroborative of that given by the other witnesses for plaintiff as to the transaction. It was perhaps not very material how or from whom plaintiff obtained the goods, but, even so, it must be apparent that the facts as to the source of plaintiff's ownership could not have been prejudicial to defendant in the minds of the jury. The real question, as was remarked by the court, was the transaction between the plaintiff and defendant, and that question was not, in our opinion, in any degree influenced to defendant's injury by the evidence objected to.

The judgment is affirmed.

Proc. § 997.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Sarah Louisa McCoy against I. J. Buckley and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant I. J. Buckley appeals on the judgment roll. Affirmed.

Frank W. Farrar, for appellant. J. K. Law, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an ordinary action to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant I. J. Buckley upon certain land to secure the payment of his promissory note, executed by said defendant and payable to defendant. The usual judgment on foreclosure was entered by the court, from which defendant I. J. Buckley alone appeals on the judgment roll. The court found that defendant Mary Buckley claims and has no interest in the mortgaged premises. The complaint is verified, and the execution of the note and mortgage and nonpayment set forth in the complaint, not being denied, are admitted. The first defense made in the answer is a denial of the reasonableness of attorney's fees claimed in the complaint, and denials of the averments that plaintiff has agreed to pay, and has incurred, any liability for attorney's fees. The answer also alleges that the action, although the complaint is verified by plaintiff, was commenced without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, and has been prosecuted for the purpose of enabling the attorney for plaintiff to collect a fee. The mortgage provides for payment of attorney's fees in case of foreclosure, and the court found against defendant upon all the foregoing defenses.

As a further defense against the claim for attorney's fees the answer sets forth at much length certain facts, which may be summarized as follows: That in 1895, plaintiff being the then owner of the mortgaged premises, conveyed the same to one Jacobs, who at the same time executed and delivered to plaintiff a deed of trust to the property, to secure the payment of his promissory note given to her, and that the said instrument created a lien on the said premises, and so remains as a cloud upon defendant's title to the land. It is not alleged that the indebtedness so secured has been paid. It is then averred that: "Long prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant offered plaintiff, in writing, if she would satisfy and discharge of record the lien created by said instrument in writing, this defendant would immediately thereafter pay to her the principal and interest due to her on the promissory note set forth in the complaint; * * * but plaintiff refused and neglected to comply with said offer." It is further averred that, "long prior to the commencement of this action, defendant was able and willing to pay to plaintiff the whole amount, of principal and interest due on said promissory note," upon the discharge of said lien, all of which plaintiff well knew. "And this defendant now comes and offers to pay to the plaintiff herein the full sum of principal and interest which is due to her upon said promissory note, set forth in plaintiff's complaint (not including, however, attorney's fees and costs), immediately upon the satisfaction and discharge by her, of record, of the lien and cloud upon his title to the land and premises mentioned and described in the mortgage set forth in said complaint." Defendant prays that plaintiff take no judgment herein for attorney's fees; that defendant recover judgment for $200, as damages for the wrongful prosecution by plaintiff of this action, and for his costs.

The court found that plaintiff conveyed the premises to Jacobs, as alleged in the answer, who contemporaneously executed and delivered to plaintiff "an instrument in writing which created a lien upon said land and premises, mentioned and described in the mortgage set forth in the complaint of plaintiff herein," and that the said lien continued to and at the commencement of this action constituted a cloud on defendant's title. But the court found that defendant never at any time offered, in writing or otherwise, to pay and discharge defendant's said mortgage indebtedness to plaintiff on the condition set out in the answer, or at all, and that plaintiff never at any time "refused or neglected to accept or comply with any offer of payment of the money due her on said note," and also found that defendant was not, prior to the commencement of this action, or at any time, able and willing to pay to plaintiff the whole amount of principal and interest of said note upon the terms and conditions alleged by defendant, or upon any conditions whatever, and, further, that plaintiff never knew at any time that said defendant was ever able or willing to pay said indebtedness on any terms or conditions. The alleged tender of payment prior to the commencement of this action may be dismissed from consideration, as the findings negative these averments. It does not appear when or how defendant acquired title to the premises. His mortgage was executed to plaintiff in 1903, eight years after the transaction between plaintiff and Jacobs, when title appears to have been in plaintiff. As plaintiff's title passed to Jacobs in 1895, defendant became the owner subsequently, either through Jacobs or his grantee, and took title subject to the lien of which he complains, and it nowhere appears that this lien is not rightfully a subsisting incumbrance on the property. We cannot see how defendant would have a right in this or any other action to have it released and discharged, without first showing that the debt, to secure which the lien was created, has been paid.

The only remaining question is whether the tender of payment made in the answer was such as to require the court to deny plaintiff the right to attorney's fees and costs of the action. It will be observed that the tender came for the first time some time after the complaint was filed, and was made in the answer thereto. The court found that the previous alleged tenders were never made. The tender by answer necessarily came after plaintiff had incurred costs, and had become liable for attorney's fees. No money was deposited in court with the tender, and defendant did not aver his ability to make good the tender then or ever. The suit having been commenced, the offer should have been made pursuant to section 997, Code Civ. Proc., and should have been to allow judgment to be taken for the amount then due, with costs incurred. The Civil Code provides that an offer of performance, which this was intended to be, must be made in good faith, and in the "manner as most likely, under the circumstances, to benefit the creditor" (section 1493); and "must be free from any conditions which the creditor is not bound, on his part, to perform" (section 1494); "and is of no effect if the person making it is not able and willing to perform according to the offer"

(section 1495). See Horan v. Harrington, 130 Cal. 142, 62 Pac. 400.

We can discover no merit in any of the points made by appellant.

TAGGART, J. Action to recover for services rendered at an agreed salary. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff was employed by F. G. Downey, claiming to act as secretary and general manager of the defendant corporation, in and about the preparations for oil-well drilling operations in which defendant was about to engage. He rendered three months' services, and at the close of the third month received a paper, which he pleads as an account stated, in the words and figures following: "There is due to G. L. Smith for services performed for the Sinbad Development Company, in accordance with terms of hiring: 3 mos. at $225 per mo. & expenses, $675; Expenses paid out by Smith, $75. Dated Nov. 30, 1907. [Signed] F. G. Downey, Sec. & General Manager of Sinbad Development Co." When this instrument was offered in evidence, it was objected to by defendant on the ground that it had not been shown "that he (Downey) had authority to make the contract." Which objection was sustained by the court and this ruling is assigned as error.

At the time of the tender of the instrument F. G. Downey, who employed plaintiff and who signed the paper in question, was asked: "Were you or were you not general manager of the Sinbad Development Company at the time you employed Mr. Smith?" Whereupon the court said: "There is no question but what he was. The articles of incorporation show that he was at that time, and he states that he didn't resign. That fact was proven that he was general manager." Counsel for defendant then stated that he should contend that there was no office of that kind authorized by the by-laws, to which the court replied: "The articles of incorporation name him as general manager. * * * His duties might be fixed by the by-laws, but he was general manager according to the articles of incorporation until the annual meeting." Counsel for defendant then admitted that Downey was secretary, but contended that there was no such officer as general manager. The witness then stated that he signed the paper in question (designating it as the pay roll) and delivered it to Smith, and the offer of the writing was renewed. Counsel for defendant objected to its introduction without stating any grounds, and the objection was sustained. An excerpt from the articles of incorporation of defendant, which had been read into the record prior to the tender of this evidence by plaintiff, was as follows: "Article 5. The affairs of the corporation shall be conducted by a board of directors and officers to be elected by the same, which said board shall consist of such number and persons as may be elected by and from among the stockholders as provided by the by-laws. Until the first annual meeting of the stockholders and until their successors are elected and qualified, the following named persons shall be the directors and officers: * * * And F. G. Downey secretary and general manager." From the Arizona statute, which was read into the record by the court as part of defendant's case without objection (the corporation defendant being organized under the laws of that territory), it appears that articles of incorporation in that territory must provide (among other things): "5. By what officers the affairs of the corporation are to be conducted and the time at which they are to be elected." Laws 1903, No. 88, § 1. The articles of incorporation were filed in Arizona June 10, 1907, and in this state in October, 1907, and no annual election was held or by-laws adopted until September 21, 1907. The by-laws so adopted make no provision for a general manager, and it was apparently the theory of the trial court that the provision in the by-laws that: "The president shall be the chief executive officer of the company. * * * He shall sign and execute all authorized bonds, contracts or other obligations in the name of the company"—excluded the possibility of any general manager being appointed. Waiving the effect of the provision of the Arizona statute, read by the court, that the articles of incorporation must contain the officers by whom the affairs of the corporation are to be conducted, and accepting the view that notwithstanding this provision the by-laws may provide what officers the corporation shall have, the by-laws were not adopted until September 21, 1907, and during the interval between June 10th and that date, by express provision of the articles of incorporation, Downey was secretary and general manager, and it was at this time that plaintiff was employed by him. The objection to the introduction of the writing in evidence that it had not been shown that Downey had authority to make the contract we think was without support. This objection, however, if good, was not sufficient to exclude the writing from evidence, as its admissibility did not depend upon the making of the contract. Whether considered as an account stated or an admission against interest by the defendant corporation, its contents showed it related to the bookkeeping of the corporation which was a matter clearly within the duties of the secretary of the corporation, and it was admitted by defendant that Downey was the secretary of the corporation at the time it was made and delivered to the plaintiff.

It is admissible either as a "pay roll," a "time sheet," or an "account stated."

The views which we have expressed also operate to determine in favor of appellant the matter urged upon the ground of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings made by the court. We think the specifications are sufficient under the rule declared in American Type Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 460, 62 Pac. 744, Swift v. Occidental Mining Co., 141 Cal. 161, 74 Pac. 700, and cases following them. The contention of appellant in his attack upon the findings in relation to whether or not an account was stated between the parties is based chiefly upon the exclusion of the evidence which, if it had been admitted, would have sustained his case. The sufficiency of only such evidence as has been introduced can be considered, and it is not competent for this court to say what a finding might or should have been if certain evidence which was rejected had been admitted. We think the evidence shows that Downey was authorized to act for the defendant, and, acting on its behalf, did employ the plaintiff and promise and agree to pay him as alleged.

The objection urged by appellant that the court by its language during the trial led him to assume that it was satisfied that the authority of Downey as general manager had been established, and that the findings of the court inconsistent with such a view were a surprise to him, cannot be considered under the grounds of motion specified by him or the record before us. If there was a change in the ruling of the court to the detriment of appellant's case, he should have presented such a matter to the trial court upon his motion for a new trial as an irregularity of the court under subdivision 1, § 657, Code Civ. Proc. (Hayne on New Trial, § 37; Carpenter v. Small, 35 Cal. 362; Hartson v. Hardin, 40 Cal. 267), or under the head of "accident or surprise," subdivision 3 of section 657 (Cohen v. Alameda, 124 Cal. 504, 57 Pac. 377).

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for new trial.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 3, 1909.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 84*)—SUBSCRIPTIONS—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—"ETC."—"ET CETERA."

A subscription to stock of a corporation to be formed for the purposes "of acquiring and carrying on a general produce and merchandising business, etc.," did not bind subscribers to take stock in a corporation formed not only for such purposes, but also for dealing in real estate, bonds, mortgages, etc.; the abbreviation "etc.," which as commonly understood stands for "et cetera," meaning "and others," or "other things," not covering such other purposes under the rule of ejusdem generis, and, conceding that by the abbreviation it was intended that other and independent lines of business might be carried on by the corporation, there being no evidence as to what lines of business were intended to be so included.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action by the Hanford Mercantile Store, a corporation, against Joe S. Sowlevere, sometimes known as Joe S. Salvador. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dixon L. Phillips, for appellant. H. P. Brown, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to collect subscription to contemplated corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from judgment and order denying its motion for a new trial.

Defendant with some 50 other persons subscribed a writing whereby they agreed to join in the formation of a corporation under the laws of the state of California, the "purposes to be acquiring and carrying on a general produce and merchandising business, etc., at Hanford, Cal.; and to that end" subscribed and agreed to pay for the number of shares set opposite their respective names, etc.; the subscription of defendant being for 80 shares, amount $2,000. Thereafter some of the other signers of the writing mentioned incorporated and organized the plaintiff corporation, having for its purposes, as set forth in its articles of incorporation: "To acquire, purchase, own, control and manage, and carry on and conduct stores of general merchandise; purchase, own, sell, lease, manage and control goods, wares, merchandise and other kinds of personal property, mixed goods and effects of whatever nature or kind; to own, acquire, control, manage, mortgage and lease real property, wherever situated, and to sell, mortgage, or lease the same; to own, acquire, manage and control bonds, mortgages, accounts, and all and every kind of debts and evidences of debts, and to sell or otherwise dispose of the same, and to carry on, own, acquire and manage, for profit, a general mercantile business, and stores and warehouses and buildings and other houses and improvements, necessary or convenient for the same; to own, acquire, lease, control and manage warehouses for the purpose of storage and depositary for hire."

But one question is presented for solution: Is the "etc." following the purposes named in subscription paper, sufficient to embrace all the purposes enumerated in the articles of incorporation? This abbreviation, as commonly understood, is for "et cetera," which, as used, means "and others" or "other things." In itself it implies no limitation, and its use is so varied that it is questionable whether it can be said to have any definite use or uniform interpretation. It is sometimes declared to be meaningless and without effect, and in such a case is treated as mere surplusage. Harrison v. McCormick, 80 Cal. 327, 331, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 409. It is implied in this case that it may in some cases be construed as meaning that the contract is not complete in some respect, and that in such cases it is competent to supply the missing term by parol. But the majority of the cases construe the term as relating to correlated matters (Hayes v. Wilson, 105 Mass. 21; Loeser v. Liebmman, 60 Hun, 579, 14 N. Y. Supp. 569; Shuler v. Dutton, 75 Iowa, 155, 39 N. W. 239), or others of like character, things within the rule of ejusdem generis (In re Schouler, 134 Mass. 426; Tefft v. Tillinghast, 7 R. I. 434; Lathers v. Keogh, 39 Hun. [N. Y.] 576).

Measuring the case before us by either of the constructions given the term, and we are of opinion that the conclusion of the trial court will have to be sustained. If "etc." be treated as mere surplusage in the subscription paper, the defendant cannot be held to be obligated to take stock in a corporation organized for the purpose of dealing in real estate, bonds, mortgages, etc. Neither would he be bound under a construction that the term meant other things of like character or those covered by ejusdem generis. There is no evidence in the case, either of custom or of intent, from which it can be determined that dealing in real estate and bonds is correlated to the business of carrying on and conducting produce and general merchandise stores, or that such dealing is necessary to the acquiring, purchasing, owning, or controlling of such stores or business. If it were assumed that by the use of the letters "etc." it was intended to indicate that other and independent lines of business might be carried on by the corporation to be formed, there is no parol or other evidence as to what lines of business were intended to be so included. Without evidence of what other lines of business were intended to be included, or what others might by custom or otherwise be said to be correlated and thus assumed to have been intended to be included, there would be no limit to the kinds of business which the trial court might have read into the instrument in consequence of the use of the abbreviation in question, if appellant's view were accepted. We think the trial court properly rejected this construction.

The oral testimony introduced was all directed to establishing a waiver or ratification by the defendant and the findings of the trial court, which find support in the evidence, were in favor of defendant.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROSS. (Cr. 184.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Sept. 4, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL TO GIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal to give a single instruction is not erroneous where, from an examination of the entire record and the instructions given, it appears that the jury were fairly instructed on the point covered by such instruction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the killing by accused was admitted, and the only question to which the instructions as to reasonable doubt could apply was whether he acted in self-defense, and the court charged that, if decedent first attacked accused and attempted to assault him under such circumstances as would justify a reasonable man in believing that decedent was about to inflict great bodily injury, accused could act on the appearances and beliefs, and, if necessary for his own protection, he could kill decedent, and that the law presumes every man to be innocent, which presumption attaches to every fact essential to a conviction and that the jury must give accused the benefit of every reasonable doubt, the refusal to charge that, if the jury were not convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that accused did not act in self-defense, the verdict should be not guilty, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 631; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

John S. Ross was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

King & Kirk, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. Defendant was informed against for the crime of murder, and was convicted of murder in the second degree. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

There is only one point urged in this appeal—the alleged error of the trial court in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction offered by the defendant: "And, finally, if you are not convinced beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that the defendant did not act in self-defense, you will return a verdict of not guilty." We must look to the entire instructions given by the court in order to determine the question as to whether or not the refusal to give any single instruction was prejudicial to defendant. Although an instruction may not be given in the exact language in which it was asked, yet, if by an examination of the entire record and the instructions as given by the court it appears that the jury were fairly instructed upon the point concerning which a single instruction was refused, such refusal will not be erroneous. If it be conceded in this case that there was testimony sufficient to have justified the giving of the instruction asked by the defendant, then we think that the court fairly and fully instructed the jury as to the point. The court, at defendant's request, instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe that the deceased made the first hostile demonstration or attack against or upon the defendant by attempting to strike the defendant with an axe, and if you believe that having made such an attack the defendant wrested or took away from him such axe, and immediately thereupon the deceased seized a knife and attempted to assault defendant in such manner and under such circumstances as would have justified a reasonable man in defendant's position in believing that deceased was about to inflict upon him, the defendant, great bodily injury, then the defendant was justified in acting upon these appearances and beliefs, and, if necessary for his own protection, or to prevent great bodily injury to himself, the defendant struck the fatal blow, he was justified in so doing, and your verdict should be one of acquittal."

The court further, at defendant's request, instructed the jury as follows: "The law presumes every man to be innocent until his guilt is established beyond any reasonable doubt, and this presumption attaches at every stage of the case and to every fact essential to a conviction; and you must give the defendant in this case the benefit of every reasonable doubt." Applying the latter portion of the instruction, that the jury must give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt as to every fact essential to a conviction, and reading it in connection with the other instruction given as to the defendant's right to defend himself and act upon appearances and beliefs, it appears the jury were fairly instructed, and fully understood that they must find beyond a reasonable doubt every fact necessary to defendant's conviction before they would be justified in finding him guilty.

Moreover, the killing by defendant being conceded, the only question at issue to which the instruction given by the court on the subject of reasonable doubt could apply was whether defendant killed the deceased in justifiable self-defense.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; John E. Raker, Judge.

Action by the Modoc Co-operative Association against Phear E. Porter. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Wylie & Wylie and J. H. Stewart, for appellant. N. A. Cornish and F. M. Jamison, for respondent.

HART, J. The respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal taken from the judgment in the foregoing entitled cause under the method authorized by section 941a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the grounds: (1) That appellant has not filed the undertaking required by section 953b of the Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1907, p. 751, c. 408), by which the party giving notice that he desires and intends to appeal from any judgment, order, or decree of the court shall undertake and agree to pay to the clerk the cost of preparing said transcript; (2) that appellant has not complied with rule 2 (78 Pac. vii) of this court by causing to be filed a printed or any transcript of the record in this court within 40 days after her said appeal was perfected. The record here on this motion, as certified to by the clerk of the court below, recites the following facts: That judgment was rendered in this action in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, Phear E. Porter, on the 13th day of January, 1908, and that notice of said decision and judgment was served on said defendant on the 21st day of January, 1908; that on the 30th day of January, 1908, said defendant filed a notice of intention to appeal from the judgment, and at the same time requested that there be prepared a transcript of the testimony offered and received, rulings, etc., as authorized by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure; that on the same day said defendant "filed a purported undertaking to the said clerk to secure the cost of making up said transcript"; that the judge who tried the cause made an order, in compliance with the request of the defendant, requiring the official reporter of the superior court in which the said judgment was rendered to prepare and file said transcript, and that, thereupon, "said transcript was duly prepared and filed by said reporter" in the office of the clerk of said court on the 20th day of February, 1908, and, "after due notice to the attorneys representing said plaintiff and the said defendant, Phear E. Porter, the said transcript was presented to the said judge and was by him, on the 23rd day of March, 1908, approved and allowed." On the 20th day of March, 1908, "the defendant, Phear E. Porter, filed a notice of appeal from the aforesaid judgment, and served said notice of appeal on said plaintiff on said 20th day of March, 1908, acknowledgment of such service having been admitted upon said notice by said plaintiff, through its attorneys," etc. On the 24th day of March, 1908, the said defendant filed an undertaking on appeal in said cause, in the sum of $841.40, being double the amount of the judgment, "and said undertaking is in due form." The certificate of the clerk concludes with the following statement: "The said defendant and appellant, Phear E. Porter, has not requested the said clerk to certify to a correct, or to any transcript of the record of said case, nor has said clerk prepared said transcript of the record of said case or filed same with the clerk of the appellate court." Accompanying the papers filed on this motion is a copy of the undertaking sought to be executed in obedience to the requirements of section 953b of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The defendant, Phear E. Porter, resists the motion to dismiss the appeal upon the single ground that there is now pending in the court which rendered the judgment from which the appeal is taken and yet undisposed of a motion to modify and vacate said judgment, and it is declared in support of the opposition to the dismissal of the appeal, "that, until the said court acts upon said motion to vacate and modify, the appeal to this court cannot be perfected, and therefore a dismissal of appellant's appeal herein would be premature." The motion to "vacate and modify" the judgment is doubtless the one authorized by section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by which it is provided that a judgment may be set aside and vacated by the same court rendering the judgment and another and different judgment entered where it appears that the court has made incorrect or erroneous conclusions of law not consistent with or not supported by the findings of fact, such error materially affecting the substantial rights of the party or entitling him to a different judgment; or where "the judgment or decree is not consistent with or not supported by the special verdict." The notice of motion does not strictly follow the language of the section as to the grounds upon which it is authorized to be made, but we are not here concerned with the question whether the notice of said motion is sufficient to justify its consideration by the court. It is clear that the appellant has not complied with the requirement of rule 2 (78 Pac. vii) of this court with respect to the time within which a transcript on appeal must be filed after the appeal is perfected. Said rule provides that "the appellant in a civil action shall, within forty days after the appeal is perfected, serve and file the printed transcript of the record," etc. The record here shows that the appeal was taken on the 20th day of March, 1908, and that on the 24th day of March, 1908, the appellant filed the stay bond or undertaking required by section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was filed in this court on the 12th day of February, 1909; no transcript of the record having been filed here up to that time. The excuse offered by appellant for failure to file the transcript within the time prescribed by the rule of this court is not a valid one. The proceeding authorized by section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure has absolutely no connection with an appeal from a judgment, and in no manner or degree affects or controls the latter proceeding. The two remedies are distinct from and independent of each other. Speaking of sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, the Supreme Court, in Patch v. Miller, 125 Cal. 241, 57 Pac. 986, has this to say in reply to the suggestion that a party's remedy for an inconsistency between the judgment and the findings is under the sections mentioned and not in an appeal from the judgment: "We do not find anything in these added sections to indicate that it was the intention of the Legislature to repeal or in any way modify section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides for an appeal from a final judgment. It would therefore seem that an appeal from a final judgment entered in the superior court has the same effect and is to be heard and determined in the same way as before the enactment of the added sections. We hold that those sections were not intended to affect the remedy by appeal already existing, but were intended to provide a remedy in addition thereto." There was, therefore, no necessity for postponing the preparation and the filing of the transcript on the appeal from the judgment until the motion inaugurated upon the authority of section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure should first be disposed of. While it is obvious that the purpose of section 663 is to furnish a more speedy and summary method for attacking a judgment unsupported by the findings than by an appeal therefrom, yet that remedy is merely cumulative, and was not designed to supersede the remedy by appeal. Spelling on New Trial and Appellate Practice, § 718, and cases cited. Section 663a provides for an appeal from an order granting the motion under section 663, but makes no provision for an appeal from an order denying such motion for the obvious reason that on an appeal from the judgment the very same proposition may be reviewed and a reversal could be ordered and the court below directed to enter the judgment which the findings alone justify.

It is not pointed out wherein the undertaking required to secure to the clerk the cost of preparing the transcript is insufficient, but it is manifest from what we have said that it is unnecessary to consider that point, for the appealing defendant has otherwise been inexcusably derelict in the prosecution of her appeal.

The motion to dismiss the appeal must therefore be granted, and such is the order.

CLAIRMONT v. NAPIER MOTOR CO. OF AMERICA. (Civ. 632.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 3, 1909.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 81*)—EMPLOYMENT OF AGENT—COMPENSATION.

A contract whereby a manufacturer appointed one its exclusive agent for the sale within a territory of its motor cars for a commission on sales in the territory, though construed as entitling the agent to a commission on all cars sold in the territory, does not prevent the manufacturer from making sales in the territory on the payment of the commissions, and a commission due on a sale made by the manufacturer is due and payable when the sale is made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by J. A. Clairmonte against the Napier Motor Company of America. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler, for appellant. Ward Chapman, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal by defendant from a judgment entered against it and in plaintiff's favor.

The action was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts which may be summarized as follows: The defendant manufacturer had appointed plaintiff its exclusive agent for the sale of motor cars in the district of Los Angeles upon an agreed compensation of 20 per cent. discount. Preceding September, 1906, the business had been conducted in the manner following: When plaintiff ordered a car, he purchased the same of defendant in his own name and the car was shipped to him personally. The bill of lading was accompanied by a draft drawn by defendant upon plaintiff for the list price of the car less 20 per cent. In September, 1906, a lady, who had been solicited by plaintiff to buy a car, was given a letter of introduction by plaintiff to defendant, and this customer purchased a car directly from defendant, paying defendant a third in cash and agreeing to pay the balance upon delivery of car at Los Angeles. Defendant accordingly shipped the car to the purchaser, and through a Boston bank drew for the unpaid balance. The bank purchased the draft in good faith, and credited defendant with the face thereof, and honored defendant's checks until the amount was exhausted. The bank forwarded the draft so purchased to its correspondent in Los Angeles. The purchaser paid to the correspondent the amount of the draft. Whereupon plaintiff, who had before that time commenced an action against defendant to recover 20 per cent. commission upon the sale of the machine, attached the money in the hands of the correspondent, and the Boston bank gave an undertaking for the release of such attachment. Intermediate the sale of the draft and its payment the defendant upon involuntary proceedings was adjudged a bankrupt by the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts. While this adjudication was had before the commencement of plaintiff's action, he had no actual knowledge thereof. After the adjudication in bankruptcy a composition was effected, signed by a majority of the creditors, to which plaintiff was not a party, under the terms of which 33½ per cent. of all claims were by the creditors agreed to be received in satisfaction of their demands. This composition was confirmed by the court, and the per cent. due plaintiff was deposited in the registry of the court, of which fact plaintiff received notice. Afterwards, in June, 1908, plaintiff made due proof of his claim in the bankruptcy proceeding, and there was paid to him the pro rata share so on deposit, it being stipulated in the record that plaintiff during the pendency of these proceedings "collected from the funds duly deposited in the United States District Court for Massachusetts out of which the dividend in composition was paid, which settled all claims against the Napier Motor Company of America, his dividend upon his claim which had been theretofore proved, to wit, one-third, which was the same dividend which all other creditors received and that the said Clairmonte now holds the said sum." With these facts before the trial court, judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor for the full amount of 20 per cent. of the purchase price of the car.

There is nothing in the record indicating fraud, or any reason why the discharge in bankruptcy should not operate as a release from plaintiff's claim as a provable debt. Assuming that under its terms the appointment of plaintiff as agent entitled him to a commission of 20 per cent. upon all machines sold within his territory, nevertheless the defendant possessed the right to make sales conditioned only upon the payment of such commission; in other words, if under the contract a commission was due, it became due and payable when the sale was effected. The agreement for commission being for the payment of money only, it must be performed immediately upon the thing to be done being exactly ascertained. Section 1657, Civ. Code. Nothing to the contrary appearing; it will be presumed that the law of Massachusetts, where the contract was made is the same as that declared in the section of the Code referred to. The amount of this claim, then, was a provable debt at the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy. While plaintiff was not a party to the composition, nevertheless, with full knowledge of such composition, he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court when he proved and presented his claim against the estate, and most certainly should he be bound by the composition when he accepts its terms and receives his per cent. under the terms of the stipulation referred to.

We are of opinion that the statement of facts discloses that defendant had and possessed no interest whatever in the draft or its proceeds, and that plaintiff, by becoming a party to the bankruptcy proceedings, is concluded by the composition and his receipt of the amount thereof under an agreement that the same settled all claims against the company.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to render judgment in favor of defendant, and against plaintiff for costs.

Supreme Court Nov. 4, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 259*)—FENCES—FAILURE TO MAINTAIN—INJURY TO STOCK—LIABILITY OF LESSEE ROAD.

Under Civ. Code, § 485, requiring railroads to maintain fences beside their tracks, and making them liable for injuries to stock through failure so to do, a lessee of a road in control thereof and operating trains over the same is within the statute.

2. RAILROADS (§ 103*)—OPERATION—"FENCES"—DUTY TO MAINTAIN—GATES.

Under Civ. Code, § 485, requiring railroads to maintain fences beside their tracks, a gate is a part of the fence, and the road is under the same duty to erect gates in the first instance and keep them in repair when erected as it is regarding any other part of the fence.

3. RAILROADS (§ 443*)—OPERATION—FENCES—INJURY TO ANIMALS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Under Civ. Code, § 485, requiring railroads to maintain sufficient fences, and making them liable for injuries to animals through failure so to do, evidence in an action for injuries to mules that defendant railroad's gate was out of repair, that defendant had notice thereof, that the needed repairs were not made until after the accident, and that the mules escaped through the defective gate without plaintiff's fault, made out a prima facie case of negligence against defendant.

4. RAILROADS (§ 413*)—OPERATION—FENCES—GATES—DUTY OF RAILROAD TO KEEP GATE CLOSED—CARE REQUIRED.

Under said section, a railroad erecting and maintaining a good and sufficient gate is required to exercise only reasonable diligence in keeping the gate closed.

5. RAILROADS (§ 441*)—FENCES—DEFECTIVE FENCE—INJURIES TO ANIMALS—ACTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action under said section for injuries to plaintiff's mules, where it appeared that defendant railroad knew that a gate was defective and had sufficient time to repair it, defendant had the burden of showing that the mules escaped without its fault; plaintiff not being required to explain how the gate came to be open.

7. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a railroad for injury to plaintiff's mules escaping through a defective gate in a fence, where the court instructed the jury not to consider any testimony as to negligence except as to the gate and its condition, and that the only cause of action was for damages through defendant's failure to maintain a sufficient fence, an instruction that a nonsuit had been granted as to the second cause of action alleging carelessness in operating the cars, and that the sole point to be considered was whether defendant had maintained a sufficient fence, was properly refused.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 867*)—ORDER DENYING NEW TRIAL—MATTERS REVIEWABLE.

The action of the court in improperly granting or refusing a nonsuit is an error of law whether made on the opening statement of counsel or after the close of the evidence, and may be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by E. E. Johnson against the Southern Pacific Company. From an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Tuttle & Tuttle, for appellant. F. A. Duryea, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for damages for injury to certain mules by defendant's cars. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had the verdict on which judgment was entered for $796. Defendant appeals from the order denying its motion for a new trial. The pleadings are verified.

The complaint alleges the corporate capacity of defendant, and "that during all the times herein mentioned the said defendant corporation was in the possession, control, and operation of that certain railroad located and extending from the town of Roseville, county of Placer, state of California, northerly through the western part of said county and beyond, to and through the state of Oregon, and known as the 'California Central Railroad,' and during all of said times the said defendant was engaged in the operation of its engines and cars over and along the said railroad." These averments are not denied. It is further alleged that plaintiff was at all said times "in the possession and occupancy as tenant of that certain farm" (describing it) "and through and over which said farm the said 'California Central Railroad' extended during all the times herein mentioned; that during all of the times herein mentioned it was the duty of said defendant corporation to maintain a good and sufficient fence on either or both sides of the said railroad where the same extended through and over the said farm as aforesaid." It is then alleged that plaintiff was on February 11, 1905, the owner of certain four work mules of the value of $1,000, which were then "upon pasture on the said farm" and that on said day "said defendant, disregarding its duty in that behalf, failed, refused, and neglected to maintain a good and sufficient fence on that side of said railroad on said farm on which the said four mules were at pasture as aforesaid; and by reason of such failure, refusal, and neglect of said defendant to maintain such good and sufficient fence, as aforesaid, and without fault or neglect upon the part of plaintiff, the plaintiff's said four mules on or about said 11th day of February, 1905, escaped from the said premises and strayed upon the track and ground of the said railroad, and the engine and cars of the said defendant, while being then and there operated and run over and along the said railroad by the agents, servants, and employes of said defendant, then and there ran over, against, and upon said four mules, so that two of said mules were then and there killed and destroyed and the other two of said mules were then and there so maimed and crippled that they were from thence and now are almost wholly unfit for use." It is further alleged that plaintiff expended the sum of $21 for medicines and the services of a veterinary surgeon in the care and treatment of said last-named mules. There is a second count in the complaint alleging that the injuries complained of resulted from the negligent and careless management of defendant's cars. A motion for a nonsuit was granted as to this count.

There was evidence that at the times mentioned in the complaint plaintiff was lessee and in the occupancy of land bordering on the right of way and track of the California Central Railroad near the town of Lincoln, Placer county, and that the defendant was at all said times engaged in operating its engines and cars over and along the said railroad. On the evening of February 10, 1905, plaintiff turned out to pasture on said land certain mules, and that during that night four of these mules strayed upon said railroad track, were run down by defendant's engine and cars while on said track, and two were killed and two badly crippled; that these mules escaped through a gate leading from plaintiff's pasture to and across said track to the public highway on the opposite side of said track; that this gate was one, but not the only, means by which plaintiff could reach the highway and was so used by plaintiff. It was what is called a slide gate, not on hinges, and constituted part of the fence built by the railroad company in fencing its track and was placed there for the convenience of the landowner. It was fastened at the end where it was opened by slipping some inches between two upright posts intended to receive it, and to open it the gate was pushed back sidewise and swung around the requisite distance to permit passage through it. The plaintiff testified: "The top board of the gate was broken and one of the rear posts in the back of it was broken off in the top of the ground where the gate swung on, and the top board of the gate itself was about 14 or 15 inches, where nailed on, broken, and it would not shove in between the boards more than a couple of inches. Where it was closed, it would not go in more than a couple of inches. When the gate was open, it would have a tendency to sag in the middle towards the track. The two posts on which the gate was adjusted were so close together on account of this sagging that it could not be shoved between them." He was asked if he had previously called the attention of the company or any of its agents or employés to the condition of the gate, and answered: "I asked the foreman about a month before for a new gate in place of the one that was there. I told him the gate was in a bad condition, and I wanted a new gate in place of it. I think I mentioned it to him several times before the mules were killed. Two or three days after the mules were killed, I noticed there were two ties lying this side of the gate. I supposed they were posts for the rear end of the gate." The day before the accident plaintiff passed through the gate with a team and left it closed; i. e., he pushed the gate between the posts a couple of inches as far as it would go. He did not see the gate again until the next morning, when he found it closed, and was told by the foreman of the section that a couple of mules had been killed, which proved to be plaintiff's. He observed by the tracks, as others did, that the mules escaped through this gate. Witness Kirkham testified for defendant that he was in the employ of the defendant at the time. He testified: "My position was section foreman. My duties were to keep up the tracks, repair fences, and see that everything was kept in shape. * * * The duties of a section foreman are to repair the track, keep the fences in shape, and repair the gates when in bad order." He also testified that the morning after the night when the mules were killed he found the gate "wide open" and closed it. He also testified that he repaired the broken board on top of the gate "about four days before the accident," and that "the gate would slide in between the posts five or six inches." Witness Raner for defendant testified: "I was employed by the Southern Pacific in February, 1905, as trackwalker. My duties were to take care of all switch lines and watch for lost bolts, broken rails, and fences when down. I had to see that gates were closed when not in use. I had occasion to go by the Hemphill ranch (the land in question) every day. I remember the killing of the mules. I walked by the scene of the accident the day before the mules were killed about 11 o'clock in the forenoon. The gate was closed then." He testified further: "I know that repairs were made upon the gate shortly before the accident. These repairs consisted of fastening the top board and latching the gate on the post where the gate goes into it. I was present when it was done by the section foreman, Kirkham. * * * Mr. Kirkham put in new posts and straightened them so that the gate could go in between them." Kirkham in his testimony said nothing about putting in new posts. Plaintiff's witnesses testified that the gate was not repaired before the accident, and the jury must have found that Kirkham and Raner were mistaken in this part of their testimony. There was no direct testimony as to how the gate came to be open. The evidence left no doubt that the mules escaped from the pasture through this gate. There was evidence tending to show that the gate might have been opened by the mules or other animals rubbing or pushing against it. Plaintiff testified (referring to the two posts between which the gate was held when closed): "Those two posts were sloughed around out of their natural and proper position so that they faced out. They were not parallel with the gate. The gate was about 15 feet long. If any mules or stock rubbed against the gate, it would have a tendency to move it from the posts, and the springing of the gate would move it out between the two posts." And this witness testified that an animal could easily rub the gate out where it was fastened between the posts on account of not admitting in far enough to hold itself. Plaintiff also testified: "There were four boards to the gate. With the top board off the gate was still sufficient to turn stock when the gate was properly closed. My complaint was that there were these two posts between which the gates slid that were so tightly closed that it was difficult to slide the gate in and fasten the gate. * * * With the gate in that condition so that the boards would slide between the posts a couple of inches, it was sufficient to hold the gate in place. It would have to be moved back before it would swing one way or the other at least a couple of inches to be free from the posts."

Appellant contends that this admission of plaintiff should defeat his claim; that, if the gate was sufficient to turn stock notwithstanding the top board was broken, and, if with the gate closed, as plaintiff testified he closed it, the gate would turn stock, defendant should not be held liable, it being conceded that the mules escaped through the open gate. We do not understand plaintiff's testimony to be that the gate was sufficient to turn stock. What the jury inferred and might properly have inferred from his testimony that so long as the gate kept its position when closed it would turn stock. His complaint was that it could not be securely fastened because of the condition of the posts; that it had so slight a hold that the rubbing of animals against it would cause it to open. The statute law on the subject is found in section 485 of the Civil Code, and provides as follows: "Railroad corporations must make and maintain a good and sufficient fence on either or both sides of their track and property. In case they do not make and maintain such fence, if their engines or cars shall kill or maim any cattle or other domestic animals upon their line of road which passes through or along the property of the owners thereof, they must pay to the owner of such cattle or other domestic animals a fair market price for the same, unless it occurred through the neglect or fault of the owner of the animal so killed or maimed."

Defendant makes the following points: (1) There is no evidence that defendant was the owner of the road; citing Fontaine v. S. P. R. R. Co., 54 Cal. 645. (2) The gate was used for plaintiff's convenience alone, and was a private gate into his own lands and no duty devolved on defendant to maintain the same. (3) The evidence does not show that defendant failed to maintain a good and sufficient fence. Some alleged errors of law are also pointed out.

In Fontaine v. S. P. R. R. Co., supra, the question was whether the company which built and owned the road was liable for injuries to stock committed by the lessee of said company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The court held that the owning company was liable, but it did not hold that the lessee was not also liable. Indeed, the cases cited in the opinion hold that both were liable. Mr. Thompson cites several cases holding that the liability extends to the lessee of a railroad. 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 2049. We think the fact being admitted that defendant was in the possession, control, and operation of the railroad—i. e., lessee of the road—and was operating trains and running engines over the track when the animals were killed, the defendant is brought within the statute. It requires no wider interpretation to so hold than that the right of action accrues not only to the owner of the land but also to his lessee, as was held in Walther v. Sierra Ry. Co., 141 Cal. 288, 74 Pac. 840. The gate was part of the fence, and the statute applies to all parts of the fence. The railroad company is under the same duty to erect gates in the first instance and keep them in repair when once erected, as it is in regard to any other part of the fence. 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 2058, and numerous cases there cited. It was proven that the gate was out of repair, and was not "good and sufficient" for the purpose, and that defendant had notice of the fact; and there was evidence that the needed repairs were not made until after the accident. As it was the duty of defendant not only to "make" but to "maintain a good and sufficient fence," and as the injured mules escaped through the defective part of the fence, without fault of the plaintiff, these facts unexplained make a prima facie case of negligence against the defendant. McCoy v. California Pac. R. Co., 40 Cal. 532, 6 Am. Rep. 623. In the case cited it was held that the railroad company operated its road at its peril when left unfenced, and that the adjoining landowner could recover for live stock injured by defendant's cars, although he turned the stock out knowing that the track was not fenced. Had the defendant erected and maintained a good and sufficient gate, it would have been required only to exercise reasonable diligence in keeping the gate closed. Mr. Thompson says: "As these gates and bars are part of the statutory fence, the duty of the railroad company to keep its fence in repair requires it to use due diligence to keep them closed. Reasonable care, however, is all that is required. It is not bound to keep a special patrol sufficient to discover immediately when gates are open. It cannot be charged with negligence until it has had reasonable time to make the discovery, or has failed to take proper action after notification." 2 Thompson on Negligence, § 2059, and cases there cited.

Plaintiff was not called upon to explain how the gate came to be open. Being known by defendant to be defective and sufficient time given it to make the necessary repairs, the burden was upon defendant to show that the mules escaped through no fault of it. There was evidence that in its then defective condition the gate might have been opened by the mules themselves. But this would not excuse defendant from liability. It is strongly urged that the gate could not have been opened by the mules wide enough to account for the tracks to appear the full width, and that the only reasonable explanation is that some person must have opened the gate wide and left it open. Only one witness, Raner for defendant, stated that the tracks showed the full width of the gate, and his testimony on the point was inherently improbable. He testified that he noticed the tracks as he rode along the track on a hand car, 50 feet distant, the next morning after the mules escaped. The other witnesses testified to seeing the tracks, but did not locate them with reference to the space in the opening. At most, it may be said that there is no satisfactory explanation as to how the gate came to be open, and, as it was shown not to have been "good and sufficient," defendant has failed to excuse its negligence.

Defendant requested an instruction informing the jury that a nonsuit had been granted as to the second cause of action alleging carelessness in operating the cars and directing the jury that the sole point they were to consider was "whether defendant has or has not maintained a good and sufficient fence along its right of way." The court gave in lieu thereof the following instruction: "You are not to consider any testimony as to carelessness or negligence except as relates to the gate and its condition." It is contended that the defendant was deprived of a substantial right to its prejudice because the jury were not specifically told that a nonsuit had been granted as to the second cause of action. So far as appears, the motion was made and the ruling of the court announced in the presence and hearing of the jury. The court elsewhere told the jury, at the request of defendant, that "the complaint of plaintiff contains but one cause of action," and explained that the action was brought to recover damages "caused by the failure of defendant to maintain a good and sufficient fence along its right of way across the Quinn Ranch." We cannot see that the jury was left in any doubt of the real issue, or that the instruction complained of "only served to befuddle the jury."

A question was asked of plaintiff's witness whether the track foreman made any statement about the gate. The witness answered that he made no statement. Obviously defendant was not injured by the answer.

The points that a nonsuit should have been granted to both causes of action and that the general demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained rest mainly upon considerations already disposed of. It was not necessary to allege that defendant is the owner of the railroad. The averments of the complaint were sufficient to charge the defendant with liability.

Respondent makes the point that the order denying the motion for a nonsuit cannot be reviewed where there is no appeal from the judgment; citing Merced Bank v. Ivett (Cal. App.) 98 Pac. 383. The syllabus of the case so states. The opinion stated that the order denying the motion for a nonsuit "was made upon the sole ground of the insufficiency of the complaint. But the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be inquired into. Cases, supra. For like reasons we cannot consider the demurrer, as that goes to the sufficiency of the complaint." The syllabus is not borne out by the text, which latter, it must be confessed, is not quite clear as to what was intended to be held. In Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 80 Pac. 234, the court said: "The action of the court in improperly granting or refusing a nonsuit is also an error of law, whether made upon the opening statement of counsel or after the close of the evidence in the case," and may be reviewed on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LELANDE, City Clerk. (Civ. 698.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 10, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 4, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 266*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—STATUTES—REPEAL.

Sidewalk Act March 6, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 179, c. 115) § 20, expressly declares that it is to be deemed a repeal of the Vrooman act (approved March 18, 1885 [St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153]), and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, so far as the same relate to sidewalks and the construction thereof, and to assessments to be made and the enforcement of payments for the construction of such sidewalks; but, as to all other street improvements, it is declared that the Vrooman act shall not be deemed repealed or affected by the act, which contains a new scheme for constructing sidewalks and assessing the entire cost thereof on the frontage on the side of the street on which the sidewalk is laid. Section 6 (page 171) declares the construction of sidewalks to be of peculiar and special benefit to the property fronting on it, and not to any other property, and the expense of the portion of the work at a street intersection is required to be paid out of the city treasury. Section 19 provides that the act may, at the election of the council, be used in the construction of curbing also. Held that, such sidewalk act repeals the Vrooman act as to the construction of sidewalks, and does not merely provide an alternative method for constructing the same.

2. STATUTES (§ 170*) — REPEAL — RE-ENACTMENT.

The Vrooman act having been repealed by the sidewalk act, the re-enactment of section 2 of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) on April 21, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 1017, c. 676), with the word "sidewalks" therein did not render the act again operative as to sidewalks, the subject of sidewalks not being in any way germane to the purpose of the amendment, which purpose was to strike from the section the clause relating to change of grade, which had been elsewhere provided for, and the restating of the entire section, including such word, being merely in compliance with Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring the amended section to be re-enacted and published at length as amended, and the failure to eliminate the word "sidewalks" might be attributed to inadvertence on the part of the judiciary committee to which the amendment was referred.

3. STATUTES (§ 159*) — REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

The rule that the repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a holding that the later in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so, has peculiar force in cases of laws of special application, which are never deemed repealed by general legislation, except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect.

4. STATUTES (§ 158*)—REPEAL BY INADVERTENCE.

The theory of repeal by inadvertence is not to be considered if, by the application of any rule of construction, another result may be arrived at.

5. STATUTES (§ 230*)—CONSTRUCTION—AMENDATORY AND AMENDED ACTS.

An unconstitutional amendatory act cannot be considered as affecting for purposes of construction the law as it stood prior to the enactment of such act.

Petition by the City of Los Angeles for writ of mandate against Harry J. Lelande, as City Clerk of the City of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty., and Edward R. Young, Deputy City Atty., for petitioner. Arthur M. Ellis, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of mandate. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel respondent, as city clerk of the petitioning city, to certify to the passage of an ordinance, by the common council of that city, ordering certain street work (which includes the construction of sidewalks) under Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153). Respondent bases his refusal to do this upon the contention that the Vrooman act, in so far as it was applicable to the construction of sidewalks, was repealed by the sidewalk act, which was approved March 6, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 167, c. 115), and took effect before the date of the passage of the ordinance, to wit, May 11, 1909. Petitioner in response to this contends: (1) That the sidewalk act provides an alternative procedure only; (2) that if it be conceded that it was intended to repeal the Vrooman act with respect to sidewalks, nevertheless, by reason of the re-enactment of section 2 of the Vrooman act on April 21, 1909, which act took effect immediately, with the word "sidewalks" therein, this act again became operative as to sidewalks (St. 1909, p. 1017, c. 676); and (3) that by amending the Vrooman act on March 18, 1909, by adding a new section thereto, numbered 56 (St. 1909, p. 399, c. 261), relating to bids for doing work on sidewalks and curbing, the Legislature evidenced its intent that sidewalks should still be constructed under the Vrooman act. Some question is also suggested as to the propriety of the remedy by mandamus; but, as we read the brief, this is based upon the right of the court to issue a writ in this particular case rather than upon any question as to this being the proper procedure if a case has been made.

The sidewalk act (section 20) expressly declares that it is to be deemed as a repeal of the Vrooman act, "and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplemental there- to so far as said act and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto relate to sidewalks and the construction thereof, and to the assessments to be made and the enforcement of payments for the expense of the construction of such sidewalks," but as to all other street work and improvements it is declared that the Vrooman act "shall not be deemed as repealed, amended, or affected by this act." It contains a new and complete scheme for constructing sidewalks, and assessing the entire cost thereof on the frontage on the same side of the street that the sidewalk is laid; the Legislature apparently intending thereby to relieve the property owner on the opposite side of the street from the burden imposed upon him under the Vrooman act as construed in Millsap v. Balfour, 154 Cal. 303, 97 Pac. 668. The construction of sidewalks authorized by the act is declared to be of peculiar and special benefit to the property fronting on it, and not to any other property (section 6), indicating an intention to relieve from the district assessment plan under which the ordinance before us was framed. The expense of the portion of the work constructed upon an intersection or crossing of the street is required to be paid out of the city treasury. These and other provisions of the act, considered in connection with the completeness of the scheme established, are sufficient to justify the inference that it was intended to repeal the Vrooman act in respect to the construction of sidewalks, independent of the express repealing clause above referred to, not so much by implication as by the creation of a substitute method inconsistent with the Vrooman act. Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372; Alameda Co. v. Dalton, 148 Cal. 246, 251, 82 Pac. 1050. But as said in Santa Cruz Rock Co. v. Lyons, 133 Cal. 117, 65 Pac. 329, as to the Mack-Jastro Case, this is not a case in which the question of repeal by implication is involved, but a question of enforcing the will of the Legislature last expressed on the very same subject.

The view expressed by one of the members of this court at the oral presentation of this cause, that the sidewalk act should, if possible, be considered as an alternative method for constructing sidewalks, is fully met by the application of the rule "expressio unius," etc., to section 19 of the act. By this section the Legislature expressly provides that the act may at the election of the council be used in the construction of curbing also. The absence of any such provision as to sidewalks clearly indicates that a distinction is drawn in this respect between the construction of curbing and the construction of sidewalks. We do not think the other acts mentioned operate to repeal the sidewalk act, or to restore to the list of improvements authorized to be made under the Vrooman act the street work which is included in the term "construction of sidewalks." The application of the rule that repeals by implication are not favored, invoked by the petitioner with respect to the sidewalk act, makes the more strongly against its position here, in that it relies upon the repeal of a special act by the amendment of a general one. As said by Judge Cooley: "The repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the later in time repeals the other when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in case of laws of special application, which are never to be deemed repealed by general legislation, except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect." Const. Lims. (7th Ed.) 216. Clearly in this connection it is proper to consider the Vrooman act as a general law relating to street work, and the sidewalk act as a special act providing a special method of construction for only such particular street work as is connected with sidewalks.

This principle was applied by the Supreme Court in People v. Pacific Imp. Co., 130 Cal. 442, 62 Pac. 739. While the facts of that case were such that it may be said the rule adopted supported the position here taken only so far as the question of the repeal of the sidewalk act is to be considered, yet the reasoning upon which the decision was based also sustains our view that the amendment of section 2 by the act of April 21st did not operate to restore sidewalk construction to the improvements authorized to be made under the Vrooman act. Here, as in the case cited, it is apparent that in so far as the amendment to the general law is concerned, the fact that it in any manner mentions the subject-matter of the special act is due to a matter of copying. In the case at bar this may be attributed either to inadvertence or to an oversight on the part of the judiciary committee to which the amendment was referred, who failed to eliminate the word "sidewalks" from the section, and thus make it conform to the other legislation on the same subject at the same session of the Legislature. The evident and apparently sole purpose of the amendment was to strike from the section the clause relating to change of grades which had been elsewhere and otherwise provided for. Compliance with the constitutional mandate that the amended section must be re-enacted and published at length as amended (Const. art. 4, § 24) made it necessary to restate the entire section, leaving out only the part relating to the change of grade; and, as the repeal of the Vrooman act in relation to sidewalks was of such a character that the phraseology of the act remained unchanged, it would be a strained construction of the section to say that by copying the section as it stood the Legislature intended to restore sidewalks to the operation of the act merely because this word was not stricken out. The subject of sidewalks was not in any way germane to the purpose of the amendment.

Certainly the theory of repeal by inadvertence is not to be considered if, by the application of any rule of construction, another result may be arrived at. We think the intent with which the act of April 21st was passed is too apparent to require such a construction. The rule declared by section 325 of the Political Code that, where a section or part of one is re-enacted for the purpose of amending it, the unamended part is deemed not to have been changed, but to retain the status it occupied prior to the amendment, also makes for the same interpretation.

We do not lay much stress upon the act of March 18th adding a new section to the Vrooman act. It appears to be conceded that the act is unconstitutional; and, that being so, it cannot be considered as affecting the law as it stood prior to its enactment (Ex parte Sohncke, 148 Cal. 262, 82 Pac. 956, 2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 813, 113 Am. St. Rep. 236; 1 Sutherland, Stat. Cons. [2d Ed.] p. 458), but petitioner contends, nevertheless, that it indicates that at the time of its passage and adoption the Legislature still thought the Vrooman act included the construction of sidewalks in its provisions. Treated as evidence of this, it is not entitled to much weight. If constitutional, its enactment would not be entirely idle, as it may be applied to the matter of curbing, which it includes, as well as sidewalks.

We are of opinion that respondent was justified in refusing to certify the ordinance, and therefore, the writ is denied.

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 138*)—UNDERTAKING— WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

The filing of an undertaking by a surety corporation on the day fixed for the justification of the sureties on the original undertaking to procure a writ of attachment is the offering a new surety, whom defendant may examine as to its sufficiency; and, in the absence of a showing that the representative of the corporation was not present in court, or that defendant questioned the sufficiency of the surety, or was denied the right to examine the surety, there was a waiver on the part of the defendant of other than the prima facie justification made by presenting and filing an undertaking duly executed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Charles La Dow against the National Building & Paving Brick Company. From an order denying a motion to vacate and set aside a writ of attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Woodruff & McClure, for appellant. Walter, Pratt & Ball and Stephen L. Sullivan, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from an order of court denying its motion to vacate and set aside a writ of attachment. Prior to the issuance of the writ plaintiff filed with the clerk an undertaking in due form, as required by the provisions of section 539, Code Civ. Proc. Within the time provided therefor defendant excepted to the sufficiency of the sureties upon the undertaking, notice of which was duly served upon plaintiff. At the time fixed for the justification of the sureties only one of them appeared and justified. The further hearing was thereupon continued to a subsequent day, when, the other surety not appearing, plaintiff presented and offered to file an undertaking executed by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Defendant did not question the sufficiency of said Guaranty Company as a surety, but objected to the filing of the undertaking upon the sole ground that it was contrary to law, and that defendant would not be able to collect thereon for costs and damages sustained prior to the date of filing the same, which objection the court overruled. The new undertaking was thereupon received and filed. Thereafter defendant moved the court to vacate and discharge the writ of attachment, upon the ground that at the time and place fixed for the justification of the sureties neither the sureties upon the undertaking nor others appeared and justified thereon. The undertaking is not incorporated in the record, and, in the absence of a contrary showing, it must be presumed that it was in due form, and in the execution thereof and conditions of its terms fully complied with the requirements prescribed by law. Harris v. Frank, 81 Cal. 289, 22 Pac. 856; Ohleyer v. Bunce, 65 Cal. 544, 4 Pac. 549.

The presentation of the undertaking so executed by the Guaranty Company (a corporation) was, in effect, offering a new surety, as to whom defendant was entitled to examine with regard to its sufficiency. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 97 Cal. 353, 32 Pac. 446; State v. District Court, 58 Minn. 352, 59 N. W. 1055. There is nothing in the record disclosing that the agent and representative of such corporation surety was not at the time present in court; nor is there anything showing that defendant questioned the sufficiency of said surety, or that defendant was denied the right to examine said surety as to its sufficiency. The facts of the case clearly show a waiver on the part of defendant of other than the prima facie justification made by presenting and filing an undertaking duly executed. Bank of Escondido v. Superior Court of San Diego, 106 Cal. 43, 39 Pac. 211; Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 53.

from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Louis P. Boardman, for appellant. Edwin T. McMurray, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendant from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The action was to recover the reasonable value of services rendered to him by plaintiff as a bookkeeper and saleswoman. The findings of the court are as follows: "(1) That on the 11th day of December, 1906, said plaintiff entered defendant's service at his request, and continued in said service at his request until the 11th day of June, 1907; that during said time plaintiff performed various duties for defendant at his request, and rendered service to defendant in and about his business, in the city and county of San Francisco, as bookkeeper, saleslady, and general clerk; that said plaintiff was engaged in the service of defendant as aforesaid for six months, to wit, from the 11th day of December, 1906, to the 11th day of June, 1907; that during said period plaintiff devoted eight or nine hours a day to defendant's service, and occupied a position of confidence and responsibility; (2) that no definite agreement was had between said parties as to the compensation which plaintiff was to receive for her said service, and no agreement was had between said parties that said service was to be rendered gratuitously; (3) that the reasonable value of the said services rendered by plaintiff as aforesaid for the said six months is the sum of $322.50, or the sum of $53.75 per month." Upon these findings the court rendered judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $300 and costs (there being an offset amounting to the balance of $22.50). The appellant makes two points: (1) That his motion for a nonsuit should have been granted; and (2) that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision of the court.

The plaintiff testified that at the request of the defendant she performed services for him as clerk, bookkeeper, and saleswoman in his store for some six months, and goes at some length into detail as to those services. She testified that there was no understanding between them as to the amount of her compensation, but that she had previously worked for the defendant in a similar capacity, and thought that he would pay her what was right; that she had during her employment spoken to the defendant about her pay, and had been put off by him because he was short of money, but that he promised to pay her later. She also gave testimony as to the value of her services. In view of this testimony we think the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

On the second point, viz., that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision of the court, appellant's principal argument is directed to the fact that the only evidence of the value of the services of plaintiff is her own testimony that she considered her services were well worth $15 a week, and objects that upon this evidence the court found that her services were worth the sum of $53.75 per month. There is no reason why the plaintiff should not give testimony as to the value of her services; and, if defendant was dissatisfied therewith, he could have introduced testimony upon the same point, but he neglected to do so, and the plaintiff's evidence stands uncontradicted. It is easy to calculate the value of a month's service when a weekly rate is given; and, if the court found a less amount than would have been warranted by the uncontradicted testimony, the appellant was not injured thereby, and cannot complain of the finding.

On the same point—the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court—the appellant calls attention to some evidence that the plaintiff was, during the period covered by the services forming the basis of this action, employed by a corporation (of which the defendant was president) in another and different capacity, and argues that the two employments were incompatible, and rendered unlikely the one now under consideration. But the evidence discloses that the services rendered under this additional employment were performed principally during the evening, and did not unduly interfere with her duties under her employment by the defendant.

Upon a careful reading of the record we think the findings are amply supported by the evidence, and that the motion for a new trial was properly denied.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

A. L. Frick, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed upon a girl 11 years of age. Upon his trial the jury found him guilty of assault with intent to commit rape. From the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, he has appealed. But two points are urged as grounds for reversal.

1. The court permitted the district attorney, over the objection of defendant, to re-examine the prosecutrix upon matters about which she had been examined in chief. Whether or not the court should permit such a re-examination is largely a matter of discretion, and the action of the court in so doing will not be disturbed, unless a clear case of abuse of discretion is shown. Rea v. Wood, 105 Cal. 314, 38 Pac. 899; People v. McNamara, 94 Cal. 509, 29 Pac. 953. In the case at bar no such abuse of discretion is shown. On the contrary, the record, in our judgment, discloses a very proper case for the exercise of such discretion. Upon her direct examination the girl had testified that defendant had inserted his private parts in her private parts, but on cross-examination had made statements inconsistent therewith. Her testimony was thus left in a very unsatisfactory condition upon this point. The re-examination was directed to this matter, and seems to have been very fairly conducted by the district attorney, who concluded by calling her attention to the inconsistent answers she had made to defendant's attorney and asking for an explanation. The verdict returned shows that the jury disregarded her statement that defendant penetrated her private parts.

2. It is next urged that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. Upon this point the counsel for defendant has reviewed the testimony of the girl, and pointed out what he claims to be inconsistencies therein, as well as contradictions between her testimony and that of other witnesses, who gave testimony as to what occurred between defendant and the girl upon the occasion in question. Doubtless a similar argument was made to the jury, whose province it was to determine the facts, and especially to determine the intent with which defendant committed the acts that the evidence amply proves that he did commit. We find in the record ample evidence tending to show that defendant was guilty of bestial conduct with the girl. The only plausible contention that can be made is that he did not intend to go so far as to actually have sexual intercourse with her, and attempted so to do. But this question was submitted to the jury under fair and full instructions upon these points, and the question was primarily for them to determine. We cannot interfere with their verdict, if it can be fairly said to find support in the evidence. As was said in a very similar case (People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 Pac. 842): "We do not think the crime charged against this defendant, and of which he was convicted, is of such a nature that we should attempt to shield him upon imaginary reasons, or upon a theory that might possibly account for his acts as being done with the intent only to gratify an unnatural desire."

We have not attempted to set forth or discuss in detail the evidence in this case. No good purpose will be subserved by so doing. It is sufficient to say that the evidence to support the verdict that was returned is quite as strong as was the evidence in the following well-considered cases: People v. Johnson, supra; People v. Kuches, 120 Cal. 566, 52 Pac. 1002; and People v. Logan, 123 Cal. 415, 56 Pac. 56—in each of which cases a verdict of guilty was sustained. The record does not present a case of a verdict depending only upon the uncorroborated and improbable testimony of the prosecutrix, and for that reason does not come within the rule laid down in the cases cited by appellant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SHAW, J. This purports to be an appeal from an order made by the superior court of Orange county dismissing an appeal had and taken to that court from the justice's court of Huntington Beach township. The action as brought in the justice's court appears to have been for the recovery of certain personal property of the alleged value of $144, and damages claimed for the detention thereof in the sum of $155.99.

The appeal must be dismissed upon several grounds: First. There is no authentication of the record by bill of exceptions or otherwise, in the absence of which the documents and papers printed in the transcript constitute no record which can be reviewed by this court. Second. The appeal is ineffectual by reason of the fact that neither the undertaking on appeal nor deposit prescribed by section 941, Code Civ. The appeal is dismissed without the imposition of penalty.

Where plaintiff, without objecting to an answer insufficient to raise an issue, offered evidence to support the sufficient allegations of the complaint, but failed to prove his case, defendant, who offered no evidence contradicting the allegations of the complaint, could not complain of the judgment for plaintiff, since, under Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Ella E. Blodgett against S. E. Scott. From an order denying a new trial after judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. O. Bordner, for appellant. George H. P. Shaw, J. M. Eshleman, Shaw & Brewer, and Eshleman & Swing, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was sought to be maintained under the forcible detainer act. Code Civ. Proc. § 1160. The complaint alleges plaintiff's possession, and right of possession, of and to a certain 80-acre tract of land on the date stated, and for a long time prior thereto, entry without right thereon by defendant, and the subsequent withholding of possession from plaintiff, together with service of notice to vacate and surrender possession. The answer denied that plaintiff was in the lawful possession of the entire tract at the date stated, and denied the entry and withholding of possession without right. This answer was insufficient to raise an issue. Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 287. The plaintiff, however, without demurring, or in any other way raising the question of the insufficiency of the answer, proceeded to trial, and introduced evidence obviously intended to support the allegations of the complaint, both as to plaintiff's possession and the unlawful entry of defendant. This testimony was simply to the effect that on the land in dispute some one, in July of some year, had broken the brush from 50 acres of land, which was desert in its character; that the brush breaker was still upon the land when defendant entered; that there was no inclosure, and no marking of the boundaries, except that the corner stakes had been placed there by some one, upon which were the letters "E.E.B."; that defendant saw these stakes when he entered. Plaintiff did not connect herself with either the breaking of brush, ownership of break, or setting of stakes; nor was there any testimony offered tending to show that there had been any entry upon this desert land with the intention to improve the same under the desert land act. After a motion for nonsuit was denied, defendant introduced evidence tending to show that when he entered upon the land no one was personally upon the property, and that new growth had at that time partially destroyed evidences of brush breaking. This is said to have constituted the evidence offered in the case, and at the close of the testimony defendant was given leave to file an answer to correspond to the proof, but this answer when filed raised no issue. The court thereupon found that plaintiff had, for more than five days before the date stated in the complaint, been in the actual possession of the premises, and was in such actual and peaceable possession when defendant entered; that defendant's entry was without right, and judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor. This appeal is from an order denying a new trial.

The affidavit relating to irregularities occurring at the trial cannot be considered; the same not being incorporated in a bill of exceptions. Higgins v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 5 Cal. App. 749, 91 Pac. 344, and cases cited.

Respondent does not contend that the findings have support in the evidence alone, but contends that, there being no issues presented by answer, no findings were necessary, and that, no appeal having been taken from the judgment, the specifications of error in relation to the insufficiency of the findings cannot be the basis for a reversal of the judgment. In passing upon the motion for a new trial the court properly considered the admissions which follow a failure to deny the material allegations of the complaint. Section 462, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true." The complaint in its averments is as complete as was the one under consideration in Leroux v. Murdock, 51 Cal. 541, which is there held to be sufficient. The material allegations of the complaint not being denied, plaintiff was entitled to a judgment upon the pleadings. A judgment so sustainable will not be reversed because of insufficiency of evidence introduced upon the trial. The doctrine of equitable estoppel, made to apply in certain cases where parties proceed to trial in the absence of particular issues, should have no application in the case under consideration, for it does not appear by the record that defendant, even upon the assumption that an issue was properly made, introduced any evidence tending to contradict the allegations of the complaint, or to justify his acts in taking possession. Were it to be assumed that he was misled by the failure to object to the sufficiency of the answer in any wise, there is nothing indicating that such omission injuriously affected his interests.

The order denying a new trial is therefore affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; TAGGART, J.

ceding that the improper refusal of a nonsuit may be considered upon such an appeal as an error of law occurring during the course of the trial, the grounds stated in the record on said motion are not those presented by the brief of appellant's counsel. (Civ. 643.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.

1. SALES (§ 442*)—WARRANTY OF QUALITY—BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Defendant purchased certain oakum from plaintiff under a warranty of quality, and sold it. In an action for the price, the court found that the value of the oakum delivered was $1,302.57, and that its value, if it had complied with the warranty at the time of delivery, would have been $1,449.43. Held that, the court not having found that defendant suffered any additional loss by reason of the breach, the amount defendant was entitled to recoup from the price was the difference between the value of the oakum as it was and the value as it would have been if it had complied with the warranty as expressly provided by Civ. Code, § 3313.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Tibbals Oakum Company against Fayette M. Meigs. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Boyer, for appellant. T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to recover from defendant the balance due for 520 bales of oakum, sold and delivered by the plaintiff to defendant at his request. The case was tried before the court, and findings filed, on which judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for $632.55, with costs. This appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions.

It is claimed that the judgment is not the legal conclusion from the facts found. The defendant pleaded by way of defense that there was a warranty made by the plaintiff as to the quality of the oakum, and that by reason of a breach of said warranty he suffered loss in net profits on the sale of the oakum and other damages in the sum of $574.08, and he asks that this sum be allowed and deducted from the amount that might be found due the plaintiff. The court found that the sale was made with a warranty, and further found as follows: "(6) That all said oakum, sold and delivered as aforesaid, was in bad condition at the time of sale, due to the poor workmanship exercised in its manufacture, and to the further fact that said oakum consisted of extremely short fibers, and could not be sold for the high price it would otherwise have sold for if the same had been of the grade and quality and in the condition warranted by plaintiff; that defendant sold said 520 bales of oakum delivered as aforesaid for, and received for the same, the sum of $1,332.57; that the value of said 520 bales of oakum was, at the time of the delivery thereof to defendant, at said city and county of San Francisco, said sum of $1,332.57; that the excess of the value which said 520 bales of oakum would have had at the time to which the warranty of plaintiff referred, if it had been complied with over their actual cash value at that time was, and is, the sum of $116.86. (7) That by reason of the poor grade and quality and the condition of said oakum defendant has suffered loss in net profits in the sale of said oakum, premiums, cartage, storage, and freight in the sum of $578.08, no part of which has been paid. (8) That, subsequent to the sale of said oakum by plaintiff to defendant as aforesaid, said defendant paid to plaintiff, on account of the purchase price of said oakum, the sum of $700, but refused to pay any additional sum because of the poor grade and quality and bad condition of said oakum."

The question for determination is as to the correct rule of damages in sales of personal property where the purchaser retains the property and it is inferior in quality to the warranty. The Civil Code provides (section 3313): "The detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the quality of personal property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time." This section lays down a simple plain rule, which eliminates all imaginary claims to damages in such cases. It is intended to do justice to both the seller and the buyer. In fact the Code only recites the rule as long established in England and since adopted in most of the leading cases in the United States. See Benjamin on Sales (5th Ed.) pp. 1017, 1024; 3 Sutherland on Damages, § 670; Hodgman v. S. L. & S. R. R. Co., 45 Ill. App. 395. In cases where the warranty refers to the time of delivery, as in this case, the first question to be determined is, What was the actual value of the property at that time? The court has found (and we cannot here question the finding) that the value was $1,332.57. The court also found that if the oakum had complied with the warranty, it would at the time of delivery have exceeded such value by the sum of $116.86. The latter sum is, by the section of the Code, fixed as the measure of defendant's damages. If the oakum had come up to the quality stipulated in the warranty, it would thus, according to the court's finding, have been of the value, at the time of delivery, of $1,449.43; but it was not of such value, but only of the value of $1,332.57. The plaintiff, although it shipped and delivered goods that did not comply with the warranty, was nevertheless, in case defendant kept the goods and thus affirmed the contract, entitled to the contract price, less the damages suffered by defendant when measured by the Code, caused by the failure of the plaintiff to comply with its contract. As the damages found to be $116.86, and the $700 paid, were deducted from the $1,449.43, we have the balance of $632.57, which is within two cents of the amount of the judgment. The law is just when it allows the party, who has delivered personal property of a different quality from that which it agreed to deliver, to recover the agreed price less the excess of value the property would have had at the time of delivery, if it had equaled the quality warranted over its actual value at that time. In the case at bar, if the oakum in its warranted condition would have been worth $500 more than its value in the condition in which it was delivered, the defendant would have been entitled to have that sum deducted from the price of the oakum.

The defendant contends that he suffered loss in net profits, premiums, cartage, and storage and freight, amounting to $578.08 (and the court so found), and that he is entitled to have such sum deducted from the value of the oakum delivered. We cannot consider the question under the findings in this record. The court has found the actual value of the oakum, and whether it found correctly or not is not now open to question. We must consider the findings with the view of supporting the judgment if possible, and reject all surplusage or trivial inconsistencies. There being no specification of insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding as to the value, and no evidence brought here, we cannot consider the question. It is consistent with the finding of the court to conclude that the defendant kept the oakum much longer than he should have done before selling it, and thus incurred the expense of storage, premiums, and cartage. The findings show that the defendant sold the oakum. They show and state that the value of the oakum at the time it was delivered to defendant was $1,332.57.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 487*) — PLEADING — TRIAL AMENDMENTS.

Courts are liberal in allowing amendments to pleadings at all stages where the rights of the adverse party are not unduly prejudiced, and, in an action against defendant as indorser of notes, where the issue was whether the notes were indorsed and surrendered to plaintiff for cancellation, and not with the intention that they should become plaintiff's property with liability over against defendant as indorser, and the complaint and answer were not verified, it was not error to permit defendant to amend and verify his amended answer to deny the genuineness and due execution of indorsements on the note showing receipt of interest; the original answer having admitted the execution of the notes and defendant's "indorsement" thereof, referring to the writing of his name on the back of them when they were transferred to plaintiff, and the indorsements negatived by the amendment being merely evidentiary as bearing upon the main issue.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 466*) — PAROL EVIDENCE — VARYING WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS.

In an action against defendant as an indorser of notes transferred to plaintiff, evidence of an agreement of the parties that the notes were indorsed and surrendered for cancellation, and not with the intention that they should become plaintiff's property with liability over against defendant as indorser, was not objectionable as contradicting or varying the terms of the notes sued upon, nor of adding any new terms thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action by Richard Bradley, administrator of James A. Bradley, against E. E. Bush. From an order and a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 1 Cal. App. 516, 82 Pac. 560.

H. Scott Jacobs, for appellant. Charles G. Lamberson and John F. Pryor, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is to recover judgment against defendant as indorser of two promissory notes for $1,000 each, executed by the Sunset Vineyard Company, payable to defendant, dated January 25, 1892, and falling due on or before January 1, 1898. The notes, not being paid at maturity, were duly protested and notice of nonpayment given defendant. Plaintiff's intestate died December 19, 1894, and the notes came into plaintiff's possession among other effects of deceased. Defendant refused payment, and hence this suit.

The principal contention of plaintiff is that finding 2 is not supported by the evidence. Paragraph 2 of the amended answer set forth the defense to the action as follows: "The defendant denies that he did at any time prior to the 1st day of February, 1894, or at any other time, whatever, or at all, for value received or at all, duly or otherwise, indorse or transfer or deliver said promissory notes set out in the complaint, or either of them, to James A. Bradley, plaintiff's intestate named in said complaint. But, on the contrary thereof, defendant alleges: That long prior to the 1st day of February, 1894, this defendant wrote his name upon the back of said notes, and each of them, and thereupon placed said notes in the possession of M. W. Upton, at the city of San Francisco, and thereafter agreed with the said James A. Bradley and with the Sunset Vineyard Company that the said defendant would surrender and deliver up the said promissory notes to said Sunset Vineyard Company, and thereupon instructed the said M. W. Upton to deliver the two promissory notes set out and described in the complaint herein to the said Sunset Vineyard Company, and that thereafter the said James A. Bradley received the said promissory notes from the said M. W. Upton, acting as the agent of the said Sunset Vineyard Company, and, as defendant is informed and believes, thereafter retained the said notes in his possession until the death of the said James A. Bradley. That said order to the said M. W. Upton for the delivery of said notes to the said Sunset Vineyard Company was made for the purpose of surrendering up to the said Sunset Vineyard Company the said evidence of indebtedness, and for the purpose of canceling the same, and not with the intention that the same should ever become the property of the said James A. Bradley or that said James A. Bradley should have any right or interest therein." The court, in finding 2, finds the facts substantially as averred in the amended answer, and in finding 7 finds "that all the allegations of paragraph 2 of the 'further and separate answer and defense herein' set forth and contained in the amended answer herein are true."

The cause was tried once before, and judgment given for plaintiff. On appeal the First District Court of Appeal reversed the judgment. Bradley v. Bush, 1 Cal. App. 516, 82 Pac. 560. Guided by the principles enunciated by the appellate court, the learned trial judge at the second trial, upon facts substantially the same as those appearing at the first trial, entered judgment for defendant. The Supreme Court denied a rehearing in that court on the first appeal, thus affirming the principles of law involved. We feel relieved, therefore, from an extended discussion of either the facts or the law of the case. Upon sufficient facts the court made the finding complained of, which was as follows: "That said defendant did not at any time indorse or transfer said promissory notes or either of them to one James A. Bradley, but did prior to December 19, 1894, cause said promissory notes to be delivered to said James A. Bradley, but did not cause said delivery to be made with any agreement or intention on the part of said defendant or of said James A. Bradley that the title to or ownership of said promissory notes or either of them should thereby or at all be transferred from the defendant to said James A. Bradley; but, on the contrary thereof, such delivery of said promissory notes and of each of them was made upon the understanding and agreement between said defendant and said James A. Bradley that said promissory notes and each of them were delivered to James A. Bradley as an agent of said Sunset Vineyard Company, a corporation, to be canceled and retired so as to reduce the indebtedness owing by said Sunset Vineyard Company." Speaking of defendant's offer to prove certain facts by witness Upton (he testified at the second trial to, those facts), which the lower court refused to allow on the ground that "there is the same evidence before the court now" and that there cannot "be any dispute as to the facts of the case at all," which ruling was held to be error, the appellate court said: "From this it appears that the court understood the transaction as stated above, but it will be observed that the declarations of Bradley to Upton had not been proved, and that the testimony offered as to these was not only new, but of material importance; for, the transaction being as stated, it would follow that Bush did not indorse, transfer, or deliver the note to Bradley, but to the company, as to which the transfer and indorsement could create no obligation (Civ. Code, § 3116); nor, indeed, could it have any effect other than that of a mere relinquishment or surrender of his title to the company. The ordinary effect of such a transaction would be to extinguish the obligation itself; but here, by agreement between Bradley and the corporation, assented to by Bush—who held the other notes—the note was not to be canceled, but was to be transferred by the latter to Bradley, to be held by him as evidence of its debt, with the benefit of the mortgage security. Such an agreement would doubtless be valid, and its effect would be to keep the note alive and to vest the title in Bradley. But—assuming the facts to be as stated in the offer of proof—his title would come to him from the company, and there would be no contract of transfer or indorsement between him and Bush; nor, indeed, any direct contractual relation whatever. Nor could Bradley acquire from the company any right of action against Bush, since the company itself by the transfer or surrender to it of its own obligation did not acquire such right of action." The principles here announced must be regarded as the law of the case, for they rest upon substantially the same facts in all material particulars as gave rise to the decision at the last trial.

Defendant was permitted to amend his answer at the close of plaintiff's evidence. Plaintiff objected on the ground that there had been an unreasonable delay in making the request, and on the further ground that "in the proposed amended answer some of the matters are denied which, under our contention, were admitted in the first answer in the case"; citing Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 122 Cal. 107, 54 Pac. 537. The complaint was not verified nor was the answer. Defendant asked leave to amend and verify his amended answer "so as to deny the genuineness and due execution of the indorsements." Counsel for defendant stated that the answer had been treated as sufficient at the former trial, but, having some fear that it might not now be so regarded, he sought to make the amendment. In the original answer defendant admitted the execution of the notes and "his indorsement" of the notes set out in plaintiff's complaint—referring, apparently, to writing his name on the back of the notes. There were two indorsements showing receipt of interest, as to which plaintiff offered some evidence, and it was as to these that the proposed amendment related. In the case cited by appellant the lower court refused the proposed amendment. The Supreme Court sustained the ruling on the ground that the proposed amendment was not in the interest of justice (Code Civ. Proc. § 473); and "the defense under the circumstances was highly inequitable." Courts are liberal in allowing amendments to pleadings, and at all stages, where the rights of the adverse party are not unduly prejudiced. In the present instance the amendment was but a specific denial of facts alleged and which plaintiff endeavored to establish by evidence. Furthermore, the indorsements, negatived by the amendment, were merely evidentiary as bearing upon the main issue, namely: Were the notes indorsed and surrendered for the purpose of cancellation, and not with the intention that they should become the property of Bradley with liability over against defendant as indorser? The court, we think, properly overruled the objection to the evidence regarding defendant's agreement with James A. Bradley in the surrender of the notes. Its object was not to contradict or vary the terms of the written instruments sued upon, nor did it have the effect to add any new terms thereto. As was said in Guidery v. Green, 95 Cal. 630-634, 30 Pac. 786, 787: "Its purpose was to show that the agreement had been canceled by consent, and had no longer operative effect." And it was there held that in such case "the objection that the written agreement could be altered only by an agreement in writing or by an executed oral agreement (Civ. Code, § 1698) has no application to the facts offered to be shown."

So also may want of consideration be shown, when pleaded as was done here, even though due execution and genuineness of an instrument be not denied. Brooks v. Johnson, 122 Cal. 569, 55 Pac. 423; Myers v. Sierra Valley, etc., Ass'n, 122 Cal. 669, 55 Pac. 689.

We find no errors of law among those further pointed out which seem to call for notice. In no instance, even conceding error, is a reversal called for, or is there anything which would affect the substantial rights of the appellant. Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SACRAMENTO SOUTHERN R. CO. v.

HEILBRON. (Sac. 1,594.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 29, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 26, 1909.)1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 131*)—COMPENSATION —MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The measure of damages for land taken by condemnation proceedings is the market value of the land; that is, the highest money price which the land would bring if sold in the open market to one buying with knowledge of all the purposes to which it was adapted, allowing a reasonable time in which to find a purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 353; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 134*)—COMPENSATION
—MARKET VALUE—VALUE FOR PARTICULAR PURPOSE.

The measure of damages for land taken by condemnation is its market value in view of all the purposes to which it is adapted, and, while evidence that it is "valuable" for particular purposes is admissible, its money value for any particular purpose, as for nursery purposes, cannot be shown in determining its market value.

3. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

An instruction that, in determining the damage to land not taken in eminent domain proceedings, the jury must consider the purposes for which it was adapted, and determine the market value from what one would then pay for it in cash, not buying for any particular purpose, but having regard to the market value of the property for all purposes, read in view of other instructions of the question which required the market value to be determined by considering, and allowing for, all purposes for which the property was shown to be adapted, could not have misled the jury to exclude from their consideration what sum a purchaser desiring to use the property for a particular purpose would have paid, but must have been understood as merely prohibiting the consideration of the particular purpose for which a buyer might desire to use the property, and requiring its valuation to be based upon its market value for all purposes.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 222*)—PROCEEDINGS—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES—"MARKET VALUE"—"ACTUAL VALUE."

An instruction that the damages for land not taken should be determined by ascertaining the "market value" of the part not taken as it was when the remainder was taken, and deducting therefrom its market value after the taking, which was pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, except that the quoted words were substituted for "actual value" used in the statute, was not objectionable for using the substituted words; the law holding the market value as equivalent to the actual value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 222.*

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Sacramento Southern Railroad Company against Louise R. Heilbron. From a judgment awarding damages and from the order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Seymour and A. L. Shinn, for appellant. Devlin & Devlin, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was to condemn for railroad purposes a strip of land extending diagonally across a tract owned by defendant. Following the jury's award of damages, defendant appeals; the principal contention upon appeal being that the court erred when instructing the jury upon the law governing their consideration in estimating the damages sustained by defendant. The asserted errors are found in instruction 8, laying down the rule for measuring damages for the land actually taken, and in instruction 9, where the jury is told how to arrive at the damages which may have resulted by the impairment and depreciation in value of the remaining portion of the freehold.

Limiting this consideration for the present to the award by way of damages for the land actually taken, the rule is of universal acceptance that the measure of this damage is the market value; that is to say, the highest price estimated in terms of money which the land would bring if exposed for sale in the open market, with reasonable time allowed in which to find a purchaser, buying with knowledge of all of the uses and purposes to which it was adapted and for which it was capable. In varying language the principle has oftentimes been announced. "Some of the cases hold that its value for a particular use may be proved, but the proper inquiry is: What is its market value in view of any use to which it may be applied and of all uses to which it is adapted?" Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 479. "In estimating the damages to be allowed where property is taken for a public use, the recovery is not limited to the value in connection with a particular purpose for which it may be used, but all its capabilities or uses to which it may be adapted should be considered in order to determine the market value." Joyce on Damages, § 2185.

That this is the measure of damages is not disputed. But by appellant it is contended that the rule as laid down in this state permits evidence of value for the use of the land for a particular purpose in terms of money—that is to say, price, to be given in evidence—while respondent insists that the rule does not go so far; that the rule permits evidence to be given of all uses and purposes for which the land is or may become adapted, but that it forbids the opinions of witnesses to be given as to the value in terms of money of the land for any specific purpose, and limits those opinions to the market value of the land, taking into consideration all of the uses and purposes for which it may have been shown in evidence that the land was suitable. Unquestionably the general rule forbids evidence of value in terms of money to be given touching a specific purpose or use. It is to be considered whether, as appellant contends, the rule in this state does so permit. In Gilmer v. Lime Point, 19 Cal. 47, the question was asked of land sought to be condemned, "What was the value of the property as a site for a fortification?" Here was the first effort in this state to have value for a specific use declared in terms of money. The question was ruled out. This court disposed of the claim that this ruling was error by the brief statement that there was no merit in the contention. In C. P. R. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 247, it was ruled that evidence of the value of lands in terms of money directed to the specific use of the land for wharf purposes was inadmissible. In San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. 372, 3 L. R. A. 83, the land condemned being a portion of a reservoir site, it was held that it was proper to show the value of the property as a reservoir site; the commissioner writing the opinion declaring that this is not "sanctioning a remote or speculative value. It is merely taking the present value for prospective purposes." This decision was by a divided court, one of the justices not participating, two distinctly dissenting upon the ground that the value in terms of money for reservoir purposes could not be shown. The case again came before this court, and is reported in 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604. There this court felt itself bound by the law of the case as laid down upon the former appeal, saying: "As stated before, it was decided on the former appeal and is the law in the case, that the value of the land for any special purpose may be taken into account as one of the elements tending to show its market value." Proceeding with the consideration, the court again places itself in line with the well-established rule by the declaration: "It is sufficient to say that any facts showing the nature of the land in controversy and its adaptability for reservoir purposes may be shown." In Spring Valley Water Company v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 28 Pac. 681, by a divided court, where land was sought to be condemned for reservoir purposes, it was held, following the case of San Diego Land Company v. Neale, that questions asked of a witness, "Do you know what the value of that land is down there for reservoir purposes? Have you any means of knowing the value of this for reservoir purposes?" should have been allowed. Mr. Justice Harrison in his concurring opinion in this case takes the position that the questions were admissible as tending to show the witness' knowledge of the adaptability of the land for a particular use, and as thus affecting the worth of his testimony upon the market value, which alone is to govern. Reviewing the case of San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, he says: "To the extent that the opinion announces the right to offer evidence of such value (for a specific purpose) as an independent fact to be considered by the jury as a measure of the compensation to be awarded, it is at variance with an almost unbroken line of authorities, and, in my opinion, ought not to be followed." The following case of Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224, a department case, quotes Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 479, to the following effect: "The conclusion from the authorities and reason of the matter seems to be that witnesses should not be allowed to give their opinions as to the value of property for a particular purpose, but should state its market value in view of any purpose to which it is adapted." This the department declares it regards "as a correct exposition of the law on the subject." This opinion was concurred in by Justice De Haven, the author of the opinion in Spring Valley W. W. v. Drinkhouse, supra, by Justice Paterson, the author of the opinion in San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604, and by Justice Harrison; Justice Paterson in his especially concurring opinion, declaring his view that his opinion in San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, in 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604, was in strict accord with the case of City of Santa Ana v. Harlin. In Kishlar v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 134 Cal. 636, 66 Pac. 848, the question again arose; the court saying: "Plaintiff (appellant) concedes in his brief 'that market value is not necessarily the use to the plaintiff for a particular purpose,' but he claims that 'this use to the plaintiff for a particular purpose is a very proper element to be considered by the jury, and should not be taken from the jury in arriving at market value'—citing San Diego Land, etc., v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604. In Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224, which was a proceeding to condemn land, the court said: 'The present market value of the land is the measure of damages, and not its value in use to the owner or to the parties seeking to condemn. There is nothing in the Neale Case indicating a different rule. The availability of the property for any particular use may be shown, and in the present case all the facts bearing on the use to which the building was adapted and for which it was being used were shown."

It is seen, therefore, that this court by its latest utterances has definitely aligned itself with the great majority of the courts in holding that damages must be measured by the market value of the land at the time it was taken, that the test is not the value for a special purpose, but the fair market value of the land in view of all the purposes to which it is naturally adapted; that, therefore, while evidence that it is "valuable" for this or that or another purpose may always be given and should be freely received, the value in terms of money, the price, which one or another witness may think the land would bring for this or that or the other specific purpose is not admissible as an element in determining that market value, for such evidence opens wide the door to unlimited vagaries and speculations concerning problematical prices which might under possible contingencies be paid for the land, and distracts the mind of the jury from the single question—that of market value—the highest sum which the property is worth to persons generally, purchasing in the open market in consideration of the land's adaptability for any proven use.

With this as the rule established in this state, we come to a consideration of the instructions given and attacked. Those instructions, varying somewhat the order of their delivery to the jury, are as follows:

"(6) You are not to consider what the land was worth to the defendant, the owner, for speculation, or merely possible uses, nor what she claims it was worth to her, nor what it may be worth to plaintiff for railroad or other purposes, nor what the land would bring at a forced sale. You are not to consider the price the land would sell for under special or extraordinary circumstances, but its fair, market value, if offered in the market under ordinary circumstances for cash, a reasonable time being given to make the sale. Market value is the amount the strip would sell for if put upon the open market, and sold in the manner in which property is ordinarily sold for cash in the community where it is situated, with a reasonable time being given to find a purchaser and make the sale.

"(7) The location of the property, its surroundings, and all other things are to be considered, but you are not to indulge in speculation or conjecture. The law does not require that the plaintiff, in order to take the land, should pay a value based upon speculation, or what might happen if certain things would occur."

"(1) In ascertaining the market value you may consider the purposes for which the land is adapted, and the price for cash it would bring for any purpose, allowing a reasonable time in which to find a purchaser on February 14, 1906."

"(8) You must take into consideration the purposes for which the property was adapted, and determine the market value from what a person would then have paid for the property, in cash, not buying, however, for any particular purpose, but having regard to the market value of the property, as it then stood for all purposes."

Of instructions 6, 7, and 1 no criticism is made. It is conceded that they do clearly and pertinently declare the law. But instruction 8, it is said, is self-destructive and at variance with instruction 1. Against this instruction it is argued that when the court tells the jury that they are to determine the market value from what a person would then have paid for the property in cash, not buying, however, for any particular purpose, the instruction, in effect, excludes from the jury's consideration the sum which would be paid by any purchaser desiring to use the land for a particular purpose, and that, as, in the nature of things, most, if not all, persons buy land with the design of using it for a particular purpose, the error and injury worked by the instruction become manifest. Upon the other hand, it is insisted that the instruction means no more than that the jury was told that it was to determine the market value from what a person would then have paid for the property in cash, taking into consideration the purposes for which it is adapted, but cautioning the jury that it is not at liberty to consider the particular purpose for which a buyer might desire to use the property, but is to reach its valuation having regard to the market value of the property for all purposes. So construed, the instruction is unobjectionable, is in accord with the instructions previously given, and correctly states the rule. We think, reading all of the instructions upon this point together, and in view of the fact that throughout the jury was properly instructed to arrive at the market value, after due consideration and allowance for all of the purposes for which it was shown that the property was adapted, that the jury could not have been misled, as appellant contends, but would have adopted as the natural meaning and import of the language the construction assigned to it by respondent.

Criticism is also made of instruction 9, which is as follows: "After you have determined the value of the strip of land sought to be condemned for the right of way, you must then ascertain and assess the amount of damages, if any, which accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned by the plaintiff. This damage, if any, will be determined by ascertaining, in the same manner as here-before stated, the market value of those portions of said tract not taken as it was on February 14, 1906, and by deducting therefrom the market value of said property after the severance and proposed railroad is constructed. The difference between these values, if there shall be any, will be the amount of damage done by the opening of said railroad to the part of said land not taken. The law fixes this method of ascertaining the damages, and it is your duty to follow it. You must exclude in this estimate, however, any estimate of benefits derived from building the road to the property not taken." This instruction is in strict accord with the mandate of section 1249, Code Civ. Proc. It is argued, however, that the instruction uses the term "market value," while the statute employs the phrase "actual value," and that confusion and injury result by not following the precise words of the statute. It is herein said that market value is not the legal measure at all, but a clumsy method frequently and sometimes erroneously adopted for ascertaining actual value, which is the true test. We think this, however, an over-refinement. The law universally has adopted market value as establishing actual value, and, however clumsy the appellant may think that the method is, it is the best one so far known to the law.

The foregoing discussion disposes of certain alleged errors of the trial court in ruling upon evidence. McWilliams' evidence as to the price which he thought would be paid for the land by one desiring it for nursery purposes was not admissible. It was not even contended that McWilliams qualified himself to testify as to the market value, and his testimony amounted to no more than that the land was suitable for nursery purposes, and that for such purposes a purchaser could be found who would pay so much per acre. Here is an excellent view of the domain of speculation which is opened by the introduction of testimony such as this. The next witness might, in turn, testify that he believed the land valuable for oil, and worth, therefore, for that purpose, thousands of dollars per acre. A third witness might find a similar special use and value for town-site purposes and declare his opinion of the value per acre based upon this consideration. We see nothing in the other rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence to call for further statement than that they were correct.

No other matters seem to call for consideration.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

OWSLEY et al. v. MATSON et al. (S. F. 5,123.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§§ 71, 74*)—"COLOR OF TITLE."

A deed conveying land described by metes and bounds and a decree of court distributing to the grantee the land described as in the deed are color of title, under which the grantee may found an adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. §§ 71, 74.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1264-1273; vol. 8, p. 7606.]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—CLAIM UNDER COLOR OF TITLE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 322, providing that an occupant of some part of a tract of land for five years under a claim of title to the tract founded on a conveyance thereof holds the tract adversely, a possessor of the major part of a tract under a deed and cultivating the same within section 323 for more than five years acquires title to the boundaries set forth in the deed.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 106*)—TITLE ACQUIRED.

Under Civ. Code, § 1007, providing that occupancy for the period prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure as sufficient to bar an action for the recovery of the property confers a title thereto, adverse possession as defined in the Code of Civil Procedure when continued for a period exceeding five years vests in the possessor a title in fee simple.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 94*)—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

A redemption of land sold for delinquent taxes made by the occupant thereof while he was in undisturbed possession and in good faith is a payment of the taxes within Code Civ. Proc. § 325, providing that adverse possession shall not be considered established unless the person in possession or his predecessor paid the taxes on the land.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 90*)—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

One in possession and cultivating the major part of a tract of land claimed under a deed describing the tract by metes and bounds listed the tract for taxes and paid the taxes. The adjoining owner listed for taxes in his own name parcels of the tract. Each party had the land assessed, and paid the taxes thereon in good faith, and in ignorance of the conflicting boundaries of their respective title deeds. Held, that the fact that the adjoining owner had parcels of the land assessed to himself and paid the taxes thereon did not operate to defeat the effect of the adverse possession of the former.

6. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 45*)—MISTAKE—EVIDENCE.

To justify a reformation of a deed because of a mistake in the description therein, it is sufficient that the circumstances proved induce the conviction in the mind of a reasonable man that there was a mutual mistake, and in showing clearly in what such mistake consisted, though no witness testified to personal knowledge of how it occurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-193; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by Marie M. Owsley and another against Isaac Matson and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Henry L. Ford and Denver Sevier, for appellants. Mahan & Mahan, F. A. Cutler, and Frank Sweasey, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendants have appealed from the judgment within 60 days after its rendition and entry, and the evidence is set forth in a bill of exceptions. The contention of the appellants is that the decision is not supported by the evidence.

The plaintiffs sued to recover possession of two tracts of land, constituting parts of a larger tract of 43.33 acres, all of which is claimed by the defendants. The pleadings are not verified. The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint, and avers that the action is barred by the provisions of sections 318 and 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants also filed a cross-complaint, averring that they were the owners of the 43.33 acres described, and also that the claim of the plaintiffs is based on a deed to one Boeing, plaintiffs' predecessor in interest, by Jesse C. Greenlaw, defendants' predecessor in interest, dated March 14, 1887, whereby the land claimed by plaintiffs appeared, by mutual mistake, to have been transferred to Boeing, contrary to the intention of the parties, and praying that the deed be reformed, and that the title of defendants be quieted. The claim of the defendants that they were the owners of the 43.33-acre tract was based upon an asserted adverse possession and upon the alleged mistake.

Upon the question of adverse possession the court found that the defendants had gained title by that means to a part of the land in dispute and gave judgment in favor of the defendants for that part. As to the remainder of the two overlapping parcels, the findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants' contention is that the findings on the subject of the mistake and as to the ownership of the parcels adjudged to the plaintiffs are contrary to the evidence. It is unnecessary to consider at length the question of the alleged mistake. We are of the opinion that the court should have found that the defendants had gained a prescriptive title to the entire tract of 43.33 acres by adverse possession thereof under color of title. L. B. Matson does not appear to have any interest. She was evidently made a party defendant because she is the wife of Isaac Matson. On November 29, 1897, Mary E. Greenlaw and Alfred Greenlaw conveyed to one Edward Greenlaw the 43.33 acres in controversy, describing it accurately by metes and bounds. On June 24, 1898, the decree of distribution of the estate of Jesse C. Greenlaw, deceased, was entered in the superior court, and by its terms the 43.33-acre tract in question was distributed to Edward Greenlaw; the tract being accurately described as in the deed last mentioned. On July 15, 1905, Edward Greenlaw conveyed the 43.33 acres by the same description to the defendant, Isaac Matson. From the time of the execution of the deed to Edward Greenlaw in November, 1897, up to the time of the execution of the deed from said Greenlaw to Isaac Matson in 1905, Edward Greenlaw was in the actual possession of and was occupying and cultivating a large part of the 43.33 acres, and was claiming title to the whole thereof under the aforesaid deed and decree, up to the boundaries described. When the deed was made to Matson, Greenlaw delivered his possession thereof to Matson, who continued in possession as Greenlaw had been, from that time until shortly before this action was begun, claiming title to the entire tract. Neither the plaintiffs nor their predecessors in interest were ever in actual possession of any part of the tract. The action was begun on February 15, 1906. It is further shown that for the years 1899 to 1905, inclusive, this tract was assessed to Edward Greenlaw and that he had paid the taxes thereon. The evidence did not show an actual occupation, cultivation, or inclosure by Greenlaw or Matson of the whole of the parcels awarded to the plaintiffs. It does show, however, an actual occupation and cultivation by them of a considerable part thereof, and that they each claimed title to the entire tract up to the limits described in the deed and decree. It is clear that under these circumstances actual possession and occupancy of the entire tract was not necessary in order to give title by adverse possession. That the deed of November 29, 1897, and the subsequent decree of distribution in 1898, constitute color of title cannot be disputed. Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 485, 20 Pac. 66, 11 Am. St. Rep. 299. Section 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that when it appears that an occupant of land enters into possession thereof "under claim of title, exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the property in question, or upon the decree or judgment of a competent court, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the property included in such instrument, decree, or judgment, or of some part of the property, under such claim for five years, the property so included is deemed to have been held adversely." By section 323, Code Civ. Proc., it is further provided that, for the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by a person claiming under such deed or judgment, the land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied where it has been usually cultivated or improved, or where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel, or of fencing timber for the purpose of husbandry, or for pasturage, or for the ordinary use of the occupant. The evidence to the effect that the major part of the 43.33-acre tract was occupied and possessed in this manner was ample and sufficient to prove the fact, and it was without contradiction. Under the provisions of section 322 such possession of a part of the property in this manner is sufficient to extend the claim of adverse title up to the boundaries set forth in the instrument under which the occupant claims. Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 16, 15 Pac. 431; Christy v. Spring V. W. W., 97 Cal. 26, 31 Pac. 1110; Hicks v. Coleman, 25 Cal. 135, 85 Am. Dec. 103; Davis v. Perley, 30 Cal. 639; Walsh v. Hill, 38 Cal. 487; 1 Cyc. 1125. Adverse possession, as defined in the Code of Civil Procedure, if continued for a period exceeding five years, is not only sufficient to bar a claimant under a legal title, but it is also sufficient to create a title. Such possession so continued vests in the possessor a title in fee simple against all other claimants. Civ. Code, § 1007.

The tax for the year 1903 upon the assessment of this land to Edward Greenlaw was not paid when it became due. The land was sold therefor, and in July, 1905, long before this action was begun, it was redeemed by Edward Greenlaw. The same thing occurred with respect to the taxes in 1904, and the redemption was made by Greenlaw at the same time. It is claimed that this was not a sufficient payment of the taxes; that, in order to make his possession adverse within the law (Code Civ. Proc. § 325), the party in possession must pay the taxes, either before they become delinquent, or, at all events, before the property is sold therefor under the law. There is a dictum to this effect in McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 73, 53 Pac. 421. In that case, however, it appeared that the person in possession had failed to pay any taxes during his possession, and that the redemption took place after he had ceased to have possession or to claim any right thereto. In such a case there may be good ground for saying that a subsequent payment of the taxes by way of redemption from such sale would not relate back to and aid the previous possession so as to make it adverse from the time of the tax sale to the time of such redemption. In order that a possession may be sufficient to constitute title in fee simple, it would seem reasonable to hold that all the elements necessary thereto must have been in existence at the time the five years are running, and that a redemption of taxes after the adverse possession had ceased could not relate back so as to make it a payment during such period. But where, as in the present case, the tax has been allowed to become delinquent and a sale has taken place, and, so far as appears, a redemption has been made thereof, while the party or his successor in interest was in undisturbed possession, and all this is done in good faith, we see no reason why the same should not be held to operate as a payment, and we think it is sufficient to bring the occupant within the terms of the statute which requires him to pay the taxes upon the property claimed. The evidence also showed that during the same period, while Greenlaw was in possession of the land in the manner above stated, the plaintiffs and their predecessor in interest also listed for taxation in their own names the parcels claimed by plaintiffs and paid the taxes thereon. So far as the record shows, each party had his land assessed and paid the taxes thereon in good faith, and in ignorance of the conflicting boundaries of their respective title deeds. It is altogether probable that the lands were listed by each party upon the supposition that the boundaries in the deed coincided with the line surveyed, and to which the possession of the defendants extended, or without taking into consideration the overlap.

In Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 99 Cal. 672, 34 Pac. 509, it appeared that during three of the years that were required to constitute the adverse possession the land had been separately assessed to each party and the tax paid upon each assessment by the party to whom the assessment was made. The court said, referring to the person in possession: "Having had the land assessed to him, and having paid the taxes levied thereon, we think he has fulfilled the conditions of the statute, and it is immaterial as to the number of times the land may have been assessed to and the taxes paid by other parties." And the opinion expressly declined to hold that "priority of payment by the true owner of itself nullifies the time which has actually run and starts anew the statute." It was remarked that: "If such were the law, upon the first day that taxes became due and payable, it would result in a scramble at, or a race to, the tax collector's office, by the respective parties, to secure priority of payment. The destruction of old titles and the creation of new ones would thus be dependent upon the strongest man or fleetest horse." This was a department decision, and only two justices, Garoutte, J., and Beatty, C. J., joined in this opinion. Harrison, J., concurring, was of the opinion that, when the taxes on the land had been once paid by the true owner, a subsequent payment by one in adverse possession would give him no right, but that, as the record did not show which party succeeded in making payment first, it would be presumed, in support of the judgment below, that the adverse occupant first paid. A similar question arose in Carpenter v. Lewis, 119

Cal. 18, 50 Pac. 925. In that case, however, there were not separate assessments. The tax was assessed each year to the true owner, who paid the tax each year, but the adverse occupant also paid the tax each year upon the assessment to the owner. In two of the years his payment was prior to that of the owner, in the other years subsequent thereto. The statement in the concurring opinion of Justice Harrison in Cavanaugh v. Jackson that, if when the adverse occupant offers to pay the tax the same has already been paid by the true owner, a second payment by the adverse occupant will not give him any right, was approved, as applied to the facts involved in the Carpenter Case. This opinion also was signed by only two justices. Justice Garoutte concurred only in the judgment, and, it being also a department decision, the opinion of the majority is not authority. We are therefore at liberty to adopt the rule which we believe to be most just and most in accord with the spirit and purpose of the statute. We think the reasoning of the majority opinion in Cavanaugh v. Jackson is the more satisfactory in its application to the facts in the case at bar. Under the circumstances here appearing, we do not think that the fact that each party had the land separately assessed to himself and paid the taxes upon that assessment would operate to defeat the effect of the adverse possession of Matson and Greenlaw in gaining for them a title by prescription.

All the circumstances indicate very strongly that there was a mistake in drafting the deed executed by Jesse C. Greenlaw to Boeing in 1886, and that both parties then and for a long time afterwards supposed and believed that the line described in the deed was the line surveyed along the foot of the hill bounding the land of which Greenlaw retained possession. But owing to the rule that, where different inferences may reasonably be drawn from the circumstances proved, the decision of the trial court is conclusive upon this court, we cannot interfere with the finding on that point. It is said that the court below made this finding because the evidence gave no explanation as to how the mistake occurred in drawing the deed. There was no explanation by any direct evidence. Greenlaw and the attorney who drew the deed were both dead at the time of the trial, and there were no means of proving the facts attending immediately upon the writing and execution of the deed. It may be said, however, that direct evidence of the manner in which a mistaken description became incorporated in a deed is not an indispensable requisite to a reformation thereof. If the circumstances proven are sufficient to induce the conviction in the mind of a reasonable man that there was a mutual mistake in drawing the deed and to show clearly in what such mistake consisted, a reformation may be decreed, although no witness testifies to personal knowledge of how it occurred.

Because of the finding on the subject of ownership by adverse possession, the judgment is erroneous and cannot be allowed to stand.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.

KIMIO v. SAN JOSE-LOS GATOS INTER-URBAN RY. CO. et al. (S. F. 5,016.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 25, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 22, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 316*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a passenger on a street car was injured in a collision between the car and the car of another street railroad at a crossing, a presumption of negligence on the part of the latter did not arise from the mere fact of the collision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1261-1294; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—COLLISIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

Whether a motorman was negligent who approached a crossing of another street railroad while a car of the latter was approaching on a level track, and within a few feet thereof, and in plain sight, in such manner and at such speed that he could not stop in time to avoid a collision if the other car continued to advance, depends on whether an ordinarily prudent man, having a due regard for the safety of the passengers on the other car, as to whom he owed the exercise of ordinary care, would have done what he did, though under an established custom of the two railroads his car had the right of way and the other car should stop, and, since a reasonable man might conclude that under the circumstances ordinary care required the motorman to approach the crossing in such a manner that he could stop in time if the other car did not stop, and that failure to do so was negligent as to a passenger on the other car, regardless of whether the motorman on the other car was also negligent, the issue of the motorman's negligence was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Negligence is a question of fact, though there is no conflict in the evidence, where different conclusions on the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence; but, where but one conclusion can reasonably be reached, it is a question of law.

4. CARRIERS (§ 306*)—COLLISIONS—COMPANIES LIABLE.

Where the negligence of two street railroads contributed to the injury of a passenger of one of them, the passenger could recover from both railroads, or either.

5. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—COLLISIONS—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a street railroad for injuries to a passenger of another street railroad in a collision between the cars of the two railroads, evidence held to support a verdict of negligence of the motorman in charge of the car which collided with the car in which the passenger was riding.

6. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for personal injuries, the testimony was conflicting on the issue whether plaintiff was afflicted in a particular manner by reason of the injuries received, and whether such condition was permanent, an instruction that plaintiff claimed that the injuries caused a particular condition, and that the jury were the judges as to the extent of the injuries and as to the existence of the condition complained of, and that, if the injuries received did not cause such condition, they should not allow plaintiff any damages on account thereof, and that the burden was on plaintiff to show the result of the injuries, was not objectionable as allowing damages for such future loss as the jury might think would possibly or probably follow from the injuries.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in a personal injury action, plaintiff testified without objection that his business was worth before the accident from $10 to $12 a day, and that his earning capacity before the accident was from $10 to $12 a day, and that he had not been able to attend to business since the accident, the error, if any, in permitting him to state that since the accident he had not been able to earn $10 or $12 a day in his business, was not prejudicial, as he did not thereby intimate any amount by which his earning capacity had been decreased.

8. WITNESSES (§ 269*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—EXTENT.

Where, in an action against two street railroads for injuries to a passenger of one of them in a collision with a car of the other at a crossing, the motorman of the latter testified on direct examination as a witness for plaintiff as to the custom between the two railroads under which the cars of the latter had the right of way, without referring to any order from any officer of the latter railroad as to the right of way at the crossing, a question on cross-examination as to what orders he had received as to the right of way at the crossing was not proper cross-examination, but was an attempt to bring before the jury orders which had been given by the latter railroad to its servants out of hearing of plaintiff and codefendant.

15. WITNESSES (§ 291*)—RE-CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where, in a personal injury action, a nurse on direct examination testified from memory as to the condition of plaintiff during the time he acted as nurse, and on cross-examination stated that he had burned his charts, and that he always did so unless the patient wanted them, and that, when he left plaintiff's home, he asked plaintiff if he wanted the charts, and that plaintiff replied that he would not need them, that there would be no lawsuit, and on redirect examination testified without objection to the remainder of the conversation between himself and plaintiff, saying that plaintiff told him that the reason there would be no lawsuit was that an officer of one of the defendants had promised to do the right thing, a question on re-cross-examination as to the conversation between plaintiff and such officer was improper, because the subject-matter was not covered by anything previously testified to.

25. NEW TRIAL (§ 44*)—GROUNDS—MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger in a collision between cars of two street railroads, the issues so far as one of the railroads was concerned were whether its motorman was warranted in assuming that the car of the other railroad would not be at the crossing at the time he reached it, and whether he approached the crossing at such speed that he could not stop in time to avoid anything thereon, however well adapted to all purposes the brake on the car was, the misconduct of the jury in examining the brake of a car and the mechanism thereof while on the car going to the place of the accident for a view did not warrant a new trial on the ground of such misconduct.

26. NEW TRIAL (§ 56*)—GROUNDS—MISCONDUCT OF JURY.

Where, in an action for injuries to a passenger on a street car in a collision between his car and the car of another street railroad at a crossing, the issue was whether the motorman of the latter railroad was warranted in assuming that the car of the former would not be at the crossing at the time he reached it, and whether he approached the crossing at such speed that he could not stop in time to avoid anything thereon, the refusal to grant a new trial for the misconduct of a juror while inspecting the scene of the accident in stating at the time a car of the latter railroad approached the crossing that that was the way the passenger was injured, and that if the tracks were wet the car could not have been stopped before the crossing, was warranted, as the trial court could find that the juror was not prejudiced, and that his statement did not prejudice the other jurors.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Charles Kimic against the San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban Railway Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant the San Jose & Santa Clara County Railroad Company appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 104 Pac. 312.

E. M. Rea, for appellant. Leo B. Archer, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendant San Jose & Santa Clara County Railroad Company (hereinafter designated as the appellant) from a judgment in favor of plaintiff against it and its codefendant, San Jose-Los Gatos Interurban Railway Company (hereinafter designated as the Interurban Company), for damages for personal injuries, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The general facts of the case are stated in the opinion filed September 20, 1909, in the matter of the appeal of the Interurban Company from the same judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial (S. F. No. 5020) 104 Pac. 312.

1. At the close of plaintiff's case, appellant made a motion for a nonsuit upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove any negligence on appellant's part. The granting of this motion was objected to by both plaintiff and the Interurban Company, and the motion was denied. It is urged that this ruling was erroneous. We are of the opinion that the evidence introduced by plaintiff was sufficient to warrant the denial of the motion. It is true that as the plaintiff was a passenger on the Interurban Company car, and not on appellant's car, no presumption of negligence on the part of appellant arose from the mere fact of collision. Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 549, 66 Pac. 787, 55 L. R. A. 608; Tompkins v. Clay St. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 Pac. 1165. But there was evidence as to other facts that warranted the trial court in concluding that there was a sufficient case on the question of appellant's negligence to go to the jury. It may be conceded that the evidence showed very clearly that appellant's cars had the right of way over said crossing, and that it was the duty of the Interurban car operatives to come to a stop before crossing Tenth street whenever one of appellant's cars was approaching, and to allow such car to pass before crossing. The well-established custom of appellant's cars was to slow up on approaching the crossing and then to cross without stopping. Appellant's motorman, W. B. Plimpton, called by the plaintiff, testified that in conformity to this custom on the occasion in question he did shut off his current and pull back on his brake when approaching the crossing, and that he was going at the rate of four or five miles an hour when fifteen feet from San Carlos street, he saw the Interurban car standing still on the east side of the crossing, and only then released his brake and threw on his current, and at that moment the Interurban car shot out in front of him at full speed. He said that he immediately shut off his current and put on his brake, but that it was impossible to stop in time. His conductor, also called by plaintiff, corroborated him by testifying that the car slowed down to about four miles an hour when near San Carlos street; that, when it was about 20 feet from the crossing, he saw the Interurban car standing on the east side of Tenth street; and that this appellant's motorman turned on his current and dashed ahead. But there was other testimony on the part of witnesses of plaintiff from which the jury might properly conclude that the Interurban car, which was that day being operated by a new motorman and a new conductor, did not come to a stop before attempting to cross at Tenth street. It did slow down to allow a passenger, the only passenger other than plaintiff, to alight, but he stepped off the car before it stopped, and testified that he did not know whether it stopped after he alighted. The plaintiff testified quite clearly and positively that this passenger prepared to alight by getting down on the step with his hand on the bar; that the car slowed down and he swung off while it was moving slowly; that just as he swung off the conductor rang the bell and the car shot ahead very fast; and that the motorman of the Interurban car did not look to the north at all, but was apparently engrossed in the passenger who was alighting. There was nothing improbable in this evidence, and it was sufficient to support a conclusion on the part of the jury that the Interurban car did not come to a stop at or near Tenth street until stopped by the collision. Appellant's car struck the Interurban car, a car 33 feet long, near the front wheel of the rear truck, knocking such rear truck some 2 feet off the track. Appellant's car weighed about 15 tons. The motorman of appellant's car testified that he saw the Interurban car approaching on San Carlos street when it was about 100 feet from the crossing. The crossing at Tenth street and San Carlos street is a level crossing, and both of said streets are level. It had been raining on the day of the accident, and the tracks were a "little damp" by reason thereof. Appellant's car was being operated on the easterly of its two tracks on Tenth street, the track nearest the Interurban car approaching on San Carlos street. The accident occurred between 12 and 1 o'clock of the afternoon. There was nothing to indicate whether any warning signal was given by either car on approaching the crossing. In all this evidence there was certainly sufficient to support a conclusion that appellant's motorman, having under his absolute control an electric street car of great power and weight, approached the intersecting track of another street railroad while a car of such other road was approaching such intersection on a level track and was within a few feet thereof and in plain sight, in such manner and at such a rate of speed that he could not stop his car in time to avoid a collision in the event that the other car continued to advance upon its track to the intersection. Would an ordinarily prudent man having a due regard for the safety of those who were passengers on the other car and as to whom he was held to the exercise of ordinary care do this under like circumstances, even though he knew that, under an established custom of the two roads, his car had the right of way and the other car should stop and allow him to pass, and even although the other car had slowed down? We do not feel that this question can be answered in the affirmative as a matter of law, and, if it cannot be so answered, it cannot be said as a matter of law that he was not negligent. "The rule is that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. * * * If but one conclusion can reasonably be reached from the evidence, it is a question of law for the court; but, if one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury. Our ideas as to what would be proper care vary according to temperament, knowledge, and experience. A party should not be held to the peculiar notions of the judge as to what would be ordinary care. That only can be regarded as a standard or rule which would be recognized or enforced by all learned and conscientious judges, or could be formulated into a rule. In the nature of things no such common standard can be reached in cases of negligence, where reasonable men can reach opposite conclusions upon the facts." Wahlgren v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 663, 62 Pac. 308, 64 Pac. 993, and cases there cited. See, also, Seller v. Market St. Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 271, 72 Pac. 1006. A reasonable man might well conclude that, under the circumstances shown here, the exercise of ordinary care required appellant's motorman to approach the crossing in such a manner that he could stop in time to avoid a collision if the other car did not stop, and that, if he did not do this, he was guilty of negligence as to plaintiff, regardless of whether the motorman of the Interurban car was also guilty of negligence. Where the negligence of the managers of both vehicles contribute to the injury, the party injured may recover from the proprietors of either or both. Tompkins v. Clay St. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 163, 4 Pac. 1165. It might reasonably be concluded that in the exercise of ordinary care appellant's motorman could not act upon the assumption that the moving Interurban car would be stopped before reaching the intersection, notwithstanding that he had the right of way, and that, until it had actually come to a full stop, he was called upon to assume that there was danger of a collision if he went rapidly ahead, and to so manage his car as to avoid the same. Of course, if he neglected to observe that the Interurban car had not stopped when he could have observed that fact by the exercise of ordinary care, he was negligent in failing to observe it and in acting accordingly.

2. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the conclusion of the jury that there was negligence on the part of appellant. This claim requires very little notice in view of our discussion of the alleged error in denying the motion for a nonsuit. The case of the plaintiff was strengthened on the question whether or not the Interurban car stopped before coming to the crossing by the testimony of the motorman thereof, called as a witness by the Interurban Company, who testified that the car did not stop, but simply slowed down, while the case of appellant was strengthened by the testimony of a passenger on its car, who testified that the Interurban car did stop. There was also the testimony of the motorman and the conductor of the Interurban car to the effect that as they reached the crossing they for the first time saw appellant's car 125 to 150 feet away coming at a rate of 15 to 20 miles an hour. There was, taking all the testimony on this point, simply a conflict of evidence. For the reasons stated in discussing the motion for a nonsuit, there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

3. It is contended that the damages awarded are excessive. The verdict was for $7,000. Six hundred dollars was remitted from this in consequence of the order of the trial court on motion for new trial, making the judgment one for $6,400. The record on this appeal shows practically the same evidence on the question of damage as did the record on the appeal of the other defendant (S. F. No. 5020). This question was fully discussed in the opinion filed on that appeal, and it was concluded that it could not be held that the damages awarded were excessive in amount. For the reasons stated in that opinion the same ruling must be made here.

4. It is contended that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction at the request of the other defendant: "He (plaintiff) also claims that the physical injuries in question caused a condition of disease known as neurasthenia or traumatic neurosis and that such condition is possibly, or probably permanent. You are the judges of the fact as to the extent and severity of the injuries sustained by the plaintiff, and also as to the fact of the existence of neurasthenia, or traumatic neurosis, as well as of the degree of such disease, and of the probability of its permanency. If you find that the injuries received by plaintiff in the collision in question did not cause neurasthenia or traumatic neurosis, you will not allow plaintiff any damages because of the existence of such disease." The instruction then went on to say that the burden was on the plaintiff to show such result from the injuries, and that, if he had failed to do so, he could not recover damages therefor. The theory of learned counsel for appellant apparently is that the jury were practically told by this instruction that they might allow damages for such future loss as they thought might "possibly or probably" follow on account of the injuries; the true rule in this regard being, as stated in Melone v. Sierra Ry. Co., 151 Cal. 117, 91 Pac. 522, that plaintiff can recover only "such damages as by the evidence it is reasonably certain he will suffer in the future." We do not so construe the instruction. It was not an instruction on the subject of damages at all. The testimony of the witnesses was conflicting as to whether the plaintiff was then afflicted in the manner stated by reason of the injuries received, and, if so, as to the permanency of such condition. The whole purpose and effect of this instruction was to impress upon the jury that they were the sole judges as to the extent and severity of the injuries sustained, the then condition of the plaintiff in the respect specified and the probability of its permanency, and that in all these matters the burden was on the plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of evidence. It was nowhere intimated to the jury that they might award damages for future losses which were only possible or probable and not reasonably certain to ensue. The only instruction as to the damages that might be awarded was carefully limited, so far as future damage was concerned, as follows: "If the injury has impaired the plaintiff's power to earn money in the future, such sum as will compensate him for such loss of power." At the request of appellant the court instructed the jury that they could allow "only such actual damages as the evidence shows to a reasonable certainty he has sustained by reason of the accident," and that, "if you find that the injury is of a permanent nature, then plaintiff is entitled on account of the damages to compensation; that is, to such sum as will compensate him for his loss of power to earn money in the future."

5. Plaintiff, having testified without objection that his time and business (which was a "wall paper business") was worth before the accident from $10 to $12 a day, that his earning capacity before the accident was from $10 to $12 a day, and that he had not been able to attend to business since the accident, was asked: "Since the accident have you been able to earn that amount of money in your business?" An objection to this question was overruled, and the witness answered: "I have not." If we assume this ruling to have been technically erroneous, we nevertheless cannot hold it prejudicial. The answer of the witness to the question did not intimate any amount by which his earning capacity in the business had been decreased, but simply that it had been decreased, that he had not been able to earn the full amount stated. So far as any specific damage was concerned, which under the instructions of the court must be shown by the plaintiff before any recovery therefor could be had, plaintiff's case practically stood after the answer the same as it did before, upon the evidence that had already been admitted without objection. The answer did not materially add to the effect of such previous testimony.

6. Appellant's motorman, called by plaintiff as a witness, testified fully on direct examination as to the custom between the two companies under which appellant's cars had the right of way. He fully substantiated the claim of appellant in regard thereto. No testimony was given by him on direct examination as to any statement or order made or given him by any officer of the appellant in regard to the right of way at such crossing. On cross-examination by appellant's counsel he was asked: "What orders did you have from your office in regard to the right of way at that crossing?" This was objected to by the other defendant as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and not proper cross-examination. No objection was interposed by plaintiff. The objection was sustained. We cannot conceive of any theory upon which it can be held that the supposed evidence was competent for any purpose. It was not cross-examination regarding any matter covered by the direct examination, and was simply a plain attempt to bring before the jury statements and instructions which had been made and given by appellant to its servant out of the hearing of plaintiff and the other defendant. Even if there had been no objection upon the part of any party to the question, the proposed evidence being incompetent and inadmissible for any purpose, the court had the right to exclude it of its own motion. See Davey v. Southern Pac. Co., 116 Cal. 330, 48 Pac. 117; People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 166, 26 Pac. 650; Parker v. Smith, 4 Cal. 105. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether the objection made by appellant's codefendant alone was effectual for any purpose. However, we can see no reason why it was not entitled to make and insist on the objection if the question called for evidence incompetent for any purpose.

7. On his direct examination appellant's motorman testified that some seven or eight minutes after the collision he "spoke" to the men on the other car. He further testified that he had not discussed the accident since its occurrence with any one. On cross-examination by appellant he was asked if it was not a fact that immediately after the accident he discussed this matter with the motorman of the Interurban car, and answered "Yes." He was then asked: "What did you say to that motorman?" An objection on the part of the other defendant that the same was not proper cross-examination was sustained. This ruling was correct. It was not suggested or intimated to the trial court that the object of the proposed evidence was to impeach the witness by showing any statement by him to the Interurban motorman which was inconsistent with his present testimony as to the circumstances of the accident, and, of course, it is apparent that there was no such object. The witness had testified as favorably to appellant's cause as could be desired, and, according to his testimony, the negligence was wholly on the part of the Interurban car. The question was not proper cross-examination. The only possible object thereof was to elicit from the witness evidence that some seven or eight minutes after the accident he had made a statement to the other motorman favorable to his own employer and unfavorable to the other defendant as to the cause of the accident, which statement was in no way inconsistent with his present testimony. Under elementary rules, such statements constituting no part of the res gestæ, were incompetent and inadmissible as against the other defendant.

8. On his direct examination the same witness testified that about seven minutes after the accident the motorman of the Interurban car made a statement as to the cause of the accident. He was then asked what that statement was, and an objection of the other defendant that the same was not a part of the res gestæ, in that it occurred after the transaction, and was clearly hearsay, and not binding on the Interurban Company, was sustained. The proposed evidence was clearly incompetent. The statements of the Interurban motorman proposed to be shown constituted no part of the res gestæ, and any statement made by him as to the cause of the accident which was not a part of the res gestæ was not admissible against his employer or for any other purpose of which we can conceive. See Luman v. Golden, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 700, 709, 74 Pac. 307, and cases there cited.

9. It is conceded in the reply brief of appellant that a motion to strike out certain evidence given by Dr. Saph was too general and was properly denied.

10. L. A. Mcquaide, a graduate nurse of five years' experience, who attended plaintiff for four weeks following the accident, was a witness in his behalf. He testified that on both the first and second days he gave the patient some strychnine and brandy. He was asked why this was given, and, over objection of defendant that this called for expert testimony which the witness had not shown himself qualified to give, answered that it was because he was weak. There can be no doubt that one who is shown to be a graduate nurse and to have been constantly engaged in the calling of a professional nurse for five years may properly be called upon as an expert to give evidence of the character of that elicited by the question asked. See generally Estate of Toomes, 54 Cal. 509, 514, 35 Am. Rep. 83.

11. The nurse on direct examination testified to the condition of plaintiff during the time he acted as nurse from memory. On cross-examination by appellant he testified that he had burned his charts; that he always did so unless the patient wanted them; that when he left plaintiff's home he asked him if he wanted the charts; and that plaintiff said he would not need them, that there would be no lawsuit. On redirect examination by plaintiff in response to questions and without objection he testified as to the remainder of the conversation between himself and plaintiff, saying that plaintiff told him therein that the reason there would be no lawsuit was that Mr. Hale, the vice president of the Interurban Company, had promised to do the right thing by him and give him everything he wanted, and that he thought Mr. Hale would do the right thing by him. Being asked if Mr. Hale did not call on plaintiff while the witness was nursing him, the witness answered "Yes; he did." On recross-examination by appellant, the witness was asked if he, the witness, was present when the original conversation between plaintiff and Mr. Hale took place, and an objection of the other defendant that the same was not proper cross-examination, and that it assumed something not testified to by the witness, was sustained. It will be observed that the witness had not anywhere testified as to any conversation between Mr. Hale, the Interurban vice president, and plaintiff, or even that any conversation had taken place between them except in so far as it was to be implied from the fact that Mr. Hale had called on plaintiff. Except for the latter statement, his testimony had been confined to a statement of a conversation between himself and the plaintiff at which Hale was not present, in the course of which plaintiff told the witness what Mr. Hale had said to him. This latter portion of the conversation plaintiff was entitled to elicit on redirect examination because appellant had elicited the other portion on his cross-examination, and plaintiff was entitled to the whole conversation on redirect examination in order that he might explain thereby the admission intimated by the first portion, viz., that he had said that there would be no lawsuit because, perchance, he had no just claim. Appellant had the right on recross-examination to fully question the witness as to this alleged conversation between himself and plaintiff, and also as to whether Mr. Hale had in fact called on plaintiff, but he was not entitled on cross-examination to go into the question of the original conversation between plaintiff and Mr. Hale, for that subject-matter was in no degree covered by anything he had previously testified to. If the witness was present at any conversation between Mr. Hale and plaintiff wherein plaintiff by conduct or words made any admission inconsistent with his claim asserted in this action, or which conversation was of such a nature as to make it apparent that plaintiff's statement to the witness was untrue and that he desired the charts destroyed for the purpose of suppressing evidence, it was for appellant to introduce the evidence in regard thereto as a part of his own case. We do not think that the evidence that appellant suggests might have been elicited had evidence as to the conversation between Hale and plaintiff been allowed could have substantially affected or impaired the evidence of the witness as to his own reason for burning the charts. He testified he always burned his charts unless they were desired by the patient. We do not know that the witness was in fact present at the conversation between Hale and plaintiff, and, were the case to be reversed on account of the sustaining of the objection to the question asked, the witness might answer that he was not present. The trial court might well have allowed this preliminary question. We have discussed this matter upon the assumption that he was present, and that the question before us is whether appellant was entitled to elicit on cross-examination of the witness the conversation between Hale and plaintiff. This we are satisfied he was not entitled to do except in so far as it might tend to affect the weight to be given the evidence of the witness as to his reason for destroying his charts, and we are satisfied that as to this it could have had no substantial effect, so that in so far as it might have been erroneous at all, the ruling was not prejudicial. As suggested by respondent's counsel, it is apparent that the real purpose of the question was to get before the jury an admission of the vice president of the other defendant that his company was the one at fault.

12. There was no error in allowing plaintiff to ask his witness Dr. Gerlach certain questions for the purpose of obtaining from him an explanation of certain testimony theretofore given by him. He had previously testified that he had no opinion to offer as to whether plaintiff was now shamming any symptoms, and was asked substantially if he intended thereby to intimate to the jury that he was shamming. He answered that he did not. He was then asked substantially what he did mean by his testimony, and explained that he meant that from a medical standpoint it was difficult and probably impossible to say in regard to the shamming, although he might have an opinion if he could take plaintiff and his personal knowledge of him into consideration. Both questions were legitimate. The witness did not by his answers, as claimed by appellant, express his personal opinion as to plaintiff and his character, or his views as to his shamming based on such opinion.

13. Dr. Pierce, a medical expert called by plaintiff, was asked as to the probability of an injury to the muscles being a lasting and permanent injury in a man of 62 years of age, which was plaintiff's age. He proceeded to answer that it would depend entirely on the extent of the injury, of which he knew nothing except what he had heard in the report of the case, but that if the muscle was ruptured or a blood vessel ruptured, and there was an extravasation of blood amounting to a quart, as he understood there was, the chances were ———. At this point appellant objected that it was unfair to allow the witness to base his answer on any understanding that he had with reference to reports, and the objection was overruled. The witness then finished his answer by saying that the chances are that there would probably be a permanent injury. The answer was substantially that in the case of a man 62 years of age, if the muscle was ruptured or if a blood vessel was ruptured, and if there was an extravasation of blood amounting to a quart, as to all which there was evidence, the chances were that there would probably be a permanent injury. The matter elicited by the answer was material and competent.

14. A question asked the plaintiff as to his expenses for medical attendance, medicine, etc., was objected to on the ground that the matter was not within the issues. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered: "I suppose somewhere in the neighborhood of $500 or $600." A motion to strike out the answer as too indefinite was denied. If there was any error in either of these rulings, the effect thereof was obviated by the ruling of the court on motion for new trial, whereby the sum of $600, the largest sum that the jury under the evidence could have awarded on this account, was ordered remitted as a condition to the denial of a new trial. The order was expressly made upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict so far as it included any allowance on this account. The remission was made accordingly.

15. A point is made in the closing brief in regard to alleged misconduct of plaintiff's counsel in his argument to the jury, but we cannot conceive that the defendants could have been prejudiced thereby, and do not deem the matter of sufficient importance to warrant discussion.

16. There remains for consideration the claim that a new trial should have been granted because of misconduct of the jury. It was originally claimed that there was misconduct in the means adopted by the jurors in determining the amount of the verdict, but this ground has been expressly abandoned in this court, appellant conceding that it has made no legal showing in regard thereto. The only misconduct now alleged is misconduct on the part of jurors when visiting the scene of the accident under order of court. During the trial it was stipulated that the jury might be taken by the bailiff to the scene of the accident to inspect the premises. It was suggested by counsel that, as two railroad companies operated cars to that point, they might go on the car of one company and return on the car of the other company, so that they might have a better conception of the cars. The court said that the jury was to be taken out not to inspect the cars, but merely to inspect the scene of the accident, and that the cost of transportation would amount to $1.30. A juror asking if they could talk about the location of the cars while on the ground was told that they could not, that they were simply to inspect the scene, and not to indulge in discussion among themselves. They were further admonished that it was their duty not to converse with or suffer themselves to be addressed by any other person, and not to form or express an opinion until the case was finally submitted to them. The affidavit of the bailiff shows that he accompanied the jury to the scene of the accident; that they went on one of appellant's cars; that some of the jurors rode on the front platform or open part of the car; that they remained at the scene for about 15 or 20 minutes; that thereupon a car of appellant approached the scene and stopped before the crossing and a car of the other defendant also approached; that he said to the jurors "Let's not spend all of our money with one company"; and that thereupon they boarded the car of such other defendant, and returned to town. The affidavit of W. F. Carroll, who was the motorman on the car of appellant that took the jurors to the scene of the accident, showed that on the trip out all of the jury except two or three sat on the front part or open part of the car on each side of him, "that said jurymen examined the brake of said car as the same was being operated by defendant and the mechanism thereof"; that after the jurors alighted he proceeded to the end of his run; that when he returned the jury was still at the scene of the accident; that he stopped before passing the crossing and about nine of the jurors boarded his car; that, one of the other company's cars then approaching, a juror said, "Let's ride back on the other car. I have never examined those cars"; that some one then said, "Yes; let's not spend all of our money with one company"; that all the jurors then boarded the other car, and that as he approached the crossing one of the jurors said: "That is the way Kimic was injured. If the tracks were wet, he could not have stopped his car before said crossing." The affidavit of C. P. Simpson, who was the conductor on the same car of appellant, was substantially the same as that of the motorman. None of the matters thus alleged in these affidavits was denied.

The foregoing is all the evidence that can be considered in determining the question of misconduct. Other affidavits were presented, and there were other statements made in some of the affidavits already mentioned, but these other affidavits and statements cannot be considered. The affidavits of the motorman and conductor contained certain statements made solely on information and belief. Such statements are unavailing for any purpose in such a proceeding as this.

See Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 151, 78 Pac. 540, and cases there cited; People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 478, 86 Pac. 1100. The affidavits of two of the jurors were presented for the purpose of showing misconduct. These, of course, were unavailing for any purpose, a juror not being permitted to impeach the verdict except upon the single ground that the verdict was the result of a resort to the determination of chance. Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 2; Siemens v. Oakland, etc., Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 497, 66 Pac. 672, and cases there cited. Affidavits of others than jurors detailing conversations with jurors after the verdict and showing statements made by the jurors in such conversations tending to impeach their verdict were also unavailing. While these affidavits were not, in terms, affidavits by jurors impeaching their own verdict, they were affidavits of admissions made by jurors to the same effect. "If the juror himself would not have been permitted to make affidavit directly to these facts, clearly the affidavit by another of his declarations and admissions, offered for the same purpose would be equally inadmissible. What the juror could not do directly could not thus indirectly be effectuated." Siemens v. Oakland, etc., Ry. Co., supra. See also, People v. Murphy, 146 Cal. 506, 80 Pac. 109. The statements in the counteraffidavits of 11 of the jurors "that he was governed entirely in his deliberation and in reaching said verdict by the evidence introduced at the trial thereof, and that no outside fact or circumstance influenced him in his deliberation or verdict," were ineffectual for any purpose. It is thoroughly settled that jurors cannot be heard to deny the prejudicial influence on their minds of knowledge acquired by misconduct. People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 37 Pac. 207, 42 Am. St. Rep. 102; People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 562, 80 Pac. 681. Affidavits of jurors may be used to disprove or explain the alleged misconduct, but cannot, admitting the misconduct, be used to show that the verdict was not influenced thereby. People v. Stokes, supra. There being nothing in the affidavit of the bailiff tending to show misconduct, we are left solely to the statements contained in the affidavits of the motorman and conductor which we have already set forth.

By these affidavits it appears that on the ride out to the scene of the accident the jurors who were seated on the outside of the car "examined the brake of said car as the same was being operated by deponent and the mechanism thereof." This was the statement of the motorman, and the conductor said that being passengers and sitting in front on each side of the motorman the jurymen "examined the brake of said car, and the mechanism thereof, while on said car." This it is urged, was a taking of evidence by the jurors out of court contrary to the instructions of the court, of such importance that it constituted prejudicial misconduct. To us it seems that the statements of the motorman and conductor cannot be reasonably taken as meaning that the jurors made the critical investigation and examination of the brake and its mechanism suggested by counsel for appellant. They were riding on the outside of the car, and they saw the portion of the brake and its mechanism that was in plain sight, as it was being operated by the motorman, and that was practically all. They saw only what the parties to the action must have known they would naturally see if they rode on the outside of the car at all. Assuming that this was a technical receiving out of court of evidence, was it important enough to warrant a reversal? However strictly the decisions may lay down the rule as to the effect of misconduct of the jury that may well have prejudiced the parties, it is settled in this state that a new trial will not be granted on that ground where the misconduct was of such trifling nature that it could not in the nature of things have been prejudicial to the moving party, and that, where it appears that the fairness of the trial has been in no way affected by such impropriety, the verdict will not be disturbed. Siemens v. Oakland, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 494, 498, 66 Pac. 672. Counsel for appellant concedes that, if the evidence thus received was immaterial to any issue in the case, the misconduct was not prejudicial error. It is clear to us that the evidence alleged to have been received here was absolutely immaterial to any real issue in the case as the same was presented for determination. Nobody claimed that there was anything wrong with the brakes or their mechanism, or that the accident was due to any defect therein. The real issue in the case so far as defendant's liability was concerned was whether defendant's motorman was warranted in assuming that the Interurban car would not be at the crossing at the time he reached it. That he approached the crossing at such a rate of speed that he could not stop in time to avoid anything thereon, however well adapted to all purposes was his brake, appears to be undenied by any evidence. Under these circumstances, we cannot see that the so-called "examination" of the brake and its mechanism was a matter of any importance or that it could have been prejudicial to defendant's cause.

The other incident shown by these affidavits and relied on as prejudicial misconduct was the remark made by one of the jurors during the inspection of the scene of the accident at the time appellant's car approached the crossing: "That is the way Kimic was injured. If the tracks were wet, he could not have stopped his car before said crossing." It must be conceded that the juror was guilty of a violation of the instructions of the court and of his duty as a juror in making the statement. But we cannot go with appellant's learned counsel to the extent of holding that the statement necessarily showed "a prejudiced mind." It may well have been a statement made on the spur of the moment, caused entirely by an honest conclusion as to the speed at which the car had just approached the crossing. We cannot conceive that the incident could have ultimately affected the minds of intelligent jurors as we must assume the jurors who heard the statement to have been, to the prejudice of defendant's cause. It is claimed by appellant and alleged in the affidavits of both motorman and conductor that the car was under perfect control as it approached the crossing, and could have been stopped even if the tracks had been wet. The manner of approach was as patent to the other jurors as it was to the juror making the statement, and any conclusions in regard thereto by such other jurors would naturally be based on their own observations rather than on any statement made by another juror. But the manner of approach of this car under the control of other employés on a single occasion more than six months after the accident was so absolutely irrelevant to the real question at issue, the question whether another employé many months before had used proper care in approaching the same crossing, that, as we have said, we cannot conceive that it could have affected in the slightest degree the minds of any ordinarily intelligent juror in the determination of this case. And, as we have also said, we must assume that these jurors were men of at least ordinary intelligence. So far, therefore, as the other jurors are concerned, there is nothing that would warrant us in holding that the misconduct of the juror who made the statement may have operated prejudicially to defendant's cause. As to the juror who made the statement a somewhat different question is presented. It does appear from the statement itself that the manner of approach of appellant's car at that crossing on the day of the visit was such as to convince him that the motorman could not have stopped at the crossing if the track had been wet, and that he hastily concluded for the moment that the situation must have been the same at the time of the accident, and stated accordingly. The trial court was fully warranted in holding that the making of this statement did not necessarily show a prejudiced mind or a desire to influence other jurors against appellant, but that it was simply the expression of a hasty conclusion caused by what he believed he then observed in the presence of the other jurors. Are we compelled to assume, contrary to the conclusion of the trial court, that the proof as to the making of this statement by him shows that in so far as he was concerned the appellant may not have had a fair and impartial jury, and a determination reached solely on the evidence introduced on the trial? In view of what we have heretofore said, we believe that this question must be answered in the negative. The trial court was warranted in holding that the conclusion thus hastily reached and expressed, based as it was upon an absolutely irrelevant fact, could not have operated, in the nature of things, to affect the juror's mind in reaching a verdict. The case is very different on its facts from the cases cited and relied upon by appellant.

The foregoing disposes of all the points made for reversal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Margaret Spangler against James Spangler to recover possession of land. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. P. Veuve, for appellant. S. G. Tompkins, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This appeal is from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial in an action under section 1161, Code

Civ. Proc., to recover the possession of certain orchard land in Santa Clara county.

The defendant went into possession under a written lease from his mother, the plaintiff, to himself and to his sister, Annie Leal. The term was for five years, to commence November 1, 1902, with the privilege of an additional five years, provided that the lessees elected to avail themselves of the privilege prior to July 1, 1907. The rent reserved was $600 per annum, payable annually on the 1st day of October. The lease provided that the lessees should personally occupy and cultivate the premises and should not underlet any portion thereof, nor assign the lease, without the written consent of the lessor, under penalty of forfeiture. May 8, 1905, without the consent of the lessor, Annie Leal made an assignment to the defendant of all her interest in the lease; and in June, 1907, by a notice in writing, the defendant notified the plaintiff of this assignment, and also that he elected in his own name to renew the lease for an additional term of five years.

The important question in this case is: Was there a breach of the conditions of the lease, and a consequent forfeiture thereof, by its assignment, without the consent of the lessor, by Annie Leal to the defendant? The covenant is that the lessees shall not assign, and only one of them has done so. It does not provide that neither of the lessees shall assign, nor that one may not assign to the other; and construing this covenant strictly against the lessor, as the law requires us to do, it should be presumed to mean that the lease shall not be assigned by both. As the assignment was by one only of the lessees, there was no breach of the covenant, and therefore there was no forfeiture. This conclusion is sustained by the case of Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 595, 42 Pac. 977. There one of the covenants alleged to have been broken was as follows: "And the said lessees do hereby covenant * * * not to assign this lease, or permit any assignment thereof to be made, by bankruptcy or otherwise, without the written consent of the lessor." The breach alleged was a transfer or assignment of the interest of one of the tenants by proceedings in insolvency. The restriction there was stronger in several respects than the one here, and especially in that it provided that the lessees should not permit any assignment to be made. Yet the court held that the covenant not to assign was joint by two lessees, and was not broken by an assignment by one of the lessees of his interest therein. The court said: "When, therefore, under these circumstances, it was covenanted merely that the lessees should not assign the lease, the meaning of the parties is presumed to be that the lease should not be assigned in the only way in which it could have been assigned, namely, by the joint act of the lessees. The lease therefore was not assigned within the meaning of the contract. The covenant does not provide that the lease should be forfeited upon the assignment by one of the tenants in common of his interest. * * * Of course, it is unnecessary to cite authorities to the points that covenants in restraint of alienation are barely tolerated, and that contracts looking to penalties and forfeits must be strictly construed." See, also, 24 Cyc. 968.

Even if there had been a breach of the covenant in the particulars claimed by plaintiff in the present case, the evidence tends to show that she waived it, for she was notified of the assignment in June, 1907, but she made no objection to it at that time, and upon the rent becoming due for that year she demanded its payment, and later affirmed the continuance of the lease by bringing suit for the recovery of the rent. Randol v. Tatum, 98 Cal. 397, 33 Pac. 433. The right of a tenant to renew his lease is, unless restricted, assignable. 2 Wood, Landlord and Tenant (2d Ed.) § 413. As just seen, Annie Leal's right to assign was not restricted, and, even if it were, such restriction was waived. Therefore her assignee became entitled to all her rights and privileges under the lease, one of which was the right to an extension thereof for the term of five years, and it was not necessary, as suggested by plaintiff, that both tenants should exercise this option.

As there was no joint failure of the lessees to personally occupy, till, and cultivate the premises, there was, for reasons already stated, no forfeiture of the lease by reason of the fact that Annie Leal, one of the tenants, removed from the premises; but, if there were a breach of the covenant, it was waived, for Annie Leal left the premises immediately after the assignment by her to defendant in May, 1905, and did not thereafter return, yet the lessor, knowing of her absence, made no objection thereto, and received the rent as usual in October, 1905, in 1906, and demanded and sued for it in 1907.

The plaintiff further contends that she was entitled to possession of the property on the ground that the defendant continued to hold after default in the payment of rent for the year 1907, and after statutory notice and demand. June 22, 1905, Margaret Spangler, the plaintiff, made and executed to Annie Leal a deed of gift, conveying approximately 20 acres of the land in question, and when the rent for the year 1907 was about to become due Annie Leal, basing her claim upon this deed, demanded the sum of $200 as her proportion of the rent for that year. Upon the making of this claim defendant tendered to plaintiff the sum of $400, and thereafter commenced an action in the proper court against the plaintiff and Annie Leal, requiring them to interplead and litigate their claim to the $200, the balance of the rent, which action is still pending and undetermined. Conflicting claims having been made on the defendant for the rent, he had a right to require the claimants to interplead. Schluter

AHLERS et al. v. SMILEY et al. (Civ. 643.)
(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Sept. 18, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 310*)—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY—EFFECT OF EXHIBITS.

Whatever is an essential element to a cause of action must be presented by a distinct averment, and cannot be left to an inference to be drawn from the construction of a document attached to the complaint.

2. PLEADING (§ 18*)—CERTAINTY.

A pleading which leaves essential facts to inference or argument is bad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 39; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 11*)—MATTERS OF EVIDENCE.

Where the complaint in an action for breach of contract alleged a prior action, and copies of the findings and judgment therein were attached to the complaint and made a part of it, the copies were mere evidence as to the questions adjudicated in the former action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 11*)—MATTERS OF EVIDENCE.

A complaint merely stating the evidence from which the ultimate facts are deducible is bad, as the office of the complaint is to aver material, issuable facts constituting a cause of action.

5. JUDGMENT (§ 948*)—RES JUDICATA—PLEADING.

The rule that to render evidence available in support of a defense, based on matters of estoppel, such matters must be pleaded, does not apply to the statement of a cause of action by plaintiff, and plaintiff, to avail himself of the conclusiveness of facts established in a prior action need not plead the former recovery as it operates by way of estoppel to the defense set up.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1787; Dec. Dig. § 948.*]

6. JUDGMENT (§ 728*)—"RES JUDICATA"—COLLATERAL MATTERS.

As a general rule a judgment in a former action is not conclusive of any matters which only come collaterally in issue, nor of any matters incidentally cognizable, nor of any collateral facts offered in evidence to establish facts in issue.

7. JUDGMENT (§ 585*)—RES JUDICATA—DETERMINATION.

To determine whether the issues involved in a former suit constitute a bar to a second action, reference will ordinarily be had to a comparison of the records in the two cases.

8. JUDGMENT (§ 590*)—RES JUDICATA—MATTERS EXCEPTED.

A judgment which determines that, on account of the insufficiency of the pleadings to sustain a judgment for damages for breach of contract, the matter of damages is reserved and excepted from the operation of the judgment, does not bar a subsequent action for damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by J. L. Ahlers and another, formerly copartners, doing business under the firm name of Ahlers & East, against A. J. Smiley and another, copartners, doing business under the firm name of Smiley & Walls. There was a judgment granting relief, and plaintiffs appeal from an order denying a new trial, and defendants appeal from a like order and from the judgment. Judgment and orders reversed, with instructions.

E. E. Keech, for plaintiffs. F. O. Daniel, for defendants.

SHAW, J. Both parties prosecute appeals in this action. Plaintiffs appeal from the order of the court denying their motion for a new trial, and defendants appeal from a like order denying their motion for a new trial, and also from the judgment rendered against them.

Plaintiffs were manufacturers of ice in Santa Ana, and defendants were retailers of ice. On March 15, 1905, plaintiffs and defendants entered into a written contract whereby the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to buy and take from plaintiffs all the ice which defendants might require in supplying their trade for a period of two years at a price per ton stipulated in the contract. On July 24th following defendants refused to longer buy ice from plaintiffs, but from that date to March 15, 1906, purchased ice from other manufacturers with which they supplied their customers. The action is to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiffs on account of such alleged breach of the contract.

It appears that some four or five days after defendants began buying ice from others than plaintiffs the latter instituted an action to enjoin defendants from obtaining ice from such other parties with which to supply their customers. This action was tried on March 15, 1906, and an order made enjoining defendants as prayed for, which judgment had become final at the time the action at bar was instituted. By their complaint filed in this action plaintiffs allege the filing of the complaint, answer thereto, the findings and judgment in the former suit, copies of all of which are attached to and made a part of the complaint herein. The contract for the breach of which this action is instituted is not set out or otherwise pleaded in the present action; nor is it alleged in the complaint herein that the plaintiffs ever executed or made any contract whatsoever to supply defendants with ice. Defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint, and also moved to strike out of said complaint the several allegations referring to the complaint, answer, findings, and judgment in the former suit, as well as to strike out the copies of such documents attached to the complaint herein and made a part hereof. The court overruled the demurrer and denied the motion. In so doing we are of opinion the court erred. It must be noted that the action is not one upon a judgment, but to recover damages for a breach of a contract no description of which appears in the complaint, and in the absence of any allegation in the complaint to the effect that plaintiffs ever executed such contract. "Whatever is an essential element to a cause of action must be presented by a distinct averment, and cannot be left to an inference to be drawn from the construction of a document attached to the complaint." Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151. An allegation to the effect that plaintiffs had entered into the contract was a matter of substance without which the complaint did not state a cause of action. Here the execution of the instrument on the part of plaintiffs is left to inference or argument based upon the findings in the former case, wherein the court found that plaintiffs and defendants entered into a certain contract therein set out. The defect was not cured by such reference. Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298; Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 505, 23 Pac. 50, 227. At most, these documents so attached and therein referred to constitute mere evidence as to the questions adjudicated in the former suit. "Where a complaint merely states the evidence from which ultimate facts are deducible, a demurrer lies." McCaughy v. Schuette, 117 Cal. 223, 46 Pac. 666, 48 Pac. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 176; Thomas v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 426; Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750.

The record in the former suit, being evidentiary only, had no place in the complaint, and should have been stricken out. The office of the complaint is to aver material, issuable facts which constitute the cause of action, and not the evidence to prove those facts. Jones v. Petaluma, 36 Cal. 233; Willson v. Cleaveland, 30 Cal. 192. Plaintiffs contend that by the former action certain facts were conclusively established, but that it devolved upon them, in order to avail themselves of the conclusive character of such facts, to plead the judgment roll in such former action, together with such additional facts necessary to constitute a cause of action; that, in the absence of such pleading, the complaint would contain no allegation under which, if the issues rendered it material, the judgment and proceedings in the former case could be admitted in evidence. While as a general rule, in order to render evidence available in support of a defense based upon matters of estoppel, such matters must be pleaded, the rule does not apply to the statement of a cause of action by plaintiff. Indeed, under our system of pleading, no opportunity is afforded for such pleading on the part of plaintiff. Nevertheless, the record may be given in evidence with the same conclusive effect as if it had been specially pleaded. The record in the former case could have no place in the complaint to recover damages on account of the breach of the contract. As said in Wixson v. Devine, 67 Cal. 341, 7 Pac. 776: "It was not necessary or proper for plaintiff to plead his former recovery. It operated by way of estoppel to the defense set up by the defendant, and, as we have in our system of pleadings no replication to the answer, the estoppel could not properly be pleaded." To the same effect is Riverside Land, etc., Co. v. Jensen, 108 Cal. 146, 41 Pac. 40; Clink v. Thurston, 47 Cal. 30; Flandreau v. Downey, 23 Cal. 354.

While the judgment and orders must be reversed for the foregoing reasons, it is proper, in view of the fact that a new trial may be had, to notice another point which defendants assign as reversible error. Defendants in their answer allege "that the matter of said damages, alleged to have been suffered by plaintiffs from said alleged failure of these defendants to comply with said alleged contract, has been once adjudicated and determined, and that it cannot now be litigated in this action, and that plaintiffs are, and each of them is, estopped by reason thereof to maintain this action"; and they contend that such allegation is conclusively proven by the documents contained in the record in the former case. As a general rule, a judgment in a former case is not conclusive of any matters which only come collaterally in issue, nor of any matters incidentally cognizable, nor of any collateral facts which are offered in evidence to establish facts in issue. Lillis v. Ditch Co., 95 Cal. 553, 30 Pac. 1108. For the purpose of determining whether the issues involved in a former suit constitute a bar to a second action reference will ordinarily be had to a comparison of the records in the two cases. Here, however, the judgment in the former action which defendants attempt to plead as a bar solemnly adjudges and decrees "that, on account of the insufficiency of the pleadings * * * in this action to warrant or sustain a judgment for damages which may have accrued to the plaintiffs, the matter of damages is hereby reserved and excepted from the operation of this judgment, to be determined by a separate action to be brought by the plaintiffs for that purpose if necessary." Without regard to the rule, this judgment, so long as it stands, presents an insurmountable obstacle to defendants' contention on the grounds stated.

There is no merit in defendants' contention that electing to sue for an injunction was a waiver of plaintiffs' right to assert a claim for damages in a subsequent action.

Under the views herein expressed, it does not appear necessary to discuss other points argued by counsel.

The judgment and both orders are reversed, with instruction that the court sustain the general demurrer interposed by defendants, and grant their motion to strike from the complaint the parts thereof designated in said motion, and grant leave to the parties to file such amended pleadings as they may be advised.

SAN FRANCISCO TEAMING CO. v. GRAY et al. (Civ. 618.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Sept. 15, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 314*)—HEARSAY—BASIS FOR EXCLUSION.

The exclusion of hearsay evidence is based on the principle that every person has the right to face the witness against him and to test him by cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1168; Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 318*)—HEARSAY—MEMORANDA FROM ORAL STATEMENTS.

In an action for the use of teams and drivers furnished by plaintiff to defendant, a book of items made by plaintiff's bookkeeper from memoranda made by him from oral statements by the drivers as to their work, and afterward copied into the book, is inadmissible because mere hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1195, 1198; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 354*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

A ledger to which items of account had been transferred from other books and memoranda is not admissible as a book of original entries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1432-1483; Dec. Dig. § 354.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

That there was other evidence that plaintiff furnished teams and drivers, and that they did certain work for defendant, without giving the items of such work, does not render harmless the error of admitting in evidence a book containing items of such work made from hearsay memoranda.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Teaming Company against Harry N. Gray and another. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ames & Manning, for appellants. Arnold W. Liechti, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to recover a balance claimed to be due for the use of teams and teamsters furnished by plaintiff to defendants at their request. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

There is only one question discussed in the briefs, and that is as to the ruling of the court in admitting, over the objection of defendants, a certain book called a "work book," containing the names of certain teamsters, the dates and number of loads hauled, the place from which and to where the loads were taken, and the name of the persons for whom the hauling was done; the account in this case being a charge against defendants.

Plaintiff called as a witness one Milestone, who testified that he was in the employ of the plaintiff as bookkeeper during the time the teams were claimed to have been furnished, and that he kept the accounts and a full set of books—a work book, ledger, cash book, journal, and check book; that the work book shown him contained entries of the work performed entered from a memorandum paper into the work book, and that the work book was correctly kept so far as he knew; that it was his custom to leave the barn between 4 and 5 o'clock of each day, and go from the barn out to the camp at Fourteenth street and catch the different teamsters as they came in, and get an oral statement from each teamster as to what work had been done by him during the day; that he procured such oral statements from the teamsters and put them down on a memorandum paper, and took back such memoranda to his office and the same evening or the following morning he would enter in the work book "the name of the teamster, the number of loads from where and where to." The witness clearly showed that the facts were obtained first by the oral statements of the various teamsters, then transferred by him to a memorandum or temporary paper, and then afterwards entered by him into the work book, which was the book offered and received in evidence. The book was objected to upon the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent and hearsay, and that no proper foundation had been laid for its introduction. The court overruled the objection, and allowed the book in evidence. After the book was so admitted, the attorneys for defendants moved to strike out the testimony contained in the pages which were read as to the account against defendants, upon the ground that the book was hearsay and the court denied the motion. No teamster was called, nor was any attempt made to account for the absence of such teamsters as witnesses. The first entry or memorandum made by the witness on paper was but the oral statement of the teamsters. Such teamsters were not under oath, and were not brought into court so that their statements could be tested by cross-examination.

It was long ago laid down by the courts of England that, on account of the necessity of the case and to prevent a failure of justice, the books of original entries, or the shop books as they were called, in certain cases might be introduced in evidence. The entry must have been made in the ordinary course of business and by a person since deceased or beyond the jurisdiction of the court. It was necessary to prove that the merchant or tradesman whose books were offered kept correct books of account, and that the entry was made in the usual course of business by one who had knowledge of the facts. These entries were admitted by the courts as exceptions to the general rule excluding hearsay evidence, in order to prevent a total failure of justice. It was said in the early case of Lefebure v. Worden, 2 Ves. 38: "So far the courts of justice have gone (and that was going a good way, and perhaps broke in upon the original strict rules of evidence) that where there was such evidence (entries) by a servant known in transacting the business, as in a goldsmith's shop by a cashier or bookkeeper, such entry, supported on the oath of that servant that he used to make entries from time to time and that he made them truly, has been read. Further, where that servant, agent or bookkeeper has been dead, if there is proof that he was the servant or agent usually employed in such business, was intrusted to make such entries by his master, (and) that it was the course of trade, on proof that he was dead and that it was his handwriting, such entry has been read (which was Sir Biby Lake's case). And that was going a great way; for there it might be objected that such entry was the same as if made by the master himself; yet by reason of the difficulty of making proof in cases of this kind the Court has gone so far." Applying the principles and rules laid down by the able judges of the higher courts of England and of this country, we do not think the evidence was admissible, but that it was purely hearsay.

The fact that it became necessary for plaintiff to prove was that he furnished certain teams and certain drivers to defendants at their request, and the amount and nature of such services, or a contract fixing the amount which was to be paid. Plaintiff does not appear to have kept any timekeeper or person who knew of his own knowledge the number of teams and teamsters furnished, and the number of days that they were employed by defendants. The fact which plaintiff did prove was certain oral statements by the various teamsters. The essential witnesses—the parties who did the work and knew the facts—were not called. The witness who was called did not testify to the truth of the facts, but to its having been asserted on the extrajudicial occasions on which the various oral statements were given. The evidence of the teamsters was conveyed by the witness, who told in court what other parties had told him. The exclusion of hearsay evidence is based upon the principle that every litigant who comes into a court of justice has a clear right to have the witness against him brought into court face to face, so that he may be tested by cross-examination as to every fact concerning which he has given evidence. It has been said that a person who relates a hearsay is not obliged to enter into any particulars, to answer any questions, to solve any difficulties, to reconcile any contradictions, to explain any obscurities, to remove any ambiguities. He entrenches himself in his simple assertion that he was told so and so, and leaves the burden upon his dead or absent author. In this case the witness testified only to having made an entry of what was told him by the teamsters. He does not even give a single name of any one of the persons whose statement he received, nor does he give a single segregated fact as being told him by any one person. He only in effect says: "I was told by the various teamsters the various statements I entered in the work book."

We have examined the various cases cited by counsel for respondent, but we do not find any case which supports the rule as broadly as contended for here. On the contrary, in our opinion, the great weight of authority, both in England and in this country, supports the rule as we have given it. It is said by Greenleaf (volume 1, § 120a [16th Ed.]): "The entries must have been in the ordinary course of business * * * fairly contemporaneous with the events recorded * * * must be produced in its original form * * * and of a fact within the personal knowledge of the declarant." In Underhill on Evidence, § 60, it is said: "Upon the question whether entries made in the books of a party to the suit are admissible as evidence in his own favor, under the proposition that such entries constitute a part of the res gestæ, the cases are at considerable variance. If the entry was made by an employé of the party, having personal knowledge of the fact, in the usual course of his employment, in books which were kept for such entries, and if it was made at or near the date of the transaction and is illustrative of it, then there can be no objection to its admission upon the principles already laid down. It is really hearsay evidence, however, because the bookkeeper or other person making the entry was not on oath or cannot be produced, or, being produced, has wholly forgotten the circumstances attending the transaction." In a very exhaustive note to Post v. Kenerson (Vt.) 52 L. R. A., the question is discussed, and many authorities cited. On page 595 the rule is thus summed up by the author of the note: "As a general rule, although there are cases holding otherwise, it is essential to the admissibility of entries made by a living witness that he should be able to state that or about the time the entries were made he knew their contents, and knew them to be true, so that the entries and the testimony of the witness concurrently shall be equivalent to a present affirmation of the truth of their contents."

In Swan v. Thurman, 112 Mich. 416, 70 N. W. 1023, it appeared that the only testimony to support the books was that of the bookkeeper, who merely transcribed the entries from slips handed to him by salesmen and had no personal knowledge of the sale and delivery of the articles charged. The court said: "It is sometimes proper to admit books of account as evidence of the acts of those who keep them where the entries are contemporaneous with the acts recorded. But where the book is, as in this case, the record of the acts of others not within the personal knowledge of the bookkeeper, but made up from the statements of others, such book is hearsay. From the earliest cases the admission of entries by third persons has proceeded upon the theory that such persons had personal knowledge of the facts stated in the entry." In the late case of Chicago Lumbering Co. v. Hewitt, 64 Fed. 314, 12 C. C. A. 129, the Circuit Court of the United States held that a book in which one person set down the total amount of logs scaled from memoranda furnished him by another person who did the work is not admissible to prove the amount of logs scaled, unless supplemented by the testimony of the person furnishing the original data. The court said: "That McFadden was able to testify that his additions were correct and that he had correctly entered the amounts thus ascertained is not enough. The fact which it was important to the plaintiffs to prove was the lumber contents of the logs placed in the river above the defendant company's boom from the camp of which McFadden was foreman. What McFadden knew was that Foley, whose duty it was to scale the logs put in the river each day from that camp, had by his tally board memoranda reported a given number of logs, containing when aggregated a given number of feet, as having been set afloat on a particular day. If McFadden had made his entries from oral statements made by persons having knowledge of the number and contents of logs floated each day, such entries would not have been competent without calling the persons who knew the facts and on whose authority the entries had been made. Is there any distinction in the evidential value of entries made on the oral statement of clerks or servants who know the facts and memoranda made for convenience in aiding memory of such clerks or servants? We can see none." See, further, the following cases: Dodge v. Morrow et al., 14 Ind. App. 534, 41 N. E. 967, 43 N. E. 153; Bouldin v. Atl. Rice Mills Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 795; Chisholm v. Beaman Machine Co., 160 Ill. 101, 43 N. E. 796; Chaffee v. U. S., 95 U. S. 516, 21 L. Ed. 912; Gould v.

Hartley, 187 Mass. 561, 73 N. E. 656; Van Name v. Barber, 115 App. Div. 593, 100 N. Y. Supp. 987. The book, which was afterwards offered by plaintiff, called the ledger was inadmissible for the reasons above stated, and further for the reason that it was not a book of original entries. It does not in any way appear where the data were obtained in the charges of "April 2, Bill J. 4, $711.70," and of "May 1, Bill J. 4, $747.40," except by the reference to the journal.

The claim of respondent that, if the admission of said books was error, such error was harmless, upon the ground as contended that sufficient other evidence was offered to support plaintiff's claim, cannot be upheld. It is true there was other evidence that plaintiff furnished to defendant teams and teamsters, and that they did certain work for defendants; but the amount of such labor and the number of days the teams were in the employ of defendants can only be ascertained from the entries in the work book. Not only is this true, but the defendant offered and read in evidence without objection a time book kept by one Heisler, their timekeeper, who had charge of the business of keeping accounts of the teams furnished to defendants by plaintiff. This book was in direct conflict with the work book offered in evidence by plaintiff as to many items, and made the amount of the plaintiff's claim much less than the amount for which judgment was given. We are aware that cases arise, and will continue to arise, in which much difficulty is found in proving the many items of original entries taken from clerks, agents, or employes, particularly where there is a large number of such clerks, agents, or employes. But the rule we have adopted appears to us to be the correct one on principle. If the rule contended for by respondent in this case were followed, it would lay the foundation for gross frauds. Books might be intentionally filled with overcharges based upon hearsay. The defendant would have no opportunity to investigate the truth of the alleged hearsay evidence. It is better that the rule be certain and not extended so as to include hearsay evidence, than that it be overturned to avoid the hardships of some particular case.

It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by Charles Samuels against Grover B. Larrimore. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes separate appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. J. Webb, for appellant. Leon Samuels, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. These two appeals are in separate records; but they will be considered together, as one is an appeal by defendant from the judgment against him, and the other from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and the questions are all considered together in the briefs filed by counsel. The complaint is as follows: "That within two years last past said defendant became indebted to one Frank A. Whitman in the sum of $635.86 for so much money loaned and advanced to said defendant by said Whitman at various times during said period at the special instance and request of said defendant. That prior to the commencement of this action said Whitman assigned, transferred, and set over unto plaintiff said claim, demand, and cause of action against said defendant. That no part of said indebtedness has been paid, and that there is now due, owing, and payable by said defendant to said plaintiff on account of said indebtedness said sum of $635.86, together with interest thereon at the legal rate from the date of such loans and advances." The complaint concludes with the usual prayer for judgment for the amount claimed.

The first contention of appellant is that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the complaint. His argument is that the complaint does not allege nonpayment. The contention is entirely devoid of merit. After alleging the facts as to how the indebtedness arose and the amount thereof, the allegation is "that no part of said indebtedness has been paid." The word "indebtedness" is not here used as it has sometimes been in the body of a pleading, in which the courts have said that it was a conclusion of law. As it is here used in the last paragraph of the complaint it refers to the said sum of $635.86, which it is alleged had been loaned and advanced to defendant at his special instance and request. Any person of ordinary understanding would know that the pleader, by the word "indebtedness" as here used in said paragraph, refers to the sum which he had alleged had been advanced to defendant by plaintiff's assignor.

Nor is there any merit in appellant's claim that the plaintiff should have alleged a demand of payment. The complaint is of itself a demand; and not only this, but the answer of defendant shows that a demand would have been unavailing. Defendant in one part of his answer denies the indebtedness, and in another and separate part he alleges that the money was advanced to him by plaintiff's assignor upon the understanding that he was to repay it only when convenient to him, and that "it has not been convenient for said defendant to repay any portion thereof to said Whitman."

The appellant further urges that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings because, as he contends, the money was to be repaid only "when convenient, or when business picked up." This question was passed upon by the trial court, and in our opinion the evidence justifies the findings. It certainly is not the ordinary way of doing business for one man to advance money to another upon an express understanding that the one receiving the money will be allowed to repay it or not according to his own idea as to "convenience," or as to "business picking up." It would require a very clear case, we apprehend, to satisfy any court that such a bargain was made. In fact, in all cases where there is a general conversation by the party advancing money, or delivering property as to "taking your own time to pay," or "use your own convenience to pay," or "you can pay me when able," the courts as a general thing hold that the payment should be made within a reasonable time. When a friend advances money to another, and uses such expressions, he does not intend to give the money. He expects the party to act honorably, and not to repudiate the debt, but to repay it within a reasonable time. It is not to be presumed that a man would receive money under such circumstances from a friend, and when the money is sought to be recovered use the very expressions of confidence, kindness, and friendship as means to defeat a recovery.

There are cases in which it has been made clearly to appear that the intention of the party or parties furnishing the money was to leave it entirely at the option of the party receiving it to repay it or not; in other words, to the sense of honor of the party receiving it. Such is not this case. The moneys were advanced to defendant about a year before this action was commenced. Defendant cannot complain that he did not have a reasonable time within which to repay it.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CURTIN v. INGLE. (Civ. 661.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—DISPOSITION—LAW OF CASE ON REMAND.

A decision of the appellate court construing a contract is binding upon the trial court on remand if the evidence as to the contract and the conduct of the parties thereunder is the same on retrial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by D. A. Curtin against J. W. Ingle. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for further proceedings as directed.

Cannon & Freeman and E. F. Treadwell, for appellant. Wal J. Tuska, for respondent.

HALL, J. Appeal from judgment in favor of defendant and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff sought to recover for 11,519 grain bags, being a portion of 14,500 alleged to have been delivered by Moore, Ferguson & Co., the assignors of plaintiff, to defendant, to be filled with grain and shipped to Moore, Ferguson & Co. or accounted for, and if not accounted for to be paid for at 7 cents each. It is alleged that 11,519 of the 14,500 bags were never accounted for. In a separate count plaintiff also sought to recover $34.50 for money had and received by defendant to the use of said Moore, Ferguson & Co. The court found that defendant had duly accounted for all of said 14,500 bags, and also that defendant did not have or receive to the use of Moore, Ferguson & Co. the sum of $34.50, or any other sum of money. Appellant in his brief attacks these findings as not supported by the evidence.

The case has been before the Supreme Court upon two former appeals. Upon the first appeal judgment in favor of plaintiff and the order denying defendant a new trial were reversed for error in excluding material evidence offered for defendant. Curtin v. Ingle, 137 Cal. 95, 69 Pac. 836, 1013.

Upon the second appeal the court had before it substantially the same evidence concerning the principal cause of action as in the record before us. The plaintiff then relied upon the very same writings as constituting the contract with defendant as are relied upon now. The court held that under the contract upon which the bags were delivered to defendant he was not required to account directly to Moore, Ferguson & Co., but could account to one Crosby, and that the evidence showed without conflict that he did account to Crosby for the bags. Curtin v. Ingle, 143 Cal. 354, 77 Pac. 74. The court there said: "There is no evidence in the record tending to show that it was ever agreed that any of these bags should be returned empty by defendant to plaintiffs at San Francisco. The contract left it optional with defendant to use and pay for any of these bags that he did not ship filled with grain to the plaintiffs at San Francisco, or to account for any and all of the unused bags. The evidence shows without conflict that the defendant did account to Crosby for the bags, and it appears from the undisputed evidence that the defendant was warranted in reaching the conclusion that such was his duty. He had been told in two letters from plaintiffs that he was dealing in reference to these same bags with Crosby, and not with plaintiffs, and also that he must continue to deal with Crosby."

The evidence in the record before us shows without conflict that defendant did account to Crosby for all unreturned bags, and that Crosby accepted the bags and subsequently offered them for sale. Upon this evidence the trial court could not do otherwise under the decision upon the last appeal than to find for the defendant and render judgment accordingly.

As to the action for the $34.50 for money had and received, it appears that Moore, Ferguson & Co. advanced to defendant through Crosby, upon a shipment of oats that defendant made to said firm. Moore, Ferguson & Co., under defendant's letter of instructions, sold the oats for Ingle's account, and credited him with the net proceeds thereof, against the advance of $246 and promptly rendered to Ingle a correct account of sale, showing a balance of $34.50 to his debit. Respondent, concerning this matter, contents himself with saying: "The judge of the superior court hearing the evidence found against the plaintiff's contention as to the $34.50, and there being a conflict of evidence his decision is final"—but fails to point to any evidence in the record in conflict with that above adverted to by us. We have diligently searched for any such and have failed to find it. Though defendant gave testimony, he does not in any way refer to the transaction about the oats. Upon the former appeal it was held that the evidence sustained the finding in favor of plaintiff as to the $34.50, and it appears to us that such evidence in the record before us is without conflict. A new trial should be had as to the issues under the count seeking to recover $34.50 for money had and received; but, as the findings upon the issues presented under the other counts are fully supported by the evidence, no retrial is necessary as to such issues.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court to retry the issues of fact arising under the last count in the complaint and to make findings thereon, and thereupon to enter such judgment as shall be warranted by the findings so made and the findings heretofore made upon the issues arising under the other counts of the complaint.

SHERMAN v. GRAY et al. (Civ. 662.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 18, 1909. Rehearing Denied Oct. 15, 1909; Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1909.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 163*)—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Civ. Code, § 1670, provides that every contract by which the amount of damages to be paid, or other compensation to be made for a breach, is determined in anticipation thereof, is void, except as expressly provided in section 1671, which declares that contracting parties may agree on an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage. Held that, where a contract for grading fixed $1,000 as liquidated damages for breach thereof by either party, the burden was on defendants to show that the clause was valid and enforceable.

2. DAMAGES (§ 85*)—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—ACTUAL DAMAGES—ASCERTAINMENT.

Defendants contracted to remove 7,000 cubic yards surplus sand from plaintiff's block and pay therefor 6¼ cents per cubic yard, to level and grade the block and streets to the official grade, and cover the entire surface with two inches of clay; the contract allowing $1,000 for liquidated damages for breach thereof by either party. Defendants moved 4,388 cubic yards of sand in excess of the quantity specified, but did nothing on the other part of the contract. It was shown that plaintiff, in order to bring the land to the official grade, would be required to place thereon 4,388 cubic yards of earth at an expense of $1,090.17, and that there was a balance due for sand removed of $517.23. Held that, from such evidence, it was practical to ascertain plaintiff's actual damages, and that the liquidated damage provision did not limit the extent of plaintiff's recovery.

3. DAMAGES (§ 85*)—PENALTY—ELECTION.

Where a contract contains a penalty provision for breach, plaintiff has his election to sue for the penalty or for breach of contract, and, in the latter event, his damages are not limited to the penalty.

4. DAMAGES (§ 140*)—ALLOWANCE—DOUBLE DAMAGES.

Where defendant contracted to remove a certain amount of sand from plaintiff's block and pay a specified price per cubic yard, and in fact removed 4,388 cubic yards in excess of the quantity specified, a judgment requiring defendants to pay the contract price for the excess, and also to pay the cost of restoring to the lot an equal amount of filling, was erroneous for allowing double damages for the same item.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judges.

Action by Lucia H. K. Sherman against George F. Gray and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames and Ames & Manning, for appellants. Myrick & Deering, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages for breach of contract. Plaintiff owned a piece of land in San Francisco known as "block No. 39," bounded by Van Ness avenue, Polk street, North Point, and Bay street, and on February 21, 1901, entered into a contract with defendants, by the terms of which the defendants were to remove 7,000 cubic yards of surplus sand from said block and to pay therefor 6¼ cents per cubic yard. They were also to level and grade said block and streets to the official grade, and to cover the entire surface of said block and one-half the streets fronting thereon with clay to the depth of two inches, all of which was to be done on or before August 31, 1902, and without any expense to the plaintiff. It appears from the findings (which are supported by the evidence) that the defendants removed from the said block 11,388 cubic yards of sand, being 4,388 cubic yards in excess of the quantity specified in the contract; that they did not grade or level to the official grade the said block and streets, nor cover said block and one-half of said streets with clay to the depth of two inches or at all. The court further found that plaintiff, in order to bring her said land to the official grade and level, will be obliged to place thereon 4,388 cubic yards of earth, which will cost her the sum of $1,090.17; that the defendants have paid the plaintiff only $144.52 on account of the amount due to her for the sand removed from her said block, leaving a balance due thereon of $567.23. In accordance with these findings, a judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,657.47. The appeal is from that judgment and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The contract contained the following provision: "For any violation of or default in the stipulations or covenants of either of the parties to this agreement, the defaulting party shall pay to the aggrieved party the sum of $1,000 as liquidated damages." The court below held this clause of the contract void under section 1670, Civ. Code, and awarded the plaintiff the actual damages. That section reads: "Every contract by which the amount of damages to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in the next section." The next section (section 1671) is as follows: "The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damages sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage."

Defendants assert that there is no evidence whatever upon the question whether it was practicable or not to fix the actual damages suffered by the plaintiff, and that therefore the finding of the court that this provision of the contract is void cannot be sustained. If there was no evidence on the subject, still defendants' position cannot be maintained, for, under the sections just quoted, and under the decisions, the burden was upon the defendants to show by competent evidence that the clause of the contract arbitrarily fixing the damages was valid. This point was considered in Patent Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 Pac. 890, where there was a stipulation in a building contract to pay the owner a specified amount as liquidated damages for each day's delay in completing the building. The court held that this provision in the contract was not of itself, in the absence of all other evidence on the subject, sufficient to sustain the clause. The court further said that while there might be contracts which from their very nature would warrant parties in anticipating and fixing damages to be recovered on a breach, yet, said the court, "It must always, it seems to us, be demonstrated by satisfactory evidence that the case is one where such liquidated damages may, under the statute, be contracted for and recovered." In Long Beach, etc., Dist. v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 401, 405, 67 Pac. 409, 501, it is said: "It is clearly incumbent upon the party seeking to recover upon such agreement (liquidated damage clause) to show by averment and proof that his case is within the exception." In Montana the law on this subject is in the same language as ours, and there, in Deuninck v. West G. I. Co., 28 Mont. 255, 72 Pac. 618, the court said: "If a suit be brought on a contract for the actual, and not the liquidated, damages, it is for the defendant to show the court by proper answer and competent proof that the contract for stated damages is valid."

But we think the findings complained of are supported by the evidence. An expert civil engineer, called on behalf of plaintiff, testified that it would take 4,388 cubic yards of earth to bring the block to the official grade established at the time the contract was made. Two other witnesses were called by the plaintiff, who for 41 and 25 years, respectively, had been engaged as contractors in grading and leveling blocks and streets, and they testified that it would cost a certain fixed sum per cubic yard to fill and grade the block, and another certain sum per cubic yard to cover the described area with clay. From the testimony of these witnesses it appears that it was not an impracticable, but, on the contrary, a simple, matter, to ascertain plaintiff's actual damages. This case in one respect is like Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 110, 120, 27 Pac. 36, 38, 25 Am. St. Rep. 102, for, "when the plaintiff rested, the 'nature of the case' * * * was such that the court could decide as a fact that it was neither extremely difficult nor impracticable to fix the actual damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of defendant's breach of the contract."

Defendants suggest that, "even if the provision as to liquidated damages be void as to the fixing of the amount of damages, it may still be of effect as setting the limit of damages." To sustain this position People v. Central Pacific Ry. Co., 76 Cal. 38, 39, 18 Pac. 90, 95, is cited, where the court said: "The statement of a penalty in a contract is of very little importance; its only consequence being to limit a recovery of actual damages, so that no more perhaps can be recovered than the sum named in the penalty." But in that case the question was not before the court whether the amount stated in the contract was the limit of the recovery, and what the court said in that regard was purely by way of dictum. Treating, however, the provision as a penalty, still the amount named would not be the limit of plaintiff's recovery. In Noyes v. Phillips, 60 N. Y. 408, there was an agreement for an exchange of land with this clause, "and the parties to these presents each agree to give a good and sufficient deed for their respective pieces of property on or about the 1st day of April, 1873, or forfeit the sum of $500," and defendants' counsel asked the court to charge that the jury could not under any circumstances go beyond the sum of $500, or that sum and interest from April 1, 1873. The court declined so to charge, and defendants' counsel excepted. The jury found a verdict for $1,000. Appellant contended that "the recovery could not exceed $500." The appellate court (Chief Justice Church) said as follows: "The second point is not tenable. It being a penalty and contained in an agreement inter parties, the plaintiff has his election to sue for the penalty or for a breach of the contract. In the latter event he is not limited in the amount of damages to the penalty"—and the judgment below was affirmed. This ruling was followed in Matter of Carter, 21 App. Div. 118, 123, 47 N. Y. Supp. 383. So, also, the Supreme Court of Florida, in Smith v. Newell, 37 Fla. 147, 20 South. 249, after discussing the question whether the sum was liquidated damages or penalty, says that, if the sum mentioned in the contract is construed to be merely a penalty, the plaintiff "must prove the actual damage that he has sustained, and he cannot in such a case recover any greater sum as damages than his proof shows him to have actually sustained in consequence of the breach of the contract. In such cases plaintiff is entitled to recover all such damages as he proves himself to have exactly sustained in consequence of the breach, whether they exceed the amount of the penalty mentioned in the contract or not. The amount of the penalty does not, in such cases, limit the amount of the recovery."

The court in its judgment required the defendants to pay the plaintiff  $6\frac{1}{4}$  cents per cubic yard for the 4,388 cubic yards of sand removed, and at the same time compels them to pay what it will cost to restore to the lot this amount of sand, thus for the one item of injury giving to the plaintiff double damages.

The judgment is therefore hereby modified by deducting therefrom the sum of \$274.25, the amount allowed for the 4,388 cubic yards of sand at  $6\frac{1}{4}$  cents per cubic yard, and, thus modified, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed; appellants to recover costs of this appeal.

The Cartwright act (St. 1907, p. 984, c. 530, § 1), defining "trusts," and providing that for a violation of the section any person engaged shall be punished by fine of not less than $50 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than a year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, prescribes a "misdemeanor," since under Pen. 2. STATUTES (§ 92*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—CLASSIFICATION.

The power to classify, conferred by Const. art. 11, § 6, so far as cities are concerned, is not limited strictly to purposes of incorporation and organization.

3. STATUTES (§ 98*)—GENERAL OR SPECIAL LAW—POLICE COURTS—MISDEMEANORS.

Pol. Code, § 4426, gives police courts in cities exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding \$500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months. St. 1901, p. 95, c. 81, § 2, creating police courts in cities of the  $1\frac{1}{2}$  class, gives such courts exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, or by both. Const. art. 6, § 1, provides that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in certain designated courts and such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporated city, and section 13 empowers the Legislature to fix by law the jurisdiction of such inferior courts as may be established. Const. art. 4, § 25, provides that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws regulating the jurisdiction of police judges. Held, that St. 1901, p. 95, c. 81, § 2, is not in conflict with Const. art. 4, § 25, since it is a general law applicable to all cities included in that class.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 84*)—CITY COURTS—JURISDICTION—STATUTES.

St. 1901, p. 95, c. 81, § 2, creating police courts in cities of the  $1\frac{1}{2}$  class, and conferring on them jurisdiction of all misdemeanors, is a general law, and hence is repugnant to Pol. Code, § 4426, limiting such jurisdiction, and repeals it so far as it relates to courts in cities of the class named.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 90*)—POLICE COURTS—JURISDICTION—MONOPOLIES—CARTWRIGHT LAW.

St. 1901, p. 97, c. 81, § 12, gives police courts of cities of the  $1\frac{1}{2}$  class exclusive jurisdiction in misdemeanors and is a general law. The Cartwright law (St. 1907, p. 984, c. 530), defining a "trust," and making a violation of the act a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment, or both, does not name a place of punishment. Held, that to sustain the jurisdiction of a police court, in a city of the class named the provision of St. 1901, p. 97, c. 81, § 12, prescribing that imprisonment for misdemeanors should be in the city jail, would be read into the Cartwright law.

Application by the Union Ice Company and others against H. H. Rose, City Justice of the Peace and Ex Officio Police Judge of Los Angeles, and others, for a writ of prohibition. Application denied.

Sidney J. Parsons, O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, Wm. J. Variel, J. N. O. Rech, and Gray, Barker & Bowen, for petitioners. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and Frank W. Blair, Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the police court of the city of Los Angeles and H. H. Rose, a judge thereof, from proceeding further in the prosecution of an action of the people of the state of California against the petitioners upon a criminal charge of violating the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved March 23, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 984, c. 530), commonly known and designated as the "Cartwright Law."

Petitioners base their application upon two grounds: First, that the act in question fails to designate the offense described therein as a misdemeanor, and likewise fails to specify the place of confinement on conviction. Second, conceding the violation of the provisions of said act to constitute a misdemeanor only, the act of 1901, establishing the police court of Los Angeles, approved March 5, 1901, in so far as it attempts to confer jurisdiction upon said court, is unconstitutional. St. 1901, p. 95, c. 81. Section 1 of the Cartwright act defines a "trust," and declares every such trust to be unlawful, against public policy, and void. There is no express designation of the offense, and whether such violation of the acts prohibited constitutes a misdemeanor or a felony must be determined by reference to the punishment prescribed for a violation of its provisions. By section 4 of the act it is declared: "Any violation of either or all of the provisions of this act shall be and is hereby declared a conspiracy against trade, and any person who may become engaged in any such conspiracy or take part therein, or aid or advise in its commission, or who shall as principal, manager, director, agent, servant or employé, or in any other capacity, knowingly carry out any of the stipulations, purposes, prices, rates, or furnish any information to assist in carrying out such purposes, or orders thereunder or in pursuance thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than fifty ($50) dollars nor more than five thousand ($5,000) dollars, or be imprisoned not less than six months nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Each day's violation of this provision shall constitute a separate offense." Under the provisions of this section the acts with which petitioners are charged with doing constitute a public offense or crime. Section 15, Pen. Code. By section 16 of the Penal Code, crimes are divided into two, and only two, classes: (1) Felonies; (2) misdemeanors. Section 17 of the Penal Code defines these two classes of crimes as follows: "A felony is a crime which is punishable with death or by imprisonment in the state prison. Every other crime is a misdemeanor." The law does not define misdemeanors as those offenses punishable by fine or imprisonment in the county or city jail, but as those for which the penalty imposed, whatsoever it may be, is other than death or imprisonment in the state prison. The conclusion would therefore seem irresistible that, since the offense is clearly a crime for which a penalty is imposed, the punishment for which, however, is not that prescribed for a felony, it must necessarily and logically follow that it is a misdemeanor. As said in Pillsbury v. Brown, 47 Cal. 480: "A misdemeanor is an act or omission for which a punishment, other than death or imprisonment in the state prison, is denounced by law."

Conceding the offense designated to be a misdemeanor, petitioners, nevertheless, insist that the police court of cities of the 1½ class, to which the city of Los Angeles belongs, is without jurisdiction to try the case. This contention is based upon the claim that, while the right of the Legislature to create the court is unquestioned, the act of 1901, under which such court was established, in so far as it purports to confer upon the court exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors committed in the city, is not only in conflict with section 4426, Pol. Code, but is an attempted exercise of power not warranted by the Constitution. Said section 4426, Pol. Code, provides that: "The police court has exclusive jurisdiction of the following public offenses committed within the city boundaries: * * * (3) Breaches of the peace, riots, affrays, committing willful injury to property, and all misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment." Under the provisions of this section, it would seem clear that the police court has not jurisdiction of misdemeanors committed under the Cartwright law, for the reason that such offenses are punishable by fines and imprisonment in excess of that over which such courts are thereby given jurisdiction. Section 2 of the act of 1901, creating police courts for cities of the 1½ class, provides: "Said police court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine or by imprisonment, or by both such fine and imprisonment, committed in the city where such police court is held; and in all such cases to try and determine the same, convict or acquit, pass and enter judgment and carry such judgment into execution as the case may require, according to law." Say petitioners in their brief: "Obviously, if this statute is constitutional, the police court has jurisdiction in the present case." Section 1, art. 6, of the Constitution, provides that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in certain designated courts, "and such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town, or city and county." Section 13 of the same article empowers the Legislature to fix by law the jurisdiction of any inferior courts which may be established in pursuance of section 1 thereof.

It is contended by petitioners that by section 4426, Pol. Code, the Legislature did, pursuant to section 13 of article 6, fix by law the jurisdiction of police courts throughout the state, and that the jurisdiction attempted to be conferred by section 2 of the said act of 1901 is contrary to the provisions of section 25, art. 4, of the Constitution, which provides: "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases; that is to say: First. Regulating the jurisdiction and duties of justices of the peace, police judges, and of constables." In our judgment, there is no merit in this contention. Section 2 of the act of 1901, whereby jurisdiction to try all misdemeanors committed in cities of the 1½ class is conferred upon police courts of such cities, is a general law applicable to police courts of all cities included in such classification. The power to classify conferred by section 6, art. 11, so far as cities are concerned, is not limited strictly to purposes of incorporation and organization. As said by the Supreme Court in Rauer v. Williams, 118 Cal. 401, 50 Pac. 691: "It is entirely too narrow a view to say that the power to classify cities conferred upon the Legislature in article 11, § 6, means the power to classify them only for the purpose of regulating their incorporation and organization." And quoting further from the same case: "The power to classify, which is thus conferred, would be meaningless unless the classifications made were to be employed by the Legislature for the purpose of supplying the general laws required by the varying needs of the municipalities so classified." In People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. 413, the same court says: "That cities containing a large population require different legislation from those composed of a few hundred inhabitants, is evident. To so classify them that general laws applicable to these separate classes will meet the necessities of the case was a wise provision, and a law which applies to one or more, but not to all, of these cases, is not for that reason special legislation." To the same effect is Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. 1081.

Now, while a law which applies to one class only is not for that reason obnoxious as special legislation, nevertheless, to constitute it a general law sufficient reason must appear to justify such application. Rauer v. Williams, supra. With reference to section 2 of the act in question, the reasons for holding it a general law are both apparent and cogent. The Constitution (section 5, art. 6) provides that the superior court shall have jurisdiction of all cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for. It is thus left with the Legislature to provide inferior courts upon which it may confer jurisdiction in all cases of misdemeanor when the necessity therefor arises. The superior courts of one county might be sufficient to dispose of all the litigation, including all misdemeanors brought before it, while like courts of another county, by reason of the density of population, or owing to the volume of litigation, might afford wholly inadequate facilities for the disposal of business. Hence an exercise of the power vested in the Legislature is necessary to relieve the superior courts by conferring upon inferior courts jurisdiction to try either all or only part of the misdemeanors committed within their respective jurisdictions, as the exigencies of the case may demand. In Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 556, 21 Pac. 307, 541, the court, in discussing a like contention urged against a law conferring jurisdiction upon a police court of San Francisco in cases of conspiracy which were punishable by fine of $1,000 and imprisonment for one year, said: "In counties like San Francisco, or other counties in which large cities are situated, where the superior court in all its departments is necessarily crowded with business, the necessity may exist for the transfer of misdemeanors and petty offenses to inferior courts, with a view of relieving the higher courts of the burden of trying the same, while in other counties no such necessity exists; and it may be for this very reason that the Constitution provides for the establishment of inferior courts in cities, towns, and cities and counties, and not generally throughout the state." It is apparent that in some cases, for the purpose of affording relief to the superior courts, inferior courts should be given exclusive jurisdiction over all misdemeanors; whereas, in other cases the superior courts are able to dispose of all or a part of such petty cases. See generally, as sustaining the foregoing view: Ex parte Halsted, 89 Cal. 471, 26 Pac. 961; Ex parte Mitchell, 120 Cal. 384, 52 Pac. 799. We therefore conclude that the act of 1901 creating police courts for cities of the 1½ class, in so far as it confers exclusive jurisdiction upon such courts in all cases of misdemeanor, is not subject to attack as special legislation, but that such provision is a general law which, by reason of its repugnancy to the provisions of section 4426, Pol. Code, repeals the latter so far as it applies to such courts in cities included within said classification.

While the Cartwright law provides for punishment of the offense designated by imprisonment, it does not specify the place of imprisonment. Inasmuch, however, as we hold the offense to be a misdemeanor as to which the police court has jurisdiction, we must, in the absence of other provision, look to the act of 1901 for a designation of the place of imprisonment. Section 12 of said act is as follows: "In all cases of imprisonment of persons convicted in said police court of any offense committed in the city, the person so to be imprisoned, or by ordinance required to labor, shall be imprisoned in the city jail, or, if required to labor, shall labor in the city." There appears to be no doubt that under this provision it is the duty of the police court to direct imprisonment in the city jail. Ex parte Henshaw, 73 Cal. 486, 15 Pac. 110.

So far as concerns the offense with which petitioners are charged, there is no merit in their contention that certain provisions of the act indicate that it was not the intent of the Legislature that the police court should have jurisdiction of the matter. The act not only provides for criminal prosecutions, but for civil actions in damages, for forfeitures, etc. The fact that section 5 of the act implies that criminal proceedings may be commenced by complaint, information, or indictment is unimportant. Section 1426, Pen. Code, requires all proceedings in the police court to be commenced by complaint, while section 888, Pen. Code, provides that all public offenses triable in the superior courts must be prosecuted by indictment or information. The fact that the Legislature by section 5 of the act not only specifies what shall constitute a sufficient statement of the offense in an information and indictment, but also what shall constitute a sufficient complaint in a prosecution, furnishes "internal evidence" that the Legislature recognized that the act designated a misdemeanor which in some jurisdictions was triable in the superior court, while in others it was triable in the police court.

For the foregoing reasons, the alternative writ heretofore issued is vacated and annulled, and the application for the writ of prohibition is denied.

WRIGHT & KIMBROUGH v. CARLY et al.
(Civ. 604.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*)—MOOT QUESTIONS.

The life of the agreement appointing defendant to exercise powers of agency or trusteeship having expired pending the appeal from judgment for him in an action to restrain his further exercise of power, and for an accounting, on the ground that he had a mere terminable agency, the question whether there was a valid trust, or a mere agency, becomes moot, and unnecessary to determine.

2. ACTION (§ 38*)—JOINDER—COMPLAINT—CAUSES OF ACTION.

A complaint, which shows that plaintiff complains of the invasion by defendant of one primary right only, that he continues to manage and control and retain the rents and profits of plaintiff's property without its authority, and consequently without right, is not open to objection on the ground of stating more than one cause of action, though it sets out facts from which plaintiff would be entitled to several kinds of relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 291*)—RIGHT TO ACCOUNTING—SUBROGATION TO RIGHT.

Though an agreement between the owners of property appointing one for a definite time to manage it, collect and distribute the rents thereof to them monthly, creates a trust revocable only according to its terms, a third person, to whom some of such owners convey their interests in the property, is subrogated to their rights under the agreement to receive rents and to have an accounting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Wright & Kimbrough against J. Clarence Carly and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. O. Prewett and Eugene Aram, for appellant. W. F. Renfro, White, Miller & McLaughlin, and Chauncey H. Dunn, for respondents.

HART, J. The court below sustained the demurrer of the defendants, Carly and Tate, to the first amended complaint, and, the plaintiff having declined to amend, judgment was entered in favor of said defendants. This appeal is by plaintiff from said judgment.

The facts which occasion this action are fully set out in the complaint and in a certain agreement between the defendants which is made a part of said complaint, and are, in substance, as follows: On the 8th day of December, 1905, the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento made and caused to be entered a decree distributing certain real property situated in the city of Sacramento, and described in the complaint, to Mrs. Minnie Zoe Crawford, Mrs. Amy Zella Sherman, and Harrison Tate, as the sole heirs and devisees of one J. D. Tate, deceased. The defendant Harrison Tate, at the time of the entry of said decree of distribution, was a minor, aged about 17 years, and the defendant J. Clarence Carly was "the duly appointed, qualified, and acting guardian of the estate of said minor." On the 8th day of October, 1905, an agreement was entered into between the said Crawford and Sherman, as parties of the first part, and said Carly, for said minor, as party of the second part, by the terms of which the estate of said J. D. Tate, deceased, was directed to be distributed to the devisees in the manner already stated, and said J. Clarence Carly named "as trustee, to hold, manage and control, for the use and benefit of the said parties of the first part herein, their respective interests in said estate until the said minor shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, which will occur on the 25th day of August, 1909; or, should said minor die before he attain the age of twenty-one years, then until such time as he would have attained the age of twenty-one years, had he lived, at which time this trust, herein created, shall absolutely terminate; provided, however, that, if all the devisees mentioned in said last will and testament should die before said minor would have attained the age of twenty-one years, then said trust shall terminate." It is further provided by said agreement that "it shall be the duty of the party of the second part" to collect all the rents and profits of said estate, make necessary repairs and improvements upon the property, pay all taxes and insurance on said property, and to "make and return an annual account to the superior court of the county of Sacramento, of all receipts and disbursements made by him during each and every year during his term of office." "Said trustee" is required, by the terms of the writing, to "furnish a monthly statement showing the receipts and disbursements of moneys collected by him during his term, as such trustee, to the said Mrs. Crawford and Mrs. Sherman, or to their attorneys," and to "pay over to each of the three heirs and devisees, herein named, the sum of one hundred dollars per month during his said term of office," if the net receipts justify such payments. If any moneys remain in his hands at the end of any year in excess of those required to meet necessary expenses and other stipulated expenditures, then "said trustee shall divide said surplus at the expiration of such year among the three devisees equally." The compensation which the agreement stipulates that Carly "shall receive for his services in managing the property is 6 per cent. of all moneys collected by him as such trustee."

The complaint alleges that on the 8th day of August, 1907, the defendants Crawford and Sherman "granted and conveyed to said plaintiff, by good and sufficient deeds, among other property, all of the hereinabove described real estate, together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof"; said deeds having been subsequently recorded in the office of the county recorder of Sacramento county. The complaint further alleges that the defendants Crawford and Sherman, on the 10th day of August, 1907, notified said Carly that they had conveyed said real estate, together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, to plaintiff, and at the same time notified said Carly "that they and each of them revoked his right and authority to collect the rents and profits of said real estate and to manage the same, or to further act for them as agent of said real estate, and that his employment as agent to collect said rents, issues, and profits and to manage said real estate was revoked, annulled, and made void." It is alleged that on the same day the plaintiff served upon Carly a notice of similar import, and, further, "not to collect the said rents to which it was entitled, or any portion thereof, or to assume any charge or control over said property of said plaintiff, or to attempt in any manner to manage or control said real estate so owned by said plaintiff, and to refrain and cease collecting the rents thereof, or in any manner attempting or assuming any supervision over the same, with which demand said defendant, J. Clarence Carly, then and there refused, and ever since has and still does refuse to comply, and the said defendant J. Clarence Carly still claims the right to manage and control said real estate, and to collect the rents thereof, and still continues to do so, adversely and contrary to the rights of plaintiff." It is alleged: That the plaintiff "is now and has been ever since the 8th day of August, 1907, the sole owner in fee and seised of all of said hereinbefore described real property, together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof"; that said Carly has no interest "in relation to said real property," except the compensation stipulated in the agreement between the parties for collecting the rents and managing the property; that he "has no right, title, estate, lien, claim, or interest whatever, in law or equity, in or to said premises, * * * or any portion thereof; and that his claim for commissions under said agreement for collecting the said rents and managing said real estate is not coupled with any interest in said real estate, or any portion thereof."

Plaintiff avers: That, since it became the owner of the property described in the complaint, it has attempted without success to collect the rents, etc., accruing therefrom; the tenants of said property basing their refusal to pay over the same to plaintiff on the ground that said Carly claims to be entitled to collect said rents, etc., under and by virtue of the terms of the agreement referred to. That since said 8th day of August, 1907, Carly has collected a large amount of the rents, issues, and profits of said real estate, and that plaintiff has not received any part or portion thereof. That plaintiff has demanded of Carly that he pay to it all of the rents and profits belonging to it, so collected by said Carly, and that he cease collecting said rents and profits, but that Carly has failed and refused, and still continues to fail and refuse, to comply with said demand, and has refused to pay said rents to said plaintiff, or to account therefor, and still retains said rents belonging to said plaintiff, as aforesaid, in his possession." Plaintiff charges that Carly is still attempting to collect said rents and to manage said real estate, and that "it has never authorized said Carly to collect said rents or in any manner whatever manage or control said premises." Plaintiff further declares "that it is willing and able to pay to the said defendant, Carly, any and all sums of money, either for services, disbursements, or other purposes to which he may be legally entitled, and it further offers to pay to him any and all sums of money to which the court may decree that he may be legally entitled." The prayer of the complaint is for a decree: That no trust was created under and by virtue of the written agreement between the defendants; that the right of said Carly, under the terms of said agreement, to manage and control the property described in the complaint and to collect the rents, issues, and profits thereof, "has been terminated and extinguished"; that said agreement has been terminated; "that the object for which it was made has been entirely fulfilled and accomplished; that said defendant, Carly, be restrained and enjoined from further collecting said rents or attempting to manage said property or otherwise interfering with the rights of said plaintiff in connection with said real estate"; that the said Carly render an account of said rents collected by him in pursuance of said agreement; that he account and pay over to said plaintiff all the rents of said premises collected by him since the 8th day of August, 1907; that "the said defendants and each of them be enjoined and restrained from claiming any interest in said premises by virtue of the said agreement hereto attached, or in any manner acting, or proceeding to do anything whatsoever in relation to said real estate, under and by virtue of said agreement," etc.

From the agreement between the parties which, as seen, is made a part of the complaint, it appears that the defendant Harrison Tate reached his majority on the 25th of August, 1909, and that therefore the life of the agreement having then expired by virtue of its own terms, and no longer exists, the question as to the nature and effect of said agreement—whether there was established thereby a valid trust relating to the real property therein mentioned or a mere agency in Carly to manage the same and collect the rents, etc.—has become purely abstract and moot, and hence a construction by this court of the instrument unnecessary. Bradley v. Voorsanger, 143 Cal. 214, 76 Pac. 1031, and cases therein cited. The demurrer is both general and special. The special demurrer objects to the complaint on a number of different grounds, which may be summarized as follows: That the court is without jurisdiction of the subject of the action or of the persons of the defendants; that several causes of action have been improperly united; that several causes of action are set out but not separately stated; that plaintiff is without legal capacity to sue in this action; that the complaint is uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible in certain particulars specifically pointed out by the demurrer. The complaint, in our opinion, states a cause of action, and only one, and is therefore invulnerable as against the general demurrer. It follows, of course, that, if but one cause of action is set out in the complaint, the pleading cannot be obnoxious to the objection of the special demurrer that several causes of action are improperly united, and that several causes of action are pleaded without being separately stated. Nor is the complaint open to the criticism that its averments are ambiguous, or uncertain, or unintelligible. Neither do we perceive any reason upon which there may be founded the contention that the court is without jurisdiction of the subject of the action or of the persons of the defendants, or that plaintiff is without capacity to sue.

The pleading, by its averments, very clearly, we think, declares that the plaintiff became the purchaser of the real estate involved (the undivided one-third interest each of two of the three devisees named in the will of J. D. Tate, deceased); that Carly, having been appointed by said devisees an agent or trustee to manage said property and collect the rents accruing therefrom for a certain stipulated period, which had not expired at the time of the conveyance to plaintiff, claimed the right to exercise the full power vested in him by the agreement creating the agency or trust after plaintiff became the owner of the property; that plaintiff seeks to have the instrument investing Carly with such power over the property revoked and the so-called "trust" terminated; that it is entitled to an accounting of the moneys received by Carly as rents and issues flowing from the property after its transfer to plaintiff, and asks that said Carly be enjoined from further exercising any power, management, or control over said property described in the complaint. It is at once to be observed, from these averments, that the plaintiff complains of the invasion or violation by one of the demurring defendants of one primary right only, to wit: That Carly continues to manage and control and retain the rents and profits of property of which the plaintiff is the owner without its authority, and consequently without right. Therefore but one cause of action is stated. It is true that plaintiff, in the statement of said cause of action, sets out facts from which it would be entitled to several different kinds of relief; but, obviously, this cannot be made the ground of an objection to a pleading the averments of which, as here, justify the granting of any one or all the several kinds of relief asked for. Indeed, the central purpose of the reformed procedure is to authorize the awarding in one action of any kind of relief to which a party may be entitled under the facts pleaded and characterizing the transaction out of which the action has grown, and thus avoid running afoul of that other rule against a multiplicity of suits involving the same cause of action.

Assuming, but by no means conceding, that the effect of the instrument of agreement between the defendants was to establish a valid trust which could not be revoked or terminated except by virtue of its own terms, or until its objects had been entirely accomplished, we do not think that counsel for the respondents would for a moment undertake to deny the right of Crawford and Sherman to sell and convey their interests in the real estate which is the subject of such trust. This proposition is so manifestly true that authorities need not be cited in its support; nor will the proposition be disputed that the party to whom their interests in said property have been transferred is, upon such transfer, immediately subrogated to all the rights to which the grantors or cestuis que trust were entitled under the terms and provisions of the trust. Therefore, when the plaintiff became the owner by purchase of so much of the real estate to which the so-called "trust" relates as was owned by two of the beneficiaries under the trust, it was entitled, from the time of the transfer, to receive the proportion of the rents, issues, and profits accruing from the property to which the grantors would have been entitled had they retained the interests in the trust property which they sold and conveyed to the plaintiff. Carly having refused to turn over the rents to plaintiff, the latter is therefore entitled to an accounting of all the moneys received by said Carly from the property which it purchased from Crawford and Sherman, and we think the complaint clearly discloses by its averments that plaintiff is at least entitled to relief to that extent.

The complaint, as we have seen, alleges: That the plaintiff, as well as its grantors, notified Carly of the transfer; that the plaintiff thereafter demanded of Carly the rents collected by him from tenants of the property of which it had become the owner, and demanded of Carly that he render to it an account of all the rents and profits which he had collected and received from said property; that Carly refused either to pay over to plaintiff any of the moneys collected by him as rents, or to render a statement or an account of the moneys so received by him. Under the terms of the agreement (Carly's sole authority for collecting the rents) it was his duty to pay over to each of the parties of the first part thereto a certain specified sum of money each month, and this, the complaint alleges, he failed and refused to do, so far as plaintiff, the successor in interest to Crawford and Sherman, was concerned. We entertain no doubt that the facts pleaded in the complaint state a good cause of action for at least an accounting, even if it be assumed that the other reliefs demanded could not be awarded under the allegations of the complaint, and that the order sustaining the demurrer was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

A. J. Knoblock and another were indicted for obtaining money by false pretenses, and, from an order and judgment sustaining demurrers to the indictment, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People. Frank J. Murphy, for respondent Knoblock. Hiram W. Johnson, for respondent Grossman.

HALL, J. This is an appeal by the people from an order and judgment sustaining the demurrers of defendants to an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses. The transcript filed in this court contains what purports to be the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions, settled on the 21st day of January, 1909, by George W. Cabaniss, judge of the superior court.

Respondents make the point that the transcript contains no legal record, and for this reason ask that the order and judgment be affirmed. It is insisted that the only way in which a review of the action of the trial court in sustaining a demurrer in a criminal case can be had is upon a bill of exceptions. This is the rule laid down in People v. Long, 121 Cal. 494, 53 Pac. 1097, and which this court is obliged to follow. People v. Druffel, 3 Cal. App. 731, 86 Pac. 907.

It is next urged that the purported bill of exceptions set forth in the transcript appears to have been settled by a judge other than the judge who made the ruling now sought to be reviewed, and for that reason cannot be considered. Before taking up the discussion of the law as to who must settle the bill of exceptions, appellant urges: That the record does not disclose that the order sustaining the demurrer was made by one judge and the bill of exceptions settled by another. Upon this point the purported bill of exceptions shows that the demurrers came on to be heard before the Honorable Carroll Cook, as judge of the superior court, and were denied and overruled on the 22d day of August, 1908; that thereafter the court set this order aside, and the demurrers were reargued, and the matter was continued from day to day by the court until the 2d day of January, 1909, when the court entered an order sustaining the demurrers of said defendants. While the record does not state that Judge Cook was presiding when this order was entered, we know that Judge George W. Cabaniss, who settled the bill of exceptions, could not have presided at that time, for he did not take office until the first Monday in January of the present year, which was January 4th. We are obliged to take notice of "the accession to office and the official signatures and seals of office of the principal officers of government in the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this state and of the United States." Code Civ. Proc. § 1875.

That a superior judge is a principal officer of the judicial department of this state cannot, we think, be doubted, and as such the accession to office as well as the official signature of such superior judge must be taken judicial notice of by all the courts of this state. We thus have judicial knowledge of the fact that the judge whose official signature is attached to the order settling the bill of exceptions, January 21, 1909, was not a judge of any superior court on the 2d day of January, 1909, when the order sought to be reviewed in this proceeding was made and entered.

There is no provision in the law authorizing the successor in office of the trial judge to settle a bill of exceptions in a criminal case as to rulings made by the trial judge. Section 1174 of the Penal Code requires such bill of exceptions to be settled by the trial judge, or, if he refuses to settle the bill of exceptions according to the facts the party seeking the settlement may apply to the Supreme Court to prove the same, "and the bill when proven must be certified by the Chief Justice as correct, and filed with the clerk of the court in which the action was tried, and when so filed it has the same force and effect as if settled by the judge who tried the case. If the judge who presided at the trial ceases to hold office before the bill is tendered or settled, he may nevertheless settle such bill, or the party may, as provided in this section, apply to the Supreme Court to prove the same." The provisions of the statute were not followed in this case. The bill of exceptions was settled by a judge who had no power so to do.

It may well be said that the method of proving the bill of exceptions before the appellate tribunal is inconvenient and cumbersome, and that a wiser and more convenient method could be devised. The Legislature seems to have recognized this in providing for the settlement of bills of exceptions in civil actions, for while the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 652 and 653) as originally enacted in 1872 were substantially identical with section 1174 of the Penal Code, the Legislature in the session of 1875-76 amended the law (St. 1875-76, p. 93, c. 505) so that in such cases as the present bills of exceptions in civil cases may be settled in such manner as the Supreme Court in its rules may provide. The propriety, however, of making the procedure in criminal cases correspond to the procedure in civil cases is for the Legislature, and not for the courts.

In this case, as the bill of exceptions was not settled by an officer with power so to do, it cannot be considered by this court. We are therefore obliged to affirm the order and judgment appealed from for want of any legal record from which we can determine whether or not the court erred in its ruling. People v. Long, 121 Cal. 494, 53 Pac. 1097.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by James Shultz and another against the Redondo Improvement Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for appellants. Gray, Barker & Bowen, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiffs sued to recover the sum of $5,825.25 paid by them to the Redondo Improvement Company as the consideration for two options to purchase a tract of land belonging to said company. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The first contract was executed on July 10, 1905. It stated that the Redondo Improvement Company thereby granted to the plaintiffs, in consideration of $5,443.75, then paid, the option to purchase at any time within six months the lot in question, at the price of $16,344.65. This price was to be paid, if the option was accepted, by applying thereon the amount paid as a consideration for the option, and by paying a like amount six months from the date of the option, and a third like amount at a period not named; the last payment to be secured by mortgage on the property. If the option was not accepted, the consideration paid therefor was to be retained by the seller as the consideration for granting the option. The second option was similar in form, except that it was dated January 10, 1906, six months after the first option, that the consideration was $381.50, and that it should be exercised within six months from its date, and that the price was $11,282.40. The $381.50 paid as the consideration of this option was the interest which had then accrued upon the unpaid portion of the price expressed in the first option. The price named in the second option, it will be observed, was made up of the $381.50 accrued interest and the two payments of $5,443.75 each, constituting the unpaid portion of the price named in the first option. It is quite obvious that the second option was, in effect, a mere renewal or extension of the first option, and that the $5,443.75, paid as the consideration for the first option was understood to be a part of the price for the sale of the lots.

The grounds upon which the plaintiffs claim the right to recover the consideration paid for the options are two: First, that the agreements are illegal because the tract to be sold was a part of a subdivision of lots intended for sale, and that at the time of the execution of the options the map of the subdivision had not been recorded or officially approved, as required by the statutes of 1893 and 1901 (St. 1893, p. 96, c. 80; St. 1901, p. 288, c. 124); second, that the plaintiffs were induced to accept the options and pay the considerations therefor by material false representations made to them by the defendants to induce plaintiffs to enter into the contracts and pay the money. A large part of the briefs of counsel is devoted to the discussion of the first-mentioned ground, and of the validity and effect of the statutes referred to, as applied to the particular map in question. We do not find it necessary to take up this branch of the case. The court found in favor of the plaintiffs on both grounds, and it is clear that the findings upon the second ground above stated are sufficient to support the judgment. In that event it is immaterial whether the first ground is well taken or not.

The first contract described the property as "lot 5," block 216 of Redondo Beach town-site, as per map recorded at page 1, book 39, miscellaneous records of Los Angeles county. The statement that the map recorded at page 1, book 39, showed any lot 5 or block 216 was erroneous. The map of Redondo Beach town-site was recorded on April 21, 1889. It did not show any block 216. The block now designated as 216 was shown thereon as an irregular shaped tract, some 640 feet long and from 83 to 227 feet wide, and it was not numbered, lettered, or designated upon that map in any way except by boundary lines. A map was exhibited to the plaintiffs by the defendants at the time this option was made, showing a subdivision of this tract into 23 lots, designating the tract as block 216 of the town-site of Redondo Beach, and stating that the Redondo Improvement Company had caused it to be surveyed and platted. Upon this map lot 5 was shown as a lot 50 feet wide extending across the block about midway thereof, with a narrow strip some 20 feet wide, in appearance like an alley, bounding it on the west end, and a similar narrow lot bounding it on the south side, marked, respectively, as "lot A" and "lot C." This map was recorded on August 5, 1905, in book 7 of maps, at page 150. The second option, which was executed after the recording of this map, described the property as "lot 5, block 216, of Redondo Beach townsite, as per map recorded in book 7 of maps, page 150." The first contract, if taken alone and without aid from the unrecorded map then exhibited to the plaintiffs, would be void because of the uncertainty in the description; the map therein referred to containing no block or lot answering the description there given. The court found that it was uncertain for this reason. It may be conceded that, if the map subsequently recorded was taken into consideration, the uncertainty might have been removed, and that, perhaps, it would not be fatal to the validity of the contract; but, in view of the ground upon which we hold the judgment is supported, it is not necessary to consider this question.

The court made its findings: That, at the time of the execution of the first option, the defendants falsely represented to the plaintiffs that lot 5 was bounded in the rear by an alley; that a public alley also extended along the entire length of one side of the lot; that plaintiffs believed the said representations to be true and did not discover the contrary until June 12, 1906; that because of such belief they were induced to pay the sum of $5,443.75 for the first option and the further sum of $381.50 for the second option; that the said representations were false; and that there were in fact no alleys bounding said lot. Each plaintiff testified that the defendant Ainsworth, who was acting for his codefendant in the transaction, made the representations substantially as the court found they had been made. It was not claimed that there was any public alley adjoining or bounding the lot. Ainsworth testified that the two strips of land bounding the lot were marked respectively "lot A" and "lot C" in order to withhold them from dedication as public alleys, and that it was the intention to make them private alleys for the use of the purchasers of lots in the subdivision. There was no evidence that any instrument making such dedication had even been executed, nor is it claimed that any such dedication has been in fact made. An unexecuted intention of this character would not be sufficient to constitute a dedication of these strips of land as private alleys or ways. The evidence is ample to show that plaintiffs were justified in understanding the statements of Ainsworth to mean that the strips in question were public alleys. The word "alley," when used without qualification and applied to a map or subdivision of land into lots which are offered for sale, ordinarily means a public alley. The testimony of the plaintiffs is that they so understood it in this case, and that their action was induced by that understanding. There is no merit in the contention that the presence of a public alley would not materially enhance the value of the lot. The evidence was to the effect that it would increase its value to the extent of one-half. The representation was clearly material.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

GRIERSON v. GRIERSON. (S. F. 5,125.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1909.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 93*)—DESERTION—COMPLAINT.

A complaint, in an action for divorce for desertion, which alleges that on or about a designated date defendant "willfully and without cause deserted and abandoned plaintiff, and has continued to live separate and apart from plaintiff against her will and without her consent," sufficiently alleges continuance of the desertion to the time of the filing of the complaint, as against a demurrer without an allegation that the desertion lasted longer than the reasonable period mentioned in Civ. Code, § 124.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 93*)—DESERTION—COMPLAINT.

The complaint also sufficiently charged that defendant remained away from plaintiff without sufficient cause, because the words "willfully and without cause" modify the words "has continued to live," as well as the words "deserted and abandoned."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 27*)—DESERTION—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

It is not necessary that the husband should entertain, in connection with his acts of cruelty, any settled purpose to drive his wife from him, but it is enough where such is the natural consequence of his acts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-83; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

4. DIVORCE (§ 93*)—GROUNDS—HABITUAL INTemperance—EXTREME CRUELTY.

Habitual intemperance and extreme cruelty are separate grounds of divorce, and the pleading of instances of voluntary intoxication, in connection with other matters, as constituting acts of cruelty cannot, in the absence of a finding of cruelty, be regarded as a sufficient allegation of a cause of action for habitual intemperance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 297; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

5. DIVORCE (§ 93*) — GROUNDS — EXTREME CRUELTY—COMPLAINT.

A complaint, in an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, which contains allegations of excessive drinking of liquor, coupled with other acts which, in themselves, amount to extreme cruelty, states a cause of action for extreme cruelty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 300; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

6. DIVORCE (§ 93*)—EXTREME CRUELTY—COMPLAINT—IMMATERIAL ALLEGATIONS.

The allegation in the complaint, in an action by a wife for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, that defendant is a highly nervous and excitable man is immaterial; for all men, whether nervous or otherwise, must treat their wives decently.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action by Carrie Forrest Grierson against James Louis Grierson. From an interlocutory judgment of divorce, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Julian H. Biddle, for appellant. Will M. Beggs, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is defendant's appeal from an interlocutory judgment of divorce, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff upon two causes of action, the first for desertion and the second for extreme cruelty. Appellant urges as grounds for reversal, first, that the demurrer was improperly overruled; second, that the findings are not supported by the evidence. The first cause of action is briefly, but we think fully, stated. The gist of it is in the following language: "That on or about the 1st day of July, A. D. 1904, the said defendant, disregarding the solemnity of his marriage vow willfully and without cause, deserted and abandoned plaintiff, and has continued to live separate and apart from plaintiff, against her will, and without her consent." We find no merit in the theory that the pleading fails to assert how long the desertion continued. The language quoted means, when fairly interpreted, that the desertion, dating from about July 1, 1904, continued to the time of the filing of the complaint. It can mean nothing else, and would be given no additional force if words had been appended to the effect that the desertion lasted longer than the reasonable period mentioned in section 124 of the Civil Code. Nor was it necessary that the pleading should contain an added averment that in the abandonment of the plaintiff defendant remained away from her without sufficient cause, because the words "willfully and without cause" in the quoted paragraph of the complaint clearly modify the words

"has continued to live" as well as the verbs "deserted" and "abandoned."

Appellant's counsel cites McVickar v. McVickar, 46 N. J. Eq. 490, 19 Atl. 249, 19 Am. St. Rep. 437, to support the view, which he apparently holds, that unless a defendant's acts of cruelty show an intention upon his part to drive his wife from the home, he may cure the results of a milder degree of cruelty, although it was sufficient to send her into temporary exile, by urging her to return to him. There is an expression in the closing paragraph of the learned vice chancellor's opinion in that case which, at first glance, might be taken as a statement of such a rule. Closer examination of the case, however, will bring to mind the fact that the writer of the opinion was discussing the duty of the offending party in seeking reconciliation, if he would escape the conclusion that his wife lived separate and apart from him by his own desire. There is nothing in that opinion, however, which supports the theory that the wife must in every case accept the advances of her husband. But, even if there were such a rule, it would have no application here, for the court below found in this case that the husband's conduct amounted to desertion, and, as was said, in McVickar v. McVickar, supra, it is not necessary "that the husband should entertain, in connection with his acts of cruelty, any settled purpose to drive his wife from him. It is enough if such is the natural consequence of his acts." The court having found, in effect, that his cruelty was (to quote again from McVickar v. McVickar) of such "intensity as to amount to desertion," it is unnecessary for us further to discuss the rule which seems to exist in New Jersey when the cruelty justifies merely temporary absence on the part of the wife.

There was a demurrer to the second count of the complaint on the ground that two causes of action, one for habitual intemperance, and the other for extreme cruelty, are improperly united. Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 263, is cited in the brief to support the statement that "Intemperance cannot be pleaded to support cruelty." Such is not the doctrine of that case. It was there held that "habitual intemperance" and "extreme cruelty" are separate grounds of divorce, and that the pleading of certain instances of voluntary intoxication in connection with other matters as constituting acts of cruelty cannot, in the absence of a finding of cruelty by the court of trial, be regarded as a sufficient allegation of a cause of action for habitual intemperance. The second count contains allegations of excessive drinking of liquor, coupled with other acts which, in themselves, would amount to extreme cruelty. Delatour v. Mackay, 139 Cal. 621, 73 Pac. 454. This part of the complaint is obviously drawn with the design of charging, and we think it does clearly allege, a cause of action for extreme cruelty. The demurrer to the second count was properly overruled.

The findings that on various occasions defendant spoke harshly to plaintiff, and that plaintiff believed her life to be in danger, are sufficiently sustained by the testimony of plaintiff supported by that of her brother-in-law. The force of the latter's corroboration is not broken in the least by his testimony: "Personally I have never seen him (defendant) in a mood to hurt any one." This statement immediately following the declaration that the witness had never seen the appellant with a deadly weapon obviously meant that Mr. Downing had never seen Grierson ready to perform any act of personal violence; but that the latter did speak harshly to his wife, and that Mrs. Grierson was afraid of him, are facts that may be derived from the testimony of both witnesses.

Appellant's counsel calls our attention to the omission of the superior court to find on paragraph 6 of the complaint. That paragraph is as follows: "That the defendant is a highly nervous and excitable man, frequently drinks, and when in that condition is dangerous. Said defendant has so frequently threatened to kill plaintiff and the said child that plaintiff is afraid that he will carry said threat into execution." The court specifically found that it was not true that defendant threatened to kill his wife or child, and this is, of course, a finding adverse to the allegation that she was afraid he would carry said threat into execution. Obviously plaintiff could not be afraid that an unuttered threat would be executed. The court found in accordance with nearly all of the substantial allegations of a preceding paragraph of the complaint "that frequently * * * the defendant would become intoxicated, and would reel around the yard and house so that neighbors and strangers could see his condition," and "that on many occasions the defendant, while intoxicated, would lie down in the house with his pipe in his mouth, and while the pipe was lit and full of live coals, the defendant would go to sleep, thereby endangering plaintiff's life, and the home and property of the parties hereto." These findings seem to cover all the other allegations of paragraph 6 except, perhaps, the one that "defendant is a highly nervous and excitable man," and that, we think, was an immaterial allegation. The obligation is upon all men, whether they be nervous, phlegmatic, excitable, or habitually calm to treat their wives decently. While courts might, in some cases, be inclined to show more charity towards nervous, excitable men than towards others less mercurial of temperament, we think that these characteristics, when alleged as in this complaint, would neither intensify nor excuse the defendant's acts.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PASS SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. HOLLYWOOD CITY SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 2,296.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1909. Rehearing Denied Dec. 1, 1909.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 32*)—NATURE—DIVISION, CHANGE OR ABOLITION—POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

School districts of California, being public quasi municipal corporations, subject to constitutional limitations, the power of the Legislature over them is plenary, and it may divide, change, or abolish them at pleasure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 41*)—ALTERATION OF BOUNDARY—EFFECT ON PROPERTY RIGHTS.

By the annexation of land belonging to a school district to a city and a city school district, which by virtue of Pol. Code, § 1576, sprang at the same time into existence, the power of the first-named district to use the property for school purposes ended, and the legal title passed to the trustees of the new district, since under section 1617 the management and control of school property within their districts is vested in the trustees of the district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 41*)—DIVISION—PROPERTY—DEBTS.

While the Legislature may provide for the division of the property of a school district and the apportionment of the debts of the old corporation, when a portion of its territory and public property are transferred to the jurisdiction of another corporation, in the absence of such provision, the common-law rule obtains which leaves the property where it is found, and the debt on the original debtor.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 278*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—DIVISION OF SCHOOL DISTRICT—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY.

The division of a school district by the Legislature and the transfer of part of the property to a new district is not a taking of property without due process of law; the state being the beneficial owner, and the transfer amounting merely to the naming of new trustees.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Pass School District of Los Angeles County against the Hollywood City School District of Los Angeles County. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. Cole, for appellant. Robert Young, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to quiet title to a piece of land and the schoolhouse thereon formerly within the limits of plaintiff school district and used by the district for public school purposes. Judgment passed for defendant school district, and from that judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

The facts are stipulated, subject, as to some of them, to objections touching their admissibility. From these facts it appears that plaintiff for many years past has been and still is a school district of Los Angeles county. In 1889 the real property in controversy was deeded to the trustees of plaintiff "to be used as a schoolhouse, lot, and grounds." For such purposes plaintiff held and used the property until in November, 1903, when the city of Hollywood was incorporated, with which incorporation came into existence the Hollywood City School District, defendant herein. The school property in question was included, on the incorporation of the city of Hollywood and the organization of the Hollywood City School District, within the corporate limits of the latter, and is still included therein. The remaining portion of the Pass School District, not within the corporate limits of the city of Hollywood, continued as a school district under the name of the Pass School District. No petition has been filed on behalf of the existing Pass School District for annexation to the Hollywood City School District, as provided by section 1576 of the Political Code. The question presented may be thus stated: What, under the indicated circumstances, is the disposition made by the law of the real property of such corporation owned and used for the corporate purposes when, by a change in the boundaries, that property falls within the territorial limits of a new corporation organized for identical purposes? Or, wording it differently, did the title, dominion, power, and control over the land in controversy pass to the Hollywood City School District, or did they remain where formerly they had been, with the Pass School District? So far as this state is concerned, this question would seem to have been conclusively answered in favor of respondent by such cases as Los Angeles County v. Orange County, 97 Cal. 329, 32 Pac. 316, Johnson v. City of San Diego, 109 Cal. 468, 42 Pac. 249, 30 L. R. A. 178, and Vernon School Dist. v. Board of Education, 125 Cal. 593, 58 Pac. 175. The last case is directly in point. It was an action brought to quiet title by the Vernon School District to lands used for public school purposes originally within the territorial limits of the district, but subsequently, by annexation, falling within the corporate limits of the city of Los Angeles. It is there said that, "In the absence of statutory provisions governing the ownership of municipal property, upon the division of a municipality, municipal property consisting of real estate belongs to the municipality within which it is located by the division." The judgment of the trial court so decreeing was upheld. But appellant argues that this decision should be reconsidered; that it does violence to its constitutional rights in depriving it of property without due process of law; that it works great injustice; and that it is contrary to the law as laid down in the best-considered cases. Because of the earnestness with which these pleas are advanced, and of the brevity with which the subject was treated in the Vernon Case, more amplified discussion of the question may not be amiss.

School districts of this state are public quasi municipal corporations. Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 1067; Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558. Subject to such constitutional limitations as may exist, the power of the Legislature over these public municipal corporations is plenary. It may divide, change, or abolish them at pleasure. Hughes v. Ewing, supra; Bay View School District v. Linscott, 99 Cal. 27, 33 Pac. 781; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 54. By the legal annexation of the land in controversy to the city of Hollywood and the Hollywood City School District (which latter, by virtue of section 1576, Pol. Code, sprang at the same time into existence), the power of the Pass School District to use this property for school purposes undoubtedly came to an end; for, by section 1617 of the Political Code, the management and control of school property within their districts is vested in the trustees of the district. This proposition, as we understand it, appellant does not dispute. But it contends that title to this property still remained in the plaintiff district, with the correlative rights of leasing or selling the same.

The legislative power being full and complete over the matter as a part of that power, it may make provision for the division of the property and the apportionment of the debts of the old corporation, when a portion of its territory and public property are transferred to the jurisdiction of another corporation. But, in the absence of such provision, the rule of the common law obtains, and that rule leaves the property where it is found, and the debt upon the original debtor. Johnson v. San Diego, 109 Cal. 477, 42 Pac. 249, 30 L. R. A. 178; Board of School Directors v. Ashland, 58 N. W. 377, 87 Wis. 533. Such is the declaration in the Vernon Case, in the cases of Bay View School District v. Linscott, 99 Cal. 27, 33 Pac. 781, of the Supreme Court of the United States in Laramie v. County of Albany, 93 U. S. 307, 23 L. Ed. 552, Mountpleasant v. Beckwith, 100 U. S. 535, 29 L. Ed. 699, McGovern v. Fairchild, 2 Wash. St. 479, 27 Pac. 173, Board of Education v. Board of Education, 30 W. Va. 424, 4 S. E. 640, 20 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 11, Allen v. School Town of Macey, 109 Ind. 559, 10 N. E. 578, New Point, etc., v. School Town of New Point, 138 Ind. 141, 37 N. E. 650, Prescott v. Town of Lenox, 100 Tenn. 591, 47 S. W. 181, Bloomfield v. Glen Ridge, 54 N. J. Eq. 280, 33 Atl. 925, Board of Education v. Board of Education, 30 W. Va. 424, 4 S. E. 640, 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 64, 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1023, City of Wellington v. Wellington Township, 46 Kan. 213, 26 Pac. 415, and of cases from many other jurisdictions.

To the contention that a transfer of ownership thus accomplished works the taking of property without due process of law, it should be sufficient to point out that in all such cases the beneficial owner of the fee is the state itself, and that its agencies and mandatories—the various public and municipal corporations in whom the title rests—are essentially nothing but trustees of the state, holding the property and devoting it to the uses which the state itself directs. The transfer of title without due process of law, of which appellant so bitterly complains, is nothing more, in effect, than the naming by the state of other trustees to manage property which it owns and to manage the property for the same identical uses and purposes to which it was formerly devoted. In point of law, then, the beneficial title to the estate is not affected at all. All that is done is to transfer the legal title under the same trust from one trustee to another. In this sense the trustees of the Hollywood City School District became, by operation of law, successors to the trustees of the Pass School District, as is directly held in Allen v. School Town of Macey, 109 Ind. 559, 10 N. E. 578, where it is said: "It is now a well-recognized legal inference deducible as well from general principles as from the decided cases that under the Constitution and laws of this state public school property is held in trust for school purposes by the persons or corporations authorized for the time being to control such property, and that it is in the power of the Legislature to provide for a change in the trusteeship of such property in certain contingencies presumably requiring such a change, or, indeed, to change the trustees of that class of property whenever it may choose to do so." Even if such well-established principles could be set aside under the plea that they work injustice in the individual case, this plea here presented is without merit. The state is profoundly interested in the education of its young, but has no deep concern over the personality of the trustees who shall administer this trust, so long as the administration is in the orderly form of law. But to relieve against the possibility of injustice being worked by the operation of the rule which might, without recompense, take a schoolhouse away from one district and assign it to another, this state has made explicit provision whereby the use of the school under the changed conditions may still be open to the children within the territory to which it originally belonged. This provision is found in section 1576 of the Political Code. But the residents within the plaintiff district have not seen fit to avail themselves of it. We are unable to perceive, therefore, that the rule adopted in this state either works injustice to plaintiff or does violence to any of its constitutional rights. Nor, to the last proposition which appellant urges, namely, that the weight of authority is contrary to that laid down in this state, can assent be granted. The authorities which he cites are Winona v. School District, 40 Minn. 13, 41 N. W. 539, 3 L. R. A. 46, 12 Am. St. Rep. 687; Board of Education v. School Trustees, 45 Kan. 560, 26 Pac. 13; 21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (1st Ed.) Title "Schools," p. 791.

The Minnesota case unquestionably holds with appellant's contention, but it stands in single opposition to an otherwise unbroken current of authority. In this connection we have heretofore cited the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of many sister states, with the text-writers thereon. The Minnesota case is expressly disapproved in Bloomfield v. Glen Ridge, 54 N. J. Eq. 280, 33 Atl. 925, and in Prescott v. Lenox, 100 Tenn. 591, 47 S. W. 181. The language of the Supreme Court of Kansas in Board of Education v. School Trustees is obiter, and later was expressly disapproved in City of Wellington v. Wellington Township, 46 Kan. 213, 26 Pac. 415, where that state adopts the accepted rule. The declaration in the first edition of the Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law under the head of "Schools" is modified in the second edition, where the rule adopted in Minnesota is set forth upon the authority of Winona v. School District, 40 Minn. 13, 41 N. W. 539, 3 L. R. A. 46, 12 Am. St. Rep. 687, supra, and other Minnesota cases, but where also it is declared: "On the other hand, it has been held that the common law leaves the property where it is found, and that, in the absence of special legislation to the contrary, a new school district which is organized from territory detached from an old school district, will not be required to pay anything to the old district on account of schoolhouses or school-house sites or any real estate whatever belonging to the old school district and situated in the new district." Moreover, in the fifteenth volume of the same learned work, at page 1023, it is said: "The old corporation will hold all the corporate property within her new limits, * * * and the new corporation will hold all the property falling within her boundaries, to which the old corporation will have no claim."

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

YOLO COUNTY v. JOYCE et al. (Sac. 1,720.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1909.)

1. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS (§ 7*)—CLAIMS—CRIMINAL CASES—EXPENSES—CERTIFICATION BY DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 274, providing that in criminal cases the fees for reporting and for transcripts ordered by the court must be paid out of the county treasury on the court's order, does not vest in the court exclusive power to order a transcript of testimony in criminal cases, but merely deals with fees to be paid reporters for reporting and transcribing when ordered by the court, and did not deprive the district attorney of authority to order a transcript of testimony of a criminal case at the county's expense, when he deemed it necessary under County Government Act (St. 1897, p. 575, c. 277), § 228, subd. 2, providing that all expenses necessarily incurred by the district attorney in the prosecution of criminal cases shall be a county charge.

2. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS (§ 7*)—NATURE OF OFFICE.

A district attorney is an executive officer charged with the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases, in the furtherance of which he is authorized by County Government Act (St. 1897, p. 575, c. 277), § 228, subd. 2, to incur such expense as is necessary to enforce the criminal law.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; H. M. Alberty, Judge.

Action by the County of Yolo against Hallie E. Joyce and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed, with instructions.

Arthur C. Huston, for appellants. W. A. Anderson, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action brought by the county of Yolo to recover from the defendant Hallie E. Joyce certain money claimed to have been illegally paid to her under an order of the board of supervisors of that county. On April 18, 1906, and for some time prior thereto, there was on trial in the superior court of Yolo county a criminal case entitled "People, etc. v. Dean McGrew," the further hearing of which, on account of legal holidays declared by the Governor following the earthquake in San Francisco and along the coast, it was necessary to adjourn for a considerable period or time. The trial was resumed on June 13, 1906, and the then district attorney of Yolo county, who was prosecuting the case, in anticipation of the resumption of the trial, directed the defendant Hallie E. Joyce, who was the stenographic reporter of the superior court, to transcribe the testimony of the witnesses who had theretofore testified, for the purpose of having such testimony read to the jury to refresh their minds. The district attorney considered it necessary to have such transcription made, and it was read to the jury. On June 29, 1906, the defendant Hallie E. Joyce presented a claim to the board of supervisors for $300 for the transcription of such testimony, upon which claim the then district attorney made an indorsement reciting that the transcript for which the bill was presented was used by him "in the prosecution of Dean McGrew and was necessary in the conduct of the trial of said McGrew." The claim was allowed by the board of supervisors, and a warrant issued for the amount, which was paid on July 4, 1906. A demand was subsequently made on the defendant to pay back the amount of said claim to the county, which she refused to do, and this action was brought to recover it. The court found the above facts, and, in addition, found "that the amount claimed for said alleged service * * * was not an expense necessarily incurred by the district attorney of Yolo county in the detection of crime or in the prosecution of a criminal case." Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

This appeal is to be determined by a consideration of the proposition whether the district attorney had authority to incur liability for this claim against the county. It is provided by section 228 of the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 575, c. 277) as follows: "The following are county charges: * * * (2) The traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney incurred in criminal cases arising in the county and in civil actions and proceedings in which the county is interested, and all other expenses necessarily incurred by him in the detection of crime and the prosecution of criminal cases, and in civil actions and proceedings and all other matters in which the county is interested." By section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that: "For his services the official reporter shall receive the following fees: * * * For reporting testimony and proceedings ten dollars per day. * * * For transcription, for one copy 20 cents per hundred words. * * * In criminal cases the fees for reporting and for transcripts ordered by the court to be made must be paid out of the county treasury on the order of the court. * * *" By subdivision 11 of section 25 of the county government act the supervisors are vested with authority "to examine, settle, and allow all accounts legally chargeable against the county except salaries of officers and such demands as are authorized by law to be allowed by some other person and order warrants to be drawn on the county treasurer therefor."

It is insisted by the respondent, in support of the judgment of the trial court, that no charge against the county for the transcription of testimony taken down by an official stenographer of the superior court can be allowed, unless the order for its transcription is made by the judge of the superior court and the claim therefor approved and ordered paid out of the county treasury by the judge, under section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure heretofore referred to. It will be observed, however, that this section does not vest exclusive power in the court to order transcription of testimony in criminal cases. The section simply deals with the fees to be paid official stenographers of the superior court for reporting and for transcribing testimony, when ordered in cases pending before the court, and prescribes the method whereby payment shall be made, namely, upon an order of court. By section 228 of the county government act it is provided, however, that expenses necessarily incurred by the district attorney in the "prosecution of criminal cases" are county charges, which, under subdivision 11 of section 25 of the same act, are to be paid out of the county funds under a claim presented to and allowed by the board of supervisors. There is nothing in the provisions of section

274 of the Code of Civil Procedure, fixing fees and providing how an allowance shall be paid to a reporter for reporting or for the transcription of testimony, which can be construed as a limitation upon the power of the district attorney, under the provisions of the county government act, in incurring an expense for the transcription of testimony to be used by him in a criminal case when he deems it necessary in the prosecution of a criminal case. The section of the Code of Civil Procedure only provides how payment shall be made upon order of the court when a transcription is ordered by the court. It does not provide an exclusive method whereby such a transcription may be obtained, but provides only that when the transcription is ordered by the court the power to pay for it is exclusively vested in the judge and is to be made by an order drawn by the judge on the county treasurer; but because this power is conferred upon the court in a given instance furnishes no reason for saying that under the provision of the county government act a transcription of testimony may not be obtained by the district attorney, for use in a criminal prosecution, when he deems it necessary, except under an order of court, or that the board of supervisors, if they deem it a necessary charge, may not allow it. The district attorney is an executive officer charged with the detection of crime and the prosecution of criminal cases. In furtherance of the proper discharge of his duties, the Legislature has, under the section of the county government act, enlarged his power so as to permit him to incur expense necessary to enforce the criminal law. His authority to do so for that purpose is not made subject to the control or supervision of any court or judicial officer, but is a matter for the consideration of the board of supervisors alone to the extent of determining whether the expense was necessarily incurred so as to constitute a county charge. Of course, the right of a district attorney to incur expense is not an arbitrary one. All that the section of the county government act permits is to give to the district attorney, in the first instance, the discretion to determine whether it is necessary in the detection of crime, or the prosecution of a criminal case, to incur an expense chargeable against the county. Any such claim, however, must be presented to the board of supervisors for allowance, and that body reviews the action of the district attorney and determines whether the expense was a necessary one and acts accordingly; and as the board of supervisors is vested with the authority to determine the question whether the expense was necessary or not, and is the tribunal to which is committed, under the county government act, the jurisdiction to supervise the action of the district attorney in incurring the expense, its determination that it was a proper and necessary expense is conclusive. Colusa County v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 375; McFarland v. McCowen, 98 Cal. 330, 33 Pac. 113; McBride v. Newlin, 129 Cal. 36, 61 Pac. 577; County of Santa Cruz v. McPherson, 133 Cal. 282, 65 Pac. 574; County of Alameda v. Evers, 136 Cal. 132, 68 Pac. 475.

Much is said in argument of the necessity of the supervision by the superior court over expenses incurred by the district attorney, to the end that unnecessary expenditures may not be allowed. It is not to be assumed that the district attorney will incur any unnecessary expenses. It is to be assumed that he, like all other public officials, will properly and conscientiously discharge his duties, and, as the board of supervisors is charged with the duty of supervising all expenditures incurred by the district attorney and rejecting payment of those that are unwarranted, there is no reason for assuming that any invasion of the public treasury will be attempted or allowed. In the case at bar it is not claimed but that the services in transcribing the testimony were rendered and the price charged therefor a fair one. It is not even seriously claimed that the transcription was not a necessary expense in the prosecution of the criminal case in which it was used. The only claim is that the transcript could only be ordered by the superior court and only paid for upon an order of the court. This was the view taken by the lower court, and it was erroneous. There is no provision of the law which requires the district attorney to consult any court or obtain any order therefrom as a prerequisite for his incurring any expense which he may deem proper in the discharge of his duties in detecting crime or prosecuting criminal cases. It is not necessary for him to apply to the superior court for an order directing the transcription of testimony. He has a right to determine for himself in the first instance whether it is a necessary expense to be incurred for the purposes for which he is permitted under the act to incur it, subject to having his discretion in that respect ultimately reviewed by the board of supervisors alone, and when that body determines that the discretion has been properly exercised; that the expense was necessarily incurred by him and the charges fair and reasonable, that is the end of the matter. The board of supervisors being vested with the exclusive power to allow the claim if they find it was necessarily incurred by the district attorney and that the charges are fair and reasonable, their action in that respect is not subject to the review or supervision of the courts, but is final and conclusive.

It appears the defendants demurred to the complaint, and their demurrer was overruled. We have set forth the facts as found by the court which follow the allegations of the complaint. The facts as stated in the complaint constituted no cause of action, and, as this point was made on demurrer, the demurrer should have been sustained.

The judgment and order are reversed, with instructions to the lower court to enter an order sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William D. Carithers, deceased. Appeal from a judgment revoking probate of the will of said deceased, and from an order denying motion for a new trial. Reversed.

Morton & Pruitt and E. S. Williams, for appellant. Stephens & Stephens, William A. Bowles, and Grove E. Walter, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Appeal from a judgment entered after verdict of a jury revoking probate of the last will of William D. Carithers, deceased, and from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial. The contention is made on behalf of respondent that, by the failure to argue orally the motion for new trial, the said motion was waived. This is an interesting question which, in view of the conclusions reached by us with reference to the appeal from the judgment, need not be here considered at great length. This court has decided recently, however, that mere failure to present oral argument on the motion for a new trial is not a waiver of said motion. We think that the circumstances in this case and the fact that the motion for the new trial was made upon the very day of the settlement of the bill of exceptions bring it clearly within the rule announced in Boin v. Spreckels Sugar Company (Cal.) 102 Pac. 939. By stipulation but two forms of verdict were submitted to the jury. One was as follows: "Did the deceased, William D. Carithers, know and understand on the evening of August 18, 1906, that he was then making his will and leaving his property to the parties therein named?" The other was a general form of verdict to be signed by the foreman after finding for plaintiff or defendant. To the question calling for special verdict, the jury returned a negative answer, and the general verdict was in favor of the plaintiff. The form of the verdict makes it necessary for us to determine its sufficiency or error in view of all the grounds of contest, which are: First, mental incompetency; second, undue influence; third, lack of due execution. If the general verdict may be sustained upon any one of the above grounds, the judgment must be affirmed.

We will first consider the evidence with reference to the first ground of contest mentioned above, as the special verdict was evidently based upon the belief of the jurors that the testator was of unsound mind at the date of the execution of the will. It appears from the testimony of several witnesses, and seems to be conceded by all parties to this proceeding, that prior to taking up his residence in California, William D. Carithers, who was a prosperous banker and merchant in Illinois, was a regular drinker of alcoholic liquors, but not addicted to the excessive use of such stimulants. After he came to California his habits grew worse, and he was frequently intoxicated for weeks at a time. In 1902 he married the proponent, but marriage did not seem to improve his habits. He continued to drink heavily in spite of his wife's efforts to bring about a reformation. He was taken for treatment to an institution for the care of those addicted to the improper use of liquor, and was also for a time in a home where Christian Science was practiced. Neither form of treatment availed, and he died on October 17, 1906, not quite two months after the execution of his purported last will; the cause of death being acute alcoholism. He was 57 years of age at the time of his death. About 12 days after the execution of the will he was taken to a hospital, and from that time until his death was under medical treatment.

Contestants called two physicians, Drs. Bassett and Justice. The former, in answer to a hypothetical question, gave it as his opinion that the person therein described would be insane, and expressed the belief that Mr. Carithers, whom these physicians saw for the first time when he was taken to the hospital some days after the signing of the testament, was then demented and incapable of making a will. A critical examination of the testimony of the physician, however, fails to reveal anything in the condition of his patient which would not be accounted for by the fact that Carithers had entered upon a fresh debauch after the execution of the will. In other words, the witness failed to relate any circumstances that might not well comport with the theory that Carithers was merely suffering from the usual effects of overindulgence in liquor by a man of his age and physical condition, rather than a permanent state of insanity which, to avoid the will, must have existed on August 18, 1906, when the will was prepared, signed, and attested. Dr. Justice testified that, from the specifications of the hypothetical question, the man described must have been insane, and that testator, whom he saw about 10 days after August 18, 1906, was at that time an "alcoholic dement," and must have been one for a period extending back further than the date of the will. Neither physician saw the patient on or prior to the 18th of August, 1906. Benjamin McCartney, a lifelong friend of the decedent, who was called by the contestants, testified that Mr. Carithers was of unsound mind in the summer of 1906; but he seems to have limited that judgment to periods when the testator was actually drunk. He stated that, when not too drunk to attend to business, Mr. Carithers possessed a fairly bright and active mind. Dr. Guy Elder, witness for contestant, who before he was a physician had acted as a nurse for Mr. Carithers, testified that when he first saw the patient at the emergency hospital during the first week in September the latter was drunk. Later, in the month of October, when he was called to nurse the testator at the latter's home, he found that, according to his judgment, Mr. Carithers' mind was unbalanced. Regarding the mental condition of the testator during the period of his stay at the emergency hospital, however, he testified as follows: "When I went there he was heavily under the influence of liquor. I sobered him up then. After he was sobered up I considered his condition of mind as good as anybody's. He seemed to be in perfect possession of all his faculties, and during the 10 days that I was there with him—during all that time—he seemed to be in possession of all his faculties." Other witnesses described particular eccentric acts of Mr. Carithers; but their testimony throws no light on the subject of the sanity or insanity of testator at the time when he performed the testamentary act.

There is nothing in the will itself to raise any suspicion respecting the mental condition of the testator, except perhaps the signature, which, according to the testimony, seems to have been badly written and not in his usual chirography. It was explained, however, that he signed his name while he was sitting on the edge of his bed, and without having adequate support beneath the paper. These circumstances might easily account for the bad penmanship. The will itself is a natural one, containing nothing essentially unjust. There is a small devise to a sister, and the residue of the property is devised and bequeathed to his wife. The testament was drafted by Mr. Lynn Helm, a reputable member of the bar, who had acted as Mr. Carithers' attorney for a long time. He emphatically asserted at the trial that Mr. Carithers was of sound and disposing mind when the will was prepared and executed. The most significant facts concerning the writing and signing of the will may best be given in Mr. Helm's own words: "Mr. Carithers was lying in bed, and I said to him: 'How do you do, Mr. Carithers? Are you sick? I am sorry to see you sick. He said: 'No, Helm, I am not sick. I am just getting over a drunk.' I said: 'I did not know you ever drank.' He said: 'Yes, you did too.' I said: 'No, I didn't.' 'Well,' he said, 'I am all right now, and I want to see you about some business.' I said, 'How long has this been,' and he said, 'Oh, I have been here the best part of a week; but I am all right now, and I want you to draw my will. Can you do it?' I hesitated a minute, and I said: 'I don't know. What do you want to do?' He said: 'I want to leave everything to my wife.' I said: 'That is easy. I can do that.' He and I were alone in the room at the time, and I said: 'What do you want to do?' He said: 'I want to give my property to my wife, and I want to make her the executrix.' I said: 'I can do that if I can have a piece of paper. I can write it out here.' And he said: 'You call Mrs. Carithers.' He called up to her himself, and in a moment or so she came to the door, and she was leaning over the foot of the bed. It was a very narrow room. I was sitting between the side of the bed and the wall, and there was hardly room for her to have passed me between where I was sitting and the bed, and she leaned over the foot of the bed, and he said to her: 'Dell, get the lawyer a pencil and some paper. I want him to draw my will.' She hesitated a minute and went out and brought me a sheet or pad of paper, and she came in and said: 'What are you going to do?' And he said: 'I am going to draw my will; I am going to leave you everything;' and she hesitated a minute and sort of drew back, and he said: 'Yes, I am going—I have made up my mind, I am going to leave you everything. You are the only one who takes care for me or does anything for me, and no one else cares for me.' She said: 'Well, aren't you going to remember any of your relatives?' And he said: 'Oh, I don't know, you can do that just as well as I can. If anything happens to me, why you can give any one of them a deed to anything as well as I can.' She said: 'No, I don't want it that way. If you are going to do anything of that kind, you had better do it now. Aren't you going to remember your sister, Mary Hipsley?' And he said: 'Well, if you want me to, I will give her something.' Then he talked about his property. He talked about the Kansas property, and then he said: 'I will tell you, I can leave her that piece at Table Grove.' I said: 'How are you going to describe it?' And he said: 'I will describe it as the same property I have with my brother John. I had a half interest with him.' And I said: 'Did you ever have any other property with your brother John at Table Grove?' And he said: 'No, I never did.' 'Well,' I said, 'that would be a good description, to describe it as the property in which you had a half interest with your brother John.' He said: 'All right, you can describe it then as the half interest in the property in the store and building at Table Grove which I owned with my brother John.' I said, 'All right,' and so I then took the pad and wrote the will, and I wrote it with pencil. I had an indelible pencil in my pocket, and I wrote it with that, and after I had finished I read it over to Mr. Carithers." The lawyer's graphic account of these occurrences on August 18, 1906, tends to show not only that the testator was fully conscious of what he was doing, and that he acted rationally, but that his wife was not seeking to influence him unduly in the disposition of his property. Mr. Vogel and Mrs. Strong, the witnesses to the will, both said that Mr. Carithers was sane, that on August 18, 1906, he was of sound and disposing mind, and the testimony of both of these neighbors tends to show that, except when directly under the influence of liquor, he was a man of average intellect. There was much other evidence furnished by laymen and physicians respecting Mr. Carithers' sanity, but we need not reproduce it here.

The great question is whether or not there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict upon the ground of testator's permanent insanity, or of his temporary inability to understand that he was making a will and leaving his property to the persons named therein. We do not think that the contestants produced sufficient evidence of facts to justify the jury's verdict. It is true that gross habits of indulgence in strong drink were disclosed; but there was nothing which tended to break the force of the positive testimony of the attorney and the attesting witnesses that Carithers was possessed of testamentary capacity when he signed the will. The testimony of the physicians was largely speculative and was founded entirely upon knowledge gained subsequent to August 18, 1906, while the other witnesses depended upon facts which were just as consistent with the theory of temporary drunkenness as of permanent mental derangement. Such evidence is not adequate for the overthrowing of the provisions of a will. In re Wilson's Estate, 117 Cal. 276, 49 Pac. 176, lays down the rule for cases of this kind very clearly as follows: "While evidence of the condition of the testator's mind both before and after the date of the testamentary act is admissible, yet it is important only as it bears upon that condition at the very time of the execution of the will. It unfortunately is often the case that exceedingly bright and strong-minded people are addicted to the excessive use of alcoholic drinks, and are frequently intoxicated; and to hold that the wills of such persons, although shown to have been executed when they were in full possession of testamentary capacity, can be upset by a jury upon mere proof of such drinking habit, would be to carry the rule of 'conflicting evidence' beyond all reasonable bounds."

There was no evidence of lack of due execution, so we need not consider further that ground of contest. Upon the issue of undue influence there was some evidence that Mrs. Carithers had sought to keep certain friends from communicating with her husband, and that she had expressed to Dr. Justice a fear that Mr. McCartney and Mr. Helm might induce him to make some change in his papers. There was practically nothing shown beyond interest and possible opportunity of the wife to sway her husband's mind. Much more is needed to make out a case of undue influence. Proof must be had of a pressure which overpowered the mind and bore down the volition of the testator at the very time the will was made. Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 182, 64 Pac. 294; Estate of Calef, 139 Cal. 673, 73 Pac. 539; Estate of Black, 132 Cal. 392, 64 Pac. 695; Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. 390, 73 Pac. 1081.

Appellant calls our attention to other alleged errors; but, in view of the conclusion which we have reached respecting the sufficiency of the evidence, we do not deem it necessary to consider them.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Bartlett Estate Company against W. H. Fraser and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, the mentioned defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stearns & Sweet, for appellant. Mills & Hizar, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Plaintiff filed a verified complaint, alleging its due organization and existence as a California corporation, setting out in hæc verba a nonnegotiable promissory note, joint in form, payable to the People's State Bank, and signed by defendants Fraser and Wyneken, alleging that no part had been paid except interest for one year, and the assignment and transfer of the note to plaintiff. Defendant Wyneken made default. Fraser answered, averring that he had not sufficient information and belief upon the subject to enable him to answer, and upon that ground denied that plaintiff is now, and at all times mentioned in the complaint has been, a corporation, etc.; further, for want of information and belief, denied that no part of the note had been paid except the one year's interest; for want of information and belief, denied that no part of the note remained unpaid; and, by way of counterclaim, set up an account against plaintiff theretofore assigned to him, which he alleged remained unpaid, and for the amount of which he asked judgment. The court, on motion, struck from the amended answer of defendant Fraser the portions thereof attempting to deny the corporate existence of plaintiff, and those paragraphs of the answer denying nonpayment, as well as the allegations with reference to the counterclaim, leaving in the answer only as an issue the question of the assignment and transfer of the obligation on which suit was brought.

Appellant insists that the court erred in sustaining the motion to strike out. We see no error upon the part of the court in this regard. "The rules of pleading under our system are intended to prevent evasion, and to require a denial of every specific averment in a sworn complaint, in substance and in spirit, and not merely a denial of its literal truth." Doll v. Good, 38 Cal. 290. The allegation of the answer with relation to the corporate existence of plaintiff, being in form conjunctive, fell short of denying each specific averment. The denials as to nonpayment upon information and belief are within the rule laid down in Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 487, 35 Pac. 144: "A defendant is not at liberty to answer an allegation in this form, when he may be presumed to know, or when he is aware before answering, that he has the means of ascertaining whether or not such allegation is true." Applying these rules, the court properly eliminated these evasive and insufficient denials from the answer. The note set out is in form, "We promise to pay," etc. This was therefore a joint note, as distinguished from a joint and several obligation. The form of such an obligation must be enforced according to its express terms. Farmers' Exchange Bank v. Morse, 129 Cal. 242, 61 Pac. 1088. The obligation being by its express terms joint, section 1430, Civ. Code, has no application, and, being joint, no counterclaim can be made available which consists of a demand in favor of one of the obligors. Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 114, 9 Pac. 180, 11 Pac. 599.

The court found in favor of plaintiff upon the issue as to the assignment and transfer of the obligation the basis of the action. Appellant contends that there is no evidence in the record to sustain this finding of the court. There is evidence that the bank to whom the note was made payable received a consideration for its transfer, and that the assignment was made in the name of the bank by its president eight months before suit was brought. Under the usages and customs of modern banking, the president of a bank is no longer regarded as an ornamental magnet with which to attract deposits, but, on the contrary, is now, and has been for several years, recognized as the executive head and most important agent in connection with banking operations. The reason for the rule that through banking usage the president's power was limited to transactions expressly authorized by the board of directors no longer obtains, and the rule should cease; but, aside from this, the People's Bank received and retained the proceeds of a rediscount of the note set out, thereby acquiescing in the acts of its president in making the assignment, and transfer from which the proceeds of the rediscount were obtained, and were it even conceded that the internal policy of a banking corporation requires the indorsements on its rediscounts to be executed by the cashier or other officer, nevertheless, by acquiescence in the acts of its president, it would be estopped to deny his authority in the premises. This principle is established by section 3519 of our Civil Code: "He who can and does not forbid that which is done on his behalf is deemed to have bidden it." The bank being estopped to deny the authority of the president in making the transfer appellant is fully protected from further litigation or liability in connection with any claim of the bank on the paper, and this should be the full measure of his right to enforce proof of assignment, or to question its validity. In our opinion the court was warranted in finding that the note had been assigned and that plaintiff was the owner and holder thereof.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Catherine Paine and another against A. B. Ward and others, a copartnership. From an order denying a motion for new trial after judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. D. Crawford and B. A. Herrington, for appellants. A. A. Caldwell and E. M. Rea, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The case was tried without a jury, and a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs. The appeal is from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

At the time of the accident the plaintiffs were employed on the Cullen ranch, near the town of Gilroy, as teamster and cook, respectively, and the defendants, who were in the wood business, were cutting and hauling wood from the same ranch. At that time an employé of the defendants, having in charge the defendants' team attached to a wagon, had passed from the public road into the Cullen property, and, after doing so, had left the team and wagon standing unattended while he stepped back to close a gate through which he had just passed. At this moment he noticed the plaintiffs approaching driving a horse and buggy, and he held the gate open until they had passed into the Cullen ranch. After passing through the gate, the plaintiffs drove around the team, and, when they got into the road and about 40 feet ahead of the team, the latter ran away and collided with or jumped into the rear of their buggy, resulting in the injuries complained of.

Defendants contend that the findings are not supported by the evidence. The court found: That defendants' "said servant negligently and carelessly left said team of horses, hitched to said wagon, standing about 20 feet from the gate or entrance to the Cullen ranch * * * without fastening the reins or setting the brake upon said wagon, said horses being unattended by any person or persons and untied." That while the team was left in that unsafe condition said employé "carelessly and negligently" did "slam shut violently and with great force the gate to said entrance, thereby creating a great and sudden noise," which noise "combined with other causes * * * caused said team of horses to take fright" and run away.

Defendants' contention that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding is untenable. One witness testified that this was a restless and nervous team, and that it had acted in a fractious manner before. It was undisputed that the employé in charge of the team on the day of the accident had been driving it for a period of three months. One of the plaintiffs, W. A. Paine, said in his testimony that it is the custom of teamsters to set brakes, back the team, and twist the lines securely around the seat of the wagon or the brake before getting down to open or close a gate, whether the team is gentle or not; that on this occasion, in driving by the standing team, he glanced down and noticed the reins of the team upon the ground; that, when the team was stopped, the lines were dragging upon the ground, and the brake upon the wagon was not set; and that the team and wagon were unattended while the driver thereof was holding open the gate. Both plaintiffs testified that just as they turned into the road ahead of the team, and while the team was still unattended, the gate slammed, making a loud noise, and that the team almost immediately started and came up behind them so rapidly that it was impossible to avoid the accident. On the other hand, defendants introduced testimony to the effect that the brake on the wagon was set and the reins fastened, that the gate was held open by their driver at the request of plaintiffs, and that they in passing the team drove so close to it as to touch with their buggy the stomach of one of the horses, which caused the team to run away.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The effect of all this evidence was to present a question of fact to the trial court. The court accepted the version of the accident which showed negligence on the part of defendants' employé, and under the well-established rule in cases of conflict in the evidence this court will not disturb the conclusion of the trial court.

Appellants also claim that the finding that plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence is contrary to the evidence. W. A. Paine testified that as he approached the gate he "yelled to the man standing there to go on" as "the team coming behind would close the gate"; that "I told him several times to drive on, but he would not do so, and motioned to us to go on through the gate. We drove no closer at any time to the team than 30 or 40 feet. I saw the reins on the ground just as my wife turned into the road ahead of the team, and I had not noticed them before." His wife testified: "I naturally supposed the driver of the team had set his brake and fastened his reins. If he had done so, the accident would not have happened. I did not see the reins upon the ground and did not see the brake." Neither of these witnesses, according to their testimony, knew the horses nor had ever seen them before. They were familiar with the custom of teamsters, and therefore supposed that the brakes were set and the lines securely fastened.

If the testimony in the case disclosed that the plaintiffs knew that the team in question was naturally nervous and restless, that the brakes were not set, and the lines lying on the ground, the court might have found that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence in driving ahead of the unattended team, but their evidence shows that they did not know those facts, except that one of the plaintiffs in passing the team saw the lines on the ground, but it may be inferred that this was at a time too late to change the course of the buggy and avert the accident. Neither of them could anticipate the slamming of the gate, without which act the team would probably not have run away. We think the finding of the court on this branch of the case is also amply sustained by the evidence.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BOUNDARIES (§ 3*)—CONVEYANCE ACCORDING TO SECTION LINE MARKED BY STAKES.

The owner of two sections, after having the east and west section line between them surveyed, and stakes set showing such line, conveyed a strip for a highway 60 feet wide, 30 feet wide off the south side of the north section, and 30 feet wide off the north side of the south section. The county entered on the strip and used it as a highway, though not to its entire width; and the owner of the sections platted the remainder of the north section, each on the basis of the deed for the road having conveyed a strip 30 feet wide each side of the section line as marked by the surveyor with stakes. Held that, the conveyance being made with reference to the stakes as showing the section line, the county could not be disturbed in its possession by defendant, who bought one of the south platted lots, knowing his south boundary was located with reference to the conveyance to the county being in accordance with the stakes, showing that the true section line was farther south.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by George W. Beall, Road Commissioner of Supervisor District No. 2, Fresno county, against W. J. Weir. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Williams, for appellant. Denver S. Church and Manson F. McCormick, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought by the plaintiff as road commissioner for the purpose of abating a certain post and wire fence alleged to have been erected and maintained by the defendant on a public highway in Fresno county. The defendant admitted that he constructed and maintained the fence, but claimed that such fence was not upon a highway, but upon his own land. Upon the issue thus made the court found in favor of plaintiff, and ordered the fence abated as a public nuisance, and judgment was accordingly entered. Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant, no doubt in good faith, believed that he owned the land upon which he erected the fence. His counsel states in his brief that "the only issue in the case is the location of the section line between sections 23 and 26 in township 13, S. R. 21." After carefully examining the record, we are of the opinion that the issue in the case is as to the correct location of the boundaries upon the face of the earth according to the calls of a deed made by the then owner of the land to the county of Fresno for a right of way for a public highway, and whether or not the place where the fence was erected is within the exterior calls of said deed.

On June 29, 1888, one Eggers was the owner of said sections 23 and 26, and while so the owner he conveyed by deed to the county of Fresno a strip of land 60 feet wide, being 30 feet on each side of the section line between sections 23 and 26, and extending east and west across the entire section; or, in other words, he conveyed a strip of land 30 feet wide off the south side of section 23 and a strip of land 30 feet wide off the north side of section 26. Prior to the time Eggers made the deed to the county of the right of way the section lines in the township had been located or had been attempted to be located by one Manuel, by surveys made by said Manuel, who drove redwood stakes down in the ground to mark the section corners at the east and at the west end of what was believed to be the true section line dividing said sections 26 and 23. The people in the township, so far as appears, were governed by the survey so made by Manuel and the corners as fixed by him. The surveyor of the county, McKay, made a survey in 1898 along the east line of said section 23, and found the redwood post at the southeast corner which had been placed there by Manuel in making his original survey prior to the time Eggers deeded to the county. In 1890 Eggers had all of section 23 surveyed and platted by a surveyor named Tielman, who subdivided the section into lots numbered from 24 to 59, inclusive, which survey was called the plat of the Eggers colony. In making this survey the surveyor found all the original redwood stakes as set by Manuel, and which were in the ground at the time Eggers made the deed to the county. This plat located the south boundary of the south tier of lots of said section 23 the same as the northerly line of the 60 feet right of way as fixed with reference to the stakes originally set by Manuel. Eggers, in having the survey and plats made of the Eggers' colony, treated the deed to the county as fixed and located by said stakes so originally set. This survey and plat was filed for record by Eggers. The defendant afterwards (but at what time does not appear) became the owner of lot 32 of the property so platted for Eggers. It does, however, appear that defendant knew of the stake at the southeast corner of the section and of the south boundary of his lot, which did not include the place where he built the fence which is here claimed to be a nuisance. Defendant purchased with full knowledge of the construction which had been placed upon the deed by Eggers when he conveyed to the county and with full knowledge as to the south boundary of lot 32 as fixed by the Eggers map. The county accepted the deed and the public traveled the road as a highway after the conveyance was made to it. A furrow was at first run so as to mark the line of the road, but the road was not completely graded until 1905. During the year 1905, at the request of defendant, about 20 years after the first survey had been made, Manuel resurveyed the township. In making this resurvey Manuel states that, by measuring the township north and south between the township line and the line between sections 23 and 26, he found an overplus of 39 feet, and that he divided this excess of 39 feet between the sections so "that would bring the line of Wier's place in the neighborhood of 13 or 14 feet below the place where his first row of vines is." In other words, by the resurvey made by Manuel in 1905, disregarding the stakes he originally set in the ground so as to designate the lines, he made the south line of defendant's lot about 13 to 14 feet farther south than the line was made by the Eggers map, thus taking 13 or 14 feet, a portion of the highway as located by Eggers at the time he conveyed to the county.

It is not necessary to decide as to whether or not the last survey made by Manuel is the correct one. When Eggers conveyed to the county, he owned the entire tract through which the right of way was granted, and the reference in the deed to the section line separating sections 23 and 26 was made with reference to the line as he had located it by his own surveyor. It conveyed the strip of land precisely as if the description had commenced at one of the stakes at the section corner and gone around the entire 60 feet, closing at the same stake. Eggers so understood it when he made the deed. He continued to so understand and construe it when he had the section surveyed and platted and defendant knew his said boundary as located by the Eggers colony map when he purchased. Defendant still owns undisturbed all the land described in lot 32 of the Eggers colony. He may not disturb the county in its ownership of all that Eggers had conveyed to it prior to the time defendant came upon the scene. This construction leaves each grantee undisturbed as to the lands described in the conveyance under which they respectively took.

When land has once been conveyed with reference to stakes and monuments which were fixed and in place at the time of such conveyance, the conveyance cannot be afterwards defeated by a new survey which shows that the stakes and monuments as originally set were not as a matter of fact in their true places. A contrary rule would upset titles and make all conveyances more or less uncertain. It is always the endeavor of courts to ascertain the intention of the parties in applying the description contained in a deed to the monuments referred to therein so as to locate the land in accordance with the intention of the parties. The construction we have given the deed to the county is in accord with the rule as laid down time and time again by the Supreme Court.

In Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 476, 18 Pac. 604, the deed described the land as being in the southeast instead of southwest quarter of a certain section; but the court held that, if the land intended to be conveyed could be identified by monuments actually fixed upon the ground, the mistake as to the subdivision in which the land was really located was falsa demonstratio. In Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 168, 73 Pac. 828, it was held that the boundaries of city lots as originally located on the surface of the earth must govern, and a line shown by monuments as platted by the city authorities, and acquiesced in for many years, must control courses and distances, and cannot be overturned by measurements afterwards made by a surveyor. We repeat what was there said: "The testimony of surveyors on the part of defendants was sharply in conflict with the above as to the division line by a survey by courses and distances. The defendants' surveyors took the monumental line of Green street as they located it. They found an original line monument at a point on Union street near Hyde, thence from the line of Union street across the block to Green street, a distance of 275 feet, thence 68 feet across Green street, and thence 68 feet and 9 inches to the line of defendant's lot. These surveys may have been correct by courses and distances, but in the course of 30 or 40 years a change in the position of the monuments on the surface of the earth might easily cause a variation of 4 or 5 inches. The lines as originally located must govern in such cases. The survey as made in the field and the lines as actually run on the surface of the earth at the time the blocks were surveyed and the plats filed must control. The parties who own the property have a right to rely on such lines and monuments. They must when established control courses and distances. A line, as shown by monuments and as platted by the city authorities, and as acquiesced in for many years, cannot be overturned by measurements alone." See, further, Penry v. Richards, 52 Cal. 496; Bullard v. Kempff, 119 Cal. 9, 50 Pac. 780; Diehl v. Zanger, 39 Mich. 601.

There is no merit in the suggestion that the county only used the central portion of the right of way, and did not accept the right of way for the full width of the 60 feet, because it did not use all of the 60 feet up to the south boundary of defendant's land. The county accepted the right of way by entry upon and using the same as a public highway and expending public moneys thereon. Its acceptance was as broad as the grant, although it did not use the entire width of the right of way. The question is entirely different from the construction given to the width of a right of way where the right of way is claimed entirely by prescription or user. In such case the public cannot claim a constructive dedication or a constructive title to land which in fact was never used or traveled over by the public.

There is no merit in any of the other contentions of defendant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Josephine Peterson, administratrix of Michel Cartier, deceased, against W. J. Nesbitt. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Andresen and W. S. White, for appellant. Daugherty & Lacey, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this action against the defendant, who is the sheriff of Monterey county, to recover damages for allowing the escape of one Marcelin Cartier, who had been arrested upon mesne process in a civil action, brought by this plaintiff against said Marcelin Cartier. At the trial plaintiff offered in evidence the affidavit upon which the order of arrest had been made, but upon objection of defendant the court refused to admit it in evidence, and as a result plaintiff was unable to prove her case, and at the close of her testimony the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The appeal is from the judgment of nonsuit entered in accordance with this order.

The only question to be determined is as to whether or not the court erred in sustaining defendant's objection to the introduction of the affidavit for the order of arrest. The correctness of the ruling of the court depends upon whether or not the affidavit upon which the order of arrest was based was sufficient to invest the court with jurisdiction to make the order. The statute (section 481, Code Civ. Proc.) provides that "the order may be made whenever it appears to the judge, by the affidavit of the plaintiff, or some other person, that a sufficient cause of action exists, and that the case is one of those mentioned in section four hundred and seventy-nine. The affidavit must be either positive, or upon information and belief; and when upon information and belief, it must state the facts upon which the information and belief are founded."

Several objections are urged as to the sufficiency of the affidavit, the first of which is that it does not appear from the affidavit that a sufficient cause of action existed. In this regard the affidavit, which was made by the attorney for the plaintiff in the original actions, states "that a good and sufficient cause of action exists in favor of the said plaintiff and against the defendant in said action for the sum of $2,705 for the wrongful conversion of certain property belonging to the estate of Michel Cartier, deceased, as fully appears from the verified complaint on file herein, which said complaint is in words and figures as follows, to wit." Then follows a copy of such complaint. This is but the statement of the opinion of the affiant that the complaint states a good and sufficient cause of action. It is not a statement of the affiant that the matters set forth in the complaint are true. We apprehend that no prosecution for perjury would lie against the affiant predicated upon the falsity of any of the matters set forth in the complaint. The affidavit in question differs radically from the affidavits held sufficient in Ligare v. Cal. S. R. R. Co., 76 Cal. 610, 18 Pac. 777, and Ex parte Howitz, 2 Cal. App. 753, 84 Pac. 229, where the affiant made oath to the truth of the facts stated in the document referred to. In the Howitz Case the complaint was annexed to and made a part of the affidavit, and the affiant averred "that the allegations contained therein are true." In Ligare v. Cal. S. R. R. Co., the affidavit referred to the complaint on file, and made it a part and portion of the affidavit. The language was such that the court held that "the oath to the affidavit is an oath to the truth of the document referred to."

That cannot be justly said of the language of the affidavit in this case. Though the complaint is set forth in the affidavit, the affiant does not make oath to the truth of any matter contained therein. It certainly is not sufficient for the affiant to state in general terms that a good and sufficient cause of action exists. This is a matter for the judge to determine, and the facts constituting the cause of action must be set forth and sworn to, either positively or upon information and belief. If sworn to upon information and belief, the facts upon which the information and belief are founded must be stated. The jurisdiction to issue an order of arrest in a civil suit rests upon the affidavit. Where the affidavit in an essential particular fails to meet the requirements of the law, the court is without jurisdiction to issue the order for arrest. Ex parte Fkumoto, 120 Cal. 316, 52 Pac. 726; Neves v. Kosta, 5 Cal. App. 111, 89 Pac. 860.

The court did not err in sustaining the objection to the offer of the affidavit or in granting the motion for a nonsuit, and the judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 242.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California.
Sept. 29, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 384*)—BONDS—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the recitals in an appeal bond do not identify the particular appeal which it was intended to perfect, the bond is totally void, not merely insufficient, but where a bond on appeal from a judgment properly refers to the judgment appealed from, so as to fully identify it, and shows that it was a judgment from which an appeal could only be properly taken to the court of appeal, it was not void because it recites by mistake that the appeal was to be taken to the Supreme Court, especially in view of Const. art. 6, § 4, providing for a transfer of the appeal to the proper court.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 391*)—BONDS—SUFFICIENCY.

It is no objection to the sufficiency of an appeal where a good bond has been filed and approved that the sureties on a former bond would not be liable; the very purpose of Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Paving Company against Peter Verso and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss. Denied.

W. J. Bartnett and R. K. Barrows, for appellant. Alexander D. Keyes, for respondents.

HALL, J. Respondents have made a motion to dismiss the appeal in this case upon the ground that the appeal bond filed upon taking the appeal is so defective as not to support the appeal. Two defects in the bond are pointed out by respondents, one of which they concede is not fatal, and may be corrected by the filing in this court of a new bond under section 954 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Before the hearing of this motion, a new bond was filed and approved, which is sufficient in form and substance to support the appeal, provided the other defect in the original bond is not fatal to the appeal. The appeal is from a judgment, and the bond properly refers to the judgment appealed from so as to fully identify it. The defect urged as fatal consists of the recital that "whereas an appeal is about to be taken to the Supreme Court," when, in fact, the appeal was taken to this court. It is contended that this does not identify the appeal, and that, therefore, the bond is no bond at all on this appeal.

It is true that it has been held that, where the recitals in the undertaking do not identify the particular appeal which it is intended to perfect, the undertaking is considered as totally void for any purpose, and not merely insufficient. Little v. Thatcher, 151 Cal. 559, 91 Pac. 321; Wadleigh v. Phelps, 147 Cal. 135, 81 Pac. 418; Estate of Heydenfeldt, 119 Cal. 346, 51 Pac. 543; Centerville, etc., Co. v. Bachtold, 109 Cal. 111, 41 Pac. 813; Home & Loan Ass'n v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. 799; Corcoran v. Desmond, 71 Cal. 101, 11 Pac. 815. In most of the above cases several appeals had been taken and but one bond given, which did not show which appeal it was intended to perfect. In Little v. Thatcher the bond identified a judgment as the subject-matter of the appeal, when, in fact, an order denying a motion for a new trial was the matter appealed from. In the case at bar the bond fully identifies the matter from which the appeal was taken. It was the judgment rendered in the case, and is completely identified by the recitals in the bond. Furthermore, it was a judgment from which an appeal could only be properly taken to this court; and, if the appeal should in form be taken to the Supreme Court the proceedings would still in law ultimately result in an appeal to this court; for in such case the Constitution provides for a transfer of the appeal to the proper court. Const. art. 6, § 4. It would still be the same appeal, and heard upon precisely the same record, and involve the same questions.

It is no objection to the sufficiency of this appeal as it now stands, with a good bond filed and approved before the hearing of this motion, to say that the sureties on the original undertaking would not be liable. That may be true, and the appeal supported by the new bond. It is the very purpose of section 954, Code Civ. Proc., to allow a sufficient bond to be given to supply the defects of an insufficient bond. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 114 Cal. 61, 45 Pac. 1022; Jarman v. Rea, 129 Cal. 157, 61 Pac. 790; Bay City Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Charles E. Broad, 128 Cal. 670, 61 Pac. 368. The entire law for the giving of any bond on appeal is statutory, and it is competent for the Legislature to regulate the matter as its wisdom may dictate. Spreckels v. Spreckels, supra. Section 954, Code Civ. Proc., allowing a new bond to be given when the original bond is insufficient, is remedial in its nature, and we think for that reason should receive a liberal interpretation with a view to further the determination of appeals upon their merits. The giving of the new bond before the hearing of the motion to dismiss amply protects the interests of the respondent.

As before indicated, this appeal is in its legal effect practically the same as if the notice of appeal had in fact been an appeal to the Supreme Court. Such an appeal would have effected an appeal to this court, because, as the judgment is one directly appealable only to this court, the Supreme Court, under the Constitution, would have transferred the appeal to this court. In either case, the appeal would be heard and determined by this court upon the same record, and the same question would be involved. In this regard the principle is analogous to that part of the decision in Wadleigh v. Phelps, supra, dealing with the appeals from the judgment and various nonappealable orders reviewable upon the appeal from the judgment. But one bond was given, and it was held that this supported the appeal from the judgment. Especially see concurring opinion by Mr. Justice Angellotti, 147 Cal. 142, 81 Pac. 418.

We do not think the facts of this case bring it within the rule of those cases where the subject-matter of the appeal is not identified by the bond; and in view of the remedial character of section 954, Code Civ. Proc., the doctrine of those cases should not be stretched to cover cases not fairly within them. In McAulay v. Tahoe Ice Co., 3 Cal. App. 642, 86 Pac. 912, cited by respondent, no new bond was filed or offered, and the question of the effect of giving a new and sufficient bond under section 954 did not arise.

The motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied, and it is so ordered.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by O. R. Cole against the Roebling Construction Company and James Wilson. From an order denying a motion to vacate a default judgment against defendant Wilson, he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and J. J. Lerman, for appellant. Hiram W. Johnson and D. M. Duffy, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was one for the recovery of $6,618 damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by reason of the negligence of defendants. The complaint alleges that the "defendants, their servants, agents, and employes" negligently threw from a building into a street along which plaintiff was passing a "heavy solid plank" in such a manner that it struck plaintiff, inflicting upon him permanent and other injuries, by all of which he had been damaged "at the present time" in the sum already specified. The action was commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on February 13, 1907. Summons was duly served on both defendants on February 15, 1907. Defendant Wilson having failed to appear within the time allowed by law, his default was entered on March 1, 1907. The other defendant appeared, and filed a demurrer and a motion to strike out a portion of the complaint. On March 22, 1907, the motion to strike out was granted. The effect of this order was simply to strike out the following: "That it cannot now be told what the permanent effects of the said injury will be other than the loss of the said toes of the plaintiff, and for that reason the plaintiff avers that his damage will be continuous and increasing." It does not appear that the demurrer was sustained, and the striking out of this portion did not leave it any way defective. It alleged in another place the loss of three of plaintiff's toes by reason of the negligence, and also that thereby plaintiff "has been permanently maimed, injured, and crippled." On March 29, 1907, defendant Wilson not having appeared, the court proceeded with the hearing of the cause as to him; he not being present and not having been notified. The court found that he had been regularly served, and that his default had been duly entered, and that all of the allegations of the complaint are true except that as to the amount of damage. It further found that the damage was $6,318, and ordered a judgment against Wilson accordingly. The findings and decision were filed on March 29, 1907, and judgment was given against Wilson for that amount on the same day, and entered on March 30, 1907. On April 1, 1907, plaintiff filed an amended complaint. This was an exact copy of the original, except that the matter that had been stricken out was omitted, and in lieu thereof there was inserted the following: "That the injuries of plaintiff are permanent; that his damage will be continuous and increasing." The amended complaint was not served on Wilson. On May 24, 1907, the other defendant filed its answer thereto, and at the time of the hearing of the motion hereinafter referred to the cause was at issue between plaintiff and said defendant on said amended complaint and said answer. On June 15, 1907, Wilson made his first appearance in the action by moving to vacate the default and judgment against him, on the ground of excusable neglect on his part in theretofore failing to appear and answer, and also on the grounds that the judgment was inadvertently rendered by the court, was irregular, and was without the jurisdiction of the court. This motion was denied on July 28, 1908, and this is an appeal by Wilson from the order denying his motion.

Learned counsel for appellant frankly admit that, so far as their motion was based on the ground that the judgment was taken against him through his excusable neglect, their case on appeal from the order of the trial court denying relief is not a strong one. This is clearly apparent when the record is examined. Indeed the showing was of such a nature that, notwithstanding the established tendency in favor of a trial on the merits, it might well have been contended that the granting of the motion would have been an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. But it is sufficient to say that as to the alleged fact upon which alone appellant claimed to have relied in failing to himself appear and defend there was a substantial conflict of evidence, and the decision of the trial court thereon is conclusive here. We may add that the preponderance of evidence on this question of fact was clearly against appellant.

As we have seen, an amended complaint was filed subsequent to the entry of the default, which was never served upon appellant. It is earnestly urged that the effect of this was to open the default and make the judgment entered irregular, one inadvertently rendered, and one given without jurisdiction. It is settled by a long line of decisions that where, after the default of a defendant has been entered, a complaint is amended in matter of substance as distinguished from mere matter of form, the amendment opens the default, and unless the amended pleading be served on the defaulting defendant, no judgment can properly be entered on the default. See Thompson v. Johnson, 60 Cal. 292; Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 399, 24 Pac. 1089, 21 Am. St. Rep. 52; Witter v. Bachman, 117 Cal. 319, 49 Pac. 202; Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 304, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108; Linott v. Rowland, 119 Cal. 452, 453, 51 Pac. 687; Riverside County v. Stockman, 124 Cal. 224, 56 Pac. 1027; Tappendorff v. Moranda, 134 Cal. 421, 66 Pac. 491. The reason for this rule is plain. A defendant is entitled to opportunity to be heard upon the allegations of the complaint on which judgment is sought against him. His default on the original complaint is limited in its effect to that complaint; and, if by amendment a matter of substance is added, he should be given the opportunity to contest the same before any judgment is given against him on account thereof. The law, therefore, requires that the amended pleading shall be served on all the adverse parties, including defaulting defendants. But, assuming the amendment here to have been a matter of substance, this rule has no application to the case at bar. All of the cases cited are cases where the judgment was given against the defaulting defendant subsequent to the presentation of the amended pleading, and was necessarily based solely on such amended pleading which had taken the place of the original pleading, while here judgment had been given and entered upon the default against the defaulting defendant before any amendment was made, there being at the time of such judgment a good and sufficient complaint on file, with a copy of which he had been duly served, and which constituted the basis of the judgment. So far as the superior court was concerned, the action, at the time of the amendment, had been finally disposed of as to the appellant by the judgment entered upon the original complaint, the allegations of which were admitted by his failure to appear. The judgment having thus been given, appellant could not be "affected" by any subsequent amendment (Code Civ. Proc. § 432), nor was he longer an "adverse party" within the meaning of that term as used in sections 465 and 472 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As to him, the action had been disposed of in the superior court upon the issues tendered by the original complaint. The whole reason for the rule relied on by the appellant is wanting in such a case, and there is nothing in the law warranting the conclusion that there is any such rule where judgment is given against the defaulting defendant before any amendment is made.

It is further contended that the trial court had no power to give judgment against the appellant alone, "in view of the finding that both defendants were jointly guilty of the negligence alleged to have been the cause of plaintiff's injury." We have already stated the allegation of the complaint as to the act of the defendants that caused the injury. The court simply found "that all the singular averments of the complaint are true," except the averment as to damages. Section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "In an action against several defendants, the court may, in its discretion, render judgment against one or more of them, leaving the action to proceed against the others, whenever a several judgment is proper." Section 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that if, in an action of this character, the defendant fails to answer, the clerk must enter the default of the defendant, "and thereafter the plaintiff may apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint," and the court is authorized to hear the evidence that may be offered to sustain the allegations of the complaint.

It is not disputed that two or more persons who jointly engage in the commission of a tort are jointly and severally liable, as the injured party may elect. The injured party may sue all or any of them jointly, or each separately, or, having secured a joint judgment against all, enforce such judgment by execution against one only; the only limitation being that he can have but one satisfaction for the injury that he has received. Fowden v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 157, 86 Pac. 178. See, also, Tompkins v. Clay St. R. R. Co., 66 Cal. 166, 4 Pac. 1165. In this case plaintiff might have brought separate actions against Wilson and the other defendant; his complaint containing the precise allegations as to a joint act of negligence that are made in the complaint here. If he had so done, such complaint in each action, although alleging a joint act of negligence on the part of the defendant and the other party named, would have stated a complete and separate individual liability against the party sued on account of the single act complained of. Fowden v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., supra. Nor can it be disputed that, under the rules of law in force in this state, in an action of the character of the one before us, judgment may be given against one defendant and in favor of another defendant. Section 578, Code Civ. Proc.; Fowden v. Pacific Coast, etc., Co., supra. In view of these well-settled views, by virtue of which a separate action could have been maintained against Wilson upon the very allegations contained in this complaint, it is difficult to conceive why a "several judgment" against one of two or more defendants charged with having jointly participated in a single act of negligence producing injury is not "proper"; and, if it would be "proper," it is in terms authorized by section 579 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Wherein can appellant complain of such action being taken in this case? By his failure to appear he had admitted the truth of the allegations of the complaint "which stated a complete and separate individual liability" on his part on account of the single act complained of just as fully as if he had been the sole defendant. So far as his liability was concerned, it could make no difference whether his co-defendant was subsequently held liable or not. He had no legal right to insist that others who had participated in the confessed negligent act, whether defendants or not, should pay any portion of the damage. He was liable for all such damage upon the allegations of the complaint that must be taken as admitted by him. Learned counsel for Wilson say that if this practice is to be sustained, the logical result will be that the court, after entering this judgment against the appellant, can proceed to the trial of the case as against the remaining defendant, entering up a new and separate judgment, and perhaps a different judgment from the one entered against the appellant. This may be so, but we do not see that it affects the question before us. The well-settled rule is that no bar arises as to any of the wrongdoers until the injured party has received satisfaction, or what in law is deemed its equivalent, and a judgment against one wrongdoer which remains wholly unsatisfied is not such satisfaction. See Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 199, 29 Pac. 31; Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 127 Cal. 438, 59 Pac. 826, 47 L. R. A. 467, 78 Am. St. Rep. 75.

The situation here in this regard is practically not different from that in Dawson v. Schloss, supra, where the action was against Schloss and Hinkle. On the first trial judgment was recovered against both Schloss and Hinkle for $5,000. A new trial was granted as to Schloss alone. The judgment against Hinkle for $5,000 remained in force, but wholly unsatisfied. A new trial resulted in a judgment against Schloss for $3,000. Schloss appealed from the judgment against him, contending that so long as the original judgment existed against Hinkle, no judgment should have been rendered against him on the new trial; that "while separate suits may be brought against each of joint tort-feasors, yet it is well settled that, if the defendants are sued jointly, as here, there can be but one verdict and judgment." This court said: "Such is not the prevailing rule in the United States." The judgment against Schloss was affirmed.

It is not true under our rules that different judgments against different wrongdoers for the same wrongful act may not be for different amounts, the amount in each case being dependent upon the conclusion of the particular judge or jury as to the amount of damage accruing to the injured party from the wrongful act. Dawson v. Schloss, supra, shows that the same result may follow where there is one action only against all the wrongdoers. It is true that in an action of this character the damages cannot be severed and apportioned by the trial court or jury among the different defendants. McCool v. Mahoney, 54 Cal. 491, holds no more than this. In that case the jury by their verdict against two defendants apportioned the total damage of $3,500 found, awarding $3,000 against one defendant and $500 against the other, and judgment was entered accordingly. This judgment was reversed, the court saying that, as the action was for a wrong in which both defendants joined, the damages could not be severed. But this rule has no application to the question we are discussing. There will be no severance of damages even if plaintiff is allowed to proceed and obtain judgment against the remaining defendant for a different amount. The amount for which he finally obtains judgment against the other defendant would be the total amount of damage that, in the opinion of the trial court or jury, the plaintiff had suffered from the wrongful act of both defendants. The case of Curry v. Roundtree, 51 Cal. 184, cited by appellant, was an action against three alleged copartners jointly on a partnership demand, and is not in point. See Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 620, 11 Pac. 456.

No other point is made for reversal. The order is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Petition for certiorari by John Baird, against the Justice's Court of Riverside Township and Thomas B. Stephenson, Justice of the Peace. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lafayette Gill, for appellant. Miguel Estudillo and George A. French, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. This is a proceeding wherein the court below gave judgment annulling the following order made and entered by appellant justice in an action pending in said justice's court wherein petitioner was defendant: "It is ordered that Police Judge George A. French be disbarred from practicing law in the justice court of Riverside township so long as he shall remain police judge of said city, and his name is hereby stricken from the files in this case." The application for the writ was made by the defendant to the action in which the order was made; the attorney, French, not being a party thereto. It is conceded, however, that French was at all times mentioned in the proceedings a practicing attorney, having been duly admitted to practice in all the courts of the state, and had been retained by petitioner and had appeared in said action in petitioner's behalf.

Counsel for the respective parties have discussed at length in very interesting and instructive briefs the effect which should be given section 171, Code Civ. Proc., which in terms prohibits a justice of the peace from practicing law before another justice of the peace of the same county; respondent's contention being: That the section is not applicable to a police judge appointed in a city, even though his jurisdiction within such city is concurrent with that of the justice of the peace, while appellant contends that under the charter of the city of Riverside a police judge is a justice of the peace when performing the functions of that office; that the character of a court is determined, not by its name, but by the nature of its jurisdiction and functions; that in the enactment of section 171 the Legislature intended to prohibit those performing the functions of a justice of the peace from engaging in such practice of law. In view of the conclusions hereinafter expressed, we do not consider it necessary to discuss or determine the above-mentioned controversy.

Section 287, Code Civ. Proc., designates the courts having power to remove or suspend attorneys, and the causes for which such removal or suspension may be made. A justice of the peace is not a court which, under that section, has power to remove or suspend an attorney, and the practicing of law by one occupying a judicial position is not one of the causes for removal or suspension. If, as a matter of fact, French violated the law by thus engaging in the practice of his profession before a justice of the peace, when at the same time he was occupying a judicial position, his offense is that of a judicial officer and not that of an attorney (In re Silkman, 88 App. Div. 102, 84 N. Y. Supp. 1027); and, if he subjected himself to any penalty by reason of misconduct, the punishment therefor is provided by section 758 et seq., Pen. Code. As said in the case last cited: Courts which have inherent power to discipline lawyers are confined in its exercise to such acts exhibiting turpitude, or loss of that good character which was essential to admission in the first instance, and, when misconduct is made by statute ground for removal from office for transgression as a judicial officer, the same, in the absence of expressions to the contrary, must be deemed exclusive. Conceding want of jurisdiction on the part of the justice to make the order complained of, the question as to the power of petitioner to invoke the writ of certiorari for its annulment then presents itself. Section 1069, Code Civ. Proc., with reference to the writ of certiorari, provides: The application must be made upon a verified petition of the party beneficially interested. Is the petitioner herein shown to be such party? That part of the order complained of, purporting to strike the name of French from the file, could in no wise prejudice petitioner. The answer, being the only instrument which could be affected by the order, was an oral one requiring no signature by an attorney, and, eliminating his name therefrom, it still remains as a complete answer to the complaint, and the cause was as much at issue as if French's name appeared as attorney. Aside from the fact that the order of a justice of the peace disbaring an attorney is so obviously without authority, so foreign to any jurisdiction or power reposed in a justice of the peace, its void character is made apparent upon its face, and for that reason could scarcely be said to work injury or affect the rights of any one. Petitioner does not show how such order could affect his substantial rights, or any judgment which might be rendered in the action. That petitioner has the right to be represented by counsel does not imply that he has the right to be represented by any particular person. The attempt at disbaring French could only affect petitioner in that, while the justice of the peace persisted in his effort to prevent French from practicing law before him, he could not have the benefit of French's services. It may be that French does not care to interest himself further in petitioner's defense, or, perchance, the plaintiff in the action may discontinue the same before trial, and the services of an attorney will no longer be required. In either of which events, the order could not remotely affect petitioner. Upon the other hand, if this order in any wise affects a judgment thereafter rendered against petitioner in the action, he possesses the right under section 974, Code Civ. Proc., to appeal upon questions of law, and by section 980 the superior court, upon such appeal, may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from. Certiorari will not lie when the matter complained of can be corrected on appeal. Stoddard v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 303, 41 Pac. 278; Southern Cal. Ry. Co. v. Superior Court, 127 Cal. 422, 59 Pac. 789.

While it appears from what is here said that, in the opinion of this court, the superior court erred in its judgment vacating the order, yet it is apparent that the order thus vacated has no efficacy and is a nullity, void upon its face, and an order of the court vacating an order of such character, even if erroneous, could not prejudice the rights of any one. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc., charges an appellate court in every stage of the action to disregard any error which, in the opinion of the court, does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and that no judgment shall be reversed by reason of any error unless it shall appear from the record that such error was prejudicial, and that the party complaining or appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury. Prejudicial error not being apparent, an order will be entered affirming the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action by B. F. Knott against A. F. Patnott. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. McClure and J. L. C. Irwin, for appellant. M. L. Short, John F. Pryor, and D. L. Phillips, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The plaintiff in his complaint set out the purchase by him of a motor car from defendant at an agreed price of $750; that plaintiff was induced to make such purchase and pay said sum by reason of the representations of the defendant that the car was in every respect in first-class condition, suitable for use, and had been tested by defendant and found satisfactory and in good condition; that plaintiff was unskilled in the mechanism of such machines and notified defendant that he would rely upon his representations; that these representations of defendant were false, and known by him to be false when made, and the plaintiff promptly, upon discovering the defects which rendered the car unsatisfactory, notified defendant of his rescission of the contract and demanded the return of the price paid. Defendant by answer denied all of the allegations made by plaintiff in respect of representations, and, on the contrary, averred that the machine was in good condition when sold and was worth the sum received; denied that the purchase was based upon any belief in any representations made by defendant, but, on the contrary, that plaintiff, through a skilled agent, who minutely examined the car before purchase, purchased the same upon the faith of such report and examination of the agent. The court finds against plaintiff as to all the material allegations in his complaint, and further that, in substance, the allegations of the answer are true. Judgment went for defendant, from which judgment and an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals.

The specifications of error all refer to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. The record discloses evidence which, if accepted by the trial court, amply supports its findings. The rule that an appellate court will not usurp the functions of the trial court and upon appeal consider questions only involving the weight and effect which should be given the testimony has been declared so often that it would seem that a time should arrive when its force and effect should be appreciated. The duty of this court in considering such specifications of error is discharged when, upon examination, it finds that the findings of the trial court have some support from competent evidence.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RUSSELL v. BANKS et al.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 4, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 373*)—NECESSITY OF FILING APPEAL BOND.

As a new or alternative method of taking appeals to the Supreme and District Courts of Appeal, without filing appeal bonds, is provided by St. 1907, p. 750, c. 408, an appeal, evidently taken under the former exclusive method, is sufficient under the alternative method recently adopted, though no bond was filed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 340*)—TIME OF TAKING APPEAL—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT FINDINGS—CONSIDERATION OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

An appeal being taken within 60 days after entry of judgment, the bill of exceptions may be considered on the point that the evidence does not support the findings on which the judgment rests.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 98*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—FAILURE TO SUSTAIN.

It is the duty of plaintiff having the burden of proof to establish his case by satisfactory proof, and, until he has done so, defendants need not reply or cross-examine witnesses whose testimony has little tendency to sustain the complaint.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 80½*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that defendants went on premises to manage the same for a survivor of a firm leasing the same from plaintiff, and that there was no sale, transfer, or assignment of the lease on which the suit was based, so that the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties to the suit was not shown.

5. CONTRACTS (§ 187*)—THIRD PERSONS EMPLOYED TO MANAGE PREMISES—LIABILITY TO LESSOR.

The employment of third persons by a lessee to manage leased premises is obviously a contract between the parties for their own benefit, and for that of no other person, and so cannot be enforced by lessor against such persons under Civ. Code, § 1559, as a contract made expressly for his benefit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 802, 803; Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 64*)—THIRD PERSONS EMPLOYED TO MANAGE PREMISES—LIABILITY TO LESSOR.

Payment of rent by persons employed to manage premises for a lessee did not create an estoppel against them in favor of lessor suing them on the lease; that being only what they agreed to do under their arrangement with lessee irrespective of the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by C. E. Russell against James A. Banks and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Preston, for appellant. Robert Duncan, for respondents.

HART, J. The complaint alleges that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $873 under the terms of a certain lease executed by said plaintiff to one N. J. Waymire, and prays for judgment for that sum. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendants for costs was rendered and caused to be entered by the court. The plaintiff appeals from said judgment on a bill of exceptions.

Respondents first object to the consideration of this appeal upon the alleged ground that jurisdiction to do so has not been conferred because of the failure of the appellant to file an undertaking on appeal, citing sections 940 and 953 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the case of Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Edgar, 132 Cal. 197, 64 Pac. 260; but, since the decision in the case cited, the Legislature of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 750, c. 408) has provided a new method of taking appeals to the Supreme and District Courts of Appeal, and thereunder it is not necessary, as under the old method, in order to perfect such appeals, to file an undertaking guaranteeing the payment by the appellant of all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal, or in lieu thereof to deposit with the clerk the sum required by the statute. And, in Mitchell v. Cal. & O. S. S. Co., 154 Cal. 731, 99 Pac. 202, our Supreme Court, dealing with the new or alternative method of taking appeals, says that, while the later act did not repeal the old method by which the filing of a bond for costs is required, it is sufficient if an appeal is perfected under either method, "and hence," quoting from the syllabi, "though a party did not file a sufficient undertaking for costs, as required by the old method, but filed his notice of appeal which was sufficient under the new method, the appellate court obtained jurisdiction, though the party intended to pursue the old method." Here the appellant has, evidently, so far as the form of the record is concerned, taken his appeal under the former exclusive method, and, although no appeal bond was filed, this is sufficient under the alternative method recently adopted by the Legislature, according to the ruling in the case referred to.

There are some other technical objections to a review of the bill of exceptions; but they are not of sufficient importance to require special notice. It may, however, be remarked that the appeal here was taken within 60 days after the entry of the judgment, and therefore the bill of exceptions may be considered on review of the point that the evidence does not support the findings upon which said judgment rests. It appears from the record that on the 3d day of October, 1905, the plaintiff leased, by an instrument in writing, a certain dairy ranch, situated in Mendocino county, and the machinery thereon for conducting the dairy business, together with a number of milch cows, to one N. J. Waymire, for the term of one year, with a stipulation on the part of the plaintiff that at the expiration of said term he would renew said lease for the further term of four years. It was also stipulated in said lease that "this lease shall not be sold or transferred to any other party during the term of it without the written consent of the party of the first part"—that is, the plaintiff. The complaint alleges, and the evidence shows, and the court finds, that, notwithstanding the fact that the written lease indicated that said N. J. Waymire was the sole lessee, "the truth and fact was that the said lease was taken by and on behalf of a copartnership which then and there existed between the said N. J. Waymire and her son, G. C. Waymire." Mrs. Waymire and her son, G. C. Waymire, entered into the possession of said dairy ranch and the stock, etc., under said lease; but on the 19th day of February, 1906—approximately eight months prior to the expiration of the term fixed by said lease—Mrs. Waymire died, and, as the complaint alleges, "leaving as her sole surviving partner in the said lease the above-named G. C. Waymire, her son." The complaint continues as follows: "That on or about the said 1st day of March, 1906, and after the death of the said N. J. Waymire as aforesaid, the said G. C. Waymire, surviving partner as aforesaid, acting in liquidation of the affairs of said copartnership, did sell, assign, transfer, and convey unto the defendants, James A. Banks and Thomas N. Hale, the unexpired portion of the said lease so made and executed as aforesaid. That pursuant to said sale and transfer so made as aforesaid, the said defendants, James A. Banks and Thomas N. Hale, entered into the possession of the said ranch, together with the stock thereon, and did use and enjoy the same for the greater part of the unexpired term of said lease, to wit, from March 1, 1906, to the 4th day of September, 1906, at which time the said defendants abandoned the said property and taking therefrom a large number of cattle and other personal property. That the plaintiff accepted the said defendants and each of them as tenants of said property under and by virtue of the said lease so made as aforesaid." The complaint is unverified, and the answer denies generally each and every allegation in said complaint. The court found from the evidence: That said G. C. Waymire, as surviving partner of N. J. Waymire, deceased, and in the liquidation of the affairs of said copartnership, did not "sell, assign, transfer, and convey" to the defendants the unexpired portion of said lease; that said defendants did not, pursuant to said alleged sale and transfer, enter into the possession of the said ranch, together with the stock thereon; that said defendants did not "use and enjoy the same for the greater part of the unexpired term of said lease; that they did not on the 4th day of September, 1906, abandon said property or take from said ranch a large number of cattle and other personal property"; that "it is not true that the plaintiff accepted the said defendants or either of them as tenants of said property under and by virtue of said lease or otherwise or at all."

The principal contention upon the part of the appellant is that the respondents took possession of the demised premises under the lease executed to Mrs. Waymire and attorned to the appellant for a portion of the unexpired term; that, the clause in the lease interdicting the assignment of said lease without the consent of the lessor being alone for the benefit of the latter, he could waive that right or benefit, and, having done so, an assignment of the lease took place by operation of law. There are some other suggestions offered by counsel with regard to the legal effect of the alleged transfer of the possession of the demised premises to the defendants; but these will not require special notice. The position of the respondents is that they were merely employed by G. C.

Waymire to take charge of the ranch and the business connected therewith and manage the same for him.

Thus it will be observed that the only proposition involved in this controversy is: What is the legal effect of the transaction, as disclosed by the evidence, between G. C. Waymire and the respondents with respect to the property to which the lease relates? And therefore the sole question submitted here is: Are the findings of the court below justified by the evidence? We may say, in the outset, that we believe the findings are sufficiently supported, although it may be admitted that the evidence submitted by both the plaintiff and the defendants, as presented in the record before us, does not appear to be very clear or altogether satisfactory upon the question of what was in reality the legal nature of the transaction between G. C. Waymire and the respondents; but the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove the material allegations of his complaint, and this, according to the court's findings, he failed to do to the satisfaction of the trial court, and we cannot now say that the judge's conclusions from the evidence are, as a matter of law, unsupported by the proofs. He had the witnesses before him, heard and saw them testify, and was, of course, in a much better position to weigh the testimony than a reviewing court.

The plaintiff testified that, in the month of March, 1906, after the death of Mrs. Waymire, he went to the ranch and found the defendant Banks in charge of the place. The latter was living on the ranch with his family. Banks said to the witness on that occasion that he (Banks) had made arrangements with Waymire to pay the rent and for six dead carcasses. "I found him [Banks] there in possession," plaintiff continued, "and as long as he was there, and I received my rent, that was all I wanted." He said that he had received certain sums paid as rent under the lease after the death of Mrs. Waymire and after Banks and Hale "went into possession of the place." These sums, he declared, were deposited to his credit with the Irvine & Muir Company's store. In connection with this statement of the witness, it was admitted by counsel for the defendants that the sum of $178 was left at said store for the plaintiff by the defendants; but it was not admitted that said sum was so deposited as rent due from the defendants under the terms of the lease. Plaintiff further testified that the defendants left a keg of butter with Irvine & Muir to be applied as payment on the rent.

G. C. Waymire testified as a witness for the plaintiff; but his testimony throws no light whatever upon the nature of the arrangement between himself and the respondents relative to the leased property. He said that, shortly after his mother's death, he left the "Russell ranch" (meaning the demised premises), and that he did not thereafter return to said ranch to remain permanently. "I never took possession of it any more," he continued. "Mr. Banks moved on the place, and Mr. Hale was to help him. It was my understanding that Banks and Hale were jointly to take charge of the property. * * * I do not know who got the butter produced by the dairy cows. It was sold around there. After the death of my mother I do not know who sold the butter. I wasn't there. I never made any effort to retake possession of the place. After Banks and Hale moved away in September, I was first at Willits. I sent Mr. Russell word and then moved to Lake county. * * * I never had anything to do with the place after the 1st day of March, except that I was upon it a few times."

A witness testified that he worked for the respondents in the year 1906 on the "Russell ranch," and that during that time he had a talk with Banks concerning the terms upon which the latter was holding the property, that Banks then said that "he was to give $12 per head for cows and $10 per head for heifers, and that it would amount to about $100 per month. He said he was to keep it [the property] the rest of the time after Waymire had quit it."

The plaintiff introduced the deposition of the defendant Banks, whose testimony was, in part, as follows: "The trade that I made with Cleve was that we were to take the place and run it for him, and we were to have the proceeds of the place over and above certain rents we were to pay. I do not remember how much money we were to pay Russell. We were to make such payments as Cleve Waymire told us to make. We were to pay the payments called for in the lease. They (the Waymires) were to make the old stock good. There were no wages set at all. We were to take the place and run it and pay the rent and have the proceeds of the place. * * * We did not stay on the place until the lease expired. We paid the rent until Cleve Waymire said we had paid more than was coming to Russell because the cows were not on the place that should have been there. We paid the rent until Cleve Waymire told us not to, but I cannot tell how much we paid. We didn't count the cattle on the place. We counted what milch cows we milked. There were about 65, and part of these were heifers. Cleve Waymire was at Willits when I left the place. I told him I was going to leave and for him to notify Russell, and he did. I took the butter we sold off the place and took the 48 head of calves. There were no powers of attorney or other writings between me and Cleve Waymire or Ed Waymire. There was to have been though, when he was appointed administrator, but they never was appointed administrator."

The witness Clark, for the plaintiff, testified, no objection having been offered to his testimony, that Waymire stated to him that he (Waymire) had "rented the place to Banks and Hale, and he also said he was going to make Russell believe that Banks and Hale were running the place for him (G. C. Waymire)."

The foregoing represents the substance of the important testimony brought out by the plaintiff. The cross-examination of plaintiff elicited the fact that, after the death of Mrs. Waymire, he procured the public administrator of Mendocino county to petition for and secure letters of administration upon her estate. Plaintiff was asked if he did not present a claim against said estate which contained the same items as those upon which this action was brought, and he replied in the affirmative, saying that the said claim "was actually the same as my bill of particulars furnished in this case." The claim as presented against the estate was received in evidence, and it shows that it was approved by the administrator of the estate and allowed and approved by the judge of the superior court on the 16th day of April, 1907. The present action was begun on the 13th day of March, 1908, almost a year after the administrator and the judge had approved said claim. Why the claim was not paid by the administrator does not appear. The plaintiff also admitted, upon cross-examination, that, at his instigation, the administrator of Mrs. Waymire's estate brought an action long prior to the institution of the present action against the defendants here to recover a certain number of head of calves which said defendants were alleged to have taken with them when they left the demised premises in September, 1906.

For the defendants, one Hotskin testified that he was present at the trial of said last-mentioned case and heard the plaintiff here therein testify that he had found Banks and Hale on his property, but that he "had never had any dealings with them at all."

It will be noticed from the evidence, as we have briefly presented it here, that the only witness whose testimony reflects, in any degree, any light upon the nature of the arrangement between G. C. Waymire and the respondents concerning the demised premises, is the defendant Banks. He stated that he and Hale were to manage the place and business for Waymire, for which services they were to receive such portion of the income from said business as might be in excess of the sum necessary to pay certain rents, and that they were to pay such rents only as G. C. Waymire directed them to do. Banks said that he was familiar with the provision in the written lease prohibiting the transfer or sale of the same by the lessee without the consent of the lessor, and that, when he and Hale took charge of the premises for Waymire, they were fully aware of the fact that Waymire could not, without plaintiff's assent, transfer or assign to them said lease. The respondents, he said, continued to pay the rent, leaving the same with Irvine &

Muir for the plaintiff, until Waymire directed them to cease making further payments for that purpose.

Waymire, while on the witness stand, said nothing from which the conditions upon which Banks and Hale assumed control of the premises could definitely be inferred. His statement that his understanding was that the respondents "were jointly to take charge of the property" furnishes no definite information whether they were to do so under the lease or merely as agents of himself. It may, indeed, well be considered a significant fact that G. C. Waymire, the only other person than Banks and Hale who could have thrown any light upon the nature of the arrangement between himself and the defendants with regard to the control or management of the property by the latter, was not asked a single question, so far as the record shows, which would lead to an explanation of the transaction, although called as a witness by the plaintiff. If he was questioned upon the proposition, he made no satisfactory explanation of the transaction, for about all that we find from the record that he did say upon the subject was, "It was my understanding that Banks and Hale were jointly to take charge of the property." Waymire, above all other persons, except the respondents, ought to have been able to give in the most definite manner the terms and conditions upon which he permitted Banks and Hale to assume charge of the property, and yet, as suggested, he was apparently not questioned very closely upon the proposition, or, if he was, he was not compelled, as we think he could have been, to make satisfactory answers. It is true that he was asked no questions on cross-examination; but, having testified to nothing on direct examination seriously militating against the position of the respondents upon the issue before the court, there was no necessity for a cross-examination. It was the duty of plaintiff, as before stated, to establish the claims of his complaint by satisfactory proof, and, until he had made out a satisfactory case, there was no duty resting upon the defendants to reply or to cross-examine witnesses whose testimony had little tendency to sustain the averments of the complaint. We refer to this circumstance as illustrating the unsatisfactory showing made by plaintiff and in explanation of how the trial court, in weighing the testimony, could have justly rejected the contention of the plaintiff that Waymire had sold or transferred the lease to the respondents, and that they attorned to him according to the terms of the instrument. The truth is that the plaintiff, up to the time of the institution of this action, so far as we are advised by the record, did not treat or recognize in any manner the respondents as his tenants or as the successors in interest of Waymire under the terms of the lease. He encouraged the bringing of an action by the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Waymire against the respondents to recover certain stock which they took from the premises, claiming that said stock was still the property of the Waymires. Not only did he cause that action to be brought, but he testified therein that he never had had any dealings with the respondents, meaning, no doubt, that he did not place them in charge of the premises, nor recognize them as tenants after they assumed charge. Furthermore, he admitted that the items contained in the very account upon which he undertakes to sustain this action were included in a claim he filed in and against the estate of Mrs. Waymire, thus showing that up to that time he had not recognized or accepted the respondents as the tenants under the lease to the Waymires. The respondents always paid the rent to Irvine & Muir, as directed by G. C. Waymire, and never had any personal dealings with the plaintiff during the time they were on the premises, and ceased paying rent when directed so to do by Waymire. The last named testified that when the respondents left the premises he notified the plaintiff of the fact.

We can perceive no reason for doubting that the evidence justifies the court's conclusion that Banks' statement to the effect that the respondents went upon the premises to manage the same for G. C. Waymire, and that there was no sale, transfer, or assignment of the lease to them, is true. This being so, the relation of landlord and tenants between the plaintiff and the respondents is not shown, and this action cannot therefore be maintained.

We do not deem it necessary, in view of the conclusion we have reached as to the findings, to examine here the cases cited by the appellant in support of what he submits to be the law applicable to the facts as he understands them to be established by the evidence. We have no fault to find with the legal principles which he undertakes to invoke here. His difficulty, as we have seen, lies in what we deem to be a misconception of the effect of the evidence. His final proposition that, if there was not an assignment of the lease under any view of the evidence, the contract between Waymire and the respondents was nevertheless made expressly for his benefit, and that therefore, under the terms of section 1559 of the Civil Code, he is entitled to enforce it, cannot, under the findings, be maintained, for if, as the court found, upon sufficient evidence, we think, that there was nothing more than an employment of the respondents by Waymire, then, obviously, the contract thus made between the parties was for their own benefit and for that of no other person.

There is no showing that the defendants ever told or in any way ever represented or held out to the plaintiff that they were in possession of the property under the lease, nor did they mislead him to his injury. As is said in Canale v. Copello, 137 Cal. 25, 69 Pac. 699, "that the defendants paid rent" did not create an estoppel against them. If they paid rent while occupying the premises, they only did what they agreed to do under their arrangement with G. C. Waymire and irrespective of the lease. See: Fisher v. Slattery, 75 Cal. 325, 17 Pac. 235; Canale v. Copello, supra; Gustafson v. Stockton & Tuolumne R. R. Co., 132 Cal. 619, 64 Pac. 995; Brown v. Curtis, 128 Cal. 193, 60 Pac. 773.

It follows from the foregoing that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

FRESE v. MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF
NEW YORK. (Civ. 598.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Sept. 20, 1909. Rehearing Denied by
Supreme Court Nov. 26, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 36*)—POWERS OF INSURANCE COMPANIES—ULTRA VIRES.

Insured and the beneficiary in a life policy, procuring a loan from insurer secured by a pledge of the policy, are estopped from setting up that the act of the insurer was ultra vires, where they do not offer to repay the loan.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 36*)—POWERS OF INSURANCE
COMPANIES—ULTRA VIRES.

Where a loan agreement between insurer in a life policy and insured and the beneficiary was fully executed prior to the death of insured, the beneficiary could not urge that the loan agreement was ultra vires.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 461*)—POWERS—POWER TO LOAN SURPLUS FUNDS.

The contract of a corporation is legal if not expressly prohibited, and it may loan its surplus funds in the absence of an express prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1814; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

4. PLEDGES (§ 56*)—ENFORCEMENT—SALE—STATUTE.

Civ. Code, § 2889, providing that contracts for the forfeiture of property subject to a lien, and contracts in restraint of the right of redemption from a lien, are void, does not prohibit a sale of mortgaged real estate where the sale is fair and free from undue influence or fraud and for an adequate price; and under section 3000 et seq., relating to the sale of pledged chattels, a pledgee may sell pledged chattels without right of redemption, and the manner of sale may be agreed on by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pledges, Cent. Dig. §§ 161, 181; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

5. PLEDGES (§ 50*)—RIGHT OF REDEMPTION.

Civ. Code, § 3011, providing that, instead of selling property pledged, the pledgee may foreclose the right of redemption by a judicial sale, does not endow pledgors of personal property with the right of redemption, as is the case of a mortgage of real estate.

7. INSURANCE (§ 228*)—LOANS ON POLICIES—STIPULATIONS IN CONTRACT—VALIDITY—CANCELLATION OF POLICY.

A loan agreement between insurer in a $5,000 life policy and insured and the beneficiary, which stipulated that the policy should be pledged to secure a loan of $1,930 made to insured and the beneficiary, and that, in the event of default of payment of the loan at maturity, insurer might at its option, without notice and without demand for payment, cancel the policy and apply the cash surrender value, stated to be $1,932.15, to the payment of the loan and pay the balance to the parties entitled thereto, was valid, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 2889, providing that contracts for the forfeiture of property subject to a lien shall be void, etc., and where insurer, on the nonpayment of the loan at the time fixed for the payment, pursuant to an agreement extending the time of payment, canceled the policy and applied its then cash surrender value to the payment of the debt, and offered to pay the balance to the beneficiary, the latter could not complain.

8. INSURANCE (§ 179½*)—LOAN ON POLICY—CONTRACT FOR LOAN—"OPTION."

A loan contract between an insurer in a life policy and insured and the beneficiary for the pledge of the policy to secure a loan made to insured and the beneficiary, which stipulates that insurer shall loan a specified sum, and that insured and beneficiary shall assign the policy as collateral, and that, in the event of the nonpayment of the debt at maturity, insurer may, at its "option," cancel the policy, and apply the cash surrender value to the payment of the debt, evidences a loan transaction, and not a sale or option to sell; the word "option" in the contract meaning that insurer may, on default, at its pleasure, apply the cash surrender value in payment of the loan.

9. INSURANCE (§ 229*)—CONTRACT FOR LOAN—NOTICE OF DEFAULT.

That insurer in a life policy loaning money to insured and the beneficiary, pursuant to an agreement, whereby the policy was pledged to secure the loan, and whereby insurer, in case of default, could, at its option, cancel the policy without notice and without demand for payment and apply the cash surrender value to the payment of the loan, gave notice to insured of its intention to cancel the policy unless the loan was repaid, did not prejudice the rights of the beneficiary, who did not receive any notice, as insurer was not required to give notice to either, and as insurer might apply the cash surrender value to the loan as to both insured and the beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 501; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

10. INSURANCE (§ 388*)—CONTRACT FOR LOAN—CANCELLATION OF POLICY—WAIVER.

That insurer in a life policy loaning money to insured and the beneficiary, pursuant to an agreement whereby the policy was pledged to secure it, and whereby insurer, in case of default, could at its option cancel the policy and apply the cash surrender value to the payment of the loan, extended by agreement the time for the payment of the debt, did not thereby waive its right to cancel the policy for nonpayment at the maturity of the debt as fixed by the new agreement, as the new agreement operated for the benefit of insured and beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1026; Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

11. INSURANCE (§ 179½*)—CONTRACT FOR LOAN—BENEFICIARY AS SURETY FOR LOAN.

Insurer, in a policy insuring the life of the husband for the benefit of the wife, made a loan to the husband and wife as principals, and took the policy as security under an agreement stipulating that, on the nonpayment of the loan, insurer could at its option cancel it and apply its cash surrender value to the payment of the loan. Insurer and the husband made a new agreement extending the time for the payment of the loan. Held, that under Civ. Code, §§ 2823, 2832, 2844, providing that mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal does not exonerate a guarantor, and one appearing as principal may show that he is a surety except as against those who have acted on the faith of his apparent character, etc., the rights of the wife were not prejudiced by the delay, though she was in fact a surety only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 179½.*]

12. COSTS (§ 22*)—RIGHT TO COSTS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 3, giving costs to plaintiff recovering $300 or over, in an action for money damages, and section 1025, providing that no costs can be allowed where plaintiff recovers less than $300, forbid costs to defendant on a money demand.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by Ida F. H. Frese against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. From a judgment for insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

A. E. Nathanson and C. L. Brown, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to recover upon a life insurance policy. The complaint alleges: That about August 29, 1889, defendant issued to plaintiff a policy of insurance on the life of her husband, William Frese, agreeing thereby to pay to her $5,000 at his death; that the premiums due thereon were prior to his death fully paid; that on July 7, 1899, plaintiff's said husband borrowed from defendant the sum of $1,930, repayable to defendant on August 29, 1900; that defendant required as security for said loan the pledge of said policy, and plaintiff assented thereto, and thereupon plaintiff and her said husband entered into an agreement with defendant, by which they assigned to defendant said policy and agreed therein to repay said sum to defendant on August 29, 1900, and as collateral security and in consideration of the amount so loaned did "assign, transfer, and set over all their right, title, and interest in and to said policy, * * * together with all the moneys which may become payable under the same, to the company as collateral security for the payment of said loan with interest." The agreement further provided: "In the event of default of the payment of the said loan on the date herein above mentioned, the company is hereby authorized, at its option, without notice and without demand for payment, to cancel said policy, and apply the customary cash surrender consideration then allowed by the company for the surrender for cancellation of similar policies, namely, $1,932.15 to the payment of the said loan with interest, the balance, if any, to be payable to the parties entitled thereto on demand." Plaintiff further alleges that she did not know whether or not said indebtedness had ever been paid, or whether said policy had been canceled, "although the defendant now claims to have so canceled it." On information, she averred: That defendant waived performance of said agreement touching payment of said indebtedness at maturity and its right to cancel said policy, and on September 4, 1900, "entered into a new agreement with said William Frese, whereby, in consideration of the payment by him of $96.50 in cash, which sum was then paid to the defendant, said loan was extended by defendant for one year from August 29, 1900"; and in like manner entered into "a fresh agreement with said William Frese, upon a like consideration of $96.50," extending payment of said indebtedness to August 29, 1902. That at said last-mentioned date, and for a long time prior thereto, said William Frese "was sick in body and mind and was mentally incompetent to attend to business," and that plaintiff was not aware that said indebtedness was not paid, or that said policy had been canceled, until after the death of her said husband (which occurred April 8, 1903), and not until when she made proof of death of her said husband. That she was furnished by plaintiff with blanks of proof of death on or about May 27, 1903, and made up and duly verified and filed the same with defendant, "and that no objection was made thereto, and no further or other proofs demanded." That five months have elapsed since said proofs were made, and, although payment has been demanded, defendant has neglected and refused to pay the sum of $5,000, by said policy agreed to be paid to her by defendant.

Defendant by its answer admits the issuing of said policy, that it has not been paid, that all premiums thereon were paid by the assured prior to his death, and that he kept and performed all its terms "save and except as they referred to the payment of the loan hereinafter mentioned." Most of the other averments of the complaint are denied. As to the loan, defendant alleges: That it was made "to said William Frese and plaintiff jointly," and that, "as collateral security for said loan, said William Frese and Ida F. H. Frese, plaintiff herein, pledged to the defendant said policy of insurance and delivered to defendant the written instrument, copy of which is set out in the complaint, * * * and that no part of said loan has ever been paid to defendant, save and except by the application of the cash surrender value of said policy as hereinafter stated." That the loan not being paid at maturity, to wit, August 29, 1900, "at the request of said assured the term of payment of said loan was extended by defendant until August 29, 1901, and on said last-named date the term of payment was again, at the request of the assured, extended by defendant to August 29, 1902. That no further extensions of the due date of said loan were ever made, nor was the right of defendant to cancel said policy ever changed or altered, except as herein stated." Further answering, defendant avers: That prior to the last date to which said loan had been extended, to wit, about August 6, 1902, defendant notified said assured that the said loan would be due and payable on August 29, 1902, and that, if the same was not so paid, "the company would cancel said policy and apply the cash surrender consideration thereof toward the payment of the said loan, with interest, as provided in said loan agreement." That said loan was not then or ever paid, and no application was made to renew the same, "and thereupon, to wit, on October 11, 1902, in accordance with said agreement, said policy was canceled by the defendant and the cash surrender consideration thereof applied toward the payment of said loan and interest." That the cash surrender value of said policy was $2,037.99, leaving a balance of $107.99 in excess of the amount of said loan and interest, which said balance defendant has ever since been and now is ready and willing to pay plaintiff. That on October 21, 1902, defendant advised said assured of the cancellation of said policy and of the facts last above stated, and then and there offered to pay said assured said balance "upon the execution of a form of surrender receipt by plaintiff and said assured." That thereafter said assured made application to defendant to restore said policy, but defendant refused "on account of the condition of health of said assured, and the assured was so notified by defendant on November 18, 1902." That subsequent to the death of said assured plaintiff made demand upon defendant for the amount of said policy, but payment was refused "on the ground that said policy was not in force at the time of the death of said assured, and plaintiff was so notified by defendant." That plaintiff was then notified that there remained a balance in cash of $107.99 due plaintiff as the difference between the cash surrender value of said policy and the amount due on said loan at the time of said cancellation.

That a check for that amount and a blank form of receipt were sent to plaintiff and still remain in her possession. That "plaintiff requested defendant to furnish her the usual form of proofs of death of said assured, and the same was so furnished to plaintiff," but that she was then informed that said proofs were furnished "upon the distinct understanding that it was without waiver upon the part of defendant that said policy of insurance had been canceled during the lifetime of the insured and was not in force at the time of his death, and said forms of proof of death were secured by said plaintiff upon such understanding, and not otherwise."

The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had judgment for $107.99. Plaintiff appeals from so much of the judgment as gave her but $107.99, and claims that it should have been for the full amount claimed, "or at least for the sum of $2,998.17, with interest thereon from May 27 1903," and appeals also from that part of the judgment awarding costs to defendant. The appeal comes up on a bill of exceptions.

It is not necessary to set out the findings specifically. Suffice it to say that the averments of the answer are found to be true in all material particulars. In certain respects the findings are challenged as unsupported by the evidence. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to show that the policy was canceled by defendant, and also to show that its cash surrender value was as alleged by defendant. The evidence consisted in considerable part of letters between the officers and agents of the company and by them to the assured and plaintiff, also of office records and abbreviated notations on the policy which were explained. It is suggested by plaintiff that these mention the "surrender" of the policy, and not its "cancellation"; but the surrender spoken of was explained to have been made under the loan agreement, and it was further shown that the surrender of the policy was in effect its cancellation. It sufficiently appeared that, so far as the company could do so, it canceled the policy and so treated it. Whether it had a right so to do is a question of law rather than of fact. The evidence was also sufficient to show that the cash surrender value of the policy at the date of its cancellation was as claimed by defendant and as credited on the loan. The finding, "nor was the right of said defendant to cancel said policy ever changed or altered except in reference to said due date," is challenged as unsupported by evidence. This refers to the extension of time of payment of the loan as shown above. It is claimed that as these extensions were made at the request of the insured as alleged in the answer and shown by the evidence, and not by plaintiff, and as the notice given was to William Frese that the loan would be due August 29, 1902, and was not given to plaintiff, she is not bound by what took place between her husband and the company of which she had no notice. Passing for the moment the legal effect of these extensions as affecting plaintiff's rights, it will be observed that the loan agreement expressly authorized the company, on default of payment of the loan, "without notice and without demand for payment, to cancel said policy and apply the customary cash surrender consideration * * * to the payment of the said loan."

The alleged errors in admitting evidence over plaintiff's objection may here be disposed of. They are five in number, to wit: (a) Relating to the admission of the letter of the defendant's agent to plaintiff's husband informing him that the company had canceled the policy; (b) his reply thereto; (c) the company's reply to this letter; (d) the second letter of William Frese to the company; (e) the company's letter to plaintiff declining to pay the policy. There is nothing in any of these letters in the slightest degree harmful to plaintiff. There are no admissions or declarations of plaintiff's husband affecting the rights of plaintiff. They had some tendency to show that her husband was not mentally deranged.

The real questions presented by the appeal are questions of law, and upon these plaintiff's position is: (1) That the loan agreement is ultra vires; (2) that the right given by the agreement to cancel the policy is a provision for the forfeiture of property subject to a lien, and is in restraint of the right of redemption from a lien, and therefore void; (3) that, if not void as a provision for forfeiture, it is merely an option or offer by plaintiff to sell the insurance policy within a reasonable time after August 29, 1900; (4) that plaintiff pledged her policy as a surety for money borrowed by William Frese, and she was exonerated by the new agreement of August 29, 1900, whereby William Frese was given an extension of one year. It should be stated: That the loan was made to plaintiff and her husband, both joining in the execution of the agreement to repay the sum loaned and assigning the policy as collateral security. The money was paid to them by the company's check to the order of both. There was evidence that William Frese was sound of mind during all the transactions between him and the company, and, although not in good health, the company, so far as appears, was not aware of his condition until he applied for a restoration of the policy after its cancellation, and upon the report of the company's medical examiner.

1. Was the agreement ultra vires? The argument of appellant is that under the act of March 28, 1874 (St. 1873-74, p. 777, c. 540), defendant was authorized "to loan upon mortgages of real estate," that the agreement of 1899 was prior to the enactment of section 421, subd. 7, of the Civil Code, which permits insurance corporations to loan money on their own policies, and hence there was no authority for making the loan agreement. The contention is that by the act of 1874 there was an implied prohibition to loan upon property other than real estate. Respondent, it seems to us, makes conclusive answer to this contention: That by the terms of the agreement, and as alleged in the complaint, "plaintiff consented to the pledge, and did pledge, the said policy of insurance to defendant as security for said loan." That plaintiff and the assured received consideration for the loan agreement, and have not offered to repay it, and are estopped from setting up the act of the corporation as ultra vires. Grangers Ass'n v. Clark, 67 Cal. 634, 8 Pac. 445; Camp v. Land, 122 Cal. 167, 54 Pac. 839; Bay City Building & Loan Ass'n v. Broad, 136 Cal. 525, 69 Pac. 225. That the loan agreement was, prior to the death of the assured, fully executed by both parties, and in such a case ultra vires cannot be set up. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 29, p. 50. That the contract of a corporation is legal if not expressly prohibited, and it may loan its surplus funds in the absence of such prohibition. Colorado Co. v. American Co., 97 Fed. 843, 38 C. C. A. 433; Civ. Code, § 354, subd. 8.

2. It is contended that the loan agreement provides for the forfeiture of property the subject of a lien and is void as in violation of section 2889, Civ. Code, which reads: "All contracts for the forfeiture of property subject to a lien or satisfaction of the obligation secured thereby, and all contracts in restraint of the right of redemption from a lien are void." It is claimed that this section is declaratory of the equitable doctrine that property given as security cannot be taken in satisfaction of the obligation secured thereby, and that any provision in the instrument of security that undertakes to provide for such forfeiture or for restraint of the right of redemption is void, citing Bradbury v. Davenport, 114 Cal. 593, 599, 46 Pac. 1062, 55 Am. St. Rep. 92, and Lowe v. Ozmun, 3 Cal. App. 387, 86 Pac. 729. It was sought in the early cases, by virtue of this section of the Civil Code, to have the court declare void a conveyance of the mortgaged premises by the mortgagor to the mortgagee; but it was held that where the sale is fair and free from undue influence, oppression, or fraud and for an adequate price, it is not restrained by section 2889, Civ. Code. Phelan v. De Martini, 85 Cal. 365, 24 Pac. 725. The case of Bradbury v. Davenport, cited by appellant, was one involving the mortgage of real estate, where the mortgagor was, by unfair advantage taken of his physical condition and financial embarrassment, induced to place a deed of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee in escrow, under an agreement to deliver the same to the mortgagee upon payment by him of a certain sum of money, and the holder of the escrow was authorized to discharge the mortgage and return the note secured thereby to the mortgagor. It was clearly a case of an attempt to secure unfairly a waiver of the equity of redemption by the mortgagor. In Lowe v. Ozmun, supra, cited by appellant, the action was for the conversion of certain bonds of a gas company and a railway company. Embodied in the collateral note was an agreement as to the manner of selling the bonds on default of the pledgor, either by private or public sale. The pledgee assumed to purchase the bonds himself at private sale. Speaking of this the court said: "The term 'private sale' comprehends something more than the mere taking over of the property by the pledgee at such price as he may elect to consider an offer. This is, in effect, but a declaration of forfeiture, an agreement for which is invalid under section 2889, Civ. Code." Conceding that the first part of this section applies to cases of forfeiture of all kinds of property, the latter part of the section refers only to cases where there is a right of redemption—such as mortgages of real estate. Here there was no right of redemption, for the Code expressly provides that a pledgee may sell property without right of redemption, and the manner of sale may be agreed to and the notice waived by the pledgor. Civ. Code, § 3000 et seq.; Williams v. Hahn, 113 Cal. 475, 45 Pac. 815. True, section 3011 furnishes a further means by which the pledgee may obtain money from his security, and the section provides that, "instead of selling property pledged, as hereinbefore provided, a pledgee may foreclose the right of redemption by a judicial sale"; but this section by no means can be said to endow pledgors of personal property with a right of redemption, as is the case of a mortgage of real estate. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Copey, 134 Cal. 287, 66 Pac. 324. Section 3006 of the Civil Code provides: "A pledgee cannot sell any evidence of debt pledged to him except the obligations of governments, states and corporations, but he may collect the same when due." Under the agreement—"and to give effect to the contract, if possible, is our duty"—Lowe v. Ozmun, supra—the defendant proceeded strictly within its terms, and in effect collected the obligation pledged to it, and applied the proceeds to the debt, or, in pursuance of the contract, applied to the debt the cash surrender value of the policy, and to do this without notice to the pledgors was within its rights. Du Brutz v. Bank of Visalia, 4 Cal. App. 201, 87 Pac. 467, 469. It cannot be claimed as necessarily inequitable to apply the cash surrender value of a $5,000 paid-up policy in payment of indebtedness amounting to no more than the amount here involved. It was applied at its full cash value and had no other except a speculative one based upon the uncertainty of the life of the assured and would be payable only at his death. There was no attempt made to show that it had any greater value than given it by defendant. Indeed, the agreement itself fixed its then value at $1,932.15, and defendant applied the cash value as it stood when the policy was canceled.

3. We do not think appellant's third proposition is tenable, namely, that, if the provision relating to the cancellation of the policy was not a provision for a forfeiture, then it was merely an offer or option to sell the policy for $1,932.15 within a reasonable time after August 29, 1900. Appellant's contention is derived from the provision of the agreement that the company "is hereby authorized at its option, without notice and without demand for payment, to cancel said policy." The object of the agreement, plainly manifest by its terms, and as shown by the complaint itself, precludes the construction thus given by appellant. The transaction was a loan pure and simple, secured by a pledge of the policy. The agreement of the company was "to loan the parties of the second part the sum of $1,930." It provided that "the receipt of the foregoing amount as a loan is hereby acknowledged upon the pledge hereinafter set forth of policy No. 371257," and "in consideration of the amount of said loan the parties of the second part hereby assign * * * said policy as collateral security for the payment of said loan." There is no element of a sale, or option of a sale, to be found in the agreement. It would be a perversion of the English language to call this an offer or option of plaintiff and her husband to sell the policy for a certain sum. The term "option" as used in the agreement means that the company was authorized, on default of the pledgors, at its pleasure or upon its own motion, to apply the cash surrender value in payment of the loan.

4. Neither is the proposition of appellant maintainable that plaintiff pledged her policy as surety for the money borrowed by her husband, and hence she and her property were exonerated by the new agreement of August 29, 1900, between her husband and the company. There is no evidence in the record that plaintiff signed the agreement as a surety. The evidence is that the loan was to her and her husband. The agreement was signed by both, and the money was paid to both. The company was not informed as to what use the money was to be put or by whom. Both plaintiff and her husband were, by the terms of the agreement, principals, and both were debtors, and, if any other relation existed, it was not shown. The company had the same right to apply the cash surrender value to the loan as to both that it had to either. That the company gave notice to the husband, and not to plaintiff, was not prejudicial to plaintiff, for it was under no obligation to give notice to either. Neither was there any waiver by defendant of plaintiff's rights because it failed to collect the loan when originally due. Deferring the exercise of its right to cancel the policy by delaying to enforce the agreement ought not to be regarded as a waiver of defendant's rights, for it was a benefit rather than a detriment to plaintiff. The Code provides (Civ. Code, § 2832) that one who appears to be a principal may show that he is in fact a surety, "except as against persons who have acted on the faith of his apparent character of principal." A surety has all the rights of a guarantor (Civ. Code, § 2844), and conceding, what does not appear, that plaintiff was a surety, we do not find that she has been deprived of any right, given her as such by the Code. "Mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, does not exonerate a guarantor." Civ. Code, § 2823. Since the argument of the cause, our attention has been called to the very recent case of Sherman v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. (Wash.) 102 Pac. 419. In that case the same company was defendant as here, and the same form of agreement was entered into between the parties under like circumstances. It was there held that the contract was valid, that the stipulation as to cancellation is not waived by an extension of the date of payment of the loan, that no notice of intention to cancel the policy was necessary, and that the company had the right, upon default in payment of the loan, to cancel the policy.

5. Defendant had judgment for costs. The allowance of costs is a matter of statutory regulation. Plaintiff is entitled to costs, of course, "in an action for recovery of money damages, when plaintiff recovers three hundred dollars or over." Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 3. "But no costs can be allowed in an action for the recovery of money or damages, where the plaintiff recovers less than three hundred dollars." Code Civ. Proc. § 1025. It was held, in Anthony v. Grand, 101 Cal. 235, 35 Pac. 859: "This [referring to section 1025] evidently applies to both parties to the action and forbids the recovery of costs by either of them."

The judgment is modified by striking out that part thereof which provides that "defendant have and recover of and from Ida F. H. Frese, plaintiff, its costs incurred herein," and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. M. Elsom against F. H. Moore and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh R. Osborn, for appellant. James A. Hall, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action against a constable and his bondsmen to recover the value of certain personal property taken by said officer under and by virtue of a writ of attachment. The verdict of the jury was for the defendants, and this is an appeal from the judgment entered thereon and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The facts are as follows: During the latter part of November, 1906, E. R. Whitman was in Watsonville, attending for the plaintiff to the purchase and shipment of produce which had theretofore been contracted for by W. M. Elsom, the plaintiff. This produce, on being loaded into cars engaged by plaintiff, left one of them only partially filled. On November 26th Whitman, on his own account, obtained from one J. F. Kane 130 sacks of potatoes, and loaded them into the partially filled car, and billed the whole car to plaintiff. The car left Watsonville, arriving at Santa Cruz the next day, at which time plaintiff claimed to be the owner of the potatoes through purchase from Whitman. On November 28th Kane, having been refused payment by Whitman for the potatoes, commenced an action against him in the justice's court, and caused a writ of attachment to be issued therein, which was immediately levied by the constable, defendant in this case, upon the lot of potatoes in question. Plaintiff duly claimed the potatoes as his property, but the constable ignored his claim, sold them, and now retains the proceeds of the sale. The present action is against him and his bondsmen for conversion of the potatoes.

At the trial the defendants introduced evidence to show that there was an understanding between Kane and Whitman that the title to the potatoes was not to pass to Whitman until they were paid for. Under these circumstances Kane was at liberty to treat the transaction as a sale absolute or conditional (Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 477, 56 Pac. 339; Vermont Marble Co. v. Brow, 109 Cal. 236, 41 Pac. 1031, 50 Am. St. Rep. 37); but, inasmuch as Kane brought an action against Whitman for goods sold and delivered, and caused the goods to be attached as the property of Whitman, Kane must be deemed to have elected to consider the sale as absolute and unconditional (Parke, etc., Co. v. White River L. Co., 101 Cal. 37, 40, 35 Pac. 442; Ward Land & Stock Co. v. Mapes, 147 Cal. 747, 82 Pac. 426). At the request of the defendants, the court, by an instruction, submitted to the jury the question whether or not, under section 3440 of the Civil Code, there was such a delivery and continued change of possession from Whitman to Elsom as to make the transfer between them valid as to Kane. Plaintiff contends (if we understand him correctly) that there was no evidence in the case to warrant the giving of this instruction.

We will state in some detail the facts touching this phase of the case, as shown by the testimony.

Kane testified that a firm of produce dealers, by name Jacobs & Malcolm, telephoned to him from San Francisco "that Whitman wanted 130 sacks of potatoes; that he was willing to pay $1.50 a hundred for them; that they did not care to sell them to Whitman, and, if I wanted the deal, they would give them to me for $1.45. * * * Subsequently I sold Whitman 130 sacks of potatoes from the Jacobs & Malcolm lot. November 26th or 27th. I said to Whitman: 'When are you going to ship them, and when are you going out of town?' He replied, 'I don't know.' * * * In reference to payment he said: 'I will be right down to the office.

* * * I suppose I can get the potatoes if I pay for them?' I said: 'Under those conditions you can have them, but they must be paid for before they leave town.' When I next saw Whitman, he gave me the weights, and said he would be right down to the bank to get me a draft for them." He further testified that shortly after that Whitman got possession of the potatoes, and shipped them without paying therefor, and upon demand refused to do so, saying, in substance, that he had never intended to pay for them. This witness and also the constable testified—and, in fact, plaintiff admitted—that at the time the writ of attachment was levied Whitman was in full charge of the potatoes, that he had the key to the car containing them, and that he was there superintending their unloading. Elsom testified that the arrangement between him and Whitman was that the profits, if any, realized from the sales of other lots of produce purchased at Watsonville, were to be divided equally between them, but no division of profits at all was to be made concerning the potatoes in controversy; that he purchased these potatoes about noon November 27th from Whitman; that, while he did business with the banks in Santa Cruz, on this occasion he was at his home, and had on hand in cash $500 or $600 or perhaps $1,000, and, having no check book there, he paid Whitman $240.75 in cash for them; that all other purchases of produce at Watsonville were made by Whitman for him excepting these 130 sacks, and that the persons who sold such produce knew that he was the purchaser, and they looked to him for payment. The witness also said that at the time of the purchase of this lot of potatoes Whitman no doubt owed him a balance on some money advanced to pay expenses. Nevertheless nothing was said about this balance, nor was any attempt made to deduct it in making this payment. Whitman testified that he did not buy the potatoes from Kane, but from Jacobs & Malcolm, but he admits that Mr. Jacobs, of that firm, told him that, if they sold him the potatoes, he would have to pay for them before taking them out of the warehouse. Jacobs testified that, judging from past transactions, Whitman was a man not to be trusted. Whitman obtained these potatoes on the afternoon of November 26th without paying therefor; and, as a result of his efforts, they went out of Watsonville that night on the 11 o'clock freight train. He himself went to Santa Cruz early the next morning, and the potatoes reached there that same afternoon. Thereafter, on the same day, without any claimed change in the market price of the commodity, without any attempt to dispose of them to any one else, and without any general examination of them by the purchaser, Whitman asserts that he sold the potatoes to the plaintiff Elsom for the same price that he himself agreed to pay for them.

Kane, who was absent from Watsonville during the day of November 27th, returned in the evening, and, on learning that Whitman had taken the potatoes without paying for them, boarded a train that night and went to Santa Cruz. The next morning he saw Whitman about 7 o'clock, and demanded payment of him. Whitman refused to pay, and, in effect, according to Kane's testimony, said that it had been his intention throughout the negotiations to evade payment for them—and we may add that his conduct in the matter is quite consistent with such declaration.

Both Whitman and the plaintiff testified that on the afternoon of November 27th (the day before the attachment) Whitman, with money received from plaintiff for that purpose, paid the freight on all the produce, and that later that afternoon the purported sale was effected. The constable and the freight agent, on the other hand, testified that on the morning when the attachment was served and levied the freight had not been paid. The jury probably believed these two disinterested witnesses, and concluded that, if Whitman and Elsom were wrong in one part of this statement, they were probably wrong as to the other, and that, therefore, the alleged sale did not take place until after the writ of attachment was served and levied. No one can read this record and hesitate for one moment to say that the case is at least open to the view that the transfer from Whitman to the plaintiff was made with the intention of defeating Kane's demand and that it was fraudulent. But, with respect more particularly to plaintiff's contention, we also think there was sufficient evidence in the case to warrant the giving of the instruction to which objection is made. When the potatoes left Watsonville, they were under the control of Whitman, and from that time until the levy of the attachment they were subject to his disposition, being in his actual possession during part of the time. It was for the jury to say whether, as between Whitman and Elsom, there was sufficient delivery and change of possession to make the transfer valid as against Whitman's creditor Kane.

Plaintiff also contends that the court committed error in refusing to permit him on rebuttal to go into the matter of the sale from Jacobs & Malcolm to Kane. Testimony upon this subject was introduced by him in his case in chief, and the court did not abuse its discretion in permitting no further examination upon the subject. There is no merit in plaintiff's suggestion that the evidence does not show a sale of these potatoes from Jacobs & Malcolm to Kane.

At the request of the defendants, the court gave the jury seven instructions. The plaintiff proposed six instructions, some of which were given in a modified form, and the others were refused. The plaintiff in his specifications of errors of law says that the court erred in giving each of the seven instructions proposed by defendants; that it also erred in modifying certain of his proposed instructions and in refusing others; and in his brief he refers to the instructions twice as follows: "And the court gave all of the instructions requested by defendants, each of which, when applied to the facts of this case, is erroneous. It was also error for the court to refuse to give the instructions requested by plaintiff. The issue of ownership and possession was one of fact for the jury to decide." If counsel believes that the court committed error in reference to the instructions, he should point out definitely wherein the action of the court in this regard was erroneous. Such requirement is essential, not only out of fairness to opposing counsel, but also for the proper expedition of the business of this court. We should not be asked to search through the record for errors which we may suspect counsel to be relying upon.

Under somewhat similar circumstances, it was said, in Arnold v. Producers' Fruit Co., 141 Cal. 738, 75 Pac. 326: "The court will not examine the offered instructions, and go through the record to see whether or not any one of them was necessary to guide the jury in its verdict." In Dale v. Purvis, 78 Cal. 113, 20 Pac. 296, the court commended brevity, but thought it was overdone in that case, and held that appellant must put his finger on the instruction complained of, and not assail the instructions as a whole.

In the present case, the allegations of the complaint as to the damages suffered by plaintiff brought the amount of his claim up to over $300, but the value of the potatoes was $240.75 only. The record is needlessly long, consisting of 141 pages of closely printed matter. This being the condition of the record, and remembering the nature of the transaction involved, we feel no inclination and perceive no reason for departing from the rule just stated.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

George McKeehan was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon. From the judgment and from an order denying a motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Conkling & Brown, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TAGGART, J. Information for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. Verdict of assault with a deadly weapon. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Defendant was the keeper of a pool and billiard hall, and the complaining witness, Martin, was at the time of the occurrence upon which the charge is based a constable at Brawley in the county of Imperial where the billiard hall was located. About two weeks prior to the trouble between them Martin raided the premises mentioned in search of "booze," as he testified, at which time he destroyed some bottles, as to the contents of which the respective parties disagree. At that time the brother of defendant, who was the owner of the place, told Martin "he wasn't wanted in the place and for him to get out and stay out." On the evening of the affray here in question Martin was sitting in the hall watching a game of pool, when defendant asked him "if he had any particular business there," and said, "if he had not, he had better get out while he could." Martin told defendant to bring on his gun, to which defendant replied that he did not need any gun for such people. Martin did not leave, but sent a friend to get his revolver for him. Some minutes thereafter, without any further conversation, defendant approached Martin, who was sitting quietly in a chair, and attempted to strike him over the head with a heavy billiard cue. Martin warded off the blows, first with his arm and later with a chair. At last, he took refuge under a table where he drew his gun, and prepared to use it, when some one else placed the defendant under arrest.

A reversal of the judgment is asked upon the grounds: (1) That the court erred in admitting certain evidence as to the raid made by Martin two weeks before; (2) that certain comments made by the district attorney during the trial were misconduct prejudicial to the defendant; (3) that the court did not properly admonish the jury at two of the adjournments taken during the trial; and (4) that the court erred in its statement of the law, relative to Martin's right to remain in the billiard hall after being ordered to leave by the defendant, in its instructions to the jury.

Places of amusement carried on for profit are quasi public in character, and the particular business here in question was one as to which it has been declared competent for the legislative branch of the government, in the exercise of its police power, to regulate or prohibit as the exigencies of the community may require. Ex parte Murphy, 8 Cal. App. 440, 97 Pac. 199; Ex parte Mey- ers, 7 Cal. App. 528, 94 Pac. 870. It was the right, if not the duty, of Martin as a police officer to keep all places of this kind within his township under supervision, and, whenever he had reason to suppose the law was being violated therein, to enter and remain so long as was reasonably necessary to ascertain whether or not "the drunker men whom he saw in the place" procured their liquor there. Pon v. Wittman, 147 Cal. 280, 81 Pac. 934, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683. The common-law doctrine as to the right of a manager of such a place to eject a person (and particularly an officer of the peace) from his premises at his own pleasure, as declared in Burton v. Scherpf, 1 Allen (Mass.) 133, 79 Am. Dec. 717, is not the law of this state. Greenberg v. Western Turf Ass'n, 140 Cal. 357, 73 Pac. 1050, reaffirmed 148 Cal. 126, 128, 82 Pac. 684, 113 Am. St. Rep. 216. The court did not err in giving the instruction complained of.

The failure of the court to admonish the jury under section 1122 of the Penal Code is not necessarily reversible error. While the section should have been and always ought to be strictly complied with, yet, if no injury appears to have resulted from an omission to do so, prejudice will not be presumed. People v. Thompson, 84 Cal. 606, 24 Pac. 384; People v. Coyne, 116 Cal. 295, 48 Pac. 218. In the case at bar the error complained of was the failure to give the language of the section in full at two adjournments. It does not appear that it was not given at other adjournments, or that there were no other adjournments at which it may be presumed it was given. The language of the district attorney, the use of which is assigned as error, is not beyond that which is permissible as a matter of argument. The comment as to the testimony of a witness for the defendant, that the witness is "making a plausible story," is improper while the witness is testifying, but is not, or at least was not, under the circumstances here, sufficient to justify the setting aside of a verdict or a reversal of the judgment.

Some of the alleged errors assigned in connection with the admission of evidence as to the raid made by Martin two weeks prior to the date of the trouble cannot be considered, as no exceptions were preserved to the rulings of the court in relation thereto. Prior to the amendment of section 1259 of the Penal Code in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 1038, c. 713) this was necessary. People v. Miller, 122 Cal. 93, 54 Pac. 523. There are others, however, as to which exceptions were properly preserved. Defendant's brother, the proprietor of the billiard hall, was called as a witness for defendant, and on his direct examination gave his version of a raid or search for liquors made by Martin two weeks before, to the effect that Martin had forcibly entered some rear rooms on the witness's premises and destroyed some bottles of cherry cider or grape juice, but that he found no

"booze." On cross-examination, the witness was asked by the district attorney: "Q. On this raid that you speak of, or this search, did he search any other premises?" This question was objected to generally, and on the ground that it was not proper cross-examination, and the court overruled the objection and an exception was noted. The answer was, "He did." He was then asked, "Did he find any booze?" to which question a general objection was interposed and the witness answered, "He did," before the court ruled. Defendant moved the answer be stricken out, without assigning grounds of motion, and the court denied it; an exception being preserved. The witness testified that Martin broke up and destroyed the booze, and was then asked the question: "I will ask if you had any notice served on you by the constable, Martin, five days or any other number of days prior, relative to this booze question?" An objection to this was overruled, and an exception taken and the witness answered: "I can't say that it had. I received a paper, but I don't know whether it would be considered a notice served."

This same matter had been gone into by the defendant on his cross-examination of Martin earlier in the trial and the statement made by defendant's counsel in one of his questions to Martin: "You are talking about some other place. You are willing to break into other people's places, aren't you?" Upon redirect examination of this witness, over the objection of defendant, the district attorney was permitted to show that Martin "had served notice on this defendant, proprietor of this pool hall, relative to abating the nuisance carried on there." All of these exceptions are presented as error.

The evidence relating to the prior occurrence seems to have been introduced by the people for the purpose of showing that there was a motive for defendant's attack upon Martin. A proper question was propounded by the district attorney to which an objection was made by the defendant, and the answer given was that the witness "went in to search the place and poured out some booze and whisky." No motion was made to strike this answer out, and on cross-examination defendant elicited Martin's story of the raid in detail, and finally made the declaration as to Martin's "breaking into other places" above mentioned. Under the circumstances of this case, we are unable to say that the defendant was prejudiced by any act of the district attorney or the court in its rulings in relation to this evidence. Courts of appeal sit to review such errors of the trial court and misconduct of the prevailing party as prejudice the rights of the party claiming to be aggrieved, and not to set aside verdicts or reverse judgments merely because some error has been committed upon the trial.

Conceding that the introduction of improper matter into a case by the defendant does not justify the court in permitting a district attorney to pursue this same line of examination on cross or redirect examination, or estop the defendant from objecting to such cross or redirect examination, as the case may be, nevertheless, the fact that the defendant has already called the same matter to the attention of the jury will be considered in determining whether or not the error committed at the request of the district attorney is, or is not, prejudicial to the defendant. So considering the rulings excepted to, we are unable to see how the defendant was prejudiced by the showing that Martin had found "booze" on other premises and destroyed it, while the fact that he had served a notice on defendant relative to abating a nuisance carried on at the pool hall can hardly be deemed to have been prejudicial. The latter tended in some degree to show that Martin's presence in the pool hall was in pursuance of his official duties, and to negative the theory of defendant that he was a trespasser.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, we have not considered the objection of the Attorney General that the appeal from the order denying the motion is not before us, but from an examination and consideration of the entire record the judgment and order are both affirmed.

Sept. 30, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 404*) — FINDINGS — "DUE AND OWING."

2. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS—"WAS UNPAID."

The finding that a certain sum "was unpaid" relates back to the filing of the complaint, and from it, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it follows that it was unpaid at the time of the trial.

3. SALES (§ 176*)—SHIPPING LESS THAN ORDERED—ACTION FOR PRICE—ESTOPPEL.

Defendant having ordered of plaintiffs a certain number of boxes to be made and lettered according to specifications, plaintiffs thereafter notified it of their inability to furnish the full number, but that they could supply a certain smaller number; and after expiration of a reasonable time after such notice, for defendant to give notice, which it did not give, that it would not accept less than the full number, plaintiffs manufactured and shipped the smaller number. Held, that it was defendant's duty, if unwilling to accept less than the stipulated number, to signify its disapproval of the proposed shipment, so that, not having done so, it was estopped to defend against an action for the price thereof on the ground that the full number ordered was not shipped.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Nicholas Treis against the Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals on judgment roll. Affirmed.

Goldberg & Melly, for appellant. Adams, Schaertzer & Binford, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On September 28, 1906, defendant in writing ordered plaintiff's assignor, the Commercial Envelope & Box Company, to ship it (the defendant) 10,000 boxes. The order set forth in the complaint contained full specifications as to material, sizes, and quality of the boxes, and prescribed certain lettering to be printed thereon. It was also provided that 5,000 of the boxes so ordered should be shipped as soon as the box company could get them ready for shipment, and the remainder of said order to be shipped in January, 1907. It is alleged in the complaint that the Commercial Envelope & Box Company did ship to defendant the 10,000 boxes so ordered and did everything required of it to be done in filling said order; that the agreed value of said 10,000 boxes so ordered was $332.50, and that neither said sum nor any part thereof has been paid. The answer is a general denial. The court, in effect, found that in the month of October defendant received notice from the box company that it intended to ship a less number of boxes than called for, in the fulfillment of the contract, but, notwithstanding the fact that defendant had such notice, it failed to notify the box company that it would refuse to accept the boxes unless the full number called for by the order were shipped, although, had it so desired, it could have given notice of such intended refusal. The court further found that on November 6, 1906, said Commercial Envelope & Box Company, assignor of plaintiff, shipped to defendant 9,712 of the boxes so ordered, and no more, and that plaintiff's assignor, the box company, did fully comply with the terms of said order, except that it shipped 288 less than called for by the order. Defendant refused to receive the 9,712 boxes, or any part thereof.

Judgment was rendered as prayed for in the complaint.

Issue was joined upon the question of nonpayment, as to which the court found "that there was due and owing under the contract" from defendant to plaintiff the sum of $322.09. Appellant insists that such finding is insufficient, in that it is not a finding of fact, but a mere conclusion of law, and that the finding that such sum was due does not negative a subsequent payment thereof. The finding is not one to be commended, and it is objectionable, both by reason of its being in the form of a conclusion and in the wording thereof, which relates to a time anterior to the trial. While the question is not free from difficulty, nevertheless the finding must be held sufficient upon the opinion in Stewart v. Burbridge, 102 Pac. 962, where it is expressly held by this court that a finding that a sum remains "due and owing" is a sufficient finding as to nonpayment. In the consideration of that case this court had before it the opinion of the Supreme Court in Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 502, 23 Pac. 227, where the court, in considering the sufficiency of a finding upon the issue of nonpayment based upon the use of the words "due and owing," says: "This implied that the balance found to be due and owing remained unpaid." It is true that in denying a petition for a rehearing therein Chief Justice Beatty expressed an opinion to the effect that such finding was a mere conclusion of law and insufficient as a finding of fact covering the issue of nonpayment, but holding that such issue in that case was covered by other facts found constituting a sufficient finding of nonpayment. In the subsequent case of Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 Pac. 772, the court held that an allegation in the complaint that a certain sum was "due and owing" implied that it was unpaid. The conclusion of this court in Stewart v. Burbridge, supra, is based upon the principle announced in the Penrose Case and appears to be supported by the opinion of the Supreme Court in Ward v. Clay, supra. If the use of the words "due and owing" in an allegation imply that the sum is unpaid, it would seem that a like implication must follow their use in a finding upon the issue of nonpayment. That it was unpaid relates back to the time of the filing of the complaint, and being then unpaid, and in the absence of any finding to the contrary, it follows that it was unpaid at the date of the trial.

The court found as a conclusion of law that defendant was estopped from any defense based upon the failure of the box company to ship the full number of boxes ordered. Appellant insists that this conclusion is erroneous. It appears from the record that the boxes were to be manufactured in accordance with specifications, which called for three different sizes, with certain matter printed upon them, as per sample of cover submitted to the box company. The court, in effect, found that prior to shipping the boxes plaintiff's assignor notified defendant of the former's inability to supply the full number of boxes ordered, and that defendant had time within which it could have notified plaintiff's assignor that it would not accept less than the full number called for in the order, but that it did not do so. It does not appear from the findings when plaintiff's assignor gave this notice, other than in the month of October prior to shipment on November 6th; neither does it appear that the box company notified defendant of the exact number of boxes which it was able to furnish. In the absence of the evidence, which is not brought up, every intendment must be resolved in favor of the judgment. We must therefore assume, the contrary not appearing, that plaintiff's assignor notified defendant that it could supply the number of boxes which it did, in fact, ship, namely, 9,712. The fact that the boxes ordered were in size and manufacture to comply with particular specifications contained in the order, and that the evidence may have shown that all the work required to fill an order specially adapted to the wants of defendant was done subsequent to the expiration of a reasonable time after the giving of the notice, brings the case within the well-recognized equitable rule that he who is silent when he ought to speak shall not be heard to speak when he ought to be silent. The circumstances were such that the notice given by plaintiff's assignor to defendant in October imposed upon defendant, if it was unwilling to accept less than the stipulated number of boxes, the duty of signifying its disapproval of the proposed shipment of 9,712 towards filling the order. The defendant's silence must be construed to have been intended to influence the box company to engage in an undertaking prejudicial to its interest. The obvious effect of such conduct on the part of defendant was to mislead the box company to do otherwise than it would have done if the defendant had expressed its disapproval of such proposed action. By reason thereof plaintiff's assignor incurred the expense of making and shipping the boxes, which defendant knew was 288 less than the number ordered. Alvord v. United States, 8 Ct. Cl. 364; Scharman v. Scharman et al., 38 Neb. 39, 56 N. W. 704; Newmarket Iron Foundry v. Harvey, 23 N. H. 395; Maxwell v. Bay City Bridge Co., 46 Mich. 278, 9 N. W. 410. The case at bar is easily distinguishable from those cases like Deane v. Gray Bros., etc., Co., 109 Cal. 433, 42 Pac. 443, and Mickelson v. New East Tintic Ry. Co., 23 Utah, 42, 64 Pac. 463, wherein the court held that the defendants were not required to take affirmative action under the circumstances existing in those cases.

The price agreed to be paid for the 10,000 boxes, as shown by the order, was $332.50. The court gave judgment for $322.09. We assume the difference in the amounts to be the value of the 288 boxes not delivered.

Upon such theory, the judgment is correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; TAGGART, J.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 70 v. SHERMAN et al. (Civ. 533.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 640*)—RECORD—TRANSCRIPT.

The transcript on an appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, authorizing an appeal by filing with the trial court a notice, etc., must conform to court rule 7 (78 Pac. ix), and no transcript will be filed, nor appeal reviewed, except as to questions reviewable on the judgment roll alone, unless the transcript conforms to the rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 640.*]

2. COURTS (§ 85*)—RULES OF COURT—EFFECT.

The rules of the Supreme Court for the government of appellate practice are as much a part of the system of procedure as the rules promulgated for that purpose by the Legislature, and they must be complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 294; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 80*)—SPECIAL STATUTES—CREATION OF "CORPORATION."

St. 1905, p. 717, c. 552, creating a reclamation district and fixing its boundaries, creates a governmental agency merely for specific purposes, and does not create a corporation within Const. art. 12, § 1, prohibiting the creating of corporations by special act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 86; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1608-1621; vol. 8, pp. 7619, 7620.]

4. DRAINS (§ 8*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—LEGISLATIVE POWER.

The state may accomplish the work of reclaiming swamp lands, ceded to it by the federal government, without organizing a district as such, and without giving the landowners within the district any voice in the selection of the trustees, and the Legislature may appoint commissioners to perform the functions which under existing schemes are performed by trustees and assessors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 3; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. DRAINS (§ 73*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—DEFENSES.

One assessed for reclamation purposes may not attack the legal existence of the district created by a law on its face valid by showing that the act creating the district embraced within its limits existing districts, resulting in the taking of the property of landowners within the old districts without due process of law, but the matter is one for the Attorney General, on the relation of landowners of one or both of the old districts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—VALIDITY OF STATUTE—PRESUMPTION.

The Legislature may repeal laws creating reclamation districts to reclaim swamp lands granted to the state by the federal government, and, where the Legislature creates a district embracing existing districts, it will not be presumed that the enforcement of the act creating the new district will destroy vested rights or take property without due process of law, where such effect is not made clear from the language of the act itself.

7. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—SWAMP LANDS—OBLIGATION OF PURCHASER.

A purchaser from the state of swamp lands granted to the state by the federal government, on condition that it would reclaim the same and make the same suitable for cultivation, takes the lands subject to the obligation to perform the same condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—WISDOM OF LEGISLATION—JUDICIAL INTERFERENCE.

Where the Legislature deems it wise to the end that the state's obligation to reclaim swamp lands ceded to it by the general government shall be performed to put out of existence any particular reclamation district, which it has created, or to combine two or more into one, or to create a new district, embracing lands within other districts, it will be conclusively presumed, in a collateral attack on the legality of such new district, that the Legislature has acted with due regard to the rights of the owners of the land in the old districts, and that the act is valid, as the wisdom of schemes for the reclamation of such lands is for the exclusive determination of the Legislature.

9. DRAINS (§ 18*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—POWER OF TRUSTEES.

Under Pol. Code, § 3452, providing that the landowners of a reclamation district shall adopt by-laws for the government thereof, and that they may be amended in the same manner that the original by-laws were adopted, the trustees of a reclamation district have no power to amend the by-laws of the district adopted by the landowners.

10. DRAINS (§ 76*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY.

A provision in the by-laws of a reclamation district, fixing the time when regular meetings of the trustees shall be held, and prescribing the prerequisites to the calling of a special meeting, is not so vital as to materially affect the assessment levied for reclamation purposes, and, where the board has discharged its duties honestly and the assessment commissioners have been fair in the assessment, and there is no suggestion of fraud in any of the proceedings, nor that any of the meetings of the board were not attended by all the members thereof, an assessment will not be set aside merely because meetings were held in accordance with an unauthorized amendment of the by-laws adopted by the trustees fixing the time of meeting.

11. TRIAL (§ 43*)—TECHNICAL RULES—ENFORCEMENT.

Where the defense is technical, the court may hold the party engaged in making the defense to the strictest letter of the rules governing the admission and exclusion of testimony.

12. DRAINS (§ 76*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY.

A substantial compliance with the law governing the organization of reclamation districts and the administration of their affairs is sufficient to render an assessment for reclamation purposes valid.

13. DRAINS (§ 73*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY.

Under Pol. Code, § 15, providing that words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers shall be construed as giving such authority to a majority, an assessment for reclamation purposes will not be disturbed merely because one of the assessment commissioners, after his appointment, furnished money to his wife, who made a loan secured by mortgage on lands in the district, though it be assumed that the mortgage held by the wife removed him from the class of disinterested persons within Pol. Code, § 3456, providing that the three commissioners appointed to assess the lands in a district shall be disinterested persons, as there is no inhibition against the majority of the commissioners performing the duty required of them.

14. DRAINS (§ 76*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY—"DE FACTO OFFICER."

The office of commissioner to make an assessment for reclamation purposes is created by statute, and is a de jure officer, and, when one who is appointed, qualifies and participates in the performance of the duties of the commissioners, he acts under color of office and is a de facto officer, and as such his acts are valid; an "officer de facto" being one whose acts the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid as far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons where he holds under color of a known appointment, void because the officer is not eligible, such ineligibility being unknown to the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1845-1851.]

15. DRAINS (§ 76*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ASSUMPTION—VALIDITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

Pol. Code, § 3456, providing that the commissioners appointed to make an assessment for reclamation purposes must view and assess on the land within the district, a charge proportionate to the whole expense and to the benefits from the reclamation works requires the commissioners to estimate the whole expense of the proposed works, and then assess the lands in the district proportionally to the whole expense thereof, according to the benefits resulting to each parcel, and considerable discretion is conferred on the commissioners in the determination of the benefits to the several tracts, so that an assessment after a view of the land is presumptively valid under section 3463, making a list of the charges assessed on any tract of land prima facie evidence of the matters therein contained.

16. DRAINS (§ 90*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—BOUNDARIES—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where the Legislature establishes the boundaries of a reclamation district and embraces therein the land of individuals, it must be conclusively presumed, in an action to enforce the collection of an assessment for reclamation purposes, that the lands included in the district will be benefited by the reclamation works.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

17. DRAINS (§ 90*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—ACTIONS FOR ASSESSMENTS—FINDINGS.

A finding, in an action to enforce an assessment for reclamation purposes, that the amount of the charge levied on each tract of land in the district was proportionate to the whole expense, and to the benefits resulting from the reclamation works, means that a party objecting to the assessment has failed to sustain the burden of rebutting the presumption in favor of the validity of the assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

18. EVIDENCE (§§ 87, 89*)—TRIAL (§ 139*)—PRESUMPTIONS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2, providing that jurors must be instructed that they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses against a presumption, recognizes that a presumption is evidence which may outweigh the positive testimony of witnesses against it, and while against a fact proved or admitted a disputable presumption has no weight, yet where it is undertaken to prove a fact against the presumption it remains for the jury to determine whether the fact has been proven.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 109, 111; Dec. Dig. §§ 87, 89.* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 332, 333, 338-341, 365; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

19. EVIDENCE (§ 591*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

A party bringing out testimony of a witness by making the witness his own witness is bound by his statements, though they may be a conclusion of the witness.

20. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1043*)—HARMLESS ERROR—CONTINUANCE.

Where the findings of the trial court would have been the same if an absent witness had been present and had testified, the refusal to grant a continuance on the ground of the absence of witness will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. F. Mahan, Judge.

Action by Reclamation District No. 70 against Mary May Sherman and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Milton Shepardson and E. A. Bridgeford, for appellants. A. L. Shinn and A. H. Hewitt, for respondent.

HART, J. This is a suit for the enforcement of a lien upon certain land of defendants, situated within the limits of Reclamation District No. 70, under an assessment for reclamation purposes. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and this appeal is from said judgment under section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. The transcript of the proceedings, etc., as authorized by said section, is not in form as required by rule 7 (78 Pac. ix) of this court, and we will, therefore, take occasion to here say that hereafter no transcript in an appeal taken directly to this court under the section mentioned will be filed, nor the appeal, except as to such questions as may be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone where the judgment roll is, as here, presented in a proper and separate and distinct form from the transcript of the proceedings, will be considered by this court, unless such transcript conforms to the requirements of said rule 7. It would seem scarcely necessary to say that rules laid down by the Supreme Court for the government in many particulars of the appellate practice are as much a part of our system of procedure as the rules promulgated for that purpose by the Legislature, and they are, therefore, as much the necessary learning of the practicing lawyer as either the rules of procedure and practice established by the Legislature or the principles of substantive law. The consequences of failure to observe these rules are upon the lawyer, and not upon the court. The cumbersome and unwieldy form of the record here is excused in this instance only because the section under which the appeal is prosecuted is new, and, further, because the litigation involved in the action is of more than ordinary importance for the reason that the defendants' land has been decreed to be sold for the satisfaction of the assessment levied by the plaintiff.

The validity of the assessment is challenged by appellants on the grounds: (1) That the act of the Legislature by which the plaintiff was organized as a reclamation district (St. 1905, p. 717, c. 552) is unconstitutional and void, because, it is claimed, it is a special law, and therefore violative of article 12, section 1, of the Constitution. (2) That embraced within the boundaries of plaintiff are two other reclamation districts, which were created under the provisions of general laws and which were in existence at the time of the enactment of the law establishing and organizing plaintiff. (3) That the board of trustees of plaintiff by resolution amended the by-laws adopted, in pursuance of section 3452 of the Political Code, by the landowners within the district. (4) That the assessment commissioners were not disinterested persons, as required by and within the meaning of the language of section 3456 of the Political Code. (5) That the commissioners "did not take into consideration the quality and grade of the lands of the district in fixing the assessments and had nothing before them to show the relative heights of the land."

1. Upon the first point, the contention is, as stated, that a reclamation district is a "corporation" within the meaning of article 12, § 1, Const., which, in part, provides: "Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act." In support of this contention, counsel cite a number of early California cases in which reclamation districts are declared to be corporations. Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 410; People v. Reclamation District 108, 53 Cal. 348; People v. Williams, 56 Cal. 647; People v. Larue, 67 Cal. 526, 8 Pac. 84; Irrigation District v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 353, 21 Pac. 825. And as late as Angus v. Browning, 130 Cal. 503, 62 Pac. 827, it was held that Reclamation District 108 was a corporation, citing People v. District 108, 53 Cal. 348, supra, but it is not therein expressly declared, nor do we think the court intended to hold in that case, that reclamation districts belong to any of the classes of corporations defined by section 284 of the Civil Code or that they come within the purview of the article and section of the Constitution enjoining the creation of corporations except by general laws. Long before the decision in Angus v. Browning, 130 Cal. 503, 62 Pac. 827, supra, the Supreme Court declared in the case of Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 121, 48 Pac. 1016, that reclamation districts, even if, for the want of a better term, they may be called corporations, were not within the definition of "corporations" as given by section 284 of the Civil Code, and this view has not only been adopted by the Supreme Court in a case decided subsequently to the case of Angus v. Browning, 130 Cal. 503, 62 Pac. 827, but it has been expressly held that such districts may be formed and organized by special acts. People v. Levee Dist. 706, 131 Cal. 30, 63 Pac. 676.

In People v. Reclamation District No. 551, supra, the court, referring to the corporations defined by the section of the Civil Code referred to, says: "These [reclamation] districts in my opinion belong to neither of these classes. They are special organizations, formed to perform a certain work, which the policy of the state requires or permits to be done, and to which the state has given a certain degree of discretion in making the improvements contemplated. They are described by Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, §§ 24, 25, 26. He calls them 'quasi corporations.' Perhaps it would have been more accurate to say that they are not corporations at all, but are so classed because many of the presumptions and rules which apply to corporations have been made applicable to them. They are public agencies, which would cease to exist when the policy of the state has changed so that they are no longer required, or when there is no further function for them to perform. And there is nothing in the Constitution relating to municipal corporations which would prevent the state from so changing its policy as to put them out of existence." See Hensley v. Reclamation Dist. No. 556, 121 Cal. 96, 53 Pac. 401.

The case of People v. Levee Dist. No. 6, 131 Cal. 30, 63 Pac. 676, before referred to, sets at rest and completely dissipates all doubt which may have existed as to the nature of reclamation and irrigation districts and the extent of the power of the Legislature in forming them. It is there said: "Section 1 of article 12 of the Constitution, having reference to private corporations, provides that they may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by a special act. Article 11, § 6, of the Constitution, declares that corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws. Act 1891, p. 235, c. 164, is unquestionably a special law. If Levee District No. 6 be a corporation, it is certainly not a private corporation, and must, if it be recognized by the Constitution at all, come under the designation of article 11, § 6—'a corporation for municipal purposes.' And if it be a corporation for municipal purposes within the meaning of that article and section, then indubitably, the act of March, 1891, forcing upon it a new, distinct, and different organization, is special and inhibited legislation. But is Levee District No. 6 a corporation for municipal purposes within the meaning of the Constitution? Expressions will be found in the cases where such organizations have been designated 'corporations for municipal purposes,' or 'public corporations,' or 'corporations for public purposes,' but these were convenient phrases of designation and description, rather than judicial declarations as to the nature and character of these agencies. The question propounded is conclusively answered by People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 551, 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016. It is there held that a reclamation district, conceding it to be a corporation, is not a corporation for municipal purpose within the meaning of the Constitution. But, as such levee districts, or reclamation districts, are distinctly not private corporations, they are corporations in a class by themselves, and the general powers of the Legislature for their creation, organization, and control are in no wise limited by the Constitution of the state." See, also, Rec. Dist. No. 551 v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 478, 66 Pac. 668, and People ex rel. Chapman v. Sacramento Drainage District, 103 Pac. 207. In the last mentioned case it is said: "The act does no violence to article 1, § 11, nor to article 4, § 25, nor to article 11, § 6, of the Constitution of the state. That the district here organized, if it be considered a corporation at all, is not a corporation organized for municipal purposes within the contemplation of article 11, section 6, of the Constitution, must be taken as well settled. People v. Reclamation District 551, 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016; People v. Levee District No. 6, 131 Cal. 30, 63 Pac. 676; Reclamation District v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 66 Pac. 668. It is unnecessary to repeat the reasons set forth in the decisions in those cases by which the conclusion there reached was expressed, to the effect that such districts are in strictness not corporations at all, but rather governmental agencies to carry out a specific purpose—the agency ceasing with the accomplishment of the purpose. But, additionally, it may be said that the likeness of these agencies to corporations is superficial, and that the similitude—for it is no more than this—ceases if consideration be paid to the fact that the state could accomplish this very work without organizing a district as such at all, and without giving the landowners within the district any voice in the selection of the managers or trustees. Thus it would be perfectly legal and competent for the Legislature, delimiting a tract of land, itself to appoint a commissioner or commissioners to perform all of the functions which, under the existing schemes, are performed by the trustees and the assessors. * * * Nor, while a special act, is the law obnoxious to the other sections of the Constitution above cited. The considerations dictating the necessities of a special law are plain as above set forth. It would require a clear showing upon the face of the law itself that a special act was not required before a court would interfere with the determination of a co-ordinate branch of the government upon this subject, and, generally, as is said in People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 489, 22 Pac. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66, the determination of such a matter ‘depends upon questions of fact which this court has no means of investigating, and upon the solution of which it would not attempt to substitute its judgment in place of that of the Legislature.’” Nothing more can be said upon the point under consideration than is expressed in the foregoing authorities, which, it is clear, conclusively settle the proposition adversely to the claim of the appellant.

2. The proposition that the assessment is invalid because the act creating plaintiff embraced within the limits of the latter two reclamation districts existing at the time of the creation of plaintiff cannot be maintained. Counsel argue that the destruction of the two districts in the manner suggested must result in the taking of the property of the landowners within the old districts without due process of law. In reply to this argument, it is to be said that, even if the point were one which could be appropriately urged against the validity of the assessment in the case at bar, there is nothing in the record before us showing or tending to show in the slightest degree that the property of the landowners in the old districts has been taken without just compensation having been paid for it, or, without due process of law, by the act of the Legislature establishing the boundaries of plaintiff and authorizing its organization as a reclamation district. But the point is one which the defendants cannot urge in this proceeding against the legality of the assessment. If the Legislature has, by its act creating the plaintiff, trespassed upon or usurped any of the rights of other reclamation districts existing before and at the time of the establishment of the boundaries of plaintiff, the matter is one for the Attorney General, upon the relation of some landowner of one or both of the old districts, to inquire into through appropriate legal proceedings. In other words, the point under consideration involves a collateral attack upon the legal existence of plaintiff and such an attack is not within the right of the defendants in this case to interpose; for, if it be a fact that plaintiff has no legal existence for the reason here suggested by appellants, it does not so appear from the face of the act creating plaintiff, and therefore such fact cannot, obviously, constitute a defense against the legality of the assessment. People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 526, 8 Pac. 84. The act creating the plaintiff is upon its face in all respects perfectly valid, and, if facts extrinsic to the act itself may disclose the invalidity of the enactment and consequently the illegality of the district, an inquiry to that end, if there exists authority for any such inquiry, must be prosecuted directly against the district, and not against any of the acts of its own officers or the other public officers who are charged with the administration of its affairs. It is well settled that the legality of reclamation districts and like quasi public corporations or public agencies established for similar purposes cannot, in a suit to enforce an assessment for the purpose of their creation and organization, be challenged; or, in other words, their legality cannot be collaterally attacked. Hoke v. Perdue, 62 Cal. 545; Reclamation Dist. v. Gray, 95 Cal. 601, 30 Pac. 779; Swamp Land Dist. v. Silver, 98 Cal. 51, 32 Pac. 866; Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 506, 37 Pac. 514, 777; Reclamation Dist. v. Turner, 104 Cal. 334, 37 Pac. 1038.

The act, by express language, repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions, and manifestly, if there existed at the time of its passage any law authorizing the maintenance of districts which were made a part of the district created by said act, such law was repealed, at least by necessary implication. The Legislature is to be presumed to have known of the existence of such other districts and to have considered and weighed all vital matters with respect to their operation and expenditures as such and the extent of their efficiency to accomplish, in full measure, the purposes for which they were created. There can be indulged no presumption that the effect of an act of the Legislature, if enforced, will be to destroy vested rights or to take property without due process of law, where such effect is not made clear from the language of the act itself. That it is within the power of the Legislature to repeal laws creating reclamation districts is a proposition well established. The swamp and overflowed lands of California were granted by the general government to the state upon condition that the latter would reclaim the same so that they might become suitable for the purposes of cultivation, and those who become purchasers of such lands from the state so take them subject to the obligation to perform the same condition. Kimball v. Reclamation Fund Com., 45 Cal. 344; Lamb v. Rec. Dist., 73 Cal. 133, 14 Pac. 625, 2 Am. St. Rep. 775; County of Kings v. County of Tulare, 119 Cal. 509, 51 Pac. 866; Miller & Lux v. Batz, 142 Cal. 447, 76 Pac. 42; Reclamation Dist. v. County of Sacramento, 134 Cal. 477, 66 Pac. 668. Therefore the state may adopt any policy consistent with reason for the prosecution of the work of reclaiming such lands; for there is no limitation placed by the Constitution upon the power of the Legislature to change its policy with regard to this subject. As is said in People v. Rec. Dist., 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016, supra, speaking of reclamation districts, "they are public agencies which would cease to exist when the policy of the state has changed, * * * and there is nothing in the Constitution relating to municipal corporations which would prevent the state from so changing its policy as to put them out of existence." If, therefore, the Legislature deems it to be a wise and beneficent policy, to the end that the state's obligation to reclaim and conserve the vast bodies of swamp and overflowed lands ceded to it by the general government, to put out of existence any particular reclamation district which it has created or to combine two or more districts already in existence into one or to form a new district embracing lands included within the boundaries of other existing districts, it must be conclusively presumed, in a collateral attack upon the legality of such new district so formed, that the law-making department has acted with due regard to the rights of the landowners of the old districts, and that, in fact, the latter act is in all respects legal and valid. In short, the policy of our schemes for the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands is one for exclusive determination by the Legislature, and, as before declared, if the acts of that body upon the subject are, upon their face, regular and valid, they cannot be impeached in any collateral proceeding.

3. It appears from the record that the owners of the land embraced in District 70, or those owning a majority in acreage of such land, in pursuance of section 3452 of the Political Code, adopted a set of by-laws for the government of the business of said district, and that subsequently the board of trustees amended said by-laws so as to change the time for holding the regular meetings of said board from the last Saturday in each month to the first Monday in each month; and further amended the by-laws with respect to the extent of the notice to be given the members of the board of trustees of special meetings of the board. Section 3452 of the Political Code, supra, provides that the landowners of the district shall adopt by-laws for the government thereof, and that such by-laws "may be amended at any time in the same manner that the original by-laws were adopted." It is not seriously contended that the effect of the mere unauthorized act of the board of trustees in amending or attempting to amend the by-laws is to vitiate the assessment; but appellants complain in this connection that the trial court committed prejudicial error by its alleged refusal to permit them to prove that the regular meetings of the board at which all the important business of the district committed to that body was transacted were held on the first Monday of each month, in accordance with the requirement of the amendment which the board undertook to make to the by-laws in that particular, instead of on the last Saturday of each month as prescribed by the by-laws, and, further, that the court would not permit proof as to the notice given, if any, to the members of the board of trustees of any special meetings at which the business of the board was transacted. The rulings complained of were upon questions propounded by counsel for the appellants to the secretary of the board of trustees.

Directing his attention to the resolution adopted by the board purporting to change the regular meeting days of said board to the first Monday in each month, this witness was asked if said board had held its meetings "pursuant to" said resolution and whether said board had "met upon any other day as a regular meeting than Monday as provided by this resolution"; and whether, "after the passage of that resolution your board adopted Monday as the regular meeting day of said board." To these questions the objection was made by the plaintiff, and, upon that ground sustained by the court, that they called for the opinion or conclusion of the witness and as well called for immaterial testimony. Objection was sustained on the same ground to the following question by appellants to the same witness: "I will ask you if pursuant to a resolution contained on page 2 of your minutes in relation to special meetings that if you pursued the method therein provided for giving notice of special meetings as therein provided for alone?" The object sought to be attained by the questions thus propounded to the secretary was undoubtedly to show that the board of trustees had held the meetings for the transaction of their official business upon days other than those prescribed for either regular or special meetings by the by-laws as adopted by the landowners. The by-laws, as so adopted, provide that, in the case of special meetings, the same may be held at any time at the call of the president of the board, "upon notice given to each trustee by mail, at least one day before such special meeting." The purported amendment by the board provided that special meetings may be held "upon five hours' previous notice thereof given personally by the president to each member of said board or without such notice if all members are present." The trial court made no specific finding as to the days upon which the meetings were held, but the judge, in rendering his decision, said: "I think the evidence clearly shows it was done at some meeting other than a regular meeting of the board, but as to what notice was given of the meeting at which these acts were performed there is no testimony."

It is very plain that the trustees of a reclamation district have no right or power to amend or change the by-laws of such district adopted by the landowners. The statute places this power in the landowners, and they alone may exercise it. But we do not look upon a provision in such by-laws fixing the time at which regular meetings of the board of trustees shall be held and prescribing the prerequisites to the calling of a special meeting as being so vital as to materially affect an assessment levied for the purposes of such an organization. The object of such a provision is, of course, to guarantee the proper observance of the greater and paramount consideration involved in all reclamation schemes whose prosecution is authorized by the state to wit: That the business for which such districts have been formed shall be faithfully transacted and their purpose finally accomplished by those charged with that duty. If the law has been substantially followed in the organization of such districts; if the election of the trustees has been unattended by fraud or dishonest practices; if the board has discharged its duties honestly and fairly; if the assessment commissioners have been fair and honest in the assessment of the lands in the district, taking into consideration in the performance of that duty all the elements essential to a just and equitable apportionment of the assessment of each piece or tract of land, according to the benefits which will accrue to it by reason of the reclamation works—then, under these circumstances, it is not vitally material in our opinion whether all the meetings of the board of trustees, whether regular or special have been held or called according to the strict letter of the provision of the by-laws fixing the time at which regular meetings shall be held or prescribing the prerequisites to the calling of special meetings. There is no suggestion here that there was any fraud in any of the proceedings leading to the organization of the district or in the assessment. Nor is there any claim that any of the meetings of the board were not attended by all the members of said board, and, if it could be assumed that the appellants could have proved, if the court had permitted the testimony, that certain special meetings of the board had been held without the notice prescribed by the by-laws having been previously given to the members of the board, and it appeared, as is conceded here, because it is not questioned, that all the members were present at such meetings, we hardly think any court could be found that would set at naught an assessment levied for so important a purpose and thus undo the fruition of long and laborious work and thereby impede the progress of an enterprise which the state itself has obligated itself to press to a successful termination, merely because of the omission to give a notice, the sole and only purpose of which had in fact been realized. If at such meetings all the members of the board were present, then whether the notice required was given of course became immaterial.

But the objection to some of the questions put to the secretary of the board that they called for the conclusion of the witness was well taken. Ordinarily there is little harm to be apprehended from answers to such questions as were objected to here. But the defense in this case is, in every aspect of it technical in the extreme, and we approve the course of a trial court in a case where a defense, as here, is founded entirely upon technicalities behind which there is little substance, in holding counsel who are engaged in making such a defense down to the strictest letter of the rule governing the admission and exclusion of testimony. We make this observation with no intention of challenging the right of counsel to make such a defense if they choose to do so, or believe the exigencies of their cause require it. The defense here, as we have thus far considered the case, is based altogether upon alleged slight departures from the strict letter of the law governing the organization of reclamation districts, and we think that the great purpose of those districts—a purpose in which the state as well as the owners of land embraced therein are vitally interested, because the reclamation of the large areas of swamp and overflowed lands within the borders of this commonwealth means increased prosperity to the whole state—should not be circumvented or impeded by any mere omission to dot an "i" or cross a "t." For the result of a reversal of the judgment in an action this character, the law by which it is authorized being in all respects valid, because of slight deviations from the procedure by which the assessment is required to be levied, could only be to cause the extra expense to the landowners necessarily incident to levying the assessment again, and for this reason, among those stated, a departure from the prescribed procedure should be of a very material and substantial nature before a reversal of the cause should be ordered. We therefore think that a substantial compliance with the provisions of the law governing the organization of such districts and the administration of their affairs ought to be all that should be required, for, unlike municipal corporations, they are brought into existence to serve, as public agencies, a special purpose for the whole state and to pass out with the achievement of that purpose.

4. It is next contended that the evidence discloses that the assessment commissioners were not disinterested persons. This contention is based upon testimony showing that the wife of Commissioner McRae was the holder of a mortgage on certain lands situated in the district. Section 3456 of the Political Code provides that the three commissioners appointed by the board of supervisors to assess the lands constituting the district shall be "disinterested persons." McRae testified that the mortgage referred to was given to secure the loan of money acquired during marriage, but that he gave the money to his wife so that she could make the loan, and thus prevent, by reason of that transaction, his disqualification to serve as an assessment commissioner of the "Sacramento Drainage District." The point is, however, devoid of merit. The mortgage was executed some three weeks after McRae had been selected by the board of supervisors as one of the assessment commissioners of plaintiff, and conceding, without deciding, that a mortgage held by the wife of a commissioner or lands within the district for which he was appointed a commissioner would be a sufficient reason for his disqualification, or would remove him from the class of "disinterested persons" from which the assessment commissioners must be selected, we do not think that the assessment can be affected or disturbed by that circumstance. There is no inhibition in the statute authorizing the appointment of these commissioners or in any part of the law relating to the organization and management of reclamation districts against a majority of such commissioners performing the duty required of them. Section 15 of the Political Code provides that "words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons are construed as giving such authority to a majority of them, unless it is otherwise expressed in the act giving the authority." Prior to the adoption of the foregoing section, the rule was the reverse, but the rule now is that, in the absence of an express provision to the contrary, "for all practical purposes the majority becomes the full board. It is," as is said in People v. Hecht, 105 Cal. 627, 38 Pac. 941, 27 L. R. A. 203, 45 Am. St. Rep. 96, "the receptacle—the reservoir—of all the authority conferred upon the whole, and its action, it is submitted, cannot be stayed by the nonaction, failure to qualify, absence, death, or want of eligibility of the minority." Moreover, the office of assessment commissioner is created by the statute, and is a de jure office. When McRae was appointed and qualified as an assessment commissioner and participated in the performance of the duties of the commissioners, he was acting under color of office, and presumptively entitled to the office and to discharge its duties. He was a de facto officer engaged in the discharge of the duties of a de jure office, and as such his acts were as valid and binding as those of a de jure officer. People v. Hecht, supra; Kitts v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 462, 90 Pac. 977. An interesting case upon the subject of officers de facto is that of State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409, where it is said: "A definition sufficiently accurate and comprehensive to cover the whole ground must, I think, be substantially as follows: An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons where the duties of the office were exercised: * * * (3) Under color of a known election or appointment, void because the officer was not eligible, * * * such ineligibility * * * being unknown to the public." See, also, People v. La Rue, supra. It will further be observed that at the time of McRae's appointment as commissioner by the board of supervisors he was, so far as the mortgage to his wife might have affected his qualifications to serve as such, a "disinterested person."

5. The claim is urged that the commissioners in making the assessment failed to take into consideration "the quality and grade of the lands of the district in fixing the assessments, and had nothing before them to show the relative heights of the land." Section 3456 of the Political Code provides that the commissioners "must view and assess upon the land situated within the district a charge proportionate to the whole expense and to the benefits of which will result from such works," etc. It is thus to be seen that the duty of the commissioners is to make an estimate of the whole expense of the proposed reclamation works, and then assess the lands embraced in the district proportionate to the whole expense thereof and according to the benefits which will result to each parcel of land from such reclamation. It is clear that the statute contemplates that considerable discretion shall be exercised by the commissioners in the determination of the question as to benefits which will accrue to the several tracts of land included in the district. By this we mean to say that, while an arbitrary assessment cannot be levied, the judgment of the commissioners upon the assessment, after a view of the land as contemplated by the statute, must be presumed to have been the result of a consideration of all the elements necessary to a just apportionment of the assessment. In fact, section 3463 of the Political Code so provides. It reads as follows: "From and after the filing of the list or certified copy thereof, the charges assessed upon any tract of land within the county constitute a lien thereon, and in any action to enforce said lien or to determine its validity, said list, duly executed by said commissioners, or a certified copy thereof, shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein contained, and that said commissioners were duly appointed and qualified, as required by law, and that they did view and assess upon the lands set forth in said lists the charges therein contained, and that said charges are in proportion to the whole expense and the benefits of which will result from the works of reclamation for which said assessment is so levied." In other words, after the assessment list or a certified copy thereof has been filed, the presumption is that the assessment was apportioned in obedience to the law. Therefore, when the plaintiff introduced in evidence the assessment book, a prima facie case was thereupon made out in favor of the lien against the lands of the appellants, and the burden was then cast upon the latter to overcome, if they could, the presumption thus arising.

McRae, one of the commissioners, was examined as to the methods of levying the assessment adopted by the commissioners, and other testimony was received bearing upon the character of the land of the appellants as to elevation and other elements which should be considered in properly apportioning an assessment for reclamation purposes. McRae, among other things, said that the land of appellants was assessed according to "the benefit it derived from the district, the lands and the drainage." Testimony was offered by the appellants to show that the land involved here was peculiarly suitable and adapted to the culture and growing of prunes, and some of the witnesses testified that the effect of water flowing upon lands of the same quality was to enrich it for prune-producing purposes, to which it could well be devoted where the water could be drained off in the winter season. The purpose of this testimony was obviously to show that the land of appellants could derive no practical benefit whatsoever from reclamation, and that any assessment levied thereon for reclamation purposes should not be sustained. But the question whether the land will or will not be benefited by reclamation works, or in other words, whether it should have been included within the boundaries of a district formed for reclamation purposes, is one which cannot arise or be urged in a suit of the nature of the one here. The Legislature having established the boundaries of the district and embraced therein the land of the appellants, it must be conclusively presumed, in an action to enforce the collection of the assessment, that such land will be benefited by reclamation works. If the rule were otherwise, a reclamation district could easily be dissolved or destroyed by the claim and some proof of exemption from assessment of every tract of land therein in a suit to compel the payment of the assessment for the alleged reason that such land would not be benefited by the reclamation schemes authorized by the legislature.

The ultimate and only question in this respect which it is competent to adjudicate in an action of this character is: Has the assessment been levied as the law prescribes and according to benefits which will result to the land from reclamation works? Viewing, therefore, the testimony presented by the defendants in the light of proof offered as tending to show only the alleged inequality of the assessment levied upon the lands of appellants, all that can be said with regard to it is that its probative force or value constituted a matter purely and entirely for the determination of the trial court. The court found that the amount of the charge levied upon each and every tract of land in said district was proportionate to the whole expense and to the benefits which would result from the said works of reclamation, and with this finding we have discovered no reason, after an examination of the record evidence, justifying interference by this court. This finding simply means that the defendants failed to sustain the burden which rested upon them of rebutting the presumption in favor of the validity of the assessment, and we are unable to declare, as a matter of law, that the trial judge was not justified in so finding. The declaration of counsel that a presumption of law "is an arbitrary rule which does not weigh against evidence taken in opposition thereto" does not harmonize with section 2061, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that jurors are to be instructed "that they are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a less number, or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds." "In this," says the Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 179, 54 Pac. 837, "is a distinct recognition of the facts: (1) That a presumption is evidence; and (2) that it is evidence which may outweigh the positive testimony of the witnesses against it. * * * Against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption has no weight, but, where it is undertaken to prove the fact against the presumption, it still remains with the jury to say whether or not the fact has been proven; and, if they are not satisfied with the proof offered in its support, they are at liberty to accept the evidence of the presumption." (Italics ours.) As we have seen, McRae testified that the land of defendants, as were all the lands in the district, was assessed proportionate to the whole expense of the reclamation works and to the benefits which would accrue to said land therefrom, and, while this statement might be said to be a conclusion of the witness, the testimony thus brought out was by the defendants themselves, they having made McRae their witness, and they, therefore, are bound by his statements. In any event, as already declared, it was for the court to say, after listening to the testimony directly from the witnesses themselves, whether the presumption of the legality of the assessment had been dispelled.

6. Appellants declare that the court erred to their prejudice by refusing to adjourn the trial of the case until they could produce as a witness one Blackmar, who, so alleges the affidavit upon which the motion for the continuance was made, resided on land adjoining that of the defendants for a period of 40 years, and who would have given testimony tending to show that the assessment was not levied in accordance with benefits, "and, in fact, that the defendants' land was not benefited at all by the works of reclamation." It appears that Blackmar had been subpoenaed, but failed to respond to the process, and was not present when his name was called. Opposition to the motion was interposed by the plaintiff on the ground that the testimony of Blackmar would be purely cumulative; a large amount of testimony to the same point having already been introduced.

We do not think the court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the motion for a continuance. We cannot say, as against the judgment of the judge who tried the case upon the facts, that any different result would likely have been attained had Blackmar's testimony been received. It is very probable that, had that witness testified as appellants claim that he would and no different findings deduced by the court from those crystallized into the judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted, this court would be in no better position than it now finds itself to declare that the finding of the trial court against the evidence offered in opposition to the presumption favoring the legality of the assessment was not warranted.

For the reasons expressed in the foregoing, the judgment is affirmed.

WESSLING v. NYE, State Controller.
(Sac. 1,700.)

1. STATES (§ 119*)—PUBLIC FUNDS—APPROPRIATIONS—GIFTS TO INDIVIDUAL.

While under Const. art. 4, § 7, providing that each house of the Legislature shall judge of the qualifications and elections of its members, any expense lawfully incurred by either house in the exercise of this power would be a legitimate charge on its contingent fund, the Legislature cannot reimburse one who has expended money in the preparation of a contest which is not prosecuted before it or any of its committees, there being in such case no contractual relation between the Legislature and those to whom the compensation is due, and such reimbursement would violate Const. art. 4, § 31, prohibiting the making of any gift of public money to individuals by the Legislature.

MELVIN, J. Appellant was elected a member of the assembly of the state of California, and his right to a seat in that body was contested by one Pfaeffle. The election took place on the 6th of November, 1906. The petitioner received his certificate of election from the registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco on November 26, 1906, and Pfaeffle's contest was filed on December 25th of the same year. Testimony with reference to the rights of the parties to the contest was thereafter given before two justices of the peace who had been appointed commissioners according to the requirements of section 275 of the Political Code, and their certificates, with the depositions of the witnesses, having been duly returned through the Secretary of State to the assembly, that body, on March 1, 1907, dismissed the contest on the ground that it had not been inaugurated within the period set by the statute of limitations. Section 274, Pol. Code. Thereafter, the assembly, by resolution, directed the controller to draw his warrant on the treasurer for the sum of $394, payable to Mr. Wessling out of the contingent fund of the assembly, for expenses incurred for attorney's fees, witnesses' fees, mileage, and incidental expenses in said election contest. The controller refused to draw such warrant, and this appellant petitioned the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel compliance with the aforesaid resolution. Respondent's demurrer to the petition was sustained, and this is an appeal from that judgment.

It is conceded by appellant that there is no direct statutory authority for the payment by either branch of the Legislature of the expenses of an election contest; but he insists that the power of the assembly to judge of the qualifications of those asserting the right to membership in that house carries with it the implied authority to expend any sum of money reasonably necessary to the determination of conflicting claims to a seat in that branch of the Legislature. Section 7 of article 4 of the Constitution provides that: "Each house shall choose its officers and judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its members." In our opinion, any expense lawfully incurred by either house in the exercise of the power thus given by the Constitution would be a legitimate charge to be paid out of its contingent fund; but it is here brought to our attention that this contest was not tried before the assembly. That body merely and properly dismissed the proceeding because it had not been instituted within the prescribed time after the issuance of the certificate of election. The real question presented to us is this: May the assembly reimburse one who has paid witnesses' and attorney's fees, costs, and personal expenses, in the preparation for a contest which is not prosecuted before the assembly? In answering this interrogatory it is not necessary to determine whether or not upon a trial of a contested election before the assembly that body might order the payment of the fees of witnesses whose testimony as certified by the commissioners should be used in that proceeding, the personal expenses of the contestee, or the fees of attorneys who might have prepared and presented the case of the contestee, either before the commissioners or the assembly; although it is earnestly submitted by the Attorney General that a legislative committee has no power to employ an attorney, but must seek any required legal advice from his office.

It sufficiently appears upon the face of the petition here considered that no proceedings were had before the assembly or any one of its committees. Therefore no contractual relation between the attorney for Mr. Wessling and the assembly had arisen. In the absence of such contractual relation, we think there was no legal liability upon the assembly to pay for his services, and that any attempt to do so must fail because of the prohibition against gifts of public funds. Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31; Powell v. Phelan, 138 Cal. 273, 72 Pac. 335. The same principles apply with equal force to the items of personal expenses and witnesses' fees.

It may be that the Legislature might by statute provide for the payment by a county, or by the state, of costs in certain election contests. Such laws have existed in other states. See In re Contested Election of O'Neil, 98 Pa. 461. Our Legislature, however, has passed no such law, but, on the contrary, has provided that the fees of officers for duties performed in the preliminary stages of a contested election case shall be paid by the contesting parties. Pol. Code, § 280. And we do not see how any implied duty for reimbursement of a contestee arises from the Constitution, or from the statutes that merely prescribe the procedure in election contests.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Albert G. Burnett, Judge.

Action by Sampson B. Wright against the County of Sonoma. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Transferred from Court of Appeal to Supreme Court in 7 Cal. App. 567, 96 Pac. 333.

T. J. Butts, for appellant. Clarence F. Lea and G. W. Hoyle, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment for defendant and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, in an action to recover the sum of $8,600 for water taken by defendant, by one of its road commissioners, for the purpose of sprinkling a public highway, from a well bored by it in said public highway.

The plaintiff is the life tenant of the land traversed by that portion of said highway on which said well is situated, subject to such rights therein as are possessed by defendant and the public by reason of the fact that the same constitutes a public highway. Defendant took and used water for sprinkling said highway from June 10, 1903, to October 8, 1903, 120 days—and on 52 days, from May 10, 1904, to July 12, 1904. Plaintiff's claim is based solely on the theory that there was an express contract for the payment by defendant to plaintiff of the sum of $50 for each day on which water was taken by it from said well; there being no allegation in the complaint as to the reasonable value of the water taken, or any allegation of damage to plaintiff by reason of such taking. In view of the findings based on evidence without conflict, there can be no dispute as to the facts material on the issue of express contract, and those facts completely disprove the theory of any such contract. About May 27, 1903, defendant's road commissioner commenced the construction of said well, and, the same having been completed, commenced to take water therefrom for the purpose of sprinkling said highway, all without the consent of plaintiff. Plaintiff and others interested in the land, thereupon, on June 10, 1903, notified such road commissioner in writing that he was forbidden to take any water from said well, and that, in case he disregarded such notice, the owners "hereby demand" $50 per day for each and every day on which he removed water in violation of the notice, "as compensation for the taking of said water." The well was bored and the water used for sprinkling purposes, with the knowledge of the board of supervisors of Sonoma county solely under the bona fide claim that the county had the lawful right to so take and use the water. On June 20, 1903, plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of Sonoma county to obtain a decree enjoining said road commissioner from taking said water. On September 22, 1903, the superior court rendered judgment in said cause that plaintiff take nothing by his action. An appeal was taken by plaintiff from said judgment to the Supreme Court, and on May 11, 1904, the Supreme Court rendered a decision holding that defendant had no right to take or use said water, and directing the entry of judgment by the lower court in favor of plaintiff. Wright v. Austin, 143 Cal. 236, 76 Pac. 1023, 65 L. R. A. 949, 101 Am. St. Rep. 97. The road commissioner and law officers of the county had knowledge of this decision within a few days after the opinion was filed, but the remittitur from the Supreme Court was not returned and filed in the clerk's office of Sonoma county until July 11, 1904. There is no claim that any water was taken subsequent to July 12, 1904.

It appears too clear for question that there was no express contract between the parties for the use of this water. There was never any assent on the part of plaintiff to the use by defendant of such water on any terms, and all water taken was taken against the will, and without the consent, of plaintiff. The notice given by plaintiff and his co-owners expressly forbade the use of the water at all. The provision therein to the effect that the owners demand $50 for each and every day on which the notice to refrain from taking water is violated cannot be construed as a proposition to sell water at that rate. It amounted to no more than a notice of the amount of damage that the owners would claim for the taking of the water without their consent. And the taking of the water by defendant under the circumstances shown, even after the decision of the Supreme Court in regard to the relative rights of the parties became known to it, cannot be held to show any acceptance by it of the proposition to sell the water for a specified price. The cases cited by learned counsel for plaintiff in this regard are all cases in which the conduct of the party was such as to afford reasonable evidence of his consent to a proposition theretofore made.

So far as any right to compensation for water actually taken is concerned, which is the only right asserted in this action, as was said by the learned trial judge, "the only claim open to plaintiff was for the reasonable value of the water." No such claim has been asserted; the plaintiff, both in his complaint and throughout the proceeding, relying exclusively on his claim that there was an express contract for $50 for each day on which water was used from said well.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by the General Conference of Free Baptists against T. H. Berkey and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and, from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dudley Kinsell, for appellant. Devlin & Devlin, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Maine, appeals from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The action is one to quiet title to a lot in the city of Sacramento. There were several defendants, all of whom, except the respondent Berkey, disclaimed or suffered default. Berkey answered alleging title in himself, and further setting up certain facts, which, as he claimed, estopped the plaintiff from asserting title adversely to him. The court found in his favor on both defenses. At the trial it was stipulated that on the 1st day of February, 1902, one S. P. Meads was the owner of the property. The plaintiff offered in evidence a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, whereby said Meads, on the last-named date, conveyed the said premises to plaintiff. After introducing a duly certified copy of its character or articles of incorporation, and showing compliance with the requirements of section 405 of the Civil Code, the plaintiff rested. The defendant Berkey offered in evidence a deed bearing date the 14th day of April, 1903, whereby the General Conference of Free Baptists, plaintiff herein, purported to grant, bargain, and sell to T. H. Berkey (the respondent) the property in question. This deed was signed on behalf of the corporation by its president and secretary and bore the corporate seal. Objection to its introduction in evidence was made on the ground that it had not been shown that before the execution of the instrument application for leave to sell the property had been made to or granted by the superior court of the county of Sacramento. The objection was overruled, and plaintiff excepted. This deed, if sufficient to convey title, fully sustains the finding in favor of Berkey's ownership. The appellant makes no point other than that involved in the objection to the admission of the deed which could affect this finding or the judgment based on it. If, then, the deed was properly admitted in evidence, it will be unnecessary to consider whether or not the defense of estoppel was made out.

The plaintiff was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of the state of Maine, approved January 19, 1891 (Priv. & Sp. Laws Me. 1891, p. 3, c. 1). Section 1 of the act provides that Oren B. Cheney, and 26 other persons named, "their associates and successors, are hereby constituted a corporation for religious, missionary, educational and charitable purposes under the name of the General Conference of Free Baptists, and by that name shall have power to prosecute and defend suits at law, to use a common seal and to change the same at pleasure, to take and hold for the objects of said corporation by gift, grant, bequest, purchase or otherwise, any estate, real or personal, or both, the annual income of which shall not exceed one hundred thousand dollars, and to sell and convey any estate, real or personal, or both, which the interests of said corporation may require to be sold and conveyed." Section 593 of the Civil Code of California, a part of title 12, headed "Religious, Social and Benevolent Corporations," authorizes the incorporation of any number of persons, "for any purpose where pecuniary profit is not their object and for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves." Section 598 of the same Code provides that corporations of the character mentioned in section 593 may sell the real property held by them upon obtaining an order for that purpose from the superior court held in the county in which the property is situated. The section provides for the filing of a petition for leave to sell such real estate and the giving of notice by publication of such application. Section 593 deals with the formation of corporations in this state, and section 598, applying by its terms to corporations of the character mentioned in section 593, is intended, so far as its language goes, to refer only to domestic corporations. The sole question, then, is whether the terms of section 598 are made applicable to the plaintiff corporation by the provision of article 12, § 15, of the Constitution of this state, that "no corporation organized outside the limits of this state shall be allowed to transact business within this state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state." Whether this provision is self-executing, or is addressed to the Legislature alone as a prohibition against the passing of laws affirmatively giving superior privileges to foreign corporations, is a question which may be open to doubt. See Uihlein v. Caplice Com'l Co. (Mont.) 102 Pac. 564; First Nat. Bank v. Weidenbeck, 97 Fed. 896, 38 C. C. A. 131; Coler v. Tacoma R. & P. Co., 65 N. J. Eq. 347, 54 Atl. 413, 103 Am. St. Rep. 786. It need not be here decided. For the purposes of this appeal, we shall assume that the constitutional provision is self-executing, and that by its own force it attaches to such transactions of foreign corporations as are within its scope the restrictions imposed upon similar domestic corporations.

It seems clear that the plaintiff herein is a corporation similar in character to those whose creation is authorized by section 593 of the Civil Code. That section authorizes incorporation of persons for any purpose "where pecuniary profit is not their object." The purposes for which the plaintiff was organized are defined in its charter as "religious, missionary, educational and charitable," and the power granted to it to acquire and sell property is a power to be exercised in subordination to the main purposes for which the corporation is created. The act of incorporation does not confer any power to enter into the business of buying and selling property for the purpose of advancing the pecuniary profit of the incorporators. The corporation is therefore, in all essential particulars, similar in character to those described in section 593.

It remains to be considered, then, whether a sale of real estate by such a corporation is a transaction of business by it within the meaning of the constitutional provision above referred to. The phrase "to transact business," as used in this provision, is equivalent to the words "to do business," found in the statutes of many states, prohibiting a foreign corporation from "doing business" in such states until it has filed a certificate designating a place of business and a resident agent upon whom process may be served, or complied with other conditions. See, for example, Civ. Code, §§ 405-408. There have been many decisions construing the words "doing business," under such statutes, and the cases upon the subject are not in harmony. In most jurisdictions it is held that such statutes have reference to a continuation in some form of business, and do not apply where a foreign corporation does a single act of business within the state. 3 Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 846, and cases cited. There are decisions, however, which hold that a foreign corporation may come within the purview of such statutes by the doing of a single act. See, for example, Farrior v. Security Co., 88 Ala. 275, 7 South. 200. But even in the states which announce this doctrine it is held that the single act which will bring the corporation within the purview of the statute must be an act of the ordinary business of the corporation. In the language of the Supreme Court of Alabama: "There must be a doing of some of the works, or an exercise of some of the functions, for which the corporation was created, to bring the case within that clause." Beard v. Union, etc., Co., 71 Ala. 60; Sullivan v. Timber Co., 103 Ala. 371, 15 South. 941, 25 L. R. A. 543. Thus, a statute of this kind has been held not to apply to the soliciting and receiving of subscriptions for a newspaper published in another state, by a corporation organized under the laws of that other state (Beard v. Union, etc., Co., supra), to the care of unused property and payment of taxes thereon (Sullivan v. Timber Co., supra), the owning and leasing of its land in the state for agricultural purposes by a foreign corporation organized for the purpose of mining and selling, handling and manufacturing coke (Missouri Coal & Mining Co. v. Ladd, 160 Mo. 435, 61 S. W. 191), the soliciting by a foreign corporation of subscriptions to its capital stock (Payson v. Withers, 5 Biss. 269, Fed. Cas. No. 10,864), or the making by a foreign corporation within the state of a contract adjusting a judgment debt arising out of business transacted outside the state (Security Co. v. Panhandle National Bank, 93 Tex. 575, 57 S. W. 22).

We think the single sale of property by the plaintiff in the case at bar comes within the principle of the cases last cited. This corporation was certainly not engaged in the business of buying and selling land. As we have said, in another connection, its charter plainly indicates that the power conferred upon it to make such purchase and sale was not granted for the purpose of enabling it to do such acts as a means of making a profit thereon. The buying and selling permitted to it were merely incidental to the carrying on of the main purposes of the corporation. A distinction is to be drawn between the purposes of a corporation and its powers (Floyd v. Perrin, 30 S. C. 1, 12, 8 S. E. 14, 2 L. R. A. 242). The purposes of the plaintiff, as defined in the articles of incorporation, are "religious, missionary, educational and charitable." As incidental to these purposes, it is granted a variety of powers, i. e., the power to prosecute and defend suits at law, the power to use a common seal, the power to take and hold for the objects of said corporation any real or personal property, and the power to sell and convey any estate which the interests of the corporation may require to be sold and conveyed. All of these powers are to be exercised in subordination to the main purposes as first declared. The purchase and sale of property by such a corporation is not one of the ends for which it is organized, but is merely a means to enable it to accomplish those ends. Property is to be acquired only for the objects of the corporation, and to be sold only when the interests of the corporation require such sale. The power to sell property by a corporation of this character is as purely incidental to the prosecution of its main purposes as are the other powers enumerated in the charter, as, for example, the power to prosecute and defend suits at law. It is quite generally held that the mere prosecuting or defending of suits by a foreign corporation is not "doing business," within the meaning of statutes of the kind we have been discussing. Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, § 860; Uteley v. Clark-Gardner Lode Mining Co., 4 Colo. 369; Mandel v. Swan Land Co., 154 Ill. 177, 40 N. E. 462, 27 L. R. A. 313, 45 Am. St. Rep. 124; Ware Cattle Co. v. Anderson, 107 Iowa, 231, 77 N. W. 1026; M. B. Faxon

Co. v. Lovett, 60 N. J. Law, 128, 36 Atl. 692.

If the construction we have put upon the charter of the plaintiff be correct, it must be held that the sale by such corporation of real estate is not the "transacting of business" by it, within the meaning of the constitutional provision relied upon. It follows therefore that the objection to the admission in evidence of the deed to Berkey was properly overruled.

In the foregoing discussion we have assumed that article 12, § 15, of the Constitution, applies to all corporations, including those organized for purely religious or eleemosynary purposes. Under the views above expressed, it is unnecessary to resolve any doubt that may exist on this point.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. The opinion of the court assumes that the conveyance of this land was the only business ever transacted in this state by the plaintiff corporation. The evidence does not show that this is true, and it does not appear from the record that any contention to that effect was presented to the court below. If such claim had been made, it is probable that the plaintiff could have shown that, in the accomplishment of its purposes in this state, it often advanced money to pay the price of lots upon which churches were to be built, took the title in trust for the local congregation, to be reconveyed as soon as the money advanced was repaid, precisely as it did in this case, and that this was only one of many similar transactions. The evidence indicates that the plaintiff was accustomed to do this, though no other specific instances were proven, and that, so far as it may be said to do business at all, business of this kind, and the obtaining of money therefor, constituted its principal occupation.

If the opinion had been based on the ground that benevolent enterprises of this character are not within the meaning of the constitutional provision that a foreign corporation may not "transact business" in this state on more favorable terms than domestic corporations, and that that provision referred only to corporations for gain, I should not be disposed to differ with my associates; but, as the opinion does not discuss this question, I express no opinion concerning it.

SOUSA v. LUCAS et al. (L. A. 2,157.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 18, 1909.)

ATTACHMENT (§ 164*)—CHattel MORTGAGES (§ 170*)—MORTGAGED PROPERTY—TENDER OF DEBT DUE.

Civ. Code, §§ 2968, 2969, providing that mortgaged chattels may be taken under attachment by a creditor of a mortgagor on payment or tender to the mortgagee of the amount of the mortgage debt, etc., authorize an attachment only after payment or tender of the amount of the debt, and an attachment levied without first paying or tendering the debt is invalid, and is as against the mortgagee a conversion, though the officer merely puts a keeper in charge.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by A. J. Sousa against Frank G. Lucas and others. There was a judgment of the Court of Appeal (100 Pac. 115) affirming a judgment for plaintiff, and the Supreme Court ordered the cause transferred to it for determination. Affirmed.

C. P. Kaetzel and R. V. Bouldin, for appellants. C. N. Armstrong and Paul M. Gregg, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The appeal in this case was first considered by the District Court of Appeal in and for the Second Appellate District, and the judgment and order appealed from were there affirmed upon the grounds stated in the following opinion:

"Appeal by defendants Sinsheimer Bros. and McFadden from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial.

"The complaint was one for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage theretofore given upon a growing crop of hay, barley, and beans by defendant Lucas to plaintiff as security for a note of $600 and such other sums of money as might thereafter be loaned or advanced, or merchandise sold to or for account of said mortgagor during the continuance of the mortgage, not to exceed $1,000 exclusive of the amount mentioned in the promissory note. The complaint alleges facts showing the due execution of the mortgage, the affidavit required by statute, and its recordation. Further, that a part of the growing crop, to wit, the beans, while on the premises where grown, was seized by defendant McFadden as sheriff in a certain attachment proceeding instituted against Lucas by Sinsheimer Bros., and the beans which had been thrashed and upon the ground were seized by the sheriff without tender to the mortgagee of the amount of the mortgage, or by deposit with the county clerk or treasurer of the amount as provided by section 2969, Civ. Code. It is further alleged that defendants Sinsheimer Bros. and McFadden still retain possession of said beans, and claim some interest in said mortgaged property under such attachment, which claim is subsequent and subordinate to plaintiff's claim under the mortgage. It is alleged that certain advances, aggregating $372.73, have been made by plaintiff to Lucas under the terms of said mortgage, and that the note and the advances remain unpaid. The usual prayer for relief is found. Defendant demurred to the complaint generally and because of a misjoinder of causes of action, which demurrer was overruled. The defendants who appeal filed a joint answer denying specifically most of the allegations of the complaint, admitting, however, the seizure of the crop of beans under the writ and that they claim an interest therein, but allege that the same is superior in right to the mortgage. The court found all of the allegations of the complaint to be true, except as to the amounts unpaid; that the mortgage was made in good faith without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors; that the claim of lien under the attachment was subordinate to the mortgage, and directed a sale of the property described in the mortgage, which included the beans, and the application of the proceeds so far as required to the payment of the judgment and costs.

"It is appellants' contention that the complaint is insufficient in that facts are not stated to entitle plaintiff to any relief, and, further, that there was a misjoinder of an action to foreclose with an action for conversion of the property mortgaged. With this we do not agree. The complaint sets out such a mortgage as under the laws of this state may be executed and enforced. The default which entitled plaintiff to a decree, and the subordinate character of the claim of the other defendants are made to appear. The mere fact that the sheriff, in violation of section 2969, Civ. Code, attempted to levy and remove a part of the property from the premises where it was raised, did not impair plaintiff's right to foreclose. It is true that such wrongful act upon the part of the sheriff would render him liable as in conversion, but plaintiff may nevertheless elect to pursue the remedy in equity guaranteed by section 2967, Civ. Code, when it is made to appear that the judgment and decree of the court in such foreclosure can be carried into effect. There is nothing in the complaint indicating an attempt upon the part of plaintiff to enforce any right against the sheriff for the conversion, nor allegations which would warrant a judgment against him for the value of the property taken. The levy of the writ of attachment, under the circumstances of the case, placed the sheriff and the creditor for whom he was acting in no better position than that which would be occupied by any other trespasser who might surreptitiously remove from the premises a portion of a crop covered by a chattel mortgage. The tortious removal from the premises where raised does not impair the mortgagee's right. Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 183, 26 Pac. 626. Proceedings by attachment are statutory and special, and the provisions of the statute must be strictly followed or no rights will be acquired thereunder. Gow v. Marshall, 90 Cal. 567, 27 Pac. 422. The provisions of the statute which require the tender of payment into the hands of the county clerk or treasurer of the amount of the debt secured by chattel mortgage before levy can be made measures the power of the officer in effecting a legal attachment. When these conditions are not observed, the writ affords no justification, and the officer becomes a wrongdoer. Neither the sheriff nor the judgment creditor by such attachment acquired any lien upon the property. Appellants, then, having no lien or legal right to the property in controversy in this proceeding, the action of the court in allowing certain advances to be charged was a matter which did not concern appellants as parties to the proceedings, and of which they cannot be heard to complain upon this appeal.

"It is further urged by appellants that there was a material variance in the proof, in that the note offered in evidence was not the same note set out in the complaint or in the chattel mortgage for the reason that the note offered in evidence bore the signature of Emelia Lucas, the wife of Frank G. Lucas, in addition to that of the husband. It will be observed, however, that the answer admits the execution of the mortgage as described in said complaint, which mortgage describes the note which the court finds was executed. While it may be true that the wife subsequent to its execution signed the note as surety, such signing would have no effect, there being no pretense of any consideration going to the wife on account of the same; and, in any event, the additional name of the wife on the note after the execution of the mortgage, the alteration not being material, would not affect or impair the lien of the mortgage, nor affect the right of the plaintiff in seeking relief by foreclosure of the mortgage to proceed only against the principal and the property covered by the mortgage.

"The court properly denied the motion for nonsuit and rendered a proper decree in the premises." (App.) 100 P. 115.

Upon application of the appellants, an order was made by this court transferring the cause here for determination. The point which we desired to consider further was whether or not a creditor who causes personal property, subject to a valid mortgage, to be attached without compliance with the requirements of Civ. Code, § 2969, acquires by the levy of the writ a valid lien, subordinate only to the lien of the mortgage. If this question be answered in the affirmative, it is apparent that the appellant Sinsheimer Bros., as junior lienor, was entitled to have the plaintiff limited to the recovery of such advances as he had made under his mortgage prior to the receipt of actual notice of the vesting of the junior lien. Tapia v. Demartini, 77 Cal. 383, 387, 19 Pac. 641, 11 Am.

St. Rep. 288. Upon fuller consideration, we are satisfied with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal upon this point, as upon others discussed by it. Section 2968 of the Civil Code provides that "personal property mortgaged may be taken under attachment or execution issued at the suit of a creditor of the mortgagor." The following section, entitled "Limitations on right of levy," provides that, "before the property is so taken, the officer must pay or tender to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt and interest, or must deposit the amount thereof with the county clerk or treasurer, payable to the order of the mortgagee." The two sections are obviously to be read together, and, so read, they provide that the right to attach mortgaged personal property is to be exercised only after compliance with the condition of payment, tender, or deposit of the amount of the mortgage debt. The natural conclusion would seem to be that drawn by the district court of appeal, namely, that the provisions of the statute requiring tender or payment measure the power of the officer in effecting a legal attachment, and that, without compliance with these requirements, no lien is created by the attempted levy.

To hold that a levy made without first paying or tendering payment of the amount of the mortgage debt creates a valid lien subject to the mortgage debt necessarily involves the proposition that such levy is a valid and lawful seizure of all the mortgagor's interest in the property. The property would, on this theory, be held by the sheriff, subject to the mortgagee's right to enforce his lien against the attaching creditor and the sheriff, to the same extent as he could have enforced it against the mortgagor. The levy would operate only upon the mortgagor's interest, leaving the rights of the mortgagee unaffected. If the levy of an attachment, such as that in the case at bar, creates a valid lien upon the interest remaining in the mortgagor, it is difficult to see how such levy can constitute any invasion of the mortgagee's rights. It has, however, been held by this court that an attachment so levied is, as against the mortgagee, a conversion of the property upon the part of the sheriff (Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 550; Irwin v. McDowell, 91 Cal. 119, 27 Pac. 601), and this is so, even though the sheriff merely puts a keeper in charge and does not move or otherwise disturb the property (Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127). These cases, deciding that the levy of the writ confers an immediate right of action upon the mortgagee, necessarily decide that the levy is in itself unlawful. This doctrine cannot be reconciled with the view that such levy is a valid seizure of the interest remaining in the mortgagor or creates any lien whatever.

For these reasons, as well as those stated in the opinion of the district court of appeal, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1151*)—APPEAL—CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

The granting or refusing of an application for a continuance in a criminal case is discretionary with the trial court, whose ruling in the absence of abuse will not be considered on appeal.

10. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*)—INFORMATION—VARIANCE.

Where defendant drew a check payable to "Lesser Bros. Co.," in their place of business, and delivered it to one of the firm who cashed it, he having no funds in the bank upon which it was drawn, it was immaterial whether he knew that the concern was a corporation or not, as he intended to defraud the party named in either case, so that there was no material variance between the information, alleging the corporate capacity of Lesser Bros. Co., and the evidence even if such corporate capacity was not shown.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1141*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PRESUMPTION.

Where the minutes of the court and bill of exceptions failed to show whether the trial court had or had not complied with Pen. Code, § 1066, providing that where a juror is called the defendant must be informed that if he intends to challenge he must do so when the juror appears and before he is sworn, it will not be assumed on appeal that the trial court failed to so inform defendant, it being incumbent upon appellant to affirmatively show error, in the absence of which it will be presumed the court did what was required by statute.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1141*)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTION.

Under a statute requiring the clerk to keep minutes of the proceedings in a criminal case but not definitely prescribing what the minutes shall contain except in certain cases, there being no express provision that he shall

Pen. Code, § 476a, providing that every person who willfully, with intent to defraud, draws a check on a bank, banker or depository for the payment of money knowing that he has not sufficient funds for its payment upon presentation, shall be punished, etc., is uniform and applies alike to all persons who violate it and is not unconstitutional as special legislation because not applicable to those who draw checks upon persons not named in the statute.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Henry A. Melvin, Judge.

J. H. Russell was convicted of obtaining money on his check on a depository, where he knew he had no funds, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Louis P. Boardman, Philip M. Walsh, and Carroll Cook, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was convicted upon an information the charging part of which was as follows: "The said J. H. Russell prior to the time of filing this information, and on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1907, at the said county of Alameda, state of California, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, fraudulently, feloniously, and with intent to defraud Lesser Bros. Co. (a corporation), make, draw, and utter a certain check and draft on a bank and depository, to wit, the Union Trust Company of San Francisco, for the payment of money, which said check and draft was and is in words and figures following, to wit: 'San Francisco, June 22, 1907. No. 11. Union Trust Company of San Francisco. Pay to the order of Lesser Bros. Co. $20.00. Twenty ——— dollars. Clearing House No. 16. J. H. Russell.' Whereas in truth and in fact the said J. H. Russell then and there at the time he made, drew, and uttered said check and draft, as aforesaid, did not have sufficient funds in, nor any funds at all, nor sufficient credit with, nor any credit at all with, said Union Trust Company of San Francisco, to meet such check and draft as aforesaid, in full, or at all, upon its presentation. And he, the said J. H. Russell, then and there well knew at the time he made, drew and uttered said check and draft, as aforesaid, that he, the said J. H. Russell, did not have sufficient funds in, nor at all, nor sufficient credit with, nor any credit at all, with said Union Trust Company of San Francisco, to meet such check and draft, as aforesaid, in full or at all upon its presentation." He appeals from the judgment pronounced on such conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The offense charged in the information is defined by section 476a of the Penal Code as follows: "Every person who, willfully, with intent to defraud, makes or draws, or utters, or delivers to another person any check or draft on a bank, banker or depository for the payment of money, knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering or delivery, that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank, banker or depository to meet such check or draft in full upon its presentation, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year nor more than fourteen years. The word 'credit' as used herein shall be construed to be an arrangement or understanding with the bank or depository for the payment of such check or draft."

1. There is no force whatever in the claim that the information was in any way substantially defective. Defendant strenuously urges that there is a material variance on the face of the information, in that the allegation is that the check was made and uttered "with intent to defraud Lesser Bros. Co. (a corporation)," while the check set forth in the information showed that it was payable to the order of "Lesser Bros. Co." simply, with no mention of its corporate character, and that there is no allegation elsewhere that the "Lesser Bros. Co." mentioned in the check is the corporation before mentioned. It is objected that for this reason, the information was not certain and definite enough to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended to be charged in this regard, an intent to defraud Lesser Bros. Co., a corporation, or some other Lesser Bros. Co. This objection appears to us to be unworthy of discussion. The allegation is positive and unequivocal that the check was made and uttered with intent to defraud "Lesser Bros. Co., a corporation," and there is nothing in the check with which the offense is alleged to have been committed inconsistent with this allegation, or detracting from its force in the slightest degree. It certainly cannot be claimed with any show of reason that the check as set forth was not "available to accomplish the fraud intended," which defendant's counsel insists must be shown by the information. It is claimed that the information is defective, in that it does not allege that Lesser Bros. Co. is a corporation. This point was not specially made in the demurrer, the demurrer in fact proceeding upon the theory that it was so alleged, and that herein was the variance between the allegation and the check. Assuming such an allegation to be essential to a proper description of the party intended to be defrauded, it was sufficiently made in the information, at least in the absence of special objection on that ground in the demurrer. There can be no doubt that defendant was clearly apprised by the information of the corporate character of the party whom he was alleged to have intended to defraud. See Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Carle, 133 Cal. 409, 411, 65 Pac. 951. It is claimed that the information fails to state a public offense, in that, while it alleges that defendant did make, draw, and utter a check, it does not specify the person to whom the check was delivered or attempted to be delivered. The argument of the defendant in this behalf goes rather to the question of uncertainty in the information than to its failure to state a public offense, and the point that it was uncertain in this regard was not specially made by demurrer. We are satisfied that the uncertainty was not of such a nature that it can be taken advantage of upon appeal in the absence of a specification in the demurrer, especially where the demurrer did specifically state the matters as to which he claimed uncertainty. People v. Bradbury (Cal.) 103 Pac. 215. The information clearly stated a public offense. The allegation that he uttered the check, taken in connection with the other allegations, means that with intent to defraud Lesser Bros. Co., a corporation, he asserted by words or actions to another that the check was good for what it called for, and attempted to pass the same as such a valid check. See People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 503, 509; People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 410, 56 Pac. 44. What we have said disposes in effect of all the contentions made against the information.

2. It is claimed that the trial court erred in refusing to grant a continuance upon the application of defendant. On October 29, 1907, the case was set for trial on December 30, 1907; the defendant personally requesting that it be set for some time in December. At the time so fixed the case was called. Defendant said he was not ready for trial because his attorney was not present, but was in Seattle, where he had been trying a case for some weeks. This attorney had represented defendant up to this point. No continuance had previously been requested, or any intimation made that one would be asked by defendant, and a jury was present for the trial, as well as the prosecution and its witnesses. There was nothing, according to the showing made, to warrant the assumption that the case would not be tried at the time set. The trial court was not required to indefinitely wait for the return of defendant's counsel before proceeding with the trial. We can conceive of such a showing in regard to the inability of counsel selected by a defendant to be present as would make it an abuse of discretion for a court to refuse to wait a reasonable time for such counsel, but such a showing was not made here, either at the time of the application for a continuance or subsequently on motion for new trial, where the affidavits in that regard were carefully prepared by counsel. There was no request on the part of defendant that he be given time to obtain other counsel, and no intimation on his part that he was not ready to proceed with the trial in any other respect, except that he wished to get a deposition from a witness in the East, whose whereabouts were absolutely unknown, and, so far as appeared, never would be ascertained. The trial court stated to the defendant that he would appoint counsel for him, but defendant practically declined to avail himself of this offer, insisting that his original attorney should be present, and he subsequently conducted his own defense. Defendant would have had counsel designated to assist him in his defense if he had availed himself of the offer of the court, and doubtless, if counsel so designated had found a reasonable continuance necessary to enable a proper presentation of defendant's cause, the trial court would have granted it. Defendant cannot now complain that he was not represented by counsel; that fact being due entirely to the further fact that he declined to accept the offer of the court in regard thereto. Of course, there was nothing in the claim that a continuance should be granted to enable defendant to obtain the deposition of an alleged witness as to whose whereabouts nobody had any knowledge, and concerning whom there was no apparent probability that any knowledge would ever be obtained. An application for a continuance in a criminal case is a matter in which much is left to the discretion of the trial court, and it cannot be here held that there was any abuse of that discretion.

3. There was no variance between the charge in the information and proof, and the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict. The testimony given was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that defendant intended to defraud "Lesser Bros. Co." According to the evidence, he himself drew the check payable to "Lesser Bros. Co." in their place of business, and there delivered it to Mr. Lesser in return for $20. Whether he in fact knew that the party so named was a corporation was immaterial. He intended to defraud that party, whether it was a corporation or not. The evidence was also sufficient to warrant the jury in concluding that the defendant knew that he had no funds in or credit with the Union Trust Company to meet the check upon its presentation. There was also sufficient proof to support a conclusion that Lesser Bros. Co. was a corporation.

4. An examination of the record fails to disclose that there was any error in the matter of the cross-examination of the defendant as a witness, or in the instructions given by the court to the jury, or that there was any abuse of discretion in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

5. Neither the minutes of the court nor the bill of exceptions, prepared by defendant's original attorney, affirmatively shows that the trial court complied with the provisions of section 1066, Pen. Code, which is as follows: "Before a juror is called, the defendant must be informed by the court, or under its direction, that, if he intends to challenge an individual juror, he must do so when the juror appears and before he is sworn." Neither does it appear therefrom that the court did not do so. Both minutes and bill of exceptions are absolutely silent in regard thereto. It does not appear that defendant exercised the right of challenge as to any juror. As to this also, there was complete silence in both minutes and bill of exceptions. It is contended that it must be assumed that the trial court did not comply with this provision of law, and that its failure to do so when a defendant is not represented by counsel and is not aware of his rights must be held to be prejudicial error. This point does not appear to have been made until after a decision was given in this case by the District Court of Appeal for the First District, when a rehearing was asked in that court by reason thereof. The rehearing was granted, and, the justices of that court disagreeing upon this question, the case was certified to this court for decision. We shall not discuss the latter portion of the claim made in this behalf, for we are satisfied that it should not be assumed on the record before us that the trial court did fail to comply with the requirements of section 1066, Pen. Code. It is too well settled in this state to require the citation of authorities that, where an appellant alleges error, it is incumbent upon him to show it affirmatively, and that we will not presume that a trial judge failed to do what the law required him to do, but, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, will presume that he did what he was directed by statute to do. We can conceive of no good reason why this general rule is not applicable here. The claim appears to be that, if the minutes of the court do not affirmatively show such compliance, a sufficient showing of noncompliance is made. While the law requires the clerk to keep minutes of the proceedings in a criminal case, it nowhere provides in terms that he must enter thereon such an occurrence as this, the mere making of a statement by the court to the defendant for the purpose of informing him when he must make his objection to any juror. Our statutes do not definitely prescribe what the minutes shall contain except in certain cases. For instance, it is provided that a ruling on demurrer (section 1007, Pen. Code), the plea of a defendant (section 1017, Pen. Code), the ruling of the court on a challenge to a juror (section 1083, Pen. Code), the verdict of a jury (section 1164, Pen. Code), and the judgment (section 1207, Pen. Code) must be so entered. These are only instances of various things that the Penal Code expressly requires must be recorded in the minutes. There is no such provision as to the matter covered by section 1066, Pen. Code, and, in the absence of any such express requirement practically making the minutes evidence of the thing, we do not think that the failure of the minutes to indicate action by the trial court affords any evidence of failure to act as against the well-settled presumption we have already referred to. In the case of People v. Yee Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 89 Pac. 450, in which a rehearing was denied by this court, it was expressly held that where the record failed to show whether the court admonished the jury at each adjournment, as required by section 1122, Penal Code, it will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the court did its duty, and gave the proper admonition at each adjournment. In People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 449, 50 Pac. 675, the minutes failed to show that the defendants were present when the verdict was rendered, as required by section 1148, Pen. Code, and it was held that error would not be presumed, and that, if the defendants were in fact absent, it should have been made to appear affirmatively in the record. See, also, People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 1, 4, 34 Pac. 490. We are satisfied that these cases must be held to state the correct rule, at least as to matters not expressly required by statute to be entered on the minutes.

People v. Moore, 103 Cal. 508, 37 Pac. 510, is, in effect, clearly against the conclusion we have reached. It is impossible, in our judgment, to distinguish this case from that so far as the material facts are concerned. In People v. Moore, the minutes were silent upon the matter of a compliance by the court with the provisions of section 1066, Pen. Code, and there was no bill of exceptions. This being the situation, the case was assumed to be one in which the trial court had in fact failed to give the defendant the information required by the section. For that reason, the judgment was reversed. The court stated no reason for so assuming, nor did it discuss at all the question whether the minutes must make any showing in regard to the matter, and apparently the well-settled presumption in favor of the action of the court below was not invoked at all, nor brought to the attention of the court. We are satisfied for the reasons we have stated that this decision should not be followed. The error therein lies in the assumption on the facts stated that the court failed to comply with the provisions of the law; there being no affirmative showing to that effect. It is clear in view of the fact that this defendant made no point in this regard until after the decision by the District Court of Appeal, that he had no complaint to make on this ground at the time of the preparation of his bill of exceptions, and that consequently no reliance was placed on the decision in People v. Moore, supra, in making up the record on appeal. There is, therefore, no unfairness to him in now overruling that decision.

6. We are satisfied that the objection that section 476a is unconstitutional, in that it is special legislation, is not well founded. Learned counsel for defendant appears to construe the word "banker" contained therein as merely descriptio personæ, saying that there is no good reason warranting a classification that makes it a felony to draw an order for the payment of money on an individual who is engaged in the banking business as one branch of his financial ventures, while it is not a felony to draw such an order on an individual who does not happen to be engaged in the banking business at all. This, of course, is not the proper construction of the word as used in the section. An order drawn on "John Smith" personally would not be within the purview of the section, unless he was conducting a banking business in his own name. The check or draft must, in effect, be drawn on a banker as such. The majority of the justices of the District Court of Appeal said upon this point, in the opinion certified to us: "The intent of the Legislature evidently was to make it a crime to draw and utter a draft or check upon a bank or depository for the payment of money, for the reason that such drafts or checks are not usually drawn unless the drawer has funds in such bank or with such depository to meet the check or draft. Such check or draft, drawn upon such banker or depository for the payment of money, is regarded somewhat in the nature of a circulating medium. It is generally supposed, when the check is drawn upon a bank, that the drawer has funds in such bank to meet it. It was to prevent the fraudulent making and uttering of such drafts or checks that the section was enacted. The act applies to the whole class of persons who draw and utter checks or drafts, with intent to defraud, upon the persons named in the section. It is uniform, and applies alike to all persons who willfully violate it. The defendant cannot complain because persons who draw drafts or checks upon persons other than those named in the statute are not made subject to its provisions." In this we concur.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 678*)—TRIAL—ELECTION BETWEEN OFFENSES.

The selection on a prosecution for statutory rape, under an information charging its commission on or about January 15th, of the particular offense for which defendant should be tried, was sufficient, being in the statement of the court to the district attorney: "The act you select is the first act of sexual intercourse between these parties, and you claim it occurred in the latter part of January, or the first part of February, and prior to February 20th, * * * and you admit that there were one or two subsequent acts at about that date, prior to February 20th."

TAGGART, J. Information for rape of female child under the age of 16. Verdict of guilty and sentence of 20 years in state prison. Appeal from judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The crime is charged in the information to have been committed on or about the 15th day of January, 1906. The district attorney in his opening statement said that he would prove that the defendant had intercourse with the prosecutrix once in January, 1906, and twice in the month of February prior to the 20th of that month, whereupon the defendant moved the court to require the district attorney to select the date or particular act as to which he would ask a conviction. The motion being granted, the district attorney declared that he would stand upon the act of sexual intercourse which would fasten upon the defendant the paternity of a child of which the prosecutrix was delivered June 9, 1907. A more specific selection being demanded, the district attorney then stated that he would stand upon the first act proved, and, upon further objection, made his selection in the following language: "The prosecution will stand upon the first act of sexual intercourse which they claim that the defendant had with the prosecuting witness, and which act occurred some time either during the month of January, or during the month of February, up to the 20th of February of the year 1906; it being the first act of intercourse claimed to have taken place between the prosecutrix and the defendant." This selection was still objected to, and it is now urged was not sufficiently specific to enable the defendant to know which act was selected as the basis of the prosecution. If the selection or election rested upon the above, we might be disposed to sustain the appellant's contention that it was insufficient, but, after the formal election by the district attorney above mentioned, the court said: "The act you select is the first act of sexual intercourse between these parties, and you claim it occurred in the latter part of January or the first part of February and prior to the 20th day of February, * * * and you admit that there were two subsequent acts at about that date, prior to the 20th day of February." To which the district attorney replied: "One or two. I don't know." Accepting the language of the court as the selection of the one specific offense for the commission of which the defendant was to be put upon trial, we think it comes within the requirements prescribed in People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323.

The language of Justice Temple on page 166 of 133 Cal., and page 323 of 65 Pac., of the opinion in that case, is applicable to and meets the presentation of the appeal here upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. If the evidence of the prosecuting witness is entitled to credence, the case was established, and the verdict a proper one. The credibility of the witnesses was for the jury, in the first instance, subject to review by the trial court upon the motion for a new trial, and no question of this kind can be considered by this court. While the attorney for defendant was arguing the case before the jury, it was suggested to the court that the Governor had declared the day (October 30, 1907) to be a legal holiday. This was followed by other proclamations creating a series of holidays lasting until December 2, 1907, and during this period the jurors were not put in charge of an officer, but were allowed to separate and go about their respective occupations. It is contended this was error. It is not necessary to pass upon this question, as the record discloses that the defendant consented to the various adjournments of the case between the dates named, and, in the absence of any affirmative showing of injury or prejudice from an irregularity to which a defendant has consented, it cannot be regarded as ground for a new trial. Whether or not one of the jurors was guilty of misconduct depended upon the truth of the affidavits presented to the trial court on the motion for a new trial. The affidavits filed by the respective parties were conflicting and the finding made by the trial court upon the question of fact will not be disturbed. While the trial court ought not, except there be special reasons therefor, to permit the re-examination on rebuttal of the prosecutrix upon matters about which she was examined in chief, this matter rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed unless a clear case of abuse is shown. Such a showing is not made here. People v. Rigby, 104 Pac. 840.

In respect to the admission of evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse, it was said in People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 12, 65 Pac. 13, in the majority opinion, that those occurring both before and after the principal act charged may be introduced in evidence as tending to sustain the main allegation. This was affirmed in People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 168, 65 Pac. 323, where Temple, J., says other like offenses may be shown to prove that the parties are lewdly inclined, and that the barriers of modesty have been broken down with reference to each other—not primarily to prove habitual or continuous criminality or other offenses. And again, in People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 624, 76 Pac. 501, Lorigan, J., after laying down the rule that acts occurring both before and subsequent to the act constituting the crime charged may be admitted, adds: "Not to prove distinct offenses, or continuous criminality, but as corroborative evidence tending to support the one specific offense for which the defendant is being tried." While all the authorities relied upon in support of this rule limit the application to cases involving intercourse by consent, it is nevertheless held applicable in this state in the case of statutory rape of a child under the age of consent. People v. Mathews, 139 Cal. 527, 73 Pac. 416. The evidence introduced here took an exceedingly wide range in this regard; the trial becoming, in effect, a trial of the issue suggested by the act first selected by the district attorney, to wit, the one resulting in prosecutrix's pregnancy. The examination as to this act stopped only with the question: "Who is the father of that child?" While proof of pregnancy of a child under the age of consent has been held to be evidence that the statutory crime of rape has been committed, it has never been held admissible, so far as we are aware, except it tends to prove the corpus delicti. People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 62, 46 Pac. 896. That was not the case here. We know of no case extending the rule declared in People v. Castro, supra, to include the right of the district attorney to produce and exhibit before the jury a child born of some one of the collateral acts of intercourse six or more months removed from the act constituting the offense. The error, however, if any, committed by the introduction of this kind of testimony was rendered harmless by the admissions of the defendant in open court to the same effect.

While an objection to each of the two direct questions propounded to the prosecutrix as to who was the father of the child born to her on June 9, 1907, was sustained, the district attorney was permitted to ask the prosecutrix over the objection of defendant: "Now, from the time that you had this act of sexual intercourse with your Uncle Dave which you say you told Ross Soto (defendant) about until you had this child on June 9th last, had you had sexual intercourse with anybody else besides the defendant?" To which she replied: "No sir." In line with this a series of questions were propounded to the prosecutrix as to her comparative liking for the defendant and her Uncle Dave (it being admitted that the prosecutrix had intercourse with the latter prior to the date of her intercourse with defendant), with a view of further strengthening the foregoing statement as to the paternity of the child. Some of these were: "Did you like him (defendant) up to the time that you had left in November?" "Did you like your Uncle Dave at that time?" "Now which one did you like better at that time, Josie, your Uncle Dave or the defendant?" "You think a great deal of him (defendant)?" "How long did you continue to think a great deal of him? A. Till he got me in the family way." If the instructions of the trial court had not been so full and complete in this regard, it would be difficult not to adopt the view of appellant that the jury was misled by the persistent efforts of the district attorney to secure a conviction upon the act which resulted in the conception of the child born June 9, 1907, notwithstanding another act was selected by the court and such selection assented to by the district attorney. Unquestionably the act alleged in the information, by the manner of conducting the case, was rendered less important than the matter of the paternity of the child, and the latter was urged upon the jury as if this were the matter for determination. This course of the district attorney is not to be commended, but as the jury were instructed by the court that they must, in arriving at a verdict, confine themselves to the one act selected, the one taking place between January 15, 1906, and the 20th day of February, 1906, and that they must acquit the defendant if they were not satisfied of the commission of this act, notwithstanding they were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt as to his having had illicit relations with the prosecutrix at some subsequent date. We must assume the jury obeyed the court's instructions in this respect.

As hereinabove stated, the examination took a wide range. This was true as to the questions of the people, and also those propounded on behalf of defendant. While demand was made by defendant for the selection of a particular act as the basis of a conviction, the testimony of both parties with respect to the continued relations between the defendant and the prosecutrix was introduced as if the offense were laid with a continuando. Equally unlimited was the examination as to the relations of the prosecutrix with her uncle and her statements in respect to those relations; and in the same manner the relations of defendant with his wife were inquired into by the district attorney, both on the cross-examination of the wife and the cross-examination of the defendant. We are not prepared to say that these questions were not cross-examination, and, in so far as they were immaterial, or irrelevant, or incompetent, the manner of conducting the case relieved the evidence elicited by them from any harmful effect.

Recognizing the rule that each of the acts between the defendant and the prosecutrix constituted a separate and distinct offense for which he may be prosecuted, the instructions given by the court were so worded that the conviction in this case could not be predicated upon any act but that selected by the court, with the district attorney's assent, and, had he been acquitted, there would have been no doubt as to which act was covered by such an acquittal. While under our system of pleading one particular act or some special time is required to be selected for the purpose of a conviction in cases of this character, the records in this court disclose that this offense, the debauching of a child, is frequently accompanied by a series of acts of sexual intercourse, and the punishment for this most infamous crime ought not to be made to hang upon a technical application of the rules of pleading and evidence, where the only question is which one of innumerable acts was selected by the district attorney as the basis of the prosecution.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KWPR SINGH. (Cr. 103.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 1, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 938*) — NEW TRIAL — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

One moving for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence must make a clear showing of diligence, and of the truth and materiality of such evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2306; Dec. Dig. § 938.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*)—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

The ruling of the trial court on a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3067-3071; Dec. Dig. § 1156.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 938*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

On a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, the same, as shown in the affidavits, was material and important, and defendant made a prima facie showing of diligence, but by counter affidavits it appeared that the witnesses were during the whole period within a short distance of the city where the trial was held; that defendant was at all times represented by counsel with whom he had frequent interviews, and while preparing for his trial was on different occasions visited by his countrymen who spoke his language; and that an interpreter was present to aid him in his communications with his counsel, and that the evidence was merely cumulative. Held, that there was no abuse of discretion in denying the motion.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*) — TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

Accused requested an instruction that every fact relied on by the state must be proved beyond all reasonable doubt, and that, if the jury were not satisfied beyond such a doubt that every fact had been proven, they should acquit, and that all the facts must be proved conclusively in their nature tending to the conclusion with moral certainty that defendant, and no other, committed the crime, and that, if from the evidence or want of it the jury could account for the facts in evidence upon any theory consistent with innocence, they should acquit. The instructions were refused, but the court charged that, in case of a reasonable doubt as to one of the facts essential to establish guilt, the jury should acquit, and that the presumption of innocence attached to every fact essential to a conviction, and remained with defendant until the jury were convinced of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Held, that there was no error in refusing the requests; the substance of the requested charge being covered by that given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Kwpr Singh was convicted of a criminal offense, and he appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Chamberlain and W. H. Slade, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Only two points are made by appellant in furtherance of his contention that the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial should be reversed. The first relates to newly discovered evidence, and the second to two instructions requested by him and refused by the court. The considerations to be observed in reviewing the action of the trial judge in declining to accord to the affidavits submitted by appellant the significance asserted for them are so familiar as hardly to need restatement. It is admitted that the general rule is as stated in Tibbet v. Sue, 125 Cal. 548, 58 Pac. 160, that "the moving party must make a clear case, showing due diligence on his part and the truth and materiality of such evidence. Newly discovered evidence after defeat is looked upon with suspicion, and this court is always reluctant to interfere with the ruling of the trial court on a motion for a new trial on that ground, and will not do so unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion." It cannot be said that in the case before us the court transcended the limits of judicial discretion. The evidence set out in the affidavits was, indeed, material and important and a prima facie showing of diligence was made by appellant, but by counter affidavits it was made to appear that the witnesses were, during the whole period, within a short distance of the city where the trial was held; that defendant was at all times represented by counsel with whom he had frequent interviews, and while preparing for his trial was on different occasions visited by his countrymen who spoke his language; and, furthermore, that an interpreter was present to aid him in his communications with his counsel. It is stated in People v. Freeman, 92 Cal. 367, 28 Pac. 261, that "the law requires at the hands of the defendant that he make careful and diligent preparation for his trial; and it is to be presumed more especially in a case of the importance of this that, in preparing for a trial, he should go over very carefully and diligently with his attorney every fact and circumstance which might in any way bear upon his defense." Assuming that he and his attorney exercised the diligence which the law enjoins, it is altogether probable that inquiries would have been instituted leading to the discovery of the identity and location of those additional witnesses who claimed to be present at the scene of the alleged crime. Indeed, this vital question as to the eyewitnesses would immediately suggest itself, and, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, the court was entirely justified in concluding either that the defendant was inexcusably remiss in his preparation for the trial, or else that he preferred to submit his case without the testimony of these other witnesses. No further discussion of this point seems necessary. We merely add that the "newly discovered evidence" would be merely cumulative, as several witnesses actually testified to substantially the same matters as those set out in the affidavits, and, besides, as the judge of the court, in the trial of another defendant, heard the testimony of affiants, he was in a more favorable position than he would otherwise have been to determine their credibility and whether their statements were worthy of credence and would likely produce a different verdict in case of a new trial. At any rate, in view of the record before us, we cannot, nor should we, hold that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

The said instructions refused by the court were as follows:

"(1) You are instructed that each and every fact and circumstance relied upon by the prosecution must be proved by the evidence in the case beyond all reasonable doubt; and, if the jury are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that such fact and circumstance has been proven, it is your duty to find a verdict of not guilty."

"(2) The court instructs the jury that in this case each necessary fact must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt; that all the facts must be proved conclusively in their nature tending to the conclusion with moral certainty that the defendant, and no other person, committed the crime charged in the information, and that, if you from the evidence or want of evidence could account for the facts and circumstances in evidence upon any theory or hypothesis consistent with the innocence of the accused, then it is your duty to acquit."

Upon No. 1 the learned trial judge made the following indorsement: "Refused because it is incorrect. The prosecution may rely upon facts which are nevertheless not essential to a conviction and such facts may not be proven beyond a reasonable doubt"; and upon No. 2: "Refused because the facts are not required to be conclusive in their nature." Regarded with technical discernment, the instructions are undoubtedly subject to said objections, but, if we concede force to appellant's position that the court's reasons are somewhat hypercritical, still his contention can be of no avail. This follows for the reason that extending the most favorable indulgence to the instructions appellant sought by them to have the jury directed that it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove every fact essential to a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, and, if it failed to do so, a verdict of not guilty must be rendered. But the court entirely covered this principle by instructing the jury "that when there is a reasonable doubt as to one of the facts essential to establish guilt it is the duty of the jury to acquit," and "the jury are also instructed that the presumption of innocence attaches at every stage of the case and to every fact and circumstance essential to a conviction and remains with the defendant throughout the trial until you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant."

We see no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MATEZUSKI. (Cr. 131.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Oct. 5, 1909.)

1. LARCENY (§ 68*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

On the trial of a charge of grand larceny, where the evidence tends to sustain both larceny and burglary, it is for the jury to determine which crime was actually committed.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1158*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

A finding, on the trial of a charge of grand larceny, as to whether the evidence shows larceny or burglary, is one of fact, and will not be disturbed on appeal if there is evidence to support it.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

A conviction based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, though the conflict was between testimony of witnesses for the state.

4. LARCENY (§ 41*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

Possession of property recently stolen puts on the possessor the burden of explaining such possession, and, if his explanation fails to show that the property was honestly obtained, this may be considered by the jury as tending to show his guilt.

5. LARCENY (§ 77*)—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that possession of property recently stolen puts upon the possessor the burden of explaining such possession, and that, if his explanation fails to show that the property was honestly obtained, this may be considered by the jury as a circumstance tending to show his guilt, is correct, and is not open to the objection that the conviction might be rested upon such possession alone.

6. LARCENY (§ 79*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a trial for larceny, the jury were instructed that if defendant feloniously stole the property, "or any part thereof, as charged in the information," they should find him guilty. The property alleged to have been stolen was such that proof of its value was necessary to determine whether the crime committed was grand or petit larceny. Held, that the jury having been instructed as to the distinction between grand and petit larceny, and having brought in a verdict of guilty of grand larceny, the instruction is not open to the objection that defendant could not have been found guilty of the crime charged in the information if he had stolen "any part" of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 187, 188; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

A. J. Matezuski was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

W. G. Abbott and Henry H. Roser, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TAGGART, J. It is contended by appellant that the verdict is not supported by the evidence because it tends to establish burglary as well as grand larceny. If it be conceded that larceny is not included in a charge of burglary, and that evidence of a conviction of one of these crimes would not sustain a plea of former conviction, upon a trial of a charge of the other (People v. Devlin, 143 Cal. 128, 76 Pac. 900), the jury may nevertheless determine, from evidence which tends to sustain both, which crime was actually committed. The finding upon such an issue is one of fact and will not be disturbed, if there is evidence to support it.

Another reason assigned for reversal on the ground that the evidence does not support the verdict is that the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution was conflicting, and that the preponderance of such evidence shows the defendant to be innocent rather than guilty. An argument based upon the weight of evidence, which is admittedly conflicting, will not be considered by an appellate court in reviewing the conclusions of a jury, and it is not material, in the application of this rule, whether the conflict be between the testimony of witnesses for opposite sides, or between witnesses all on the same side. The rule of finality and conclusiveness of the finding of fact by the jury or the trial court is the same in either case.

The instruction which appellant contends is erroneous because an invasion of the province of the jury, and violative of the provisions of section 19 of article 6 of the state Constitution, "that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact," is substantially section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to which has been added certain language which was held to be proper by the Supreme Court in People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 539, 66 Pac. 794, and People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 640, 77 Pac. 666. In the first of these cases the court considered the addition of the words "his interest in the case, or his prejudice against one of the parties," and in the second, "his degree of intelligence." The cases cited by appellant are distinguished in these opinions, and in the latter case it is said that the trial court is not limited in its instructions, as to the effect of the circumstances surrounding the witness, to those facts and circumstances enumerated in section 1847.

The instruction defining the word "abet" was correct, and this is true of that relating to a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice. The latter instruction is to be distinguished from the one before the court in People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 56 Pac. 44. The objection to the instruction in that case was that it informed the jury the corroborative evidence required by section 1111 of the Penal Code was sufficient "if it in any way tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime." The words "in any way" do not appear in the instruction before us, which is substantially the same as the one approved in People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 259, 264, 76 Pac. 1017.

Possession of property recently stolen puts upon the possessor the burden of explaining such possession, and, if his explanation fails to show that the property was honestly obtained, this may be considered by the jury as a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and the instruction to this effect was correct. It was not open to the objection that a conviction might be rested upon this possession alone. People v. Wilson, 135 Cal. 331, 67 Pac. 322.

The jury were instructed, at the request of the people: "That if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant feloniously stole the personal property of the Los Angeles Elastic Pulp Plaster Company, or any part thereof, as charged in the information, or aided, abetted, etc., * * * then you should find the defendant guilty." It is contended that the defendant could not have been found guilty of the crime charged in the information if he had stolen "any part" of the property. The jury were instructed as to the distinction between grand and petit larceny, and the verdict is "guilty of grand larceny." If the verdict had been one of guilty of petit larceny, the defendant would have been none the less guilty, and such a verdict might have been rendered under the information. The property alleged to have been stolen was such that proof of its value was necessary to determine whether the crime committed was grand or petit larceny.

We see no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

1. BAIL (§ 89*)—ACTION ON BOND—COMPLAINT.

A complaint on a bail bond, alleging that, after the order fixing the bail, defendants appeared and executed to plaintiff an undertaking of bail, by which defendants agreed to pay plaintiff a particular sum, etc., and that on the giving of the undertaking and its approval, the principal was released from custody, sufficiently alleged that the undertaking was executed by defendants, and that, in consideration thereof, the principal was discharged from custody.

2. BAIL (§ 89*)—BOND—ACTION—COMPLAINT.

A bail bond was conditioned that the principal should appear and answer the charge mentioned in whatever court it might be prosecuted, and would at all times hold himself amenable to the orders and processes of the court. A complaint on the bond alleged that the case was regularly set for trial on December 7, 1908, in the superior court of S. county, and on that day was duly called, and that the principal, having been theretofore duly advised of the time and place of trial, failed to appear. Held, that the complaint sufficiently alleged a breach of the sureties' covenant and their liability for the penalty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. M. Head, Judge.

Action by the People against Y. Bellafont and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, for appellants. W. D. Tillotson and O. M. Chenowith, for the People.

BURNETT, J. The action brought upon a criminal bail bond resulted in a judgment by default against the defendants, from which the appeal was taken.

The sufficiency of the complaint is assailed for the reasons: (1) That there is no allegation that Juan Santos (the principal) "was released from custody upon the execution and delivery of the bond"; and (2) "there is no allegation that any condition of defendants' obligation as set forth in the bond has been broken." Neither of these contentions can be maintained. As to the first, the allegation of the complaint is: "That after said order fixing the bail of said Santos in the sum of $1,500 was made by said judge, the defendants herein appeared before the said judge, and executed to this plaintiff an undertaking of bail in the sum of $1,500, in which undertaking of bail the defendants herein agreed to pay to the people of the state of California the sum of $1,500. * * * That upon the giving of said undertaking of bail by the defendants herein, and the same having been approved by the said judge, George J. Hoadley, the said Juan Santos was released from the custody of the constable of the said Delta township." It would, indeed, be difficult to aver more explicitly that the undertaking was executed by defendants, and that in consideration thereof the principal was discharged from custody. The cases cited by appellants are not at all relevant, since they "all go to the point," as stated in Coburn v. Pearson, 57 Cal. 308, "that in actions like the present the consideration for which the undertaking was executed and delivered must be alleged and proved."

The condition of the bond which is alleged to have been broken is that "The above-named Juan Santos will appear and answer the charge above mentioned, in whatever court it may be prosecuted, and will at all times hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court." The complaint shows that the case was regularly set for trial for December 7, 1908, in the superior court of Shasta county, and on said day "the said case was duly called to trial in said superior court, and the said Juan Santos having been theretofore duly advised of the time and place of said trial, then and there failed to appear for trial," etc. That the sureties undertook to produce Santos at the trial of the cause in the superior court when they promised that he would "appear and answer the charge in whatever court it may be prosecuted" is too plain for argument. It is true that the liability of sureties is not to be extended beyond the terms of their contract, but we are at a loss to understand how it could have been shown more clearly that their covenant had been broken, and their liability for the penalty had attached.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Rauer Law & Collection Company against Elmore C. Leffingwell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Lermen, for appellant. Macks & Tomskey, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, and is presented to this court upon the judgment roll alone. The action is upon a promissory note executed by defendant to one George W. Wittman, who prior to the commencement of the action indorsed the note to plaintiff. The original complaint was demurred to upon the sole ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; the point of the demurrer being that the complaint did not sufficiently allege nonpayment of the note. The allegation in the complaint in this regard is "that no part of said sum of $630, or interest due on said note, has been paid to plaintiff," which, of course, is not inconsistent with full payment to Wittman, the assignor of plaintiff. The demurrer was sustained, and an amended complaint was filed, which is in all respects the same as the original complaint, save that it sufficiently alleges nonpayment of the note. More than four years elapsed between the maturity of the note and the filing of the amended complaint, so that, unless the filing of the original complaint tolled the running of the statute, the action was barred. Defendant pleaded the bar of the statute by demurrer to the amended complaint, and the action of the trial court in overruling this demurrer presents the only important question to be determined upon this appeal.

Undoubtedly when a new and different cause of action is for the first time set up in an amended complaint, the statute of limitations runs to the filing of such amended complaint. The argument of appellant is that as the original complaint stated no cause of action, while the amended complaint stated a perfect cause of action, the latter necessarily stated a new and different cause of action; or, in other words, that the cause of action out of which the judgment resulted was for the first time put in suit when the amended complaint was filed. In a narrow sense this may be true, but not in the sense in which we ordinarily and judicially speak of the commencement of actions or of causes of actions. The purpose of each complaint was to enforce the very same obligation. The first complaint was defective only in that it did not sufficiently allege a breach of the obligation. An attempt to allege such breach was made. The second complaint simply remedied the defect of the first complaint. There can be no question but that, if the running of the statute was not involved in this matter, no lawyer would for one moment contend that the amendment filed in this case was not a proper one; that is, that the amended complaint was not a departure in pleading. "An action is commenced in this state by the filing of a complaint." Code Civ. Proc. § 405. An action upon any obligation founded upon an instrument in writing executed within this state may be brought within four years from its maturity. Code Civ. Proc. § 337. The obligation in this case was the obligation to pay the money promised in the note. The filing of the first complaint was the bringing of an action on this particular obligation. The filing of the amended complaint did not bring an action on a new obligation, but it was a continuance of the same action upon the same obligation. It cannot be properly said that no action was brought on the obligation sought to be enforced by the amended complaint until the amended complaint was filed. An action was brought on this same obligation when the original complaint was filed, and we have no doubt that it was sufficient to bar the running of the statute on the obligation.

We have not overlooked the cases cited by appellant from the state of Illinois, which certainly do lend support to his contention. McAndrews v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 222 Ill. 232, 78 N. E. 603; Eylenfeldt v. Illinois Steel Co., 165 Ill. 185, 46 N. E. 266; Foster v. St. Luke's Hospital, 191 Ill. 94, 60 N. E. 803, and other cases. The reasoning of those cases does not commend itself to our judgment. The Illinois rule has been followed by a divided court in Missouri (Missouri, etc., Co. v. Bagley, 65 Kan. 188, 69 Pac. 189, 3 L. R. A. [N. S.] 259). The contrary rule has been followed in Iowa. Myers v. Kirt, 68 Iowa, 124, 20 N. W. 22. In this state the precise question involved has never been determined by any appellate court; but in Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53, it was held that a complaint that counted on a promissory note might be amended by setting up a mortgage given to secure the payment of the promissory note, although in the meantime the statute had run against the mortgage. This ruling was predicated upon the proposition that the "obligation sought to be enforced; that is to say, the obligation to pay the money agreed to be paid" was the same in either case. Much more is the obligation sought to be enforced in either complaint in the case at bar the same. The court therefore did not err in overruling defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint.

The contention that the court erred in failing to find upon certain affirmative matters, showing want of consideration, pleaded as a defense, cannot be sustained in the absence of any bill of exceptions or statement of the case, showing that evidence was submitted sufficient to sustain such defense. Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098.

The findings made fully support the judgment. There is no bill of exceptions or statement of the case, and we find nothing in the record showing that evidence was introduced to support the defense of want of consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by D. J. Canty against Jesse Andrew Brown and others. From a judgment of nonsuit and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter, John J. Wells, and Carter & Carter, for appellant. P. H. Coffman, for respondents.

CHIEFMAN, P. J. This is an action for specific performance of a certain contract relating to the sale of real estate. The court granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment thereupon entered in favor of defendants and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The real point at issue arises out of the construction to be given the contract in question which latter is as follows: "Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this fifth day of June, 1906, between Jesse Andrew Brown, of Tehama county, state of California, the party of the first part, and D. J. Canty, of Alameda county, state of California, the party of the second part;

witnesseth: The party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of four thousand dollars (4,000), does hereby grant and sell to the party of the second part all fruit on trees now standing in orchard of said first party situate on Thomas Creek, in the county of Tehama, state of California, and known as the 'Westlake Place,' and more particularly described as follows, to wit: Bounded on the north by the Henleyville and Paskenta road, on the west by the lands of Mrs. Barker, on the south by fence between said orchard and Thomas Creek, on the east by fence enclosing said orchard as it now stands from farmed land owned by said first party, and containing 120 acres, more or less. The party of the second part shall have the free use of all trays, lug-boxes, cars and other equipment that is now on said place, and which is necessary for the proper harvesting of said fruit. The party of the first part agrees to furnish, free of charge, one span of mules and harness and wagon during the harvest season. The party of the second part agrees to make payment of said $4,000 as follows: $1,000 paid this 5th day of June, 1906, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged by the party of the first part, the balance, $3,000 to be paid as said fruit is sold. All fruit on said orchard to belong to and be the property of the party of the first part until said rental of $4,000 is paid in full. In consideration of the party of the second part complying with the terms of this agreement, the party of the first part does hereby grant unto the party of the second part an option to purchase, during a term of six months from the date of this agreement, all of the lands hereinbefore described, with all permanent improvements now standing on said lands, and a one-half interest in all water rights used in connection with said orchard and other lands, and recorded by said party of the first part as 3,000 miner's inches; the purchase price of said land to be eight thousand five hundred dollars ($8,500), to be paid by the party of the second part to the party of the first part in sums as follows: $3,500 to be paid on delivery of good and sufficient deed to above premises; the balance, $5,000, to be secured by mortgage on said premises, and to be paid in three equal payments, in one, two and three years from date of deed, with interest at 7 per cent. In the event of the party of the second part making payments as above, the party of the first part agrees to deliver to the party of the second part the above described orchard and enough farming land adjoining on the east side of said orchard to make up 120 acres. It is mutually agreed that this agreement, and every part and portion thereof will bind and inure to the benefit of the heirs, administrators and assigns of the respective parties to this agreement. In witness whereof, the parties to this agreement have hereunto set their hands and seals in duplicate the day and year first above written. Jesse Andrew Brown. [Seal.] D. J. Canty. [Seal.] The motion for nonsuit was upon the following grounds: "That the evidence fails to establish the contract alleged in the complaint; that the evidence fails to establish any agreement between the parties to the action for the sale and purchase of the lands mentioned in the complaint or in the evidence; that the evidence fails to establish any mutual contract between the parties to the action for the sale or purchase of any real estate; that the evidence shows that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief."

The contention of appellant is that the judgment is against the law and the evidence, and is thus stated in his specification of errors: "The evidence shows that defendant Brown entered into a contract in writing with plaintiff to sell to plaintiff the crops of fruit then here growing on the land, and to subsequently sell to plaintiff, within six months thereafter, the land on which said crops were growing, together with a water right for 3,000 miner's inches of water, at plaintiff's option for the full sum of $12,500," of which "payments were to be made as set forth in the contract"; that "it is a single contract, although severable into two parts, the intent being that the property shall be sold for $12,500; but that there is no obligation upon plaintiff to take anything more than the fruit, for which he was to pay $4,000. If he wanted the real estate, he was to pay the balance."

Where an option is without consideration, it was held in Brown v. S. F. Sav. Un., 134 Cal. 448, 66 Pac. 592, that the owner could revoke the option before the expiration of the time given the optionee if an acceptance of the option had not been communicated to the owner. In White v. Bank of Hanford, 148 Cal. 552, 83 Pac. 698, we have the case of an option to purchase real estate, with the crops growing thereon, where there was a consideration. In that case it was held that there was no mutuality of obligation inasmuch as the agreement nowhere imposed any liability on the proposed purchaser, optionee, to make the purchase. His right, the court said, was "to complete the purchase and compel the execution of a deed (by the owners) upon performance of the terms of the agreement, within the time limited by it." The correlative duties of the owners of the land "were no other than appear upon the face of the agreement—to make the deed upon demand of White and a tender by him within the time specified in the contract." The distinction between a contract to sell and an option is clearly stated in Menzel v. Primm, 6 Cal. App. 204, 91 Pac. 754. We can discover nothing in the present case that distinguishes it from the ordinary case of an option to sell land upon specified conditions, such as White v. Bank of Hanford, supra.

Plaintiff resided in Oakland, and, after making the contract, took possession of the property and harvested the fruit crop. He testified that he made inquiries as to defendant Brown's whereabouts between June and November 1st, 1906, and on November 1st he was told that Brown "was on his way down from Oregon somewhere, but not within reach at that time, with a band of sheep." He further testified: "After the 1st day of December, 1906, and before the 5th day of the same month, I tried twice to get Mr. Brown on the telephone. But I was not successful. I couldn't find him. My telephone was directed to Corning, because I always understood that was his post-office address.

* * * The contract was made in Kauffman's store at Corning. On the 5th of December, 1906, I again tried to get Mr. Brown on the telephone, and he couldn't be found in Corning. So on the morning of the 6th day of December, 1906, I telegraphed Mr. Brown. I read from the carbon copy of the telegram sent. It is as follows: 'Fresno, December 6, —6. Jesse Andrew Brown, Corning. Survey that orchard. I want it at price named in contract. D. J. Canty.'" Witness learned later that the telegram was delivered, but that Brown said it came too late, and he refused to make the sale. It was one day after the time limited in the option. We cannot see that these facts changed the relation of the parties or gave plaintiff any rights not accorded by the contract. Plaintiff could have adopted any reasonable or usual mode to communicate his acceptance (Civ. Code, § 1582); and "consent is deemed to be fully communicated between the parties as soon as the party accepting the proposal has put his acceptance in the course of transmission to the proposer." Civ. Code, § 1583. Not having communicated his acceptance within the time limited by the contract, he lost his right to demand a deed. For a comprehensive citation of cases upon the subject, see note to Mier v. Hadden, 118 Am. St. Rep. 592; Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 75, 53 S. E. 795, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403, and note. ### 3. COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURTS—POWER OF LEGISLATURE TO CONFER—"INFERIOR COURTS."

The board of supervisors of a county, though exercising judicial functions, is not an inferior court within Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that the superior court shall have appellate jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' and other inferior courts, as the term "inferior courts" are courts established for the administration of justice, charged with the exercise of judicial power as a substantive duty, but with limited jurisdiction usually confined to the limits of the city or town for which they are mainly created, and police, municipal, and recorders' courts are examples of inferior courts within the Constitution.

2. COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT—POWER OF LEGISLATURE TO CONFER.

Const. art. 6, §§ 1, 5, providing that the judicial power shall be vested in enumerated courts, including superior courts, and that the superior court shall have appellate jurisdiction "in such cases arising in justices' and other inferior courts * * * as may be prescribed by law," confers on the Legislature power to provide the method and extent to which an appeal from justices' and inferior courts may be taken,

LORIGAN, J. It appears from the petition for the writ that P. E. Lindstrom and others made application to the board of supervisors of San Joaquin county for the formation of an irrigation district in said county to be known as "the South San Joaquin Irrigation District." The application was made under the provisions of the act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 254, c. 189, Gen. Laws 1906, p. 501), and such proceedings were had in the matter that on March 22, 1909, an order granting the application for the formation of the district was made by the board, and the objections of the petitioners for this writ against the inclusion of their land within said district were overruled. Section 4 of the irrigation act provides for an appeal directly to the superior court of the county from such order of the board of supervisors, said appeal to be taken and heard in the same manner as appeals from the justice's court to the superior court, with power conferred on the superior court to enter a judgment affirming, modifying, or reversing the order of the board of supervisors appealed from. The present petitioners, being dissatisfied with the order made by the board of supervisors in the matter of the formation of said irrigation district, perfected an appeal to the superior court of San Joaquin county, in conformity to said section 4 of the act, and, the matter coming up for hearing before said court, the appeal was dismissed, the superior court holding that it had no jurisdiction to entertain it for the reason that the provision of the act attempting to confer appellate jurisdiction on the superior court, to entertain an appeal from the order of the board of supervisors, was unconstitutional and void. The petitioners thereupon applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent—the superior court of San Joaquin county—to proceed with a hearing and determination of said appeal. An alternative writ was issued, to which a demurrer was interposed, and the matter is submitted for decision on that demurrer.

It is provided by the Constitution (article 6, § 1) that the judicial power of the state shall be vested in the Senate, in the Supreme Court, District Courts of Appeal, superior courts, justices of the peace, and “such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town, or city and county.” Section 5 of the same article, after declaring in what cases the superior court shall have original jurisdiction, provides that they “shall have appellate jurisdiction in such cases arising in justices’ and other inferior courts in their respective counties as may be prescribed by law.” It is a well-recognized principle that where the judicial power of courts, either original or appellate, is fixed by constitutional provisions, the Legislature cannot either limit or extend that jurisdiction. While it is true that under the constitutional provisions conferring appellate jurisdiction upon the superior courts the matters to which that jurisdiction on appeal shall pertain—to what extent and in what manner the proceedings or action of justices’ or inferior courts may be reviewed—is not provided for, but is left solely to the determination of the Legislature, still an express limitation is imposed as to the character of tribunals whose proceedings may be reviewed in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, and it can be exercised in case of appeals from “justices’” or “inferior courts” only. All the authority that is given to the Legislature, under the constitutional provision last referred to, is to provide the method and extent to which an appeal from these courts may be taken. It has no power to enlarge the tribunals from which it may be taken, because the constitutional provision has expressly declared of what those shall consist. The appeal to the superior court, when provided for by the Legislature, can only be from a court—either a justice or inferior court—and the right of appeal cannot be given from any other tribunal.

The contention of the petitioners here necessarily is that, because the board of supervisors in the exercise of powers conferred upon it may sometimes act judicially, therefore it constitutes a court—an inferior court—from whose judicial action the Legislature may provide an appeal under the constitutional provision pertaining to the appellate jurisdiction of the superior court. Undoubtedly a board of supervisors may perform functions which are judicial in their character, as it may perform, and mainly does, those that are executive and ministerial. It exercises, in fact, in a minor degree, the powers of the general government—executive, judicial, and ministerial. As said in People v. Provines, 34 Cal. 521, 528: “The word ‘supervisors’ when applied to county officers has a legal signification. The duties of the officers are various and manifold—sometimes judicial and at others legislative and executive. From the necessity of the case it would be impossible to reconcile it to any particular head; and therefore in matters relating to police and fiscal regulations of counties they are allowed to perform such duties as may be enjoined upon them by law, without any nice examination into the exact character of the powers conferred. But, because a board of supervisors may exercise judicial functions, it is by no means an inferior court within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution relative to the appellate jurisdiction of the superior courts. The term “inferior courts” has a well-recognized meaning. They are courts established for the administration of justice, charged with the exercise of judicial power as a substantive duty, but with limited jurisdiction in that regard, and that jurisdiction usually confined to the limits of the city or town for which they are mainly created. Police courts, municipal courts, and recorders’ courts are, for example, inferior courts. But they are courts—inferior courts—as that term is employed in the constitutional provision bearing on the appellate jurisdiction of the superior court, and are the character of courts to which that appellate jurisdiction applies. Courts are tribunals which exercise functions of a strictly judicial character, and it is only inferior courts, as such, that the constitutional provisions respecting appeals to the superior court has reference to. Boards of supervisors, common councils, and other local boards, while they may be invested with mixed powers, including, among others, the power to act judicially in a matter before them, are not courts. At best, they are, in the exercise of that power, proceeding as quasi judicial bodies, something quite distinct from courts, and in no manner do they constitute inferior courts, as that term is used in the Constitution. The respondent—the superior court of San Joaquin county—was correct in its view that the portion of the irrigation act attempting to authorize an appeal to the superior court from the order of the board of supervisors was unconstitutional and void.

The application for a writ is denied.

INGLIN et al. v. HOPPIN et al. (Sac. 1,715.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1909.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 16, 1909.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 50*)—GOVERNMENTAL POWERS.

The creation of reclamation districts and the setting off of lands and the fixing of the boundaries of such districts are legislative acts, within the power of the Legislature, and the Legislature can neither be compelled to act or to refrain from acting, or controlled by any other power of government when it has acted within constitutional limitations.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—GOVERNMENTAL POWERS.

Where the Legislature has established a reclamation district, it will be conclusively presumed that the Legislature took evidence in its determination, and its decision is not subject to judicial review.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—GOVERNMENTAL POWERS.

The rule that, where the Legislature has created a reclamation district, it is conclusively presumed that it took evidence in its determination, and its decision is not subject to judicial review, is modified when applied to subordinate agencies of the Legislature charged by it with the duty of executing the legislative will, and the same exemption from judicial interference applies to the subordinate agencies only so far as their legislative discretion extends, and, where discretion other than legislative is vested in subordinate agencies, the exercise of that discretion is subject to judicial control when abused.

4. MANDAMUS (§ 70*)—ACTS SUBJECT TO REVIEW.

Where an act is in its nature ministerial and depends on the existence or nonexistence of facts, and the jurisdiction to determine that fact is vested in the first instance in an inferior tribunal, its determination, made on conflicting evidence, will not be reviewed on mandamus.

5. MANDAMUS (§ 70*)—REMEDY.

Mandamus will not lie to control discretion by forcing the exercise of discretion in a particular manner; but it will lie to correct abuses of discretion and to force a particular action by the inferior tribunal or officer when the law and uncontroverted facts clearly establish the petitioner's right to such action. And hence, in mandamus to compel the board of supervisors of a county to establish a reclamation district, the hearing in the superior court being on the same evidence presented to the board of supervisors, where the question of fact is doubtful or disputed, the court will not interfere with the determination of the board; but where it is established that the evidence before the board was uncontradicted, competent, and sufficient to prove all the matters required by Pol. Code, § 3416 et seq., relating to the establishment of reclamation districts, the superior court must issue its mandate to the board of supervisors to compel the establishment of the district.

6. DRAINS (§ 2*)—INVADING JUDICIAL POWER —“INFERIOR COURT.”

St. 1893, p. 174, c. 147, providing for an appeal to the superior court from the decision of the board of supervisors in proceedings for establishment of reclamation districts, is in conflict with Const. art. 6, § 5, limiting the appellate jurisdiction of the superior court to cases arising in justices and other inferior courts, for the board of supervisors, though exercising quasi judicial functions, is not an inferior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3580–3582.]

7. DRAINS (§ 14*)—MANDAMUS (§ 81*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—REVIEW.

The writ of review and mandamus are sufficient for the correction of errors of the board of supervisors in proceedings for the establishment of reclamation districts.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Application for mandamus by M. Inglin and others against C. H. Hoppin and others to compel the Board of Supervisors of a county to set aside an order in proceedings to establish a reclamation district and to enter an order granting the petition. From a judgment denying relief, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Hudson Grant, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate directing the board of supervisors of Yolo county to set aside a specific order heretofore given by them in the matter of the petition of plaintiffs to have certain lands situated in reclamation district No. 730 of said Yolo county set off and erected into an independent district, by which order the petition was denied, and to enter an order granting the petition. To this application a general demurrer was interposed and sustained. The question presented therefore is: Accepting as true the facts stated in the application for mandate, is any ground shown for the issuance of the writ? The petition filed by and on behalf of Inglin and his co-plaintiffs herein with the board of supervisors sought to have their lands in reclamation district No. 730 set off from said district pursuant to the provisions of sections 3481, 3472,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

3446 et seq. of the Political Code. Their complaint here avers that they took all the steps and proceedings to that end required by law, and upon the hearing of their petition established all of the facts required by law by uncontradicted, material, sufficient, and competent evidence, but that notwithstanding this the board of supervisors arbitrarily denied their petition. Section 3449 of the Political Code requires that, if the board of supervisors find on the hearing of the petition that its statements are correct, they must make an order approving the same. The gravamen of plaintiffs' complaint here is that, with sufficient competent and uncontradicted evidence establishing the statements of their petition to be correct, the board of supervisors arbitrarily denied instead of approved it. Upon this state of facts they apply for mandate succinctly stating their contention in the following language: "Where the petitioners are entitled upon the admitted facts to the relief demanded, may the board of supervisors arbitrarily deny it?" The general demurrer was sustained upon the grounds: That the creation of reclamation districts is referable to the legislative branch of the government, and is therefore beyond the control of the action of the courts; that exclusive jurisdiction to determine these questions has by the general Legislature been vested in one of its subordinate agencies—the board of supervisors—and that in the exercise of its powers to determine facts the board of supervisors may not be controlled; and, finally, that the board of supervisors having acted by denying the petition, mandate will not run against it to force an avoidance of its former order and the entry of another and different order.

It has been repeatedly held by this court, and is unquestionably true, that the creation of reclamation districts and the setting off of lands and the delimiting of the boundaries of such districts are legislative acts. Bixler v. Supervisors, 59 Cal. 698; Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 25, 81 Pac. 225; People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 103 Pac. 207. The creation of such districts is legislative in the true sense that the Legislature has the power, as it has in the case of any civil or penal law, to create or to withhold creation. No other power of the government can compel the Legislature to act in such a matter or to refrain from acting, or, when it has acted, to control the action, other than to declare whether or not it may have been taken within constitutional limitations. This right to act or to withhold action within the discretion or, indeed, within the arbitrary whim of the lawmaking body, is an essential attribute of its powers; but from this it does not follow that where legislative action is not itself complete, where the Legislature intrusts the determination of a fact or the doing of an act to some one or another of its agents or mandatories, this act itself takes on the attributes of legislation and becomes legislative in the sense that its due performance may not be controlled by the courts, for to so hold would in many instances thwart, rather than give effect to, the legislative will. Thus the granting of state lands is a legislative power and prerogative; but if, in a proper case, the Legislature should ordain that a grant be made of lands to an individual, and direct the issuance of that grant in the name of and on behalf of the state by some agent appointed thereto, such agent could not resist mandate upon the ground that the act, performance of which was sought to be compelled, was legislative in character, even if the agent were himself an officer of the state as provided by article 5, § 14, of the Constitution. The question was considered and this principle announced in State v. Elder, 31 Neb. 169, 47 N. W. 710, 10 L. R. A. 796, where the law declared the speaker of the assembly should open election returns, and declare the result. A writ of mandate directed against him to compel the performance of this duty was resisted upon the ground that he was a legislative officer exercising judicial functions; but the court declared that the law made no distinction in the persons to be compelled to perform an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office on account of any one of the three departments to which the person may belong. So, here, the Legislature has provided a plan of which landowners may avail themselves for the formation of reclamation districts. It has declared that when the facts exist, and are shown to exist within the method prescribed by the law, the supervisors shall make an order accordingly, by virtue of which order a reclamation district is created. There is a broad distinction to be recognized between the control by courts over the general Legislature acting within its powers, and the control which may be exercised over inferior boards and tribunals charged with the performance of an act enjoined by the Legislature. As was pointed out in People v. Sacramento Drainage District, supra, where the Legislature has itself spoken in the creation of a district such as this, and where the legislative determination may be deemed to have depended upon a question of fact, it is conclusively presumed that the Legislature took evidence in its determination, and the decision which it reached will not be subject to review by the courts; but this doctrine has no application, or, at the most, a much modified application, when applied to subordinate agencies of the Legislature, charged themselves with the duty of executing the legislative will. The same exemptions from judicial interference applies to all inferior legislative bodies, so far as their legislative discretion extends, but no further. Alpers v. San Francisco (C. C.) 32 Fed. 503; Davis v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 1 Duer (N. Y.) 451. Where discretion other than legislative is vested in such a subordinate officer or tribunal, the exercise of that discretion will be subjected to correction if it be abused. Where the act is in its nature ministerial and depends upon the existence or nonexistence of facts, if the jurisdiction to determine that fact be vested, in the first instance, in such inferior tribunal, its determination made upon conflicting evidence will not be reviewed. Yet, if the case presented is one where the decision has been in such flat opposition to the plain and uncontradicted facts as to force the conclusion that the decision was in bad faith, a review by the courts will always be open to the aggrieved party, as the cases which we shall cite will abundantly show.

So here, while it is unquestionably true that jurisdiction to determine the questions presented under the petition is, in the first instance, vested in the board of supervisors, as declared in Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 81 Pac. 225, it does not follow, as respondents contend, that this jurisdiction is exclusive and wholly beyond the reach of a reviewing court. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 169, 17 Sup. Ct. 67 (41 L. Ed. 369): "It may be that the action of the board upon any question of fact, as to contents or sufficiency of the petition, or upon any other fact of a jurisdictional nature, is open to review in the state courts. It would seem to be so held in Modesto Irrigation District v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. 237. * * * Very possibly a decision by the statutory tribunal, which included tracts of land within the district that plainly could not, by any fair or proper view of the facts be benefited by irrigation, would be the subject of a review in some form and of a reversal by the courts, on the ground that the decision was based, not alone upon no evidence in its favor, but that it was actually opposed to all the evidence and to the plain and uncontradicted facts of common knowledge and was given in bad faith. In such a case the decision would not have been the result of fair or honest, although grossly mistaken, judgment, but would be one based upon bad faith and fraud, and could not be conclusive in the nature of things." By the pleading such is the case here presented. The charge, in effect, is that, notwithstanding the uncontradicted proof in petitioners' favor, the board of supervisors arbitrarily and in gross disregard of the legislative mandate refuse to accord them the right guaranteed by the Legislature—that of having their lands set apart as an independent district. Plaintiffs here do not seek even to control the exercise of discretion. Their contention is: That by the express declaration of the Legislature a given result must follow a given state of facts, with no room for the play of discretion upon the part of the board of supervisors; that they have established this state of facts; and that the board of supervisors has refused to declare the result which the Legislature itself has said they must declare. In the Glide Case, supra, it is held that "jurisdiction over these matters (the formation of reclamation districts) is primarily vested with the board of supervisors, and that, so long as the board is acting within the scope of its jurisdiction, judicial interference with its proceedings is improper and cannot be tolerated." It was not held, and has never by this court been held, that in a proper case a review of the action of the board in such matters would not be permitted, and, to prevent misunderstanding, this was particularly pointed out in the opinions of the concurring justices in that case. As was there well said by the Chief Justice: "Vested rights of property and contract rights are placed by the Constitution under the protection of the courts, where alone the questions of law and fact upon which they depend can be finally decided."

The writ of mandate may be issued "to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board or person to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station; or to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which he is entitled, and from which he is unlawfully precluded by such inferior tribunal, corporation, board or person." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. As pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States, mandate is a flexible writ, whose use in modern times has been much extended. "It does not lie to control judicial discretion, except when that discretion has been abused; but it is a remedy when the case is outside of the exercise of this discretion, and outside of the jurisdiction of the court or officer to which or to whom the writ is addressed." Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 25 L. Ed. 667. As early as 4 Cal., this court said: "It is not now denied that mandamus may be resorted to by the superior tribunal to compel an inferior officer to do the act which is sought to be enforced, in all cases where the officer has no discretion, and when he is under obligation to do the specific act. * * * In such cases the writ is always liberally interposed for the benefit of the citizen and the advancement of justice." McDougall v. Bell, 4 Cal. 179.

In Thomas v. Armstrong, 7 Cal. 286, a writ of mandate was sought. The board of supervisors had refused a license to a ferry proprietor. He applied for mandate to compel the board to renew his license. This court said: "We think that this section confers a right upon the party which cannot be arbitrarily divested or disregarded. If it were a case in which there was any doubt, and the supervisors had exercised their discretion, and had determined, on testimony, that the ferry had not been properly kept, there would be no authority to interfere with their determination; but when they act under a mistake of law, and award the license to a stranger, under the supposition that he has succeeded to the rights of the plaintiff, their orders may be reached, and the error corrected by mandamus or any other proper proceeding."

In Stockton R. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 51 Cal. 328, it is said: "Our view of the law then was and yet is that, if an official duty is to be performed on the happening of an event, the officer cannot arbitrarily or capriciously refuse to perform it after the event has happened, on the plea that he is not satisfied that it has happened. If the fact exists and is established by sufficient proofs, it is his legal duty to be satisfied and act accordingly."

In Temple v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 211, 11 Pac. 699, mandate was sought to compel the superior court to hear a contempt proceeding which it had refused to do, and this court declared: "Under such circumstances the court cannot, by holding without reason that it has no jurisdiction of the proceeding, divest itself of jurisdiction, and evade the duty of hearing and determining it."

In Spring Valley Water Works v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 286, 22 Pac. 910, 1046, 6 L. R. A. 756, 16 Am. St. Rep. 116, the contention was made that the action of the board of supervisors in fixing water rates was legislative, and therefore not subject to the control of the courts, and this court replied: "There are other cases holding the act to be legislative, but whether it is judicial, legislative, or administrative is immaterial. Let it be what it may, it is not above the control of the courts in proper cases."

In Johnston v. Superior Court, 105 Cal. 666, 39 Pac. 36, the superior court, being satisfied that due notice to creditors had not been given, ordered additional notice to be given. Upon application for mandate to compel the superior court to make its decree showing that due notice had been given, the facts were reviewed, the trial court found to be in error, and mandate issued accordingly.

In Henry v. Barton, 107 Cal. 535, 40 Pac. 798, mandamus was ordered to compel the issuance of a liquor license to an applicant who had complied with all the provisions of the ordinance touching the issuance of such license; the trustees of the town contending that the matter of the issuance was within their discretion.

In Keller v. Hewitt, 109 Cal. 146, 41 Pac. 871, the applicant for mandate showed that he had successfully passed the examination entitling him to receive a grammar grade certificate as teacher, and that the board of education arbitrarily refused to grant it to him. There, as here, the contention was made that the law vested in the board absolute power and discretion to determine the question irrespective of facts, and that such determination was final and not subject to review. It was held that no such power or discretion was vested, but that the plain duty was imposed upon the board to act in conformity with established facts, and mandate was accordingly issued.

In Hensley v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 541, 44 Pac. 232, the superior court had refused to make or enter an order or decree of due notice to creditors, upon the ground that the order for notice to creditors was not in conformity with the law. This court in issuing mandate declared: "Where, as here, the law affixes a right to specific relief from certain facts, and there is no question made as to the existence of such facts, the court has no discretion to refuse the relief. In such a case the limit of the discretionary power of the court has been reached, and nothing but a clear duty remains; and if the relief is refused, and there is, as in this instance, no appeal or other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, mandamus will lie to compel it."

While, of course, it is the general rule that mandamus will not lie to control the discretion of a court or officer, meaning by that that it will not lie to force the exercise of discretion in a particular manner, the above cases abundantly show that mandamus will lie to correct abuses of discretion, and will lie to force a particular action by the inferior tribunal or officer, when the law clearly establishes the petitioner's right to such action. Such is the case here presented by the pleadings. We are not to be misunderstood as holding that the facts asserted in this petition to have been proved before the board of supervisors of Yolo county by good and sufficient evidence without conflict are to be tried by the superior court de novo. The hearing will be had upon the same evidence presented to the board of supervisors. Where a question of fact is doubtful or disputed, the court will not interfere with the determination of the supervisors; but if it be established before the superior court, as alleged in the petition, that the evidence before the supervisors was uncontradicted, competent, and sufficient to prove satisfactorily all matters required by the Political Code, it will become the clear duty of the superior court to issue its mandate to the board of supervisors to accord to the petitioners the right which the statute clearly gives.

Respondents urge that there was a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy open to appellants by appeal under St. 1893, p. 174, c. 147, which provides in terms for an appeal from the decision of the board of supervisors to the superior court. This provision, however, is both unconstitutional and unnecessary. Article 6, § 5, of the Constitution limits appellate jurisdiction of the superior court to cases "arising in justices and other inferior courts in their respective counties as may be prescribed by law." Notwithstanding the quasi judicial functions which boards of supervisors are called upon at times to perform, such boards are in no sense courts within the purview of the Constitution. The statute is therefore unconstitutional and is unnecessary, since the writs of review and mandamus are sufficient for the correction of their errors. See Chinn v. Superior Court (S. F. No. 5,298, this day decided) 105 Pac. 580.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to overrule defendants' demurrer and to permit them to plead to the merits.

BRIDGES et al. v. LOS ANGELES PAC. RY.
(L. A. 2,299.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—SAFE APPLIANCES—DUTY TO FURNISH.

A master is liable for a breach of duty to furnish safe appliances, resulting in injury to a servant.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 185*)—SAFE APPLIANCES—DUTY TO FURNISH—DELEGATION OF DUTY.

The obligation of a master to furnish his servants with safe appliances and a safe place for work cannot be delegated, and the delegation of the duty to an employé who would for other purposes be regarded as a fellow servant of an employé injured through failure of the duty would not exonerate the master.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 335; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—SAFE PLACE AND APPLIANCES—DANGER ARISING IN DOING OF WORK.

Where the place in which work is to be done and the appliances to be used by servants are as safe as can reasonably be expected, and danger arises necessarily in the doing of the work, the master has discharged his duty when he has furnished to the servants suitable means of obviating the danger.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 185*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ACTS OF FELLOW SERVANT.

The failure of a co-employé to use the means furnished to obviate the danger in the work is the act of a fellow servant, and, where a company operating an electric substation maintained highly charged wires, and furnished means whereby the current might be shut off, and authorized the foreman of a construction gang working on the roof to shut off the current, and decedent, one of the gang, was killed by coming into contact with a live wire, either because of the foreman's failure to turn off the current or his negligence in informing decedent that the line was clear, the company was not liable under Civ. Code, § 1970, prior to the amendment of March 6, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 119, c. 97), providing that the master is not liable for injury to a servant from the negligence of a co-employé, unless the negligence was committed in the performance of a duty the master owes by law to a servant or the master has not used ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé.

Shaw and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by O. S. Bridges and another against the Los Angeles Pacific Railway. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

John D. Pope, Geo. P. Adams, and Gurney E. Newlin, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson and Thos. L. Woolwine, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. A judgment for $3,000 was recovered by plaintiffs in this action for the death of their son, O. R. Bridges. The deceased was in the employ of the defendant as an electrician's helper, and was killed by coming in contact with a highly charged electrical wire in a substation of the defendant. This is an appeal by defendant from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The allegation of the complaint is that the defendant "carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to furnish the said O. R. Bridges with a safe place to work, in this: that the defendant carelessly and negligently ordered and directed the said O. R. Bridges to go among some highly charged live electrical wires from which it had carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to disconnect or cut off the electrical current, whereby the said O. R. Bridges came into contact with one or more of the said live wires and received therefrom a heavy shock of electricity, from the effects of which he died."

The following facts may fairly be said to appear without contradiction: In June, 1906, which was prior to the amendment of March 6, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 119, c. 97), section 1970, Civ. Code, relative to the liability of an employer, O. R. Bridges had been in the employ of defendant as a helper for about six months. He was a member of the construction gang, which was under the charge of one Scott as foreman. On the day of the accident this gang was engaged in the effort to install or move a piece of machinery at the Ocean Park substation. To do this, it was necessary to fasten a chain block to a timber which was to be attached to the upper part of the building. The timber itself was to be hoisted by means of a rope and pulley. Bridges started up a ladder with the rope. Before getting to the top, he asked whether the line was clear. Somebody answered that it was. Bridges went on, walked across a truss supporting the roof until he came to several highly charged wires. In attempting to climb over them, he came in contact with one or more, and received the shock which caused his death. The current at the substation was controlled by a switch, which, if properly turned, would have cut the current out from the wires. It was this condition that Bridges referred to when asking whether the line was clear. The fact was that the switch had not been turned, and, as the result showed, the current was flowing through the wires.

Before the work was undertaken, the chief operator of the defendant had instructed Scott, the foreman of the construction gang, to "open the line"; i. e., to cut off the current. The line was used for lighting purposes. It fed "only a few lights and was not important." If this order had been carried out, no injury would have resulted to any one coming in contact with the wires. The duty of shutting off power rested on the operators. No one else (except Scott and the chief operator) did that kind of work. There were other facts shown, but we have stated all that we think have any bearing upon the one point which we shall consider; i. e., whether, on these facts, the only negligence shown was not that of a fellow servant of the deceased—a default for which the defendant is not liable. Civ. Code, § 1970. It is, of course, thoroughly settled, as a general rule, that the obligation of the master to furnish to his employés safe appliances and a safe place for work is one that cannot be delegated, and that for a breach of this duty, resulting in injury to a servant, the master is liable. He will not be exonerated by the fact that he may have intrusted the furnishing of a safe place and appliances to an employé who would, for other purposes, be regarded as a fellow servant of the party injured. Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559. But this rule is subject to a qualification which appears to us to have plain application to the facts of this case. Where the place in which the work is to be done and the appliances to be used are in themselves as safe as can reasonably be expected, and the danger arises necessarily in the doing of the work, the master has discharged his duty when he has furnished to the employé suitable means of obviating the danger. The failure, on the part of a co-employé, to use such means, is the act of a fellow servant. It is not the breach of a duty which rests upon the master as a nondelegable duty. This rule is analogous to that applied in cases where "several persons are employed to do certain work, and by the contract of employment, either express or implied, the employés are to adjust the appliances by which the work is to be done." Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916. It is difficult to define with precision the limits of this doctrine. It is best set forth by a statement of some of the cases in which it has been given effect.

In Daves v. S. P. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708, 35 Am. St. Rep. 133, a section hand was killed by a train which had run into an open switch. The foreman, who should have closed the switch, had failed to perform his duty, and the accident was due to this neglect. For such neglect the master was, as was held, not liable; the court saying: "The duty violated did not relate to the place of work, but to the negligent use of an appliance or instrumentality which was proper and suitable for the purpose for which it was furnished by the master, and such use of it was simply a detail of the work or management of the business, therefore a duty of the servant, which he, and not the master, was bound to perform." The same principle was applied in Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., supra, where the plaintiff, working under a pile driver, was injured by a block thrown from above by a fellow servant. Before throwing any blocks, the latter was accustomed to ask the superintendent whether all was clear below, and on this occasion the superintendent had negligently answered the question in the affirmative. So in Donovan v. Ferris, 128 Cal. 48, 60 Pac. 519, 79 Am. St. Rep. 25, where the negligence consisted in failing to warn a workman in a quarry that blasts in a neighboring tunnel were about to be exploded. In Miller v. Centralia Pulp, etc., Co., 134 Ws. 316, 113 N. W. 954, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 742, the plaintiff was injured by falling into an elevator shaft. His fall was due to insufficient lighting of the shaft, and the cause of the want of light was the negligence of a co-employé whose duty it was to keep the place properly lighted. "The fact," says the court, "that a working place may be rendered unsafe by reason of the negligent operation by an employé of an appliance furnished by the master does not preclude the master from committing the operation of such an appliance to a competent employé, and any injury to an employé due to such negligent operation of the appliance is not a failure of duty by the master to furnish a safe place or appliance, but is a neglect of the servant in the conduct of a common employment." Where a workman engaged in pouring molten iron into a mold was informed by the superintendent that the molds were all right, whereas in fact they were too damp, it was held that an injury resulting from a blowing out of the iron by reason of such dampness was not attributable to the employer's failure to use due care in providing safe appliances. Whittaker v. Bent, 167 Mass. 588, 46 N. E. 121. Still closer in their facts to the present case are Tilley v. Rockingham County L. & P. Co., 74 N. H. 316, 67 Atl. 946, and Guest v. Edison Illum. Co., 150 Mich. 438, 114 N. W. 226. In the former the plaintiff, while engaged in cleaning out a hydraulic main, was injured by an explosion of gas which had been allowed to enter the main. The gas could have been kept out by the use of valves attached to the main, and it was the duty of the foreman to close these valves. It was held that the employer was not responsible for the failure of the foreman to discharge this duty. In Guest v. Edison Co. the plaintiff was working upon some electric wires from which the current had been cut off by the opening of a switch. The foreman had told him that he would see that the switch was kept open. This he forgot to do. The switch was closed, and plaintiff sustained injuries. An order directing a verdict for the defendant was sustained upon appeal; the court holding that the only negligence shown was that of a fellow servant. See, also, Dixon v. Winnipeg, etc., R. R. Co., 11 Man. Rep. 528.

Upon the reasoning of these cases, it must be held that the evidence was insufficient to show any negligence for which the appellant is responsible. There is no claim that the wires, switches, and other appliances were not suitable, or that they were not reasonably safe for the purposes to which they were applied. It is not charged that the defendant failed to exercise due care in the selection of its employes. The accident was caused by the fault of Scott, either in informing Bridges that the line was clear or in failing to turn the switch. In either view this negligence was that of a fellow servant in the operation of the details of work for which proper appliances had been furnished. The employer, having provided safe means for doing the work, does not insure the employe against the negligent failure of co-employes to use such means. The duty of adjusting the appliances to the varying requirements of the work to be done may be delegated to servants.

The order denying a new trial is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. Bridges, the deceased, was working under Scott, who was foreman. He was one of a party of workmen doing construction work at different places along the line of the defendant's railway. Neither Scott, nor any of the men, had any authority to shut off the electricity. It is obvious that the switches would often be far away from the men working along the line, and that the control of the current could not conveniently be a part of their work, or within their province. The evidence shows that one Peacock was chief operator of the defendant company, and that it was his duty to turn off the current when necessary to insure the safety of men at work on the lines, and that none of the men at work with Bridges were authorized to do so. I think the main opinion makes an unwarrantable assumption in saying that men engaged in the work with the deceased were furnished with "suitable means of obviating the danger." They had no authority to do the act which alone would remove it, and there is no evidence that the means were at hand, or under their control. Peacock's direction to Scott to turn off the current did not make it a part of the work in which the men were engaged, nor make Scott, as to that act, a fellow servant with them. He was, for that purpose, a principal, and his failure to turn it off was the negligence of the defendant.

I concur in the foregoing dissenting opinion: LORIGAN, J.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Samuel Shannon against R. L. Cheney and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board and another appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Aitken & Aitken, for appellants. Roger Johnson, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff brought this action to collect from defendant Cheney a debt amounting to something more than $2,000, evidenced by four promissory notes and secured by what purported to be an assignment of said Cheney's seat in the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board. The original defendants were the stock and exchange board, Mr. Cheney, and certain others described by fictitious names. A personal judgment against defendant Cheney was prayed for, and the court was asked, in addition to the usual request for general relief, to appoint a receiver to sell the seat and to apply the proceeds of such sale toward the payment of the debt and costs. The stock and exchange board answered, alleging that under its constitution and laws the seat of defendant Cheney had reverted to the board upon the failure of Cheney to pay certain claims of members against him, found by the board's committee to be due, and that these claims amounted to more than the value of the seat in question. The defendant Cheney appeared and confessed judgment. By permission of the court, plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint, making A. B. Ruggles, as president of the stock and exchange board, a party defendant; alleging that since the commencement of the action said Ruggles, pretending to act by authority of the board and the provisions of its constitution, had sold the seat in question for an amount greater than plaintiff's claim; and praying for a personal judgment against said Ruggles, as well as one against the board. Judgment was rendered as prayed in favor of plaintiff. Appeals therefrom and from an order denying their motion for a new trial are taken by the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board and by A. B. Ruggles.

The constitution of the stock and exchange board contains, among others, the following provisions: "Any member failing to meet his engagements in the board shall be suspended until he has settled with his creditors." "Any member who has been suspended for six months, and who has not made a satisfactory settlement of his contracts in the board during that time, shall be deprived of all privileges of membership, and his seat shall revert to the board. * * * Whenever any member shall have been deprived of all privileges of membership * * * the president of the board shall call a meeting of the creditors in the board of such person, who shall thereupon present to him their several claims against the delinquent, and the president in all such cases shall be ex officio a trustee for such person and for his creditors in the board, and the said trustee shall be vested with all the rights and privileges formerly held by such person in the board, and shall dispose of the same in the same manner that a person retiring in good standing may dispose of his seat and privileges. The proceeds of any such disposition so made shall be devoted by the said trustee to discharging the obligations due by such person to members of the board, and any surplus remaining shall, after having satisfied all other claims against him, be delivered to the delinquent or to any person authorized to receive the same." It is further provided in the constitution that the proceeds of sales of seats shall be applied to the benefit of members exclusive of outside creditors, "unless there shall be a balance after the claims of the members are paid in full," and that the seat and privileges of every member during his connection with the board shall be deemed "a continuing security to all members of the board, with whom he may deal, according to its rules for the performance of his contracts and the fulfillment of his engagements." The court found: That the constitution and by-laws of the board contained the provision set forth in the answer prior to April 10, 1907, when the new constitution and rules were adopted; that defendant Cheney agreed to be bound by the constitution and by-laws while a member, but not otherwise; that the claim of Hinkle, another member of the board, against defendant Cheney, was filed September 27, 1906; that thereafter a committee of arbitration acted, reporting to the board Cheney's indebtedness to Hinkle in the sum of $2,112.50; that the report was adopted by the board, and Cheney was suspended on October 10, 1906; that within 30 days thereafter claims against Cheney, aggregating more than $3,900, were filed with the board; but that none of them arose from the failure of said Cheney to comply with his engagements in the board; that plaintiff had never filed any claim with said board; that Cheney failing for six months after October 10, 1906, to settle any claims against him, was on April 10, 1907, deprived of all privileges of membership in the board; that in May, 1907, after the commencement of this action, a committee appointed to adjust all claims filed against Cheney, reported that he owed the amounts demanded, aggregating $6,697; but that said report was never presented to nor adopted by the board; that on June 30, 1907, Ruggles sold the seat for $5,500; and that no other proceedings had ever been taken by the creditors in the board to establish or to enforce their claims against R. L. Cheney.

That there can be no sale of a "seat" or the privilege of transacting business in a stock exchange except in subordination to the rules of such exchange is too well settled to require very much discussion. This privilege, so far as it is property at all, is subject to the conditions and qualifications which "entered into and became an incident in the property when it was created, and remains part of it into whose hands soever it may come." Hyde v. Woods, 94 U. S. 523, 24 L. Ed. 264. It is "a personal privilege of being and remaining a member of a voluntary association with the assent of the association." Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, 99 Cal. 162, 33 Pac. 794, 21 L. R. A. 399, 37 Am. St. Rep. 42. Or, as expressed in the case of San Francisco v. Anderson, 103 Cal. 70, 36 Pac. 1034, 42 Am. St. Rep. 98: "It is a mere right to belong to a certain association with the latter's consent, and to enjoy certain personal privileges and advantages which flow from membership of such association. Those privileges and advantages cannot be transferred without the consent of the association, and a forced sale of them would not give to the purchaser the right to occupy said seat." Cheney's property in the seat being therefore qualified, and subject to the provisions of the constitution and by-laws, plaintiff Shannon could take by the attempted assignment no greater right nor superior ownership than that which his assignor possessed. Examining that constitution, we find a provision that "a person not a member of the board shall have the right to bring a claim against a member of the said board arising from any transaction in stocks or money loaned during his membership," in a certain manner there stated, "and not otherwise." There is no showing that plaintiff ever complied with this requirement. The by-laws provide that "all claims of members and nonmembers against said delinquent member must be filed with the secretary of the board within thirty days after the adoption of the report" (recommending suspension), and "no claims, unless filed within thirty days, * * * will ever be recognized or enforced by the board." The findings of the lower court show that Shannon failed to present his claim within the limit of time above mentioned, or at all. This would bar him from participating in the award of the board, if any, based upon claims of members and other persons, duly filed. He must therefore have recourse to his remedy as a general creditor of defendant Cheney to the surplus, if any there be, after the sale of the seat and the payment of claims duly filed and adjudicated, according to the constitution and by-laws of the board. The findings of the superior court are, in substance: That there was such surplus, because it has adjudged that the claims, except that of Hinkle, were not debts arising from the failure of Cheney to comply with his engagements in the board; and that there had never been any action of the board with reference to the report of the committee to the effect that Cheney was indebted to all of the claimants. But these adverse claimants are not parties to this action. They have had no day in court. Yet the findings exclude them from participation in the fund realized from the sale of Cheney's seat held by Ruggles as trustee under the provision of the constitution quoted herein. If Shannon could maintain any action against defendants Ruggles and the board, he could only do so by making the various claimants parties. The trustee is here confronted with a personal judgment on the one hand, and, on the other, a finding of the board's committee, which the board may perhaps adopt, that sums in excess of the trust fund are due to members. To be sure, the court in this action has found that some of these creditors have not perfected their claims; but, as they are not parties, they are not bound by that judgment, and may in another action establish their rights to the fund in question. For his protection, and in justice to him, they should be made parties. Deering v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 109 Cal. 83, 41 Pac. 801. The personal judgment against Ruggles is clearly erroneous.

But as Shannon is a general creditor of Cheney, and as there is no privity of contract between him and the stock and exchange board, this action will not lie against that association nor its president. The proper course of plaintiff would be by supplemental proceedings after judgment against Cheney, to participate in the trust fund, and even that he could not do without bringing in all the claimants. Matteson, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Conley, 144 Cal. 483, 77 Pac. 1042.

Other questions are presented by the record; but we do not think they need be discussed, in view of our conclusions with reference to plaintiff's status as a claimant of a part of the fund realized from the sale of defendant Cheney's privileges as a member of the stock and exchange board.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MITCHELL v. CALIFORNIA & O. C. S. S. CO. (S. F. 5,003.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 23, 1909.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 131*)—STATEMENT—PREPARATION—TIME EXTENSION—DELAY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1054, provides that the judge of the superior court in which an action is pending may extend the time for the preparation of the statement on a new trial, but not to exceed 30 days without the consent of the adverse party. Defendant's notice of motion for a new trial was served April 15, 1907, and the clerk of defendant's attorney thereafter secured orders from the judge extending the time to serve the proposed statement until June 23d. Before the expiration of this time, and during the absence of the judge who had signed the previous orders, one of his associates granted a further extension to July 3, 1907. On July 2d the proposed statement was served, and on the same day plaintiff moved to vacate the last order for lack of jurisdiction, whereupon defendant's attorney applied for relief on the ground of mistake and excusable neglect, as authorized by section 473, and averred that after April 15th he had been engaged in other cases, and had been ill during a large part of the month of June, that he had intrusted the matter to his clerk, who had informed him that he had obtained more time, and that the attorney believed he had obtained it by stipulation; it appearing that the clerk had failed to remember the expiration of Act June 3, 1906 (St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 9, c. 6), allowing courts to extend the time not exceeding 90 days by limitation on the last day of February, 1907. Held, that defendant was entitled to be relieved as prayed.

2. ACTION (§ 66*)—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—RELIEF FROM EXCUSABLE NEGLECT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing relief from a default caused by a failure to perform an act within the time prescribed in case of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, is a remedial provision to be liberally construed in order that cases may be determined upon their substantial merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 737; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. ACTION (§ 66*)—CONSTRUCTION—RELIEF AGAINST DEFAULT—MISTAKE OF FACT OR LAW.

Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing the court to grant relief from defaults caused by mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, extends to both cases of mistake of law and fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 737; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT—SETTLEMENT—TIME—DISCRETION.

The Supreme Court will not disturb an order refusing to relieve a party against a default in failing to prepare a statement on a motion for a new trial within the time prescribed, unless abuse of discretion is shown.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by James Mitchell against the California & Oregon Coast Steamship Company. From an order granting plaintiff's motion to set aside an order extending the time for service of defendant's statement on motion for new trial, and from an order denying defendant's motion for relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, in the settlement of a statement for a new trial, the proposed draft of which had not been served in time, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

See, also, 154 Cal. 731, 99 Pac. 202.

W. F. Williamson (W. W. Sanderson, Edmund Nelson, of counsel), for appellant. Costello & Costello, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from an order of court which in its essence is really two orders; one granting plaintiff's motion to set aside an order extending time for service of defendant's statement on motion for new trial, and the other denying defendant's motion for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the matter of the settlement of the statement for new trial, the proposed draft of which was not served in time. It is practically conceded that the last order of court, extending time for service of the statement, was made without authority. Therefore it will be necessary to discuss only the other appeal, which really involves the whole matter.

Defendant's notice of motion for new trial was served on plaintiff on April 15, 1907. A clerk in the office of defendant's attorney thereafter secured orders from the judge before whom the case was tried extending time to serve the proposed statement on motion for new trial until June 23, 1907. Before the expiration of this time, and during the absence of the judge who had signed the previous orders, one of his associates granted a further extension to and including the 3d day of July, 1907. All of these orders were served in the usual manner; plaintiff's attorneys acknowledging receipt of copies before the documents were filed. On July 2, 1907, the proposed statement was served on plaintiff's attorneys, and on the same day they served on defendant's attorney their motion to vacate the last order of continuance upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to make it. Thereafter proposed amendments were prepared and served, and defendant gave notice that said amendments were not assented to or adopted by it. Finally, after a continuance by consent of the parties, the matter came on regularly on August 27, 1907, for settlement of the statement before the judge who had presided at the trial of the case, and, as plaintiff's attorneys objected to the settlement of any statement, the matter was set for hearing on August 30, 1907. Before the last-mentioned date, defendant's attorney served and filed his motion for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, supporting said motion by an affidavit, and requesting the court to settle the proposed statement. The affidavit of Mr. Williamson shows that he was busily engaged after the 15th of April, 1907, and during most of the time involved in the period following that date either in court or in preparation of briefs; that he was ill during a large part of the month of June; that he intrusted the matter of obtaining time for preparation of his proposed statement on motion for new trial to his clerk, who from time to time informed the affiant that he had obtained more time in the "Mitchell Case"; and that the attorney believed his subordinate was getting extensions of time from plaintiff's attorneys by stipulation. He also made the usual affidavit of merits. Mr. Nelson, Mr. Williamson's managing clerk, by affidavit corroborated the statements in his employer's affidavit.

Respondent calls our attention to the fact that Mr. Williamson's first affidavit states that he was engaged in the superior court of Lassen county during a part of the month of May, when in reality he was in that county in April. This was doubtless an inadvertence which the attorney was permitted by the court to correct in a supplementary affidavit. It was really immaterial, because the time spent in Lassen county was during the period when, in the ordinary course of practice, the statement would have been prepared, and testimony regarding the occupation of Mr. Williamson during any part of that period was relevant as tending to show reason not only for delay, but for intrusting the matter of continuances to his clerk.

The counter affidavit of one of plaintiff's attorneys calls attention to the fact that the clerk is an attorney at law who should have known the rules of practice, but who probably overlooked section 1054 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There are no essential contradictions of Mr. Williamson's statements regarding his engrossment in the work of his clients and his dependence upon the sufficiency of the extensions obtained by his clerk. Counsel for appellant in his brief directs our attention to the circumstance that perhaps his clerk erred by failing to remember "that the amendment of the statute passed by the Legislature in extraordinary session after the great fire of April, 1906 (St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 9, c. 6), which allowed a court to extend time not exceeding 90 days expired by self-limitation on the last day of February, 1907, and but a short time before the unfortunate error which has made this appeal necessary." We think it legitimate also to consider the fact that the time taken by appellant after the expiration of the period lawfully allowed by the court was not very great—about 37 days—and no very serious hardship can be presumed from such delay.

Under all the circumstances disclosed, we think that the relief for which application was made should have been granted. The tendency of this court has always been to relieve parties from their defaults and mistakes, upon proper showing, to the end that matters may be heard upon the merits. Treating of this subject, and particularly of the interpretation of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the following language was used by this court in Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 667, 63 Pac. 64: "Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a remedial provision, and is to be liberally construed so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and to give to the party claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense to the action an opportunity to present it. Buell v.

Emerich, 85 Cal. 116, 24 Pac. 644; Harbaugh v. Honey Lake, etc., Water Co., 109 Cal. 70, 41 Pac. 792; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 Pac. 932. It is for this reason that we more readily listen to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default, than where the motion has been granted, since in such case the defendant may be deprived of a substantial right; whereas, it may be assumed, if nothing to the contrary is shown, that the plaintiff will be able at any time to establish his cause of action. If, for any reason, he will be unable to do so, that fact should be made to appear; but, if he is merely subjected to delay or inconvenience by having the default set aside, he can be compensated therefor by the terms which the court would impose as a condition to granting the motion."

Ever since the decision in the case of Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 42, 29 Pac. 332, a very liberal policy has been pursued by this court in cases of the kind here under review. In that case the hasty reading of a stipulation whereby plaintiff gained the mistaken idea that the time to file his proposed bill of exceptions was extended 30 days beyond the period granted by law, instead of 30 days after the date of the stipulation, was considered a sufficient excuse for the failure to make timely service of the plaintiff's draft of the statement.

In Pollitz v. Wickersham, 150 Cal. 242, 88 Pac. 911, a mistake of one day was made by a clerk in the office of one of the attorneys. He entered on his diary a note that the last day to serve the proposed bill of exceptions was May 24th, instead of May 23d, the correct date. On May 24th opposing counsel refused to grant a stipulation extending time. Thereafter the bill of exceptions was prepared and served 11 days following the time allowed by law. Application for relief was not made until six months and one day later, yet this court held that the bill of exceptions was settled without abuse of discretion on the part of the court. Similar action has been upheld in: Vinson v. Los Angeles Pac. R. R. Co., 147 Cal. 483, 82 Pac. 53; Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 415, 53 Pac. 935; King v. Dugan, 150 Cal. 260, 88 Pac. 925.

It has been suggested that the real mistake upon which appellant's prayer for relief was based was one of law and not of fact. While the clerk's inadvertence was doubtless one of law, Mr. Williamson's was a mistake of fact; but the court will, in a proper case, grant relief against a mistake of law, exercising the power given it under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. "The language of this section does not limit the relief to mistakes of fact." Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 658, 31 Pac. 624 (31 Am. St. Rep. 247). See, also: Tuttle v. Scott, 119 Cal. 588, 51 Pac. 849; Kirstein v. Madden, 38 Cal. 162.

Undoubtedly courts of appeal have shown great reluctance, in cases of this kind, to disturb the order made by the lower court. "Unless the record clearly shows that the court has abused its discretion, its order, whether it be to grant or deny the application, will be affirmed." Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 371, 70 Pac. 166. Having this excellent and salutary rule in mind, we are constrained, notwithstanding it, to believe that the order made in this case which is now under consideration was calculated to defeat, rather than to advance, the ends of justice.

The order is therefore reversed, and the superior court and the judge thereof directed to settle the proposed statement according to law.

LUKENS et al. v. NYE, State Controller.
(Sac. 1,677.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1909.)

1. STATUTES (§ 26*)—APPROVAL BY GOVERNOR—STATUS WHILE CONSIDERING BILLS.

While engaged in considering bills which have passed both houses of the Legislature and are before him for approval or disapproval, the Governor acts in a legislative, and not an executive, capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 33*)—ENACTMENT—APPROVAL BY GOVERNOR—APPROVAL IN PART.

Under Const. art. 4, § 16, providing that on a bill being presented to the Governor, "if he approves it he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated," the Governor has no power to agree with the beneficiary under an appropriation bill that, on the latter's agreeing to accept a certain amount less than the appropriation, he will approve and sign the bill, and such agreement is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 215*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC MATTERS—AGREEMENT WITH GOVERNOR ON APPROVAL OF BILL.

Where an appropriation bill "authorized and directed" the State Controller to draw his warrant for the amount stated therein, the amount cannot be questioned by any official or citizen, and is not affected by any agreement between the Governor and the beneficiary that a warrant for a smaller sum may be drawn in satisfaction of the whole amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 291; Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

4. STATES (§ 94*)—CONTRACTS—AUTHORITY OF GOVERNOR.

Under Const. art. 4, § 32, providing that no payment shall be made on any claim against the state under any contract made without express authority of law, and that all unauthorized agreements therefor shall be void, an agreement between the Governor and the beneficiary under an appropriation bill that a less amount than that appropriated shall be accepted in full satisfaction is void for want of authority to make it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 126*)—VALIDITY—PUBLIC POLICY.

A contract between the Governor and the beneficiary under an appropriation bill, by which the Governor approved and signed the bill on the beneficiary agreeing to accept a less amount in full satisfaction, is void as against public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 590; Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

6. ESTOPPEL (§ 78*)—GROUNDS—VOID CONTRACT.

An agreement between the Governor and the beneficiary under an appropriation bill, pursuant to which the Governor approved and signed the bill on the beneficiary agreeing to accept a less amount in full satisfaction, being void for want of authority to make it and also as contrary to public policy, does not estop the beneficiary to claim the full amount, though it may have induced the Governor to approve the bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

7. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—DETERMINATION OF VALIDITY—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

The motives of the Governor, acting in his legislative capacity in approving an appropriation bill, cannot be made the subject of judicial inquiry for the purpose of invalidating or preventing the full operation of the bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 131; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

8. STATUTES (§ 284*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—MOTIVES OF GOVERNOR IN APPROVING BILL.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to show what induced the Governor to approve an appropriation bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 383; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

9. MANDAMUS (§ 7*)—DEFENSES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where a contract between the Governor and the beneficiary under an appropriation bill, pursuant to which the Governor approved the bill on the beneficiary agreeing to accept a less amount in full satisfaction, which is set up in defense of mandamus to require the Controller to issue his warrant for the full amount of the appropriation, is void for want of authority to make it, and as against public policy, the discretion of the court does not require a denial of the writ, on the ground that the claim for the excess over the amount agreed on is unjust and inequitable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Emma Mullan Lukens and May R. Mullan for mandamus to A. B. Nye, State Controller. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Malcolm C. Glenn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant. G. Russell Lukens, Hiram W. Johnson, and A. A. De Ligne, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action in mandamus to compel the Controller to issue a warrant on the State Treasurer to the plaintiffs for the sum of $22,808.15, being the second installment of the amount appropriated to John Mullan by the act of the Legislature approved March 22, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 791, c. 592), in satisfaction of his claim against the state. The plaintiffs are his assignees. The act appropriates $45,616.30 in payment of said claim, and declares that "the Controller is hereby authorized and directed to draw his warrant for the said sum and the Treasurer of State is hereby authorized and directed to pay the same, and thereupon the said John Mullan shall make and deliver unto the Controller a full receipt and release of his said claim." One-half is made payable on January 1, 1906, and one-half on January 1, 1907. The installment due on January 1, 1906, has been paid. This action is to compel a warrant for the remaining one-half. The act exempts the claim from the provisions of section 672 of the Political Code, and therefore it is not required to have the sanction of the board of examiners.

The answer of the Controller alleges the following facts in defense: Prior to the passage of the act the claim had been assigned to the plaintiffs. After the bill had been passed in both houses of the Legislature, and before its approval, the Governor informed the plaintiffs that the amount allowed by the bill was excessive, and that he would not approve the same unless the plaintiffs would agree to accept the sum of $25,000 in full satisfaction of the claim. Thereupon plaintiffs and the Governor agreed that $25,000 was the full amount of the claim. An agreement was drawn up providing that, in consideration of the sum of $25,000, to be paid in two installments, the first, of $22,808.15, to be paid January 1, 1906, and the second, of $2,191.85, to be paid on January 1, 1907, the said plaintiffs acknowledged full receipt and satisfaction of the claim, and released the state from further liability, claim, and demand therefor, and that if the payments were not made on said dates, the agreement should be void. For the purpose of inducing the Governor to approve said bill and attach his signature thereto, so that it would become a law, plaintiffs signed the said agreement and delivered it to the Governor for the benefit of the state, and the Governor, relying upon the said agreement, and being thereby induced to do so, signed the said bill, whereby it became a law. The plaintiffs, in pursuance of said agreement, on January 2, 1906, demanded of the Controller a warrant for the sum of $22,808.15, due on that day by the act, and thereupon the Controller, for the purpose of carrying out said agreement, and relying thereon, and also on the representations of the plaintiffs that they would accept the sum of $25,000 in full satisfaction of said claim, issued and delivered the said warrant so demanded, and the plaintiffs collected the same from the Treasurer. The Controller is ready and willing to issue a warrant for the remainder of $2,191.85, due under the agreement, and has offered the same to the plaintiffs, who refuse to accept it.

A demurrer was sustained to the answer, and judgment passed to the plaintiffs as prayed for. The appellant contends, first, that the agreement is valid; second, that the plaintiffs, after thereby inducing the Governor to sign the appropriation bill in question, are estopped to demand any greater sum than the agreement provides; and third, that under the rules applying in mandamus the lower court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should have refused the writ on the ground that the claim for the excess is unjust and inequitable.

The Governor was without power to take or receive the agreement in question, and he could not make it a valid contract. While engaged in considering bills which have passed both houses of the Legislature, and which are presented to him for approval or disapproval, he is acting in a legislative capacity, and not as an executive. He is for that purpose a part of the legislative department of the state. Fowler v. Peirce, 2 Cal. 172; People v. Bowen, 21 N. Y. 521. As an executive officer, he is forbidden to exercise any legislative power or function except as in the Constitution expressly provided. Article 3. His powers, as a part of the legislative department, are specifically enumerated in the Constitution. When such a bill is presented, "if he approves it he shall sign it; but if not he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated." If, while the Legislature is in session, he neglects to return or sign a bill for 10 days, Sundays excepted, it becomes a law without his signature. If the Legislature adjourns within the 10 days, it does not become a law unless, within the designated time after such adjournment, he shall sign and deposit the same in the office of the Secretary of State. Const. art. 4, § 16. When exercising these powers he is a special agent with limited powers, and, as in the case of other special agents, he can act only in the specified mode, and can exercise only the granted powers. If he attempts to exercise them in a different mode, or to exercise powers not given, his act will be wholly ineffectual and void for any and every purpose. When he goes beyond the limits of these powers in the attempt to exercise them, his acts, so far as they transcend the powers, are of no force.

In Ohio the Senate alone attempted to empower a committee to investigate the city officers of Cincinnati, a matter not germane to the powers or business of the Senate. Holding the committee an illegal body the court said: "Whatever inherent power the General Assembly in its entirety may possess by virtue of its being the repository of the whole legislative power of the state, we do not think it follows as a conclusion that one of its constituent parts must likewise possess the same inherent powers. It may be conceded that either branch of the Legislature has all such powers as are necessarily implied in the express grant of powers to it by the Constitution; but, under the system of distribution of powers in the American Constitutions, and especially under the Constitution of Ohio, which is explicit in excluding from the legislative department the exercise of any power which is not delegated in the Constitution (article 1, § 20), the authority of a single branch of the Legislature to act separately must be found in express terms or by necessary implication in the Constitution. It is clear that the 'legislative power' whatever may be the extent of that power which is conferred upon the General Assembly, is not expressly delegated to a part of the General Assembly. Nor is it impliedly so delegated. The Constitution explicitly grants and defines the separate powers of each branch of the General Assembly.

* * * The powers of each house are not general and subject only to limitation in the Constitution, as is the legislative power of the entire General Assembly; but they are specific or enumerated powers. * * * We therefore must look to the enumerated powers alone to determine this question; and it were just as sane to claim that either branch of the Legislature might, by itself, enact a law as to claim that by 'inherent power' it could independently exercise any legislative power outside of those specifically designated in the Constitution." State v. Guilbert, 75 Ohio St. 43, 78 N. E. 934.

The same principles apply when the power of the Governor as a legislative instrumentality is involved. He may act only in the prescribed mode, and may exercise only the powers enumerated or necessarily implied. In the case of a bill containing several items of appropriation of money he may approve one or more of them, and object to the others. Article 4, § 16. In no other case is he empowered to modify or change the effect of a proposed law, or to do anything concerning it except to approve or disapprove it as a whole. He cannot participate in the discussions or proceedings of either house, except by sending them a veto message when a bill is disapproved. If he approves a proposed bill, his duty requires him to sign it as evidence of such approval. This approval, except in the single instance stated, must be of the bill as a whole, and without qualification. Any attempt on his part to attach to his approval any qualification, or to withhold his consent to a part of the law and give it to other parts, will either be entirely nugatory and ineffectual, and leave the approval absolute, or it will completely, nullify the approval and operate as a veto of the whole bill. Porter v. Hughes, 4 Ariz. 1, 32 Pac. 165; State v. Holder, 76 Miss. 158, 23 South. 643. His approval makes such a bill a part of the statute law, next to the Constitution, the highest manifestation of the will of the people. The Governor cannot qualify or change it by any contemporaneous agreement or contract on behalf of the state with persons who are to be benefited by the law, whereby they agree to release to the state a part of such benefit. That would be to permit the Governor and the persons concerned to make the law to suit themselves without the concurrence of the legislative houses. His signature, when it is shown to have been attached, is the exclusive and conclusive evidence of his unqualified approval, and, the result being law, no evidence, nor the judgment of any court, can be allowed to modify or change its terms or effect, or prevent or impair its complete operative force. The Constitution makes no distinction between a law appropriating money to satisfy the claim of a private individual and a law declaring the will of the people on any other subject. Its mandate is unalterably fixed by the words of the bill, made a law by the final act of the Governor, and it is unchangeable except by the power which enacted it. "It is a principle in the English law that an act of Parliament, delivered in clear and intelligible terms, cannot be questioned, or its authority controlled, in any court of justice." 1 Kent's Com. 447. And in the United States: "If there be no constitutional objection to a statute, it is with us as absolute and uncontrollable as laws flowing from the sovereign power in any other form of government." Id. 448.

This law is binding upon all the executive officers of the state. It expressly commands the Controller to draw warrants on the Treasurer for the sum appropriated. The Political Code, also a binding law, directs him to do the same. Section 433, subd. 17; section 672. These commands of the law are not to be questioned by any official or citizen, or controlled by the courts. Any agreement between the Governor and the beneficiaries to the effect that the Controller shall draw his warrants for a smaller sum in satisfaction of the whole amount must necessarily be futile and entirely void for any purpose. The facts alleged could not be proven as the foundation upon which to prevent the operation of the law, or to qualify its terms in any respect, and they are in law irrelevant and immaterial.

The scheme of legislation provided in the Constitution does not contemplate nor countenance such proceedings by the Governor as a mode of qualifying or affecting the operation of a law. If it were permitted, the Governor would practically have power to adjust claims against the state, a power not given to him by any law, and which the Constitution plainly vests exclusively in the Legislature. Article 4, §§ 22, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34. The appropriation bills enacted into law, instead of being as the Constitution intends, the final declaration of the people as to the disposition of the public funds, would be subject to the negotiations and bargains of the Governor with the beneficiaries, not manifested by any public record, and resting upon private agreements in writing, or in parol. We say in parol because no distinction can be made, if the power exists, between a parol contract of this character and one in writing. The fiscal officers of the state would not be justified in relying on the sanction of the law for the disbursement of state funds; they would be forced to inquire of the Governor and of the beneficiaries to learn whether or not an agreement had been made modifying such laws, or creating an estoppel against the enforcement thereof. In case of disputes, differences, or doubts concerning the terms or execution of such agreements the officers would have to decide as to the truth of the matter. It is impossible to overestimate the scandals that might arise under such a system if it were authorized. The Constitution expressly declares that no payment of public funds shall be made upon any claim against the state, under any contract made without express authority of law, and that all unauthorized agreements or contracts therefor shall be null and void. Article 4, § 32. The entire proceeding was clearly contrary to public policy.

The agreement in question being wholly void, and also against public policy, it cannot be the foundation for an estoppel. Nor can an equitable estoppel be based upon it as the inducement or consideration which may have led the Governor to approve the bill which it purports to modify. The Governor was acting in a legislative capacity, and his signature was an act in the process of making a law. It is well established that the motives which impelled the Legislature, or any component part or member of it, to enact a law cannot be made a subject of judicial inquiry for the purpose of invalidating or preventing the full operation of the law. Harpending v. Haight, 39 Cal. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 432; People v. Bigler, 5 Cal. 26; Cooley, Con. Lim. 259; 2 Suth. Stat. Constr. (2d Ed.) § 496; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 569; People v. Glenn, 100 Cal. 423, 35 Pac. 302, 38 Am. St. Rep. 305. As the result of this rule, and because, as heretofore shown, it is incompetent, all evidence to show what induced the Governor to sign the bill would be rejected, and the facts upon which the estoppel is supposed to rest could never be established.

But, conceding their existence as alleged, the whole plan was against public policy, and for that reason the facts are not sufficient to create an estoppel. The authorities fully support this proposition. In People v. Board, 75 N. Y. 42, the salary of the police surgeon was fixed by law at $2,250. The board of police passed a resolution appointing Satterlee to the position at a salary of $1,500. He accepted the appointment, began service under it, and received part of the salary at the reduced rate. The board had no power to change the salary. It was held that the contract, claimed to have been created by the appointment and acceptance, to serve for the salary mentioned in the resolution was not binding, and that the transaction did not constitute an estoppel against him to prevent him from enforcing payment at the legal rate. The cases of Kehn v. State, 93 N. Y. 293, Clark v. State, 142 N. Y. 105, 36 N. E. 817, and Rettinghouse v. Ashland, 106 Wis. 595, 82 N. W. 555, are similar in effect. "Contracts, as a general rule, cannot vest in parties any rights in contravention of law or public policy." Shorman v. Lakin, 47 Ark. 354, 1 S. W. 560. "The reason is too obvious to admit of question. The law might, otherwise, at times be evaded, or its policy defeated, by a few strokes of the pen." Klenk v. Knoble, 37 Ark. 304. "An unlawful agreement cannot defeat a lawful right. A contract which is void as being against public policy cannot create an estoppel." Tate v. Building Ass'n, 97 Va. 79, 33 S. E. 383 (45 L. R. A. 243, 75 Am. St. Rep. 770). "Where there is no power or authority vested by law in officers or agents, no void act of theirs can be cured by aid of the doctrine of estoppel." Raisch v. San Francisco, 80 Cal. 6, 22 Pac. 22. See, also, Oregonian Ry. Co. v. Oregon R. & N. Co. (C. O.) 10 Sawy. 479, 23 Fed. 232; Seiple v. Bank, 5 Sawy. 394, Fed. Cas. No. 12,660; Dupas v. Wassell, 1 Dill, 213, Fed. Cas. No. 4,182; Webb v. Davis, 37 Ark. 555; Langan v. Sankey, 55 Iowa, 54, 7 N. W. 393; Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 311, 99 Am. Dec. 365; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur., § 935. The consequence of holding this agreement effectual as an estoppel would be to make it valid, notwithstanding the entire lack of power in the Governor to demand or accept it, and despite its infringement of the express terms of the statute. Such contracts could always be set up as an estoppel, and the public policy which prohibits them would be defeated. As said by Mr. Justice Nutter, who wrote the opinion in this case in the District Court of Appeal, to give the agreement validity in this manner, would "establish a principle at variance with the spirit of our system of government that would enable Governors as a branch of the legislative department to exercise in their approval or disapproval of bills a power withheld by the Constitution."

The rules which govern the courts in suits in mandamus do not authorize the issuance of the writ in the present case. In Wiedwald v. Dodson, 95 Cal. 453, 30 Pac. 580, the court declared the well-established doctrine that it is a discretionary writ, and that it need not issue to compel an official act not made imperative by the proper construction of a statute, and contrary to its spirit, although in strict conformity to its literal terms. In Board v. Council, 128 Cal. 369, 60 Pac. 976, a tax had been levied and had been paid by many of the taxpayers. It was asserted that the wrong board had made the levy, and a suit in mandamus was begun to compel a levy by the legal board. The result of another levy would have been that many of the taxpayers would have been compelled to pay the same tax twice. This court refused the writ, and quoted as authority Merrill on Mandamus, §§ 71-73, to the effect that, "The writ of mandate will not issue where it will work injustice, or introduce confusion and disorder, or operate harshly, or where it will not promote substantial justice." This is doubtless a correct statement of the general rule on the subject, and in many cases it controls. But it has no real application to the case at bar. The same principles also apply to and control the doctrine of estoppel in equity. Yet, as we have seen, a contract which is illegal and against public policy will not suffice to create an estoppel. The writ of mandate is discretionary, and frequently the principles of equity are to be resorted to for the determination of the question whether or not it should issue. But these principles cannot be invoked in mandamus, any more than in equity, to enforce agreements which are void in law, and which have been made in violation of public policy, which would enable the officers of the state to avoid carrying out the positive mandates of a constitutional statute, and which would sanction and enforce the doctrine that an act of the Legislature may be modified by an unauthorized contract executed at the unauthorized demand of the Governor.

It has been suggested that the power of a Governor, who believes that a sum so proposed to be appropriated to a private individual to pay his claim against the state exceeds the amount justly due, is similar to that of a judge engaged in the trial of a case, who believes that the verdict returned by the jury is excessive. The conditions are so variant that there is no real analogy. The Governor has no legal power to reduce the amount of the claim. His only course is laid down in the Constitution. He must sign the bill as it is, or he must withhold his approval and return it with his objections to the house in which it originated. The judge, on the contrary, is, for the time being and for the purposes of that case, the repository of the whole judicial power of the state. He may render judgment for any amount he sees fit, and, if no further action is taken by the parties, that judgment will be valid, and will stand as the measure of their rights. If it does not conform to the verdict of the jury, or to the agreement of the parties made manifest by their consent to a modification and reduction of the verdict, it may, of course, be reversed on appeal. But unless thus reversed, it is conclusive. There is no lack of power, although there may be an erroneous exercise of it. The Governor, in the case supposed, is proceeding entirely beyond his official power, and his acts are of no more force, so far as the validity and effect of the agreement is concerned, than if they were those of a private citizen. The judge acts within his powers and in accordance with his duty. The purpose of his official existence is that he may do justice between the parties to the litigation. The Governor acts outside of his powers, which, in this respect, limit his duty. It is never his duty in such matters to act in excess of his power. The judge does not arbitrarily reduce the verdict and give judgment for a smaller sum. He offers the plaintiff an opportunity to agree to a reduction; if he agrees, the judge has power to render the judgment accordingly; if he refuses, the judge can regularly do nothing more than grant the new trial. In either case he acts strictly within his powers. The conduct of the judge in thus inducing an agreement between the parties and a settlement of the litigation is not only not illegal nor contrary to public policy, but it is especially encouraged by public policy. It has been sanctioned by the practice of many years in the courts of this country. See 37 Cent. Dig. c. 1363, § 324. The power to do this exists at common law, and it is therefore authorized by the law of this state. Pol. Code, § 4468. The Governor, if he has such power, could compel the person concerned to yield to his demands and execute any agreement he required, at the peril of losing his entire claim, and such person will have no alternative except to apply to a succeeding Legislature. He has no other appeal. A power so arbitrary cannot justly or reasonably be implied from anything contained in the Constitution, or in our system of government. It is not sanctioned by custom, or even by precedent. It cannot be recognized by the courts until the people confer it in express terms.

A closer analogy would be the case of a judge giving judgment for a certain sum of money, and contemporaneously taking an agreement from the plaintiff to accept, in full satisfaction of the judgment, a smaller amount. The defendant, in such a case, might perhaps obtain relief by application under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., or by motion for a new trial, or by suit in equity directly attacking the judgment, provided he began the proper proceeding within the time and in the manner provided by law. But if he suffered that time to pass, he would be bound to pay the judgment in full. The agreement would form no part of the record, it would not be self-executing, nor could it operate directly upon the judgment of its own force, and it could not be used collaterally to impeach the judgment, or to satisfy it in part. The law has provided no method for the enforcement of an agreement taken by the Governor in contravention of the statute he has put in force. The veto or rejection of the entire bill is the only means he has to enforce his objections thereto; and, when the bill is signed by him, the case is parallel to that of a judgment when collaterally attacked after the time for direct attack has expired. The agreement could have no effect, and proof of it could not be permitted to impair the law, or change the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEVY v. CALEDONIAN INS. CO. et al.
(S. F. 5,157.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1909.
Rehearing Denied Dec. 23, 1909.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 303*)—DESTRUCTION OF SUBJECT-MATTER—EFFECT.

Where a contract is made in contemplation of the continued existence of a subject-matter, which is after the making of the contract destroyed without the fault of either party, non-performance of the contract is excused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1409-1416; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 303*)—PERSONAL SERVICE—DEATH OF PARTY—EFFECT.

A contract calling for the rendition of personal service by one is subject to the implied condition that, in the event of his death, further performance on both sides will be excused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 79*)—EMPLOYMENT OF AGENTS—CONTRACTS—TERMINATION.

A contract of employment of an insurance broker to place in certain companies or through them all fire insurance business which he might secure fixed a monthly salary to cover all compensation and expenses, and provided that the agreement should continue for two years. There was nothing to show that the parties contracted with reference to the broker's ability to secure business in a particular district. His business in San Francisco before the earthquake in 1906 amounted to 80 per cent. of his entire business and in the business district then destroyed to 80 per cent. of his city business. The broker's value to the insurance companies lay in his clientage which continued, notwithstanding the destruction of a part of the city. The business continued as profitable after the earthquake as before. Held, that the insurance companies could not terminate the contract on the ground of the destruction of a part of San Francisco by the earthquake.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by S. W. Levy against the Caledonian Insurance Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Van Ness, for appellants. Goodfellow & Eells, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. On March 31, 1906, the plaintiff, an insurance broker at San Francisco, entered into a written contract with one Conroy, who was acting on behalf of four foreign insurance corporations, which he represented as manager for the Pacific Coast. By this contract Levy, in consideration of the monthly payment to him of $1,000, agreed to place in said companies, or through them, any and all fire insurance business which he might be able to secure or control. The consideration above expressed was to cover all compensation for services rendered by Levy and clerical service of his employes. The agreement provided that it was to continue for a period of two years, commencing April 1, 1906. There were other terms, none of which have any bearing upon the present controversy. No payments were ever made to Levy under the contract. This action was commenced in September, 1906, and by it the plaintiff sought to recover from said four corporations the five installments of $1,000 each, falling due up to the 1st day of September. A supplemental complaint, filed in March, 1907, asked judgment for the further sum of $6,000. Plaintiff recovered judgment for the sums demanded, and the defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The defense relied upon is stated in the answer as follows: The defendants allege that, at the time they entered into said agreement with plaintiff, the principal portion of the business controlled and within the understanding of the parties to be controlled by plaintiff consisted of risks located in the business district of San Francisco; that said business district was, during the 18th, 19th, and 20th days of April, 1906, totally destroyed by earthquake and fire; and that by reason of such destruction, and of the destruction of the insurable property in said district, it will not be possible for plaintiff to secure for said companies the business in consideration of which he made the agreement, and that by reason thereof the consideration for which said companies entered into said agreement has failed in a material respect. The defendants allege that they entered into said agreement in consideration and because of the fact that plaintiff controlled a large insurance business in said business district. It is further alleged that, immediately after the destruction of said business district, the defendants notified plaintiff that they would no longer recognize the agreement as binding upon them and rescinded said agreement.

The court found that the consideration for the covenants and promises of the defendants is as set forth in said written agreement and not otherwise; that it is not true that, by reason of the destruction of the business district or the insurable property therein, it will not be possible for plaintiff to secure the business in consideration of which the defendants entered into said agreement. The agreement, it was found, has not failed in any material respect. The court finds that the business of insurance at all times since the said fire has been conducted in the city and county of San Francisco, although the location of the risks has changed by reason of the said fire; that the plaintiff has been able to procure, and has in fact procured, for the defendants a larger amount of insurance than before the fire. The defendants, the court finds, continued, after the earthquake and fire, to accept from the plaintiff performance of the agreement on his part, and received from him fire insurance until June 21, 1906, the date of the attempted rescission. The finding on the plea of rescission is against the defendants. This, however, is immaterial, if the court below was right in its view that there was no ground for rescission.

The findings regarding the business procured by plaintiff for defendant companies since the fire are fully sustained by the evidence. There is no dispute of the fact that after the fire, as before, the plaintiff placed with the defendants all the fire insurance business which he was able to control. The plaintiff testified that within 15 days after the fire he resumed his insurance business. The interruption was only during the time when "everything was in chaos and the insurers had no papers or books." The trial of the action commenced on March 25, 1907, not quite one year after the date fixed for the commencement of the contract. From March 31, 1906, to the time of his testimony, the plaintiff placed with the defendant companies insurance on which the premiums amounted to $45,219.84. The average for the three years preceding the fire had been from $30,000 to $35,000. On these facts we can see absolutely no foundation for the contention of the defendants that they were relieved from performing their contract by any failure of consideration. The appellants seek to bring the case within the well-established rule excusing performance where a contract is made in contemplation of the continued existence of a subject-matter which is, after the making of the contract, destroyed without the fault of either party. Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826; Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 104 Pac. 432; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514, 9 Am. Rep. 65; Land Co. v. Harriman, 68 N. H. 374, 44 Atl. 527; 9 Cyc. 631; 1 Beach Contr. § 217. For example, this contract, which called for the rendition of personal services by Mr. Levy, was, under the rule stated, subject to the implied condition that, in the event of his death, further performance on both sides should be excused. Robinson v. Davison, L. R. 6 Exch. 269; Spalding v. Rosa, 71 N. Y. 40, 27 Am. Rep. 7; Johnson v. Walker, 155 Mass. 253, 29 N. E. 522, 31 Am. St. Rep. 550. But neither the agreement itself nor the additional evidence discloses directly or by necessary inference that the parties contracted with reference to plaintiff's ability to secure business in a particular district. The appellants' manager testified that plaintiff's business, before the fire, had been partly within, and partly without, the city. The city business amounted to 80 per cent. of the whole, and that in the business district to 80 per cent. of the city business. This was the extent of defendants' showing. But the destruction of the buildings in the burned district did not destroy the plaintiff's capacity to obtain insurance. The most reasonable supposition is that the defendants contracted to pay him $1,000 per month, not because he was able to write insurance in a certain location, but because his relations with certain people, wherever located, enabled him to write insurance for them. His value to the appellants lay in his clientele, and this continued, notwithstanding the burning of buildings in which some of his clients had been doing business. Within a brief period after the fire, most of the merchants whose establishments in the burned district had been destroyed found quarters and resumed business in other parts of the city. There they again required insurance, and the plaintiff was again enabled to place the insurance of those of them who were his clients. It is said that there was, after the fire, a great demand for insurance, and that appellants could have obtained this business without Levy's assistance. But this conclusion is merely speculative, and can have no bearing on the rights of the parties under their contract. It may be that even before the fire the defendant companies might have been able, through their own efforts, to get a large part of the business which was brought to them by plaintiff. But they evidently considered Levy's influence valuable, and agreed to pay him for it. They should not be heard to say that they might have done as well without his aid. That his efforts were effectual is shown by the fact that he turned over a largely increased amount of premiums. Even though the excess was due, in whole or in part, to increased premium rates, there is nothing in the record to suggest that the business was not as profitable as that which the plaintiff had brought in before the earthquake and fire.

In view of what we have said, there seems to be little reason for discussing at any length appellants' further contention that they are relieved because the performance of the contract had become impossible by the occurrence of an event which could not reasonably have been anticipated. There was no impossibility. Plaintiff was able to perform his obligation to furnish insurance. He did perform it. It is equally possible for defendants to perform their part.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

8. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 146*)—ACCOUNTING—ACTION—LACHES.

Defendants' testator was appointed guardian for M. and her deceased brother July 22, 1862, when they were 12 and 14 years of age, respectively. Testator thereafter became their stepfather, and never filed an inventory or appraisal of the estate of either of his wards until March 21, 1906. Continuously up to the time of his death he denied to his wards that he had ever received any money or property belonging to them. In fact, on December 31, 1861, by the will of R., who was not of kin to the wards, they were bequeathed $10,000 and other property, but by a later will R. bequeathed all of his property to others. In October, 1862, testator in a contest over the validity of the will of R. was granted leave to settle the claims of his wards for $4,000, which was paid to him as guardian, and for which he filed a receipt which became a part of the files of the estate of R., and was not discovered by the wards until January 15, 1907, when they were informed thereof by a person who was examining the files for other purposes, immediately after which M. and the heirs of her brother then deceased filed a claim against testator's estate, and, on this being disallowed, brought suit against his executors. The inventory filed by the guardian in 1906, just prior to his death, showed that no estate, property, or money of the wards had ever come into his possession, and his final account showed that, while he had received no assets, he had expended for the support and education of his wards $500 each. Held, that the complaint was not demurrable for laches.

11. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 431*)—ACTION—CONDITION PRECEDENT—ACCOUNTING—ACTION AGAINST GUARDIAN'S EXECUTORS.

Where a guardian converted his wards' funds and did not account therefor during his lifetime, he having lived for a long period after his wards reached majority, the wards were not required to sue his executors for an accounting before suing them to recover the funds converted.

12. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 229*)—CLAIMS—PRESENTATION—EFFECT.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; J. O. Goodwin, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Miller and others against W. H. Ash, as executor, and Louise Ash, as executrix of the will of William Ash, deceased. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed as to plaintiff Elizabeth Miller, and affirmed as to the others.

S. W. McCaslin and C. E. McLaughlin, for appellants. Thomas Rutledge and W. H. Carlin, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This case was decided by the District Court of Appeal and afterward an order for a rehearing was duly granted by this court. The suit was against the executor and executrix of the estate of W. H. Ash; the plaintiffs being Elizabeth Miller and the three sons and sole heirs of her deceased brother, Robert Read. The complaint very fully set forth the appointment of Ash as guardian of the persons and estates of Mrs. Miller (formerly Read) and her brother Robert; the payment to Ash, by permission of the probate court, of a sum of money in compromise of claims against the estate of one Reynolds, based upon legacies left to Ash's two wards by one of Reynolds' purported wills; the concealment by Ash of the existence of the interests of his wards in Reynolds' estate and of his collection of money in satisfaction of their claims; the filing of his account after many years wherein he falsely asserted that he had received nothing as guardian for the benefit of either ward; their subsequent discovery of his fraud practiced upon them; and many other matters which will more fully appear in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal. The demurrer of defendants to the complaint was sustained, and, upon the refusal of plaintiffs to amend, judgment against them was rendered accordingly. The District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment of the lower court as to the three heirs of Robert Read, but overruled it as to Mrs. Miller, holding on the authority of Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 16, and Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 579, 42 Pac. 1086, that the action should have been prosecuted for the benefit of the heirs of Robert Read by the administrator of his estate.

In the petition for hearing in this court and in the briefs filed, our attention has been particularly called to the rule that all persons interested in a trust must be made parties to a suit against the trustee. It is contended that this action should have been prosecuted by Mrs. Miller, by the administrator of the estate of her deceased brother Robert Read, and by the three sons of the latter, all as joint plaintiffs, but that no claim having been presented against Ash's estate by the administrator of the estate of Robert Read, deceased, there can be no recovery on the part of any one. It is not necessary here to determine whether or not in the matter of a trust in which Mrs. Miller and the heirs of Robert Read were the joint beneficiaries it would be necessary to join said heirs of Read with their aunt Mrs. Miller and the administrator of their father's estate in bringing a suit against the trustee. When we consider the fact that each ward of William Ash had a several claim, some of the seeming difficulties of the situation disappear. Mrs. Miller, according to the allegations of the complaint, had a distinct, individual claim against the estate of her deceased guardian which existed just as independently and separately as if the other ward had been a stranger and not her brother. It is true that these plaintiffs when they presented their claim against Ash designated themselves as "joint claimants." It is also true that attached as an exhibit to this claim is a full statement of the facts regarding Ash's receipt of the $4,000 in compromise of the claims of his wards against the estate of Reynolds. This indicates that there was in reality no joint interest, but that Ash had mingled and appropriated money belonging to both estates. His combining of these funds did not make the wards joint owners, nor did his settlement in gross of their claims against Reynolds' estate without segregation of the amounts severally due his wards deprive Mrs. Miller of the right to demand her property. If Mrs. Miller had wished to make a separate claim against the estate of Ash without joining her nephews, she could have done only that which was done. She could have merely stated in her claim the circumstances which gave her an interest in that estate. She was not even required to assert the proportion of the fund to which she was entitled. That was a fact to be determined by the probate court because Ash had put it out of her power to calculate just what proportion of the fund received from Reynolds' estate belonged to her. The difficulty of making this calculation was due to a situation of Ash's own creation, and his representatives cannot therefore complain because Mrs. Miller's claim failed to specify some particular share of the $4,000 and interest due her. The failure to segregate the funds belonging, respectively, to Mrs. Miller and her brother was due to the mala fides of Ash. The difficulty, if any there be, resulted from Ash's own act. The claim as presented, therefore, contained all the necessary information respecting Mrs. Miller's interest in the Ash estate. Such claim was the proper basis, after its rejection, of a suit by Mrs. Miller against Ash's executor and executrix. While the decision of the District Court of Appeal will leave some of the complaint as surplusage so far as Mrs. Miller's cause of action is concerned, that does not alter the fact that a cause of action is stated in her behalf.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal, which we hereby adopt, is as follows:

"The court below sustained the demurrer to the complaint, and, leave to amend having been denied, judgment was entered in favor of the respondents. This appeal is by the plaintiffs from said judgment.

"The action is founded on an alleged claim of plaintiffs against the estate of William Ash, deceased, defendants' testator, for the sum of $16,000, said amount representing the principal, amounting to $4,000, and the interest accruing thereupon, at the rate of 7 per cent, per annum from the 13th day of February, 1863, to the time of the filing of the complaint herein on April 18, 1907. Said claim was on the 15th day of February, 1907, presented to the defendants, as the executor and executrix, respectively, of said estate, for allowance, and the same rejected by said executor and executrix on the 18th day of February, 1907. The claim has its origin in a transaction occurring over 44 years prior to the institution of this suit, and is founded upon the alleged fact that as guardian of the persons and estates of the plaintiff Elizabeth Miller and her brother, Robert Read, now deceased (father of the other plaintiffs), the testator of the defendants in the month of February, 1862, received into his hands for his wards the sum of $4,000, of which, as such guardian or otherwise, it is charged, he never made or rendered any account.

"The history of this venerable transaction is minutely recounted in the complaint, from the averments of which, in order that an intelligent understanding of the legal points submitted for solution may be had, it becomes necessary to extract and present the following comprehensive statement of the facts: In the year 1855, one Joseph Read died intestate at Marysville, in the county of Yuba, Cal., leaving surviving him a wife, Catherine Read, and two minor children, Elizabeth Read (now Elizabeth Miller, one of the plaintiffs herein) and Robert Read, a son. That said minors were the issue of the intermarriage of said Joseph Read and Catherine Read. That on the 3d day of May, 1859, Catherine Read married William Ash, the testator of the defendants, and remained said Ash's wife until the time of her death, which occurred on the 7th day of February, 1861. That on the 2d day of July, 1862, after proceedings duly had, said William Ash was appointed by the probate court of said Yuba county guardian of the persons and estates of said Elizabeth Miller, then Elizabeth Read, and the said Robert Read, and on said day said Ash qualified as such guardian. That at said time Elizabeth Miller was a minor of the age of 14 years and her brother, Robert Read, was a minor of the age of 12 years. That said guardian never filed an inventory or appraisement of the estate of either of his said wards 'and no such inventory or appraisement has ever been filed in the matter of the guardianship of either of said minors, save and except that on the 21st day of March, 1906, said William Ash, as such guardian, made and caused to be filed an inventory, a copy of which is hereto annexed.' That said Ash never filed an account or a report as such guardian until the 21st day of March, 1906, when he caused to be filed in said guardianship proceedings his final account (made a part of the complaint), and further caused to be filed his report as such guardian, the same being made a part of the complaint. That there were never filed or in any way exhibited by said guardian in the guardianship proceedings any 'paper, or data or statement from which the said wards or either of them or any person interested could ascertain what property, either real or personal, ever came into the hands or possession of said guardian, and the only source from which any information touching said property could be obtained was the petition of said William Ash for letters of guardianship' a copy of which is attached to and made a part of the complaint. 'That the said minors, and each of them, both during their minority and after obtaining their majority, had no knowledge of any property which might or could possibly be a part of the estate to which they were entitled save and except that they were informed by persons other than their said guardian that both their mother, the said Catherine Read, and their father, the said Joseph Read, had left property consisting of real property and horses, wagons, mules, and other personal property exclusive of money, and they, and each of them, upon obtaining such information, repeatedly requested and importuned said William Ash, as their said guardian, to render an account and turn over to them the property which had come into his hands, particularly that which had come into his hands from the estates of their parents Catherine Read and Joseph Read aforementioned. That at all times during his lifetime the said William Ash represented to his said wards and to each of them, and to said plaintiffs and to each of them, that he had never at any time or from any source received any property of any kind or nature belonging to the estate of his said wards, and denied that as such guardian he had ever received any property of any kind or nature belonging to his said wards or either of them, or to the estate of either of them.' That Ash had always represented to his wards that all the property of the estates of their parents had passed into the hands of and been used by an uncle of said minors, Robert Read by name, and that 'he had never received any money or property whatever from any source whatever, as guardian of the persons and estates of said minors or either of them.' That neither of the plaintiffs 'knew or had any reason to believe, nor had they or either of them any knowledge, or information or reason to believe, that said guardian had received any money or property from any source other than from the estates of said Catherine Read and Joseph Read, parents of said minors, until the month of August, 1906, when said male plaintiffs

* * * received information that such was the fact,' which said information was in the year 1907, for the first time given to the plaintiff Elizabeth Miller by said other plaintiffs. The complaint proceeds to allege that on or about the 31st day of December, 1861, one Richard J. Reynolds made a will in which he gave and bequeathed to the plaintiff Miller, then Read, the sum of $10,000 and 'other property,' and to her brother, the said minor, Robert Read, the sum of $1,000 and 'other property.' That subsequently to the execution of said will said Reynolds made another will, dated the 27th day of February, 1862, by the terms of which all his property was given, devised, and bequeathed to his brothers, Charles H. Reynolds and George A. Reynolds, and his sister, Lucy A. Cole. That after making the last-mentioned will said Richard J. Reynolds died. That in the month of October, 1862, the said William Ash, as guardian of said minors caused the first-mentioned will to be filed for probate in the probate court of Yuba county, and the said G. A. and Charles A. Reynolds filed for probate in said probate court the said will executed by Richard J. on the 27th day of February, 1862, 'and thereupon a contest arose in said court involving the validity and effectiveness of said wills of Richard J. Reynolds, deceased.' That on the 9th day of February, 1862 (1863?), said Ash as guardian of said minors petitioned the said probate court of Yuba county for and was granted leave by said court to compromise and settle the claims of his said wards against the estate of said Richard J. Reynolds, deceased, for the sum of $4,000. That on the 13th day of February, 1863, said Ash compromised and settled said claims of said minors against said Reynolds' estate for the said sum of $4,000, executing an instrument acknowledging the receipt, as such guardian, for and on behalf of his wards, of said sum, the same being, in the language of said receipt, 'in full and entire payment and satisfaction of all claim, right, interest or interests, legacy and devise, which the said Elizabeth Read and Robert K. Read or either of them have in, or to or against the estate of the said R. J. Reynolds, deceased.' It is alleged that all the proceedings relating to said compromise and settlement were had in said probate court in the matter of the estate of R. J. Reynolds, deceased, and that no proceedings of any kind appertaining to or connected with said settlement and compromise of the claim of the said minors against said Reynolds' estate were had in said court in the matter of the guardianship of said minors. That 'no petition, order, receipt, return, or paper of any kind relating to said compromise or to the estate of R. J. Reynolds, deceased, was ever at any time filed by said William Ash or any person whatever, in said guardianship proceedings.' That there never was any record in said guardianship proceedings from which 'said

wards or plaintiffs or any person could ascertain or know, or believe, that said wards had any interest in or claim against the estate of R. J. Reynolds, deceased.' It is further averred that Reynolds was not kin to or relative of said minors, and that there was no reason which would cause them to know or even suspect that they or either of them would be or had been named in the will of said Reynolds as legatees or devisees; that said minors did not know that they had been so named in said will; and that neither of them 'had any knowledge, belief or suspicion that the aforesaid compromise or settlement had been made or attempted or that said William Ash had received any money or property of any kind or nature either as guardian or otherwise from the said estate of Richard J. Reynolds, deceased,' until on or about the 15th day of January, 1907, when the plaintiffs, the Reads, were informed of the fact by one L. B. Ayer who, having theretofore examined the papers in the matter of the estate of said Richard J. Reynolds, deceased, discovered the receipt before mentioned as having been given by said Ash in full satisfaction of the claim of said minors against said estate of Reynolds; 'that said L. B. Ayer at the time he so discovered said receipt was not acting for or on behalf of said plaintiffs or either of them, but was acting for himself alone in looking over the papers in the matter of the estate of Richard J. Reynolds, deceased, and that the conduct of said L. B. Ayer at the time of such discovery was not prompted by or at the instance, request, or suggestion of either of said minors or of said plaintiffs.' It is charged that 'said William Ash in his lifetime concealed the fact that he had received said four thousand dollars from said minors and each of them and from said plaintiffs and each of them,' and represented to said minors that he had never received any money or property whatever as their guardian; that said minors never knew or suspected that 'he was concealing the fact that he had received the sum of $4,000 or any sum whatever as such guardian, or that his said representations were false and fraudulent and made with intent to deceive and defraud said minors,' until receiving information thereof under the circumstances before indicated.

"The complaint further states that Robert Read, one of the wards of said William Ash, deceased, died intestate at Vancouver, B. C., on or about the 10th day of October, 1905, leaving surviving him the plaintiffs, Roy R. Read, Leonard B. Read, and Egbert B. Read, 'his sons and sole heirs at law'; that said William Ash died testate in Colusa county, this state, on or about the 1st day of August, 1906, and in his last will and testament named the respondents herein the executor and executrix, respectively, thereof; that said will was proved and admitted to probate and that letters testamentary were issued to the defendants, who in due time qualified and entered upon the discharge of their duties as such executor and executrix. The petition of William Ash to be appointed the guardian of the persons and estates of said minors is dated June 30, 1862, and declares, among other matters, that, by reason of the death of their parents, they 'became and are legally entitled to real estate situated within the county of about the value of $6,000; also, personal estate of about the value of $3,000, all of which needs the care and attention of some fit and proper person'; that each of said minors was then over the age of 14 years, 'and as appears by the written nomination herewith filed has nominated your petitioner as guardian, subject to the approval of your honor.' On March 21, 1906, as has already been seen from the averments of the complaint, said Ash, as guardian, etc., filed his final account in said guardianship matter, together with an inventory and a report of his administration of the affairs of the estates of said minors. The inventory shows that no estate property, or money belonging to said minors or either of them ever came into the possession or custody or control of said guardian during the period of his said guardianship. The final account makes the same showing, but, in addition, it appears therefrom that said guardian, while so acting, expended, in the support and education of his wards, the sum of $500 each, or a total of $1,000.

"The report alleges that the only property belonging to said minors was an interest in the estate of their father, Joseph K. Read, said estate, during the lifetime of the latter, consisting of property which was owned in common and as partnership assets by said Joseph K. Read and his brother, Robert Read; that Catherine Read, widow of Joseph Read, in the year 1856 (three years prior to the intermarriage of said Catherine and said Ash), was duly appointed administratrix of the estate of said Joseph, duly qualified as such, and letters of administration regularly issued to her; that said estate was never settled or closed, and distribution thereof never made, and that said Ash, as guardian, 'did not, and never has received or had, nor did there come into his possession by distribution, or otherwise, any portion of the said estate of said Joseph K. Read'; that no administration was ever had upon the estate of said Catherine, and that 'no property, money, or estate was ever received or came into the possession of said petitioner (Ash) as such guardian belonging to the said estate of said Catherine Ash, aforesaid.' The report then states that on or about the 9th day of August, 1866, after the plaintiff, Miller, reached the age of majority, Ash executed and delivered to her a quitclaim deed of all interest in the estate of both her mother and father, and of all his interest in any property in the city of Marysville, where, the report alleges, all the property owned by said Joseph K. and Catherine Read Ash was situated during their lifetimes, and that said Miller, 'on reaching the age of majority, took possession of and received all the estate and property belonging to said Catherine Ash, and thereafter sold and disposed of all the same in her own name and right'; that, 'after the arrival of said wards at the age of majority, no account or settlement was ever had, for the reason that it was fully understood and agreed by each of said wards that no property belonging to said wards had ever come to the hands of said guardian, and that said wards were indebted to said petitioner as aforesaid.' The report states that Robert Read, after said wards had reached legal age, conveyed to them all interest of their said father in the property held in common by him and said Robert; that, although said wards resided, up to the time of said Robert's death, near and within the jurisdiction of the court in which the administration of the guardianship proceedings was pending, they never asked for or demanded or claimed any 'further settlement or accounting, but said guardianship was during all of said times since said wards reached the age of majority deemed by them and considered by all parties as fully settled and closed without further account.'

"The demurrer, among other grounds of objection to the complaint, introduces the statute of limitations (sections 339, subd. 1, 338, subds. 4, 443, Code Civ. Proc.) and laches in bar of plaintiff's cause of action.

"It is also urged through the demurrer that the plaintiffs, Roy R. Read, Leonard B. Read, and Egbert B. Read, are not proper parties to this action, for the reason that said action is for money alleged to be due the estate of Robert Read, the father of said plaintiffs, and it appearing from the complaint that said Robert Read is dead, that his legal representatives alone can sue, and not the heirs. Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 16; Robertson v. Burrell, 110 Cal. 574, 42 Pac. 1086, and cases therein cited. This contention must be sustained. In the last-mentioned case it is said: 'Plaintiffs are not the proper parties to maintain this action, and they have no legal capacity to do so. While, in a sense, they are beneficiaries of the trust which resulted by the death of their father, the fulfillment of which was imposed upon the surviving partner, yet there were certain intermediate steps and processes necessary to be taken and followed before their beneficial interests could be reduced to possession; * * * for there was another trust intervening in time and right and duties between the close of the surviving partners' trust and their enjoyment of its fruits. It is true that as heirs of their father the title to his property, real or personal, vested in them, but their title did not carry with it the right of immediate enjoyment. The rights and duties of the administrator of their father's estate interposed and intervened. * * * The heirs' title is subject to the performance by the administrator of all his trusts, and they finally come into the possession and enjoyment of only such portion of the estate as may remain after the execution of them by the administrator.'

"We have given careful attention to all the authorities cited by the respondents in which the statute of limitations and laches constitute the principal theme of discussion and the pivotal questions, and, while those cases aptly and clearly illustrate the application of the principles governing the determination of the questions involved in such defenses, yet they are of but little aid, except in a general way, in the solution of the same propositions here, since these must be measured by circumstances materially different from those found in the cases referred to. It is obvious that the courts, in dealing with a particular set of facts and circumstances in cases in which those questions arise, can do little more than to so apply the principles governing such determination as to reach a satisfactory conclusion in the particular case under review. In other words, the solution of the questions arising by reason of the plea of the statute of limitations or of laches, in cases where a long period of time has intervened between the origin of the cause and the institution of an action thereon, must necessarily hinge and depend upon the circumstances peculiar to each particular case, and each case in which such questions are appropriately raised, and which constitute the principal subject of discussion therein, becomes, therefore, largely a law unto itself. Those general rules, however, as suggested, enable the courts to successfully test the circumstances of each case and thus arrive at a final decision in conformity either with the demands of actual justice, on the one hand, or with the policy of all rational systems of jurisprudence, on the other; for it may be and no doubt is true that in many cases real justice may be thwarted by upholding the defense of the statute or of laches, in which case the principle intervenes that the revivification of stale demands, difficult to prove, and, if proved at all, by evidence of a doubtful and dubious character and origin, should not be encouraged or entertained for the sake of the peace and repose of society. In other words, the lapse of a few years may be sufficient to defeat the action in one case, while a longer period may be held requisite in another, dependent upon the circumstances, such as the situation of the parties, the extent of their knowledge, means of information, whether the case is one of constructive or actual fraud, and the like. Hammond v. Hopkins, 143 U. S. 250, 12 Sup. Ct. 418, 36 L. Ed. 134, and cases therein cited. In that case a distinction is also made in the matter of the application of the doctrine of laches between cases of constructive fraud and those where actual fraud is charged, and it is there declared that greater liberality in respect of lapse of time in the latter class is allowed than in the former. Here it is to be remembered actual malversation is imputed and directly charged in the complaint. It is one of the settled general rules in this class of cases that if the party seeking to avoid the operation of the statute of limitations or to excuse the delay which would, in the absence of a sufficient excuse, amount to such laches as would defeat his right of action, possessed information or knowledge of extraneous facts and circumstances, or, in other words, of matters in pais, which, although not directly tending to show the existence of a prior conflicting right, are sufficient to put him, as a prudent person, upon inquiry, he is then charged with constructive notice of all that he might have learned by an inquiry prosecuted with reasonable diligence. Pom. Eq. Juris., § 610. It is said by the same author that from the existence of such circumstances 'the legal presumption arises that he has obtained information of what he might thus have learned. In every such case the first question is whether the facts of which the party has information are sufficient to put him upon an inquiry, so as to raise the prima facie presumption. The further question is then presented, whether he has made a due inquiry without discovering the truth, so as to overcome the presumption and defeat the notice, or whether he has so neglected this duty that the presumption remains unshaken and the notice effective.'

"The important question, arising in this case upon the facts as stated in the complaint, and upon the solution of which the decision must depend, is that of laches, and may thus be stated: Were there such extraneous facts and circumstances in existence during their minority or within a reasonable time thereafter connected with the guardianship transaction as would put the plaintiff Miller and her brother, as prudent persons, upon any inquiry as to the specific claim against their guardian founded upon the bequest to them contemplated by Reynolds in his first will, so that their failure to inquire must be held to be a fatal neglect? We may as well say in limine that we think the complaint presents sufficient facts to warrant an investigation upon a trial of the issues of fact, of the transaction complained of, so far as it interests the plaintiff, Mrs. Miller; for we are unable to perceive anything in the circumstances, as they are disclosed by the complaint, from which we would be justified in declaring that the wards were in possession of sufficient information as to the particular claim in dispute to put them, as prudent persons upon inquiry concerning said claim. The allegation that the wards without success repeatedly importuned their guardian to render to them or to the court an account of his administration of their estates shows that they had in mind the property which they supposed belonged to them as heirs of their parents. It does not appear when the guardian was so importuned—whether before or after the wards reached their majority. But if it may be argued from the fact that they so requested an accounting that they must have suspected an intention of wrongdoing on the part of the guardian in the matter of the management of their estates, or believed that he was fraudulently seeking to withhold or conceal any portion thereof from them, and it was, therefore, their duty to have then put on foot and prosecuted a proper inquiry looking to a determination of the proposition, by which, in all likelihood, they could have developed the full extent of his remissness or fraud, thus bringing to light the fact of the receipt by him of the money in question, the answer is, we think, in the declaration of the complaint that the guardian had always and repeatedly assured his wards that no property belonging to them ever came into his possession, and that they reposed full confidence and belief in his representations; that the wards had neither a belief nor even a suspicion, nor any reason upon which to found such a belief or a suspicion, that they were to be or were made beneficiaries under the first or any will of Reynolds.

"In the foregoing announcement of our conclusion, we are not forgetful of the rule, so often applied in cases of this character, where relief has been denied because of long delay in asking it, and where circumstances, arising by reason of such delay, have intervened or appeared to clearly warrant the refusal by the courts to aid the derelict party, that 'nothing can call a court of chancery into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence, and that where these are wanting the court is passive, and does nothing.' Chief Justice Taney, in McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. 161, 11 L. Ed. 86, citing Platt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. 416, 9 L. Ed. 173. See, also, Gress' Appeal, 14 Pa. 463; Appeal of Catholic St. Vincent's Orphans' Asylum, 115 Pa. 157, 10 Atl. 37. The decision of the case here, it may frankly be admitted, has not been altogether exempt from difficulty. The courts hesitate, upon considerations of a necessary and well-founded policy, to entertain and thus undertake to settle litigation which, in the natural order of events, should have been settled so long before its resuscitation that it had faded entirely from the memory of those even directly interested in it. And, as we have seen, it is only where special circumstances are made to appear, calling for the relief demanded, that the courts are justified in excusing a long period of delay in asserting the right and so proceed to adjust the differences between the contending parties. We think the complaint here shows circumstances which would render the denial of relief a denial of justice, assuming, of course, for the purposes of this decision that the facts as pleaded can be proved by the degree of proof required in such cases. One of the significant and controlling circumstances impelling our conclusion that the judgment should be reversed, so far as the plaintiff Miller is affected, is the fact that Ash never filed a final account or asked to be discharged of his trust until a few months prior to his death—as late as March, 1906—when, for the first time he filed his final account, appraisal and a report of his stewardship as guardian, and that in said final account, appraisal, and report is not to be found a single word referring to the money which, according to the receipt executed and filed by him in the matter of the estate of Reynolds, came into his hands as guardian of the estates of his wards. While in most of the cases like the present one, where the aid of the courts is asked after the lapse of many years after the right has accrued, the fact that such aid is demanded for the first time after the death of the party charged with the default, when explanation from his own lips is impossible, furnishes the foundation for a forceful and sometimes persuasive argument under certain circumstances, yet in this case the answer to such argument may be suggested in the query: Why did not Ash avail himself of the opportunity of which he was himself the voluntary author—an opportunity which he took occasion to create at a time when life to him (for presumably he was then a man well advanced in years) had run its course, or at best its end not then far distant—to explain so important a transaction appertaining to the trust with which he had been invested? Having thus been silent when he could have spoken, had he desired to, upon a matter of such magnitude connected with his trust, the guardian, by his own unpardonable delay, occasioned, it appears from the complaint, through the want of good faith in dealing with his wards as to their rights, has answered the claim that great inconvenience and perhaps injustice may be caused by the maintenance of an action instituted after the death of the only person who could offer any explanation of the disposition of the money concerned in this dispute.

"The complaint, it has been seen, declares that the wards were in no way related to Reynolds, and that, therefore, they never expected any bounty or benefaction from him or his estate; that Ash always and persistently told them that no property belonging to them ever came into his possession as their guardian other than that which belonged to them as heirs of their parents. They had a right to and most naturally under the circumstances they would repose full confidence in him and his representations. He not only stood as to them in locos parentis by reason of his rôle as guardian, but he was, it must be kept in mind, their stepfather, having been married to their mother when they were in fact mere infants. The complaint does not disclose any extraneous circumstances concerning the Reynolds bequest which would have put the wards, as prudent persons, upon their inquiry, either before or after they attained their majority, unless it can be said that, because the transaction in the Reynolds matter constituted a public court record, the wards should have known of it. But the complaint asserts that they as a matter of fact did not know anything about the bequest, nor the compromise thereof effected by the guardian, and it is irresistibly inferable from the fact of the institution of this suit so late as the year 1907 that the complaint states the truth, for is it reasonable to suppose that the wards, knowing or even suspecting that their guardian had in his possession so large a sum of money to which they were entitled, would have neglected to assert their just claim thereto, or remain inert and supine as to so important a right so as to permit it to vanish through the erosive influence of long delay? There is in our judgment no escape from the conclusion that the plaintiff Miller knew nothing and had no reason to know anything of the money received by Ash for herself and brother from the estate of Reynolds until about the time Ash filed his final account and report in 1906.

"By whom has the memory of this ancient transaction been first revived, and why resuscitated by the guardian himself at a time so remote from that at which it should have been finally and conclusively settled? It was manifestly Ash's own inexcusable neglect and delay which brought back to life a transaction which, if properly attended to, should have been long ago, to use the language of one of the cited cases, 'confirmed and laid aside with past things, to be forever forgotten.' But for at least 35 years he permitted himself to remain undischarged of his trust, and, so far as the complaint shows, passed to the beyond without having been so discharged, and filing no final account and making no final report until, as we have seen, only a few months prior to his death, and then, as stated, giving absolutely no information and attempting no explanation of what disposition had been made of the large amount of money which he is shown to have received for his wards during his administration of their estates. Filed with and presented to the court, as they were just before his death, and when he must have been a very old man, the final account, appraisal, and report of this guardian's administration of the duties of his trust may almost be regarded in the light of a statement in extremis relating thereto, and his silence then upon the question of the disposition of the money involved in this controversy can certainly well be construed as an admission that he could not explain the transaction consistently with the principles of good conscience, good faith, and fair dealing in the discharge of his fiduciary duties. If he could, why did he not explain it? Can there be the slightest doubt, from the averments of the complaint, that he received the money? We see no reason why, in equity, good conscience, and justice, so far as the complaint discovers the facts, the plaintiff Miller should not be given the relief for which she asks, and, if the respondents find themselves unfortunately in a position in which they may be unable to make a successful defense to the merits at the trial, the misfortune is only the consequence of the default, neglect and want of good faith of their testator in the transactions leading to this litigation.

"The question involving the alleged bar of the statute of limitations calls for no extended notice. The complaint asserts that the discovery of the right declared upon was made in the year 1906, and this allegation under the demurrer must be taken as true, when supported by other sufficient statement of facts, as we have held and do hold is the case. It therefore follows that this action is not affected by the statute. The contention that the guardian repudiated his trust when he declared to the wards many years ago that he had no property in his possession as such guardian belonging to them is without merit. We have seen that, when the wards demanded a settlement or an accounting of the guardianship assets, they had reference to property which they believed had descended to or been acquired by them as heirs of their father and mother. We cannot understand how the intentional, or, as the complaint charges, the fraudulent, concealment from the wards by the guardian of money or property of which they had no knowledge and which they had no reason to know belonged to them could be treated as a repudiation of the trust in the sense that the wards would thereby be barred by the statute from maintaining an action for the same within the statutory period after the discovery that the guardian did receive money for them of which until then they had no knowledge and of the fact that he had fraudulently withheld it from them. The defense of the statute of limitations or of laches is, of course, as legitimate and as impregnable a defense as may be set up, when urged under appropriate circumstances, and should unhesitatingly be sustained where it clearly appears that a party has, through his own supineness or listlessness, and not through any act of fraud of the party against whom the right subsists, permits either the statute to run so as to foreclose his rights to assert and maintain his claim in the courts, or has neglected to prosecute his right for so long a period as to indicate an abandonment thereof and circumstances have in the meantime arisen to bring his negligence clearly within the doctrine of laches. But neither the statute limiting the time within which actions may be brought, nor the equitable doctrine of laches, has been ingrafted into our system of laws for the sole benefit and special purposes of the individual who is privileged to invoke them. The probability of doing injustice in cases long delayed, or, perhaps, to speak more accurately, of not being able under such circumstances to do exact justice, demands the application of those principles in all proper cases for the peace and repose of society. This, and not, as may by some be supposed, that the discharge of an honest debt or an honest obligation may thus be avoided, is the paramount idea underlying those rules; for the resurrection of rights of action, long deceased, or of stale demands, decomposed from age, so far as the availability of proof sustaining them is concerned, and their exploitation in the courts tends to bring about disturbances, which it is the purpose of all law to prevent. Hence, though a defendant in such a case may suffer some discomfiture or inconvenience from the existence and proof of circumstances which will arrest the operation of the statute or destroy all ground for the successful interposition of the defense of laches, yet it cannot be said to result in a rude shock to society, more vitally concerned than the individual debtor, for the courts to entertain an action on a claim, however old it may be, where, as we think is clearly shown here, the pleaded or proven facts display circumstances showing that the long delay in prosecuting the same has been due solely to the neglect and default of and concealment, ex industria, of the naked truth, by the party upon whom the law has placed and who himself voluntarily sought the responsibility of discharging the duties of a sacred trust.

"It is contended that the plaintiffs should have first brought an action for an accounting, and that the present action cannot be maintained because such a proceeding was not previously instituted and prosecuted to a final determination of the state of the account between the guardian and his wards. In certain cases involving property in the possession of a guardian or an executor as such, an action for an accounting is held to be a necessary prerequisite to the maintenance of an action at law or in equity to recover such property; but the circumstances of this case, we feel clear, bring it within certain exceptions to that rule. The death of the guardian before action was taken in this case precluded any hope of any practical advantage or benefit to be gained by either side through an accounting. It was the duty of the guardian, after the wards had attained their majority, to present his final account to the probate court for settlement. He could have been compelled to do so and required to render a full and detailed account of all his dealings with the property of his wards. He alone possessed the information concerning the estates of his wards necessary to exhibit a correct account thereof. But, the guardian having died before making a settlement, and long after the wards reached their majority, his executors have no authority to present his account to a court of probate. In re Allier et al., 65 Cal. 228, 3 Pac. 349. Such want of authority is due to the fact that there is no law which gives the executors the right and the power to present the guardian's account to the court, but why the Legislature has not given such authority to the executors is undoubtedly for the very obvious reason that such executors are possessed of no such information relative to the administration of the guardianship affairs as would insure the presentation of a correct or proper account. Hence it follows, by the most cogent analogy, that in a case like this, where the suit to establish a claim existing against a guardian and in favor of his wards is commenced after the death of such guardian, an action for an accounting against his executors antecedently to a suit to recover upon the claim or establishing a trust in favor of the claimant in relation thereto would not only be unnecessary from a legal point of view, but would be altogether barren of satisfactory results.

"Moreover, the property claimed here is in the form of money. It is therefore impossible that the 'identical trust property or its product in a new form can be traced into the estate and so into the possession of the representatives.' Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 29, 89 Am. Dec. 141; McGrath v. Carroll, 110 Cal. 83, 42 Pac. 466. It is further said in the case last cited that 'a beneficiary who is unable to do this must rely on the personal liability of the trustee, and so relying has only a claim against the estate which must be duly presented for allowance. But such a claim is still based upon the trust, whatever that may have been. It has its origin in the trust, and depends for its validity upon the legality and sufficiency of the trust. The fact that the beneficiary is obliged to present his claim and look, like a general creditor to the assets of the estate for payment does not change the nature of his demand, which is still one for property due under a trust accounting. It merely changed his remedy.' And so it is true in the case at bar. The claim here had its inception in the trust established by the creation of the guardianship, and must be sustained, if at all, upon the legality and sufficiency of such trust. The fact that the plaintiffs obeyed the law requiring all claims against the estates of deceased persons to be presented for allowance to the executor or administrator before action thereon can be maintained in no way affects their right, even though it changes their remedy.

"We have, as before stated, examined with minuteness all the authorities cited by both sides in this action, and, after a full consideration of the facts as presented by the complaint have, as already stated and as is obvious, concluded that, as to the plaintiff Miller, a cause of action is stated.

In accordance with the views herein expressed, the judgment as to the plaintiffs, Roy R. Read, Leonard B. Read, and Egbert B. Read, is affirmed, and as to the plaintiff Elizabeth Miller the judgment is reversed.

11 Cal. App. 511

Ex parte SAN CHUNG. (Cr. 106.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 18, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 111*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

When a municipal ordinance is attacked as unconstitutional, it is not sufficient that the court may entertain a doubt as to whether the legislative body had exceeded its constitutional authority, but it must clearly appear that some fundamental right has been invaded and a personal privilege unfairly impaired or destroyed before the ordinance can be declared invalid.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 594*)—POLICE POWER—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCES.

The police power of a city is of very extensive application, and, when invoked, it will be presumed that the municipal legislative body has in enacting an ordinance exercised it with a rational and conscientious regard for the rights of the individual and of the community.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—POLICE POWER—IMPROPER EXTENSION—JUDICIAL SUPERVISION.

While in general it is for the Legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needed for the public health, safety, and comfort, statutes attempted to be sustained as an exercise of police power must have some relation to these ends, and, if under the guise of police regulation, an attempt is made to violate personal or property rights, they will be overthrown by the courts.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 240*)—EQUAL PROTECTION—LAUNDRY REGULATIONS—DISCRIMINATION.

Sacramento City Ordinance No. 824, § 3, prohibiting public laundries within the limits of the city in any public hall, store, restaurant, lodging house, or saloon, frequented or occupied by many persons, was applicable to all laundries within the city, and did not discriminate against petitioner, a Chinese laundryman, either as an individual or as a member of the Mongolian race.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 597*)—LAUNDRY LOCATIONS—REGULATION—POLICE POWER.

Sacramento City Ordinance No. 824, § 3, prohibiting the maintenance or operation of a public laundry in any building used as a hall, store, restaurant, lodging house, or saloon frequented or occupied by many persons or by persons likely to spread infectious or contagious diseases, or where it is frequented or occupied for any immoral or unlawful purpose, was a valid exercise of police power in the regulation of public health.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1325; Dec. Dig. § 597.*]

Petition by San Chung for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied. Petitioner remanded.

Hinkson & Elliott, for appellant. R. Platanauer, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner is held in custody by virtue of a commitment issued out of the justice court of the city of Sacramento based upon a trial and conviction for the violation of section 3 of Ordinance No. 824 of said city, providing that "it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association of persons to establish, maintain, operate or carry on a public laundry or washhouse within the corporate limits of the city of Sacramento in any building, or any portion thereof, or in any annex or out-house thereto, that shall be occupied or used either directly or indirectly as a public hall, store, restaurant, lodging house, or saloon, or that is frequented or occupied by many persons, or that is occupied as a stopping place by transient guests, or that is frequented by persons likely to spread infectious, contagious or loathsome diseases, or that is occupied or used or frequented directly or indirectly for any immoral or unlawful purpose." The particular portion of said section of the ordinance violated by the petitioner is shown by the allegation of the complaint that: "The defendant did then and there willfully and unlawfully operate and carry on a public laundry in that certain building known as number 208 K street in said city of Sacramento then and there occupied and used in part as a public store," and it is therefore apparent that the validity of the ordinance only as it relates to this inhibition is involved in the proceeding here. The grounds of attack similar to those usually urged against police and sanitary regulations of kindred character are that the provision is unreasonable, discriminatory, oppressive, in restraint of trade, and generally violative of the constitutional right of petitioner to pursue a useful occupation without unlawful interference or unnecessary restraint.

The general principles involved in the determination of the controversy are well established, and, as far as necessary, may be stated as follows: In the first place, it is not sufficient that the court may entertain a doubt as to whether the legislative body has exceeded the limits of its constitutional authority, but it must clearly appear that some fundamental right of the individual has been invaded and a personal privilege unfairly impaired or destroyed before an ordinance duly enacted can be declared invalid. Again, what is known as the police power is one of very extensive application involving many variant circumstances, and it is incapable of exact definition, and depends for its just and intelligent exercise so largely upon knowledge of local conditions that a very wide discretion must be conceded to the legislative body clothed with the presumption, as it is, that it will be guided by a rational and conscientious regard for the rights of the individual as well as for the interests of the community. In determining the validity of the ordinance, the courts must give due consideration to all the circumstances of the particular city as far as disclosed, the objects sought to be accomplished, and the necessity which exists for the measure. But it is equally true that, while generally it is for the Legislature to determine what laws and regulations are needed to protect the public health and to secure public safety and comfort, yet they must have some relation to these ends, and if, under the guise of police regulation, attempt is made to violate personal or property rights, the courts will not hesitate to overthrow such a measure.

In Ex parte Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636, it is said the "police power is very broad and comprehensive, and is exercised to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society. * * * Under it, the conduct of an individual and the use of property may be regulated so as to interfere, to some extent with the freedom of the one and the enjoyment of the other. * * *

The limit of the power cannot be accurately defined, and the courts have not been able or willing definitely to circumscribe it. But the power, however broad and extensive, is not above the Constitution. When it speaks, its voice must be heeded. It furnishes the supreme law, the guide for the conduct of legislators, judges, and private persons, and, so far as it imposes restraints, the police power must be exercised in subordination thereto." In Ex parte Sing Lee, 96 Cal. 356, 31 Pac. 246 (24 L. R. A. 195, 31 Am. St. Rep. 218), it is declared: "It is provided by section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state that 'any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.' The power conferred upon cities and towns by the section just quoted is undoubtedly a very broad and comprehensive one, and would sustain the enactment of any ordinance having a reasonable tendency to promote the health, the comfort, safety, and welfare of the inhabitants of the municipality and which would not be in conflict with some general law of the state." In Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 78, 32 Pac. 872 (19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152), it is said: "But it is not true that when this power is exerted for the purpose of regulating a business or occupation, which in itself is recognized as innocent and useful to the community, the Legislature is the exclusive judge as to what is a reasonable and just restraint upon the constitutional right of the citizen to pursue such business or profession. * * * This principle is stated very forcibly in the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. 297 (31 L. Ed. 205) in the following language: 'The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If therefore a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution. * * * This power of the courts, however, to declare invalid what they may deem an unreasonable legislative regulation of a business or occupation which the citizen has the constitutional right to follow, although undoubted, must from the nature of the power be exercised with the utmost caution, and only when it is clear that the ordinance or law so declared void passes entirely beyond the limits which bound the police power, and infringes upon rights secured by the fundamental law.”

In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 31, 5 Sup. Ct. 359, 28 L. Ed. 923, it is said by the Supreme Court of the United States, through Mr. Justice Field, that “the fourteenth amendment in declaring that no state ‘shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws,’ undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty, or arbitrary spoliation of property, but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of any one, except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition; and that in the administration of criminal justice no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon one than such as is prescribed to all for like offenses. But neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations, to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity. Regulations for these purposes may press with more or less weight upon one than upon another, but they are designed not to impose unequal or unnecessary restrictions upon any one, but to promote, with as little individual inconvenience as possible, the general good. Though in many respects necessarily special in their character, they do not furnish just ground of complaint if they operate alike upon all persons and property under the same circumstances and conditions.” In the light of these general principles can it be said that the particular portion of the ordinance violated by petitioner is beyond the legitimate scope of the police power, or that it unwarrantably disturbs petitioner in the enjoyment of his constitutional privileges?

It certainly cannot be maintained that it discriminates against him as an individual or as a member of the Mongolian race. All persons, without regard to race or condition, are subject to its penalties if they violate its provisions. There is nothing in the measure to show that it was designed to impose unequal or unnecessary restrictions upon any particular class engaged in the laundry business. We must judge of the purpose of the ordinance by what appears upon its face. Therefore it must be held that it lays the same burdens upon all engaged in the same business under the same circumstances and one of the main grounds of opposition to it is therefore seen to be without merit. It does manifestly place restrictions upon the business of petitioner that are not imposed upon other occupations. And there is no question that his business is a common, ordinary, and useful occupation that should be hampered as little as possible. It is true, as said by Judge Sawyer, in Ex parte Tie Loy (C. C.) 26 Fed. 613, that “the right to labor in this or any honest, necessary, and in itself harmless calling, where it can be the most conveniently, advantageously, and profitably carried on without injury to others, is one of the highest privileges and immunities secured by the Constitution to every American citizen and to every person residing within its protection.” There is no contention here that the business is prima facie a nuisance, like a slaughterhouse or a house for the storage of gunpowder or dynamite, but the ordinance is sought to be justified upon sanitary considerations. It is insisted that it is not a harmless calling, that the city council determined upon proper evidence—and, indeed, that it is a matter of common knowledge—that the conditions under which laundries are operated are favorable for the propagation of disease, that the soiled garments received and handled in such places are liable to communicate deleterious germs to the circumambient atmosphere, giving rise to danger of infection to persons coming into close proximity to these surroundings. A due regard for the health of the community and a commendable desire to destroy or minimize as far as possible the sources of contagion have led, it is urged, to this regulation of a business from which the danger suggested is inseparable. If the danger really exists and is imminent, no one would have the hardihood to deny that it is not only the privilege but the duty of the council to obviate it if possible. Within the proper exercise of the police power the operation of public laundries within the city limits could be entirely prohibited if such a measure could reasonably be said to promote the public health. But here no prohibition is sought, but only a regulation which we must assume the evidence before the council demonstrated to be in furtherance of a beneficent design to contribute to the welfare of the community. Under such circumstances, if they exist, the abstract right of the individual to pursue any lawful occupation where it can be the most conveniently and advantageously carried on must yield to the superior right of the public to be protected from the menace of disease. Such legislation, indeed, is one of the beneficent products of modern advancement in sanitation. It is sanctioned by the more enlightened public sentiment as to the duty of guarding the public health, and it reflects the principle of sound, scientific hygiene. It is on the same footing as legislation requiring streets to be kept clean, garbage properly removed, and air pollutions of all kinds prevented, whether they arise from smoke, street dust, noxious gases, or other sources. Formerly such legislation would have been regarded as an unwarranted encroachment upon the rights of the individual, but, in view of the progress of the medical profession, the better understanding of the nature of disease, and its transmission and the broader conception of the duty of the municipality in regard to the preservation and protection of the public health characteristic of the present age, it seems upon its face to embody a sensible and reasonable restriction bearing a direct and efficacious relation to the accomplishment of a legitimate purpose of police and sanitary legislation. At least, in the absence of any evidence to that effect, we cannot say that the public health is not thereby promoted, or that the method adopted is unreasonable and unnecessarily oppressive. The fact is that, as far as the convenience of the petitioner is concerned, we have no right to assume that he may not secure in the same neighborhood a building for the operation of his business free from the statutory objections, having the same advantages and at practically the same expense to himself. But be that as it may, under the showing made, it cannot be held that he has any just cause for complaint.

We find that similar questions have been considered in various decisions of the higher courts, to some of which we may with propriety refer. In Barbier v. Connolly, supra, it seems that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed an ordinance reciting that the indiscriminate establishment of public laundries and wash-houses, where clothes and other articles were cleansed for hire, endangered the public health and the public safety, etc., and ordaining, among other things, that "no person owning or employed in a public laundry or a public washhouse within the prescribed limits shall wash or iron clothes between the hours of 10 in the evening and 6 in the morning or upon any portion of Sunday." In holding that this provision was not in contravention of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it was declared that "the provision is purely a police regulation within the competency of any municipality possessed of the ordinary powers belonging to such bodies. It may be a necessary measure of precaution in a city composed largely of wooden buildings, like San Francisco, that occupations in which fires are constantly required, should cease after certain hours at night until the following morning; and of the necessity of such regulations the municipal bodies are the exclusive judges; at least, any correction of their action in such matters can come only from state legislation or state tribunals. * * * There is no invidious discrimination against any one within the prescribed limits by such regulations. There is none in the regulation under consideration. All persons engaged in the same business within the prescribed limits are treated alike, are subject to the same restrictions, and are entitled to the same privileges under similar conditions." The same ordinance was before the said court in Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145, and it is there declared that: "However broad the right of every one to follow such calling and employ his time as he may judge most conducive to his interests, it must be exercised subject to such general rules as are adopted by society for the common welfare. All sorts of restrictions are imposed upon the actions of men, notwithstanding the liberty that is guaranteed to each. It is liberty regulated by just and impartial laws. Parties, for example, are free to make any contracts they choose for a lawful purpose, but society says what contracts shall be in writing and what may be verbally made, and on what days they may be executed and how long they may be enforced if their terms are not complied with. So, too, with the hours of labor. On few subjects has there been more regulation. How many hours shall constitute a day's work in the absence of contract, at what time shops in our cities shall close at night, are constant subjects of legislation. Laws setting aside Sunday as a day of rest are upheld not from any right of the government to legislate for the promotion of religious observances, but from the right to protect all persons from the physical and moral detriment which comes from uninterrupted labor. Such laws have always been deemed beneficent and merciful laws, especially to the poor and dependent, to the laborers in our factories and workshops and in the heated rooms of our cities; and their validity has been sustained by the highest courts of the states." In the Matter of Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 299, 9 Pac. 142, 58 Am. Rep. 12, it is said: "Clothes washing is certainly not opposed to good morals, or subversive of public order or decency, but, when conducted in given localities, it may be highly dangerous to the public safety. Of this fact the supervisors are made the judges, and, having taken action in the premises, we do not find that they have prohibited the establishment of laundries but that they have as they might well do regulated the places at which they should be established and the character of the buildings in which they are to be maintained." The regulation therein considered was much more drastic than the one involved here, but it was held to be valid as within the police power of the municipality.

In Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93, is an interesting discussion of the principles involved herein. In Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 369, it is said: "Our municipal corporations are usually invested with express power to preserve the health and safety of the inhabitants." Here, as we have seen, our Constitution (article 11, § 11) expressly confers the power upon the municipalities, and, in addition thereto, we find in the charter of the city of Sacramento authority granted to the board of trustees (article 2, § 25, subd. 9 [St. 1893, p. 552]), "to regulate the maintenance of acid works, slaughterhouses, washhouses, laundries, tanneries, offensive trades, and all other manufactories, works and business of every description that may endanger the public safety, health or comfort and to restrict the prosecution thereof to such fixed limits as may seem proper, or exclude such works and business from the city." Dillon proceeds to say, in section 379, that: "Much must necessarily be left to the discretion of the municipal authorities, and their acts will not be judicially interfered with unless they are manifestly unreasonable and oppressive or unwarrantably invade private rights or clearly transcend the powers granted to them. * * * It is not unusual to invest the municipal council with special authority in respect of particular avocations, trades, acts, omissions, and structures, with a view to conserve the public health and safety, of which many examples have been given in the notes to this chapter. The terms in which such authority is conferred measure its scope, but, in view of the end for which it is given, it is not subjected to a hostile or even a narrow construction."

The principal cases upon which petitioner relies to support his contention are Ex parte Jacobs, supra; Ex parte Sing Lee, supra; Ex parte Whitwell, supra; The Stockton Laundry Case (C. C.) 26 Fed. 611; In re Sam Kee (C. C.) 31 Fed. 680. The ordinance condemned in the Jacobs Case made it a misdemeanor to manufacture cigars in cities of more than 500,000 inhabitants in any tenement house occupied by more than three families, except on the first floor of houses on which there is a store for the sale of cigars and tobacco. It was held to be unconstitutional because it arbitrarily interfered with personal liberty and private property without due process of law. The only attempted justification for it that it was a health law was declared to be utterly without support. The court said: "It has never been said, so far as we can learn, and it was not affirmed even in the argument before us, that its preparation and manufacture into cigars were dangerous to the public health. We are not aware, and are not able to learn, that tobacco is even injurious to the health of those who deal in it, or are engaged in its production or manufacture. We certainly know enough about it to be sure that its manipulation in one room can produce no harm to the health of the occupants of other rooms in the same house. * * * It is plain that this is not a health law and that it has no relation whatever to the public health." The decision in Ex parte Sing Lee was put upon a similar ground. The ordinance there "prohibited the carrying on of a public laundry within the corporate limits of the town except in certain specified blocks thereof, without a written permit from the board of trustees, and provided that no permit should be granted unless the applicant should first obtain the written consent of a majority of the real property owners within the block in which the business was to be carried on and also of the four blocks immediately surrounding such block." This was held to be unreasonable and an unauthorized interference with the inalienable right to engage in a lawful occupation; the court saying that the ordinance had "no tendency to promote the public health, or in any way to secure the public comfort or safety. The sections of the ordinance above quoted bear no kind of relation to such objects, and do not attempt to regulate the business mentioned with the view of accomplishing such ends, but they commit the right to carry on such business at all, in all but two blocks of the town, to the unrestricted will and caprice of a majority of the real property owners within the block upon which it is proposed to establish such laundry and of the four blocks immediately surrounding such block." In Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152, the ordinance required that the building or buildings designed and used as a hospital or asylum for the care and treatment of the insane, persons of unsound mind, inebriates, or those suffering from any mental or nervous diseases should be fireproof by reason of being constructed of brick and iron or stone and iron, and not more than two stories in height, and that the same and the land used in connection therewith or such part of said land as any of the patients are to have access to should be surrounded by a brick or stone wall, not less than 18 inches in thickness and not less than 12 feet in height, and in which wall there is but one opening closed by a solid iron door so constructed and fitted into said wall as that the same may be securely fastened by a combination lock and said premises not to be within 400 yards from any dwelling house or schoolhouse.

There were other equally searching provisions, and it was rightly held that the ordinance was unreasonable and not a proper exercise of the police power, and therefore void. It was apparent from the face of the ordinance that it was an arbitrary and unwarrantable interference with a legitimate business recognized as innocent and useful to the community, and that it did not bear any relation to the lawful purpose of police or sanitary regulations. In the Tie Loy or Stockton Laundry Case the ordinance, as said by Judge Sawyer, absolutely and unconditionally forbade "the keeping of a laundry for washing clothes for hire at any point within the inhabited and even within the habitable part of the city of Stockton; the remainder of the city being in the uninhabitable marshes and sloughs. The isolated position of the laundry, the character of the structure, and the perfection or imperfection of the appliances for rendering the operation safe and free from unwholesomeness to the senses are not factors to be considered under the ordinance. All must go, safe or unsafe, healthy or unhealthy, offensive or not offensive." There probably might be conditions under which it would be a proper exercise of the police power to prohibit altogether a public laundry within the corporate limits of a municipality, but assuredly the burden of making such a showing would be cast upon the one asserting its rightful exercise. There may be more question about the decision in the Sam Kee Case, supra, but there the business within certain limits of the city of Napa was absolutely prohibited and the ordinance appearing on its face to be unreasonable and oppressive, in the absence of any showing before the court to justify such an encroachment upon individual rights, it was justly deemed to be invalid. In the foregoing cases an inspection of the ordinance revealed its fatal infirmity, but here it cannot be affirmed that the provision in controversy goes beyond the legitimate domain of the police power.

The writ is therefore denied and the petitioner remanded.

Oct. 19, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 16, 1909.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 164*)—NEW PROMISE—PROMISE OF MORTGAGOR.

Where an acknowledgment of a mortgage debt is made by the debtor before an action thereon is barred, the mortgage is not extinguished by the lapse of the period of limitation after the cause of action first accrued, the mortgage lien being extended with the original debt; but, where the acknowledgment or new promise is made after the debt is barred, it does not revive the mortgage.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 142*)—NEW PROMISE—PROMISE TO STRANGER—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEBT TO ASSESSOR.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, providing that no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract so as to prevent an action from being barred unless it is in writing signed by the party to be charged, the new promise must be made to the creditor or his authorized agent, whether made before or after the statute has run, and a written instrument signed by the debtor rendered to the county assessor, as required by Pol. Code, § 3629, for assessment purposes, stating that certain realty was subject to a mortgage debt, was not a sufficient acknowledgment of the mortgage debt to remove the bar of limitations to an action to foreclose the mortgage; the mortgagee having no knowledge of the statement.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

Action by the President and Board of Trustees of California College against C. S. Stephens. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. B. Gaylord, for appellant. Budd & Thompson and E. J. Jones, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The promissory note to secure which the mortgage was given became due July 13, 1900, and would be barred by lapse of time July 13, 1904. The complaint was filed October 14, 1907. Defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The demurrer was sustained, and defendant had judgment accordingly. The appeal is from this judgment.

The contention of appellant is that defendant acknowledged the indebtedness in writing before the statute had run, and hence the court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The complaint alleged that no part of the principal or interest of the note had been paid except interest to October 13, 1899. Paragraph 11 of the complaint is as follows: "That subsequent to the 1st day of March, 1904, and prior to the 13th day of July, 1904, to wit, on or about the 1st day of April, 1904, said defendant C. S. Stephens voluntarily rendered and delivered to the assessor of the said county of San Joaquin the statement required by the provisions of section 3629 of the Political Code of the state of California, for the purpose of assessment of property owned by him or in his possession or under his control on the first Monday in March, 1904. That said statement was in writing and was signed and subscribed by the said C. S. Stephens and was made by him under oath, which oath was subscribed to the said statement, and that said statement purported to set forth all property subject to taxation, owned, claimed, possessed, or controlled by him at 12 o'clock noon on the first Monday in March, 1904, and which had not already been assessed that year, and that said statement, among other property listed as belonging to the said C. S. Stephens, designated and described the real property hereinbefore described, and that by and in said statement it was by said C. S. Stephens in writing stated and declared that the said real property was subject to the lien of the mortgage above alleged, and that a mortgage upon said real property was held by the mortgagee above referred to in the sum of $5,000, and that the interest of the mortgagee under said mortgage in and to the premises therein and hereinabove described was pursuant to said statement assessed to this plaintiff for the fiscal year for which said statement was rendered as aforesaid, and that this plaintiff paid the taxes under such assessment."

The acknowledgment relied upon was made before the statute had run, and if sufficient the action was in time. Section 360, Code Civ. Proc., provides as follows: "No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged." The rules in this state were very recently stated by the Supreme Court in Sanford v. Bergin, 103 Pac. 333, as to which the court said: "The effect of the application of these rules to a debt secured by a mortgage is that, where the acknowledgment is made before the action is barred, the original contract being thereby kept alive, the mortgage is not extinguished by the lapse of the period of limitation after the cause of action first accrued. The original contract not having been barred at the time of such acknowledgment, it is extended, and the mortgage lien continued with it. But where the new promise or acknowledgment occurs after the debt is barred and the mortgage lien extinguished, the new promise, express or implied, becomes the basis of the cause of action, and it does not revive or renew the lien." Here, however, the acknowledgment having been made before the statute had run, its effect, if sufficient, was to continue the original contract and the mortgage lien continued with it. Was the acknowledgment sufficient? The statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 360) does not say at what time, with reference to the due date of the obligation, or to whom the promise must be made. In fact, it may be made at any time, before or after the debt is barred, and the time merely affects the foundation or basis of the action, i. e., in the one case it is upon the original contract, and in the other upon the new promise.

Upon the question as to the character of the acknowledgment or promise, our Supreme Court has held that it must be a direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of the debt which the party is liable and willing to pay. Pierce v. Merrill, 128 Cal. 473, 61 Pac. 67, 79 Am. St. Rep. 63. As to the person to whom the promise must be made, Mr. Wood says, in his work on Limitations (section 79 [3d Ed.]), that the promise must not only be made by one legally competent, but must be made to the creditor himself, or to some person duly authorized to act for him in that regard, and if made to an agent, in order to make it operative, it must appear that the debtor at the time knew that the person was acting as the agent of the creditor. See the authorities, note 1, p. 220. It has been held in some of the states that the acknowledgment to a stranger is sufficient; but we understand the rule in most of the states to be otherwise, as it is in this state. It was said by this court in Visher v. Wilbur, 5 Cal. App. 562, 90 Pac. 1065, 91 Pac. 412: "The test would seem to be, it seems to us, was the party to whom the acknowledgment, if any, was made, legally competent to make a contract with respect to the subject as to which the statute had run?"—citing Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609. In that case the Supreme Court said: "It is very certain that an actual promise can be made only to the creditor, and it follows that the acknowledgment from which the promise is to be inferred must be made to the creditor. An admission to a stranger of the existence of the debt cannot be construed an acknowledgment to the creditor such as indicates an intention on the part of the person making the admission to hold himself bound to pay, nor is it expressive of his willingness to pay. 'An unqualified acknowledgment to a stranger will not take the case out of the statute or constitute a good cause of action.' Trousdale's Adm'r v. Anderson, 9 Bush, 276; Kyle v. Wells, 17 Pa. 286, 55 Am. Dec. 555; Taylor v. Hendrie, 8 Nev. 243." See, also, Rounthwaite v. Rounthwaite, 136 Cal. xx, 68 Pac. 304, where the Supreme Court said: "Section 360 (Code Civ. Proc.) refers to the acknowledgment or promise of the party charged by the original contract, to the person in whose favor the contract was made." The Nevada case was decided under a statute the same as ours. In Kyle v. Wells, 17 Pa. 286, 55 Am. Dec. 555, cited in Biddel v. Brizzolara, supra, the court said: "There is a maxim in the Roman law—'Per extraneam personam nihil nobis acquiri potest,' through a stranger we can acquire no rights—and though this maxim is not in form found in our law, yet its principle is at the foundation of all our rules as to the privacy of contract and estate, and as to matters inter alios actæ. If then the defendant had expressly told the witness that he would call and pay, this would have been but the expression of a determination, revocable at pleasure, and would have created no legal duty. It is a perversion of the word 'promise' to apply it to a declaration made to one who has no interest in or connection with the subject spoken of; and we cheat the law, and morality too, of their rights, when we distort the meaning of words to reach a desired conclusion. 1 Bouv. Inst. 339." See, also, Fort Scott v. Hickman, 112 U. S. 161, 5 Sup. Ct. 56, 28 L. Ed. 636; Sheppard v. Thompson, 122 U. S. 238, 7 Sup. Ct. 1229, 30 L.

Ed. 1156; Sibert v. Wilder, 16 Kan. 176, 22 Am. Rep. 280; Kenan v. Holloway, 16 Ala. 53, 50 Am. Dec. 162. In Wakeman v. Sherman, 9 N. Y. 85, it was held that "the promise must be made to the creditor or some one acting for him, or, if made to a third person, must be calculated and intended to influence the action of the creditor"—citing Bloodgood v. Bruen, 8 N. Y. 362. In Ringo v. Brooks, 26 Ark. 540, it was held that the promise must be to the creditor. So, also, in Niblack v. Goodman, 67 Ind. 174; Wachter v. Albee, 80 Ill. 47; Cape Girardeau Co. v. Harbison, 58 Mo. 90. In Farrell v. Palmer, 36 Cal. 187, it was held that an acknowledgment of a debt to the administrator of the estate of the creditor, deceased, is sufficient, since the administrator stood as the legal representative of the creditor; but in Visher v. Wilbur, supra, such an acknowledgment was insufficient where the acknowledgment was to an heir of the deceased, who afterwards became administrator. At the time of the acknowledgment, he sustained no relation to the estate.

Appellant makes a distinction between an acknowledgment or promise given before the statute has run and one given after it has run, which latter was the case in Biddel v. Brizzolara and Visher v. Wilbur, supra. The argument is that, as the basis of the action in the latter case is the new contract, there must be a meeting of the minds of the parties; whereas, in the former, the basis of the action being the original contract, no subsequent meeting of minds is necessary. "In such case, the purpose of the statute," it is urged, "is to require the solemnity of a written acknowledgment which admits the indebtedness as an existing liability; if the presumption of payment arising from lapse of the statutory period is to be considered by the court as rebutted; but that solemnity and definiteness of evidence is equally obtained whether the acknowledgment is made to the creditor himself or to a third party, and therefore the purpose of the statute is accomplished in the latter case." We fail to recognize any just ground for this distinction so far as concerns the fact of making the promise—either as to the character or nature of the promise or the person to whom made. As said by Mr. Wood: "The distinction between the acknowledgment of a debt before and one after the statute has run consists merely in its effect upon the debt and the remedy." Wood on Lim. § 81. See, upon the point, S. P. Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 413-416, 52 Pac. 836, 55 Pac. 145. If this be true, there is as much reason in requiring the acknowledgment to be made to the creditor or some one in privity with him or representing him, in the one case as in the other. It is not alone the solemnity of the acknowledgment that suspends the operation of the statute; but it is that fact, coupled with the further fact that it is made under such circumstances as would have the effect either to keep alive the original contract or create a new contract. And it seems to us that the fact should be communicated to the creditor for equally strong reasons in both of the cases suggested by appellant. Indeed, there is additional reason why the acknowledgment, when made before the statute has run, should be made to the creditor or some one representing him. Presumably the creditor knows when the statute will bar his action. If the debt is acknowledged to him, he may safely assume that the statute begins then to run, that a new period of limitation is agreed upon, and the debtor is estopped to deny it; but if not made to him or his representative, and he allows the statute to run, the creditor should be held to the consequences of his neglect to bring his action in time. Conceding that this result follows properly where the debtor acknowledges the indebtedness to a stranger after the statute has run, we feel quite satisfied that like consequences should follow where a similar acknowledgment is made before the statute has run.

It is further claimed that, conceding the rule to be as contended by respondent, the acknowledgment was to the county assessor for the purpose of relieving defendant of a portion of his taxes, "is sufficiently connected with the mortgagee to allow him to rely upon it as a waiver of the statute." We do not agree with appellant in this contention. We incline to appellant's view that the statement made to the assessor was voluntary, for, as we read the statute pleaded (Pol. Code, § 3629), it would seem to be the duty of the mortgagee to return the mortgage indebtedness as part of his property, and that it cannot be regarded as the property of the mortgagor, or that there is any duty put upon him to return it. His object in doing so is to secure a reduction pro tanto of his taxable property and to avoid the possibility of its being overlooked by the assessor and the burden cast upon the land instead of the mortgagee. The mortgage is the property of the mortgagee, whose duty it is to return it for taxation; but, however this may be, the return made by the mortgagor was to the assessor for his information alone and had no necessary connection with the mortgagee, and there is no presumption that the mortgagee knew of it or acted upon it, and there is no allegation that it had any knowledge of it until the complaint was prepared, which was three years after this statement was made, or that it was with intention that it be communicated to the mortgagee. It seems to us that the assessor stood in no different relation to the mortgagee in the matter than any stranger to whom such a statement or acknowledgment has been made.

PEOPLE v. DISPERATI. (Cr. 94.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 5, 1909.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 185*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—DISCHARGE OF JURY ON FAILURE TO AGREE.

Const. art. 1, § 13, declares that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. Pen. Code, § 1140, provides that a jury cannot be discharged after a cause is submitted to them, unless, at the expiration of such time as the court may deem proper, it satisfactorily appears that there is no reasonable probability that the jury can agree. Held that, where the court in a criminal case obtained from the jurors an expression of their judgment to the effect that they could not agree, and thereupon discharged the jury, jeopardy did not attach, though the court did not hear any evidence or try the issue, or make any findings on the question whether the jury could agree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 344; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

On appeal from a conviction on a prosecution where former jeopardy was pleaded, it would be presumed, if necessary to support the judgment, nothing appearing to the contrary, that the discharge of the jury on the former trial was with the consent of the accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3019; Dec. Dig. § 1144.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 180*)—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Pen. Code, § 1385, provides that the court may in furtherance of justice order an indictment dismissed; the reasons to be set forth in an order entered on the minutes. Section 1387 provides that a dismissal as provided for in section 1385 is not a bar to another prosecution for the same offense in the case of a felony. Held that, where the jury in a prosecution for felony is discharged because an agreement cannot be reached, and the information is dismissed pursuant to section 1385, the dismissal is no bar to another prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 316, 328; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 178*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—DISMISSAL OF INFORMATION—GROUNDS.

Pen. Code, § 1385, provides that the court may in the furtherance of justice order an indictment dismissed. Held, that the dismissal of an information was not warranted, so as to authorize a second prosecution, on the ground that the trial would be expensive, and might burden the county general fund; that money due for other county expenses and contracts might so be consumed thereby, causing bona fide claimants to lose their rights to be paid out of the revenues of the fiscal year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 326-329; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 178*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—DISMISSAL—RECITAL OF REASONS.

Pen. Code, § 1385, provides that the court may in furtherance of justice order an indictment dismissed, and that the reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered on the minutes. Section 1387 provides that a dismissal, "as provided in this chapter," is not a bar to another prosecution for the same offense in the case of a felony. Held that, where on a prosecution for felony the information was dismissed under section 1385, but the order of the court did not recite the reasons upon which it was based, the dismissal was a bar to another prosecution, though the record showed the ground upon which the motion to dismiss was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 326-329; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 292*)—JEOPARDY—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEA.

That defendant in pleading former jeopardy substantially followed the form prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1017, subd. 4, but, instead of specifying simply the time, place, and the court, set forth all the facts in any way relating to the plea, did not vitiate the plea.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 668-671; Dec. Dig. § 292.*]

7. LARCENY (§ 75*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PARTICIPATION IN TAKING OF PROPERTY.

On a prosecution for grand larceny, there was no evidence of actual participation of defendant in the original taking of the stolen animals from the possession of their owner, but it appeared that the animals were brought by a certain person to defendant's place, and left there to be pastured; that some days later they were taken to the S. pasture, and subsequently to the G. pasture, and the court instructed that it was not necessary for the state to prove that defendant actually participated in the act of leading or driving away the animals, but that, if he knew when the animals were put in his pasture that they had been stolen, and he thereafter aided and abetted the thief in driving the animals to the S. pasture, defendant might be convicted, and that if the jury were satisfied that when defendant took the animals to the G. pasture he did so with a felonious intent, the larceny was complete, and that it was no defense for the felonious taking of property that it had been previously stolen by some other person, if the person accused thereafter himself feloniously took or drove away the property. Held, that the instructions were erroneous as ignoring the distinction between larceny and receiving stolen property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 193; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

8. LARCENY (§ 75*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PARTICIPATION IN TAKING OF PROPERTY.

It was error to refuse requested instruction that, if the only part defendant took in the alleged larceny was that, after the animals were stolen, he aided or assisted the thief in selling or disposing of them or participating in the profits, he could not be convicted of larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 193; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 202*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—IDENTITY OF OFFENSES.

A conviction of larceny is no bar to a subsequent prosecution for receiving stolen property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; John G. Covert, Judge.

E. Disperati was convicted of larceny, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Reversed.

Robert L. Hargrove, Geo. W. Mordecia, Jr., and R. R. Fowler, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

BURNETT, J. In a brief of exceptional merit it is earnestly contended by appellant that he has not had a fair trial. "Prejudiced," declare his counsel, "by the misin-structions of the court and by the court's refusal to give proper instructions and by the outrageous and villainous misconduct of a juror, the defendant was deprived of a just consideration of his case. The verdict is contrary to the evidence because there is no evidence that defendant abetted or advised anyone to steal. The verdict is contrary to the facts, because receiving or disposing of stolen property is not larceny. The verdict is contrary to law because the defendant has been once in jeopardy." These various propositions are methodically presented with citation of numerous authorities. The consideration of some of the points discussed is deemed unnecessary, but the following we regard as of vital importance:

1. On December 18, 1907, Miller & Lux caused a complaint to be filed in the justice court against defendant, charging him with the larceny of four mules branded H.H. On January 23, 1908, defendant was held to answer, and on the 30th following an information was filed in the superior court, to which a plea of not guilty was entered. On April 6, 1908, the trial was begun. The jury disagreed, and on April 10th it was discharged; the minutes of the court showing that they "came into court and state to the court that they are unable to agree upon a verdict, and further state that it is impossible to ever reach a verdict, whereupon it is ordered by the court that they be and they are hereby discharged from further consideration in this case." On June 5, 1908, the district attorney made an application for a dismissal of the information "in furtherance of justice, as provided in section 1385 of the Penal Code." He submitted certain reasons for said application, to the effect that sufficient time had not elapsed to secure the attendance of the necessary witnesses for the plaintiff; that disclosures had been coming to light indicating that defendant had an accomplice or accomplices in the crime, and that it was important that the investigations concerning the same be completed before the trial of the defendant, and that it was impossible to complete them before the expiration of 60 days from the former mistrial; that it would be opposed to the interests of justice to disclose at that time the matters being investigated tending to connect the defendant or his accomplices with other offenses, and that "the trial of this action will be very expensive, and might burden the county general fund; that money due for other county expenses and contracts might thus be consumed, thereby causing bona fide claimants to lose their legal rights to be paid out of the revenues of the current fiscal year." The court thereupon made the following order: "It is therefore ordered that the motion of the district attorney be and the same is hereby granted and order made as requested. It is further ordered that the information be and the same is hereby dismissed, the defendant discharged, and bond exonerated." On the same day another complaint was filed in the justice court, charging the defendant with the same larceny. He was held to answer, and another information was filed, to which a plea of "once in jeopardy" and of not guilty were entered. The trial resulted in a verdict of guilty and for the people, under the direction of the court, on the plea of "once in jeopardy."

In support of his contention that he is entitled to the protection of article I, § 13, of the Constitution, providing that "no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense," it is insisted in the first place by appellant that jeopardy attached for the reason that the jury was discharged without legal consent; the rule being as stated in People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 477, "that when a party is once placed upon his trial for a public offense on a valid indictment, before a competent court with a competent jury, duly impaneled, sworn, and charged with the case, he has then reached and is placed in the jeopardy, from a repetition of which, upon the same indictment, or any other indictment for the same offense, the constitutional shield forever protects him, and after the jeopardy has once so attached, a discharge of the jury, without the consent of the defendant, for any cause within the control of the court, before they have rendered a verdict, is equivalent to a verdict of acquittal."

Appellant, however, admits that the jury may be discharged because of their inability to agree upon a verdict, and jeopardy will not attach, but it is insisted that this rule can have no application here for the reason that: "The court did not hear any legal evidence, or try the issue, or make any finding on the question whether or not the jury could agree, but dismissed the jury summarily, on the same day of the submission of the cause, without the consent of the defendant." But it does appear that the jurors stated to the court that it was impossible for them to agree, and we cannot say that their statements were unworthy of belief. We must assume that the court was entirely satisfied that any further effort to secure a verdict would be futile. The statute does not provide just what proceeding shall be taken to determine the probability of an agreement, but no better method occurs to us than to obtain from the jurors an expression of their judgment; and the court, in the exercise of the discretion committed to it, may give such weight to this opinion as the surrounding circumstances seem to demand. Again, although the jury should not be discharged until the court is satisfied that an agreement is not probable, still the law does not require an express finding by the court that the jury could not agree, and for that reason were discharged. Section 1140 of the Penal Code, the authority for the court's action, provides that: "The jury cannot be discharged after the cause is submitted to them until they have agreed upon their verdict, and rendered it in open court * * * or unless at the expiration of such time as the court may deem proper, it satisfactorily appears that there is no reasonable probability that the jury can agree." There is nothing therein requiring the court to state its reasons for discharging the jury, and, in harmony with this provision, it is stated in People v. Greene, 100 Cal. 142, 34 Pac. 630: "The reasons upon which the court deems it proper to discharge the jury are not required to be placed on record; it is sufficient that it shows the jury were unable to agree." It may be remarked that the minutes introduced in evidence in the case at bar do sufficiently show that the jurors could not agree, although in view of the presumption as to the regularity of the proceedings of a court of record, and of the rule imposing upon the appellant the burden of showing error affirmatively, since nothing appears to the contrary, it would be presumed, if necessary to support the judgment, that the defendant consented to the discharge of the jury.

A more serious question arises from the fact that the information was dismissed, and the second trial was had upon another information, based upon a new complaint in the justice court charging the same offense. The proceeding is quite unusual, and no doubt should be adopted only when substantial and exigent reasons seem to demand it. The Attorney General seeks justification for the course pursued in section 1385 of the Penal Code, which provides that: "The court may either of its own motion or upon the application of the district attorney and in furtherance of justice order an action or indictment to be dismissed. The reasons of the dismissal must be set forth in an order entered upon the minutes." Section 1387 is: "An order for the dismissal of the action as provided in this chapter, is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense, if it is a misdemeanor; but it is not a bar if the offense is a felony." In the case of People v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 263, 30 Pac. 815, it is said: "Upon due notice given the district attorney moved the court to dismiss the action and retain the defendant in custody for a re-examination upon a new charge for the same homicide. The defendant and his counsel were present at the hearing of the motion and made no objection, and the court ordered the dismissal upon the ground stated in section 1385, supra. After the entry of the order a new charge of murder was made against the defendant, upon which he was regularly examined before a magistrate and committed to answer. The dismissal of the former action did not constitute a bar to another prosecution for the same homicide. Section 1387, Pen. Code." In that case, however, it is said: "But it was also proved that the information upon which he was convicted contained no allegation that the homicide had been committed with 'malice aforethought,' nor were any words of equivalent import used in it to describe the crime. The information was therefore fatally defective." In People v. Campbell, 59 Cal. 243, 43 Am. Rep. 257, and People v. Breen, 130 Cal. 72, 62 Pac. 408, the doctrine is reiterated that "an order setting aside an indictment or information is no bar to a future prosecution for the same offense," but it does not appear upon what specific ground the orders were made in those cases. In People v. Mooney, 132 Cal. 14, 63 Pac. 1070, there had been a trial, conviction, and a reversal of the judgment by the Supreme Court on the ground that the information was fatally defective. "Upon a return of the remittitur to the trial court the district attorney made a motion in furtherance of justice that the court dismiss the information." Thereupon the information was dismissed, and the defendant discharged. Proceedings were again taken in the justice court, and a new information filed, upon which defendant was convicted, and the Supreme Court held that he had not been in jeopardy. In People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77 Pac. 449, it was held that: "The dismissal of a charge of petit larceny in a justice's court on motion of the district attorney, for the purpose of charging a felony for the same offense against the same defendant, based upon a prior conviction of burglary, does not operate as a former acquittal."

The foregoing cases are certainly authority for holding—if authority other than the provision of the statute is needed—that the dismissal of an information in the interests of justice is not a bar to another prosecution for the same offense. Nor does it signify that "the defendant," as stated by appellant, "was not the actor in any matter that laid the foundation for the plea, but, on the contrary, all the proceedings taken that created and compelled the jeopardy were done against his wishes and without his act or consent." If there had been a conviction of the defendant upon the first information, it would indeed have been a bar to another prosecution, unless it had been set aside at his instance; but the case is entirely different where the jury disagree and are discharged by the court. Then the status is the same as though there had been no trial at all, and no consent of the defendant is required to justify the court in dismissing the case under said section 1385. The Legislature has not attempted to define the expression "in furtherance of justice," and therefore it is left for judicial discretion, exercised in view of the constitutional rights of the defendant and the interests of society, to determine what particular grounds warrant the dismissal. As far as the depleted condition of the treasury is concerned, we cannot give our adherence to the view that this is a sufficient ground for the course pursued. The right of an individual charged with a crime to a speedy trial without unnecessary delay and embarrassment is surely as urgent and important as that of a creditor of the county to have his just demands promptly liquidated. The other reasons urged by the district attorney are more meritorious, but it would have been much better if they had been embodied in an affidavit, and made the basis for an application to have the cause continued a reasonable period for trial. Thereby the investigations could have been completed, the additional witnesses probably secured, and the necessity avoided of adjudicating the vexatious question now presented. But passing this, the statute provides that the order "as provided in this chapter" is not a bar, and the mandate in reference to said order is that it must contain the "reasons of the dismissal." We have no authority to disregard this requirement, or to hold that it is merely directory. The proceeding is somewhat harsh, and imposes an additional burden upon the defendant, and no substantial departure from the plain provision of the statute should be tolerated. In the case of People v. Jordan, 63 Cal. 219, it appears that, "Pending a demurrer to an information, a new information was filed, and afterwards the demurrer to the former information was sustained, but no order was made or requested permitting a new information to be filed, nor was any opinion expressed that the objection raised could be avoided by a new information," and it was held that the judgment on demurrer to the first information was a bar to another prosecution. Ex parte Williams, 116 Cal. 512, 48 Pac. 499, is to the same effect, although the court sustained the demurrer "with leave to the district attorney to file a new information." It was held, however, that the mandate of the law must be respected in a matter affecting the substantial rights of the defendant. Here there is no pretense that the order of the court recites the reasons upon which it was based. It is true the record shows the grounds upon which the motion was made by the district attorney, but nothing in the order shows that these grounds were, or any of them was, the basis for the action of the court.

There is an objection by the Attorney General that "once in jeopardy" was not sufficiently pleaded. Section 1017, subd. 4, of the Penal Code provides a simple form for such a plea. The defendant followed substantially the language of the Code, but, instead of specifying simply the "time, place and court," he set forth all the facts, including the specific times, places, and courts in any way relating to the plea, so that even laymen could understand the import of the plea. The only valid objection that could be urged against it is that it contains more than the law demands, but this does not deprive the defendant of the right to have it considered. It is to be observed that this is no "technical" objection to the proceedings, as the term "technical" is commonly understood, but it relates to an important rule of procedure which the Legislature has provided for the guidance of the courts, and the omission to observe it cannot be held to be innocuous without an invasion of the authority of a co-ordinate branch of the government. If the practice of which complaint is made is to be continued, it is manifest that great abuse is likely to follow, more dangerous to society than even the acquittal of the guilty.

2. Complaint is made of various rulings of the court in admitting evidence over the objection of appellant. Conceding some of the rulings to be erroneous, the error seems to have been without prejudice. We, therefore, forego any specific consideration of them, and devote our attention to the following instructions given by the court:

(A) "The court instructs you that in determining whether the defendant is guilty of the larceny of said animals, as charged, I instruct you that it is not necessary for the people to prove that the defendant actually participated in the act of leading or driving away the animals from the possession of their owner. If you believe to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, from all of the evidence and circumstances of the case, that the defendant knew, at the time said animals were placed in his pasture, if they were placed there, that the same had been feloniously stolen and driven away from their owner, and that the defendant did thereafter aid and abet the thief in taking and driving said animals to the pasture on the river, known as the 'Service' pasture."

Again (B): "If you are satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that at the time the defendant took the animals mentioned in the information from the Hatch & Service pasture to the corral of Mr. Gordon, if he did take them, or assisted in doing so, he did so with a felonious intent, and if you further find that such taking was prior to the 31st day of October, 1906, and in the county of Madera, and that at said time said animals were the property of Miller & Lux, Incorporated, a corporation, then I instruct you that the offense of grand larceny is complete as charged. It is no excuse for the felonious taking of personal property that such property had been previously stolen by some person other than the person accused, if the person accused thereafter himself feloniously took, stole, or drove away said property, and it makes no difference whether such taking was done with or without the consent of the person who previously stole the same."

These instructions are separated by another instruction upon a different subject. The first one, which we have marked "A," is not complete, but the latter clause plainly implies that if the jury believe the facts therein stated, they must find the defendant guilty of larceny. The first sentence in the instruction is not open to objection, as it is not necessary that the defendant actually participate in the act of leading or driving away the animals; It is sufficient if he aided and abetted its commission or, not being present, advised and encouraged the commission. Section 31, Pen. Code. But the criticism of appellant is directed at the second clause, which in effect holds, so it is claimed, that one who does not participate in any manner in the original taking, but subsequently receives the property into his possession knowing it to have been stolen, is guilty of larceny the moment he moves it from one spot to another while it is so in his possession. "The pawnbroker who has never heard of the stolen watch before it is brought to him, and he is told it is stolen, is guilty of larceny the instant he takes it from the counter and puts it in the showcase to sell." It is insisted that this is not the law, and that in order to constitute larceny there must be some participation, either directly or indirectly, in the original taking. It is undoubtedly true that the instructions must be considered in the light of the facts disclosed by the evidence, and it is often properly held that an instruction, although erroneous as an abstract proposition of law, is not prejudicial because it is apparent from the record that it could not have influenced the verdict of the jury.

In the case at bar, however, there was no evidence of the actual participation of the defendant in the original taking from the possession of Miller & Lux, and it was conceded by the people that the mules were brought by a Mexican to defendant's place and left there to be pastured. Some days after that they were taken to what was known as the "Service" pasture, and about six weeks thereafter they were taken to the Gordon corral mentioned in instruction "B." The jury must have understood from instruction "A" that, though defendant had no connection whatever with the original caption, and no knowledge of it at the time, yet if he afterwards received into his possession the property with knowledge then that it had been stolen, and subsequently participated in the disposition of it, he is guilty of larceny. But the instruction is erroneous because it presupposes that the larceny had been completed before defendant had any guilty knowledge of it. In fact it assumes that the mules "had been feloniously stolen and driven away" before they were received into defendant's pasture, and, the asportation having been terminated, that the defendant aided the thief in getting rid of the property. No man can be guilty, as principal, of a crime who has no knowledge of it until the crime is fully consummated. The facts set forth in the instruction constitute the crime of receiving stolen property, and nothing more.

In Tucker v. State, 21 Tex. App. 699, 2 S. W. 893, defendant was convicted of theft; his defense being that he bought the animal in question from two strangers. Defendant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If you find that M. A. Tucker drove up the yearling in question, and that defendant, after it was brought to his lot, opened the gate, and had nothing to do with the original taking and driving, you will acquit; and this is so, no matter what connection defendant had with it thereafter." The appellate court said: "This sixth requested instruction was directly pertinent and applicable to the facts proven, and presented the law in a concise and pointed manner to the vital issue in the case, * * * and we are of the opinion it was error to refuse to give said instruction." In Boyd v. State, 24 Tex. App. 570, 6 S. W. 853, 5 Am. St. Rep. 908, it is said: "The prosecution, however, being for theft, and it being absolutely essential in support of that charge to connect the defendant with the original taking to warrant his conviction, without such proof of connection, any subsequent guilty connection with the stolen animal, such as a receiver of the same, or as to the party who had illegally altered the mark or brand, would not be sufficient to warrant the conviction for theft. To inculcate a defendant as a principal offender in the crime of theft, the state must show that he had some connection with or complicity in the taking of the property. It does not suffice to prove that subsequent to the taking, and without complicity therein, but with knowledge that the property had been stolen, he aided the taker to dispose of it." In People v. Maxwell, 24 Cal. 14, a larceny case, the following instruction was condemned: "Should you believe from the evidence that the witness Morgan stole the property described in the indictment, and that the same was found in the possession of this defendant, and that this defendant and Morgan were associated together, and that the defendant knew that the property was stolen, then and in that case he is equally guilty in the eye of the law, and your verdict should be guilty." In People v. Stakem, 40 Cal. 599, it is held that if the cattle were stolen by another than the defendant, and the defendant afterwards had guilty knowledge that they were stolen, and aided and assisted the other in selling and disposing of said cattle, and was to participate in the profits thereof, he was guilty of the specific offense under the statute of receiving stolen property. In People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 659, 39 Pac. 35, it is said that "the crime of larceny is distinct from that of receiving stolen goods, and proof of the latter crime is insufficient to convict a person who is accused of the former," and it was impliedly held that the following instruction given by the court was correct: "Before you can convict defendant, you must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of, or in complicity with, the original fraudulent taking, and any subsequent connection after the taking would not be larceny in him, either in good or bad faith; and, if you believe that the defendant traded for the cow from Bane, or any other party, after the felonious taking, either in good or bad faith, he is not guilty of larceny, and you must acquit him." In People v. Horton, 7 Cal. App. 34, 93 Pac. 382, the following instruction was upheld: "Before you can convict the defendant of larceny, you must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of, or in complicity with, the original fraudulent taking, and any subsequent connection after the taking would not be larceny."

The instruction marked "B" is equally objectionable as the one we have been considering. It assumes that the third asportation with a felonious intent would constitute larceny. The second paragraph of the instruction, abstractly considered, may be a correct exposition of the law, but it was liable to be misapplied by the jury in view of the evidence. It is true that after the original taking was completed the defendant might have stolen the property. If, for instance, he had feloniously taken it from the possession of the Mexican, it would be larceny, and the ownership could have been laid in the latter or in the real owners, Miller & Lux. But a defendant cannot "feloniously steal and take property"—necessary to constitute larceny—which is already in his possession. Applying it, however, to the facts, the jury were likely to conclude from this portion of the instruction that a felonious disposition of the property after it had been stolen by another was larceny. Respondent cites the case of People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 100 Pac. 887, as authority in support of these instructions. But in the Del Cerro Case it was expressly held that the instruction should not be construed as a direction to the jury that, "if the defendant knew the animals were stolen from Miller & Lux, and after the theft received the loot and disposed or assisted in the disposition of the same, he is guilty of grand larceny." And, while suggesting that it was somewhat obscure, it was declared that, in view of other instructions, the jury could not have been misled by it, and that, reasonably interpreted as a whole, it applied to the theory of the prosecution supported by the evidence that the defendant and one Del Carlo had entered into a conspiracy to steal the property, that Del Carlo drove the animals off the ranch, and that, while the animals were still in transit, Del Cerro, by prearrangement, joined in the asportation. The instructions of which complaint is made here are capable of no such construction. They do not contemplate any participation or complicity in the original taking or asportation. They ignore all distinction between larceny and receiving stolen property, and in view of the undisputed evidence must have been prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant. In

State v. Grant, 76 Mo. 236, it was held that "a larceny may be regarded as still in process of accomplishment so long as the original caption is still unbroken, and the original asportation is still in progress," and in State v. Trexler, 4 N. C. 188, 6 Am. Dec. 558, that "where there is one continuing transaction, though there may be several distinct asportations, the party may be indicted for the final carrying away," but the several asportations were continuous and by the same party, while here, as we have seen, the instructions are based upon the hypothesis that the offense of larceny had been completed before any culpable participation on the part of the defendant.

Among other instructions the defendant requested that the court give the following, which was refused: "The jury is instructed that if you believe that the only part that the defendant took in the alleged larceny was that he, after the said mules were stolen, aided or assisted the person who stole them in selling or disposing of them, or participated in the profits thereof, then he cannot be convicted of grand larceny, and, in such case, you will acquit the defendant." As this states a correct principle of law, and as there was evidence to which it would apply, we think it should have been given.

In conclusion, we deem it proper to state that the evidence of larceny by defendant is slight. There is at least more evidence against him of the crime of receiving stolen property; and, if it should be deemed advisable to prosecute him for this latter offense, the former conviction, of course, would not be a bar.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by Nancy J. Metteer against C. D. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dougherty & Lacey, for appellant. Zabala & Wyatt and A. H. Hewitt, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment quieting the title of plaintiff to certain lands in Pacific Grove, Monterey county. There is no question respecting the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the judgment; but certain rulings of the trial court are involved in this appeal. Plaintiff offered and the court admitted over the objection of defendant a part of the deposition of plaintiff taken prior to the trial. The part admitted was as follows: "Q. Have you ever sold or conveyed this property? A. No, sir." Defendant's objection properly presented the point that it was error to offer only a selected portion of a deposition, and respondent virtually admits that the ruling was erroneous in view of the decision of this court in the case of Bank of Orland v. Finnell, 133 Cal. 475, 65 Pac. 976. Respondent contends, however, that the error was harmless because, under the pleadings and the proof of title otherwise presented and not contradicted, the evidence was not necessary to the establishment of her case—that in an action of this kind, after proof of title in the plaintiff, she need not show that she has not parted with it. We think this position of respondent must be sustained. A status once established is presumed by law to remain until the contrary appears. Eltzroth v. Ryan, 89 Cal. 140, 26 Pac. 647. While the rule announced in that case has been held not to apply to actions for the recovery of personal property (see Lettelier v. Mann [C. C.] 79 Fed. 82, and cases cited), we think it still applies in suits of this kind. Section 321, Code Civ. Proc.

Appellant also predicates alleged error upon the ruling of the trial court sustaining an objection to the introduction in evidence of a certain deed executed by the tax collector of Pacific Grove, purporting to convey to appellant the property described in the complaint, upon a sale made by said tax collector for delinquent taxes of said city of Pacific Grove for the year 1902. There was a general objection, and also the special one that "said deed on its face purported to be executed by the authority and pursuant to the provisions of an ordinance of the city of Pacific Grove, and that no such ordinance had been alleged in the answer, or offered or received in evidence." In this behalf appellant calls attention to section 871 of the municipal incorporation act relating to the government of cities of the sixth class, which provides that "all deeds made upon any sale of property for taxes or special assessments under the provisions of this chapter, shall have the same force and effect in evidence as is or may hereafter be provided by law for deeds for property sold for non-payment of state taxes." St. 1905, p. 89, c. 90. We are also cited to section 3786 of the Political Code, which provides, among other things, that a tax deed is primary evidence: First, that the property was assessed as required by law; second, that the property was equalized as required by law; and, third, that the taxes were levied in accordance with law. Appellant's counsel earnestly maintain that the presumptions thus applying to tax deeds under the cited section of the Code made it unnecessary for them to prove the passage and approval of the ordinance in question. While this court will take judicial notice of the fact that Pacific Grove is a city of the sixth class (Cole v. Segraves, 88 Cal. 104, 25 Pac. 1109; Bryan v. Abbott, 131 Cal. 225, 63 Pac. 363), and while a tax deed "duly acknowledged or proved" is primary evidence that "the taxes were levied according to law" (section 3786, Pol. Code), we do not think that the existence of the ordinance mentioned in the tax deed or its pertinence to a subject within the taxing power of the governing body of the corporation of Pacific Grove may be presumed, even under the broad provisions of the Political Code and the municipal incorporation act cited above. It is a general rule, supported by unbroken authority in this state, that courts of record do not take judicial notice of municipal ordinances. Ex parte Davis, 115 Cal. 447, 47 Pac. 258; City of Tulare v. Heyren, 126 Cal. 229, 58 Pac. 530. The court's ruling excluding the offered deed was also entirely defensible under the general objection that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial because there was no allegation in the answer of the matters essential to the validity of the tax deed. "The recitals in a tax deed are declared by the statute to be prima facie evidence of the proceedings recited; but it has never been supposed that a party who sets forth a tax title was thereby excused from alleging that those proceedings were had. The reverse has been decided by this court." Himmelman v. Danos, 35 Cal. 449. In Russell v. Mann, 22 Cal. 135, Mr. Justice Norton, writing of the requisites of a deed executed upon a tax sale, used the following language: "The Legislature has provided that the deed executed upon such a sale shall state certain of these essential facts, and shall be proof of the matters by it set forth, subject to certain exceptions; but this provision as to the effect of the deed as evidence does not dispense with the necessity of averring every essential fact in a pleading in which a tax title is specially set forth." We are of the opinion that the objection was properly sustained upon the authorities above set forth, and it will therefore be unnecessary to discuss the other matters appearing in the brief of respondent. The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge. Action by Lester Woodard against Dwight Grover and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hugh R. Osborn, for appellants. Wm. M. Aydelotte, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of defendants for a new trial. Plaintiff sued to enjoin defendants from trespassing upon certain property in San Mateo county, and particularly to restrain them from cutting and removing timber. Defendants answered, admitting plaintiff's ownership of the land in question, but claiming, under a purported contract, set forth by copy in their answer, the right to cut and remove the timber. Plaintiff by affidavit under section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure denied the due execution and delivery of the written instrument, and challenged its genuineness, stating that although he had on April 17, 1905, signed in duplicate and acknowledged such a writing in which M. A. Grover and M. A. Littlefield were described as parties of the second part, one copy of the instrument had been mutilated by substituting the name of E. S. Grover for that of M. A. Grover. He further deposed that he had never agreed to such substitution; that through his agent he had so notified D. W. Grover and C. L. Littlefield; that the alleged contract had never been executed in duplicate and deposited in a certain bank in accordance with its provisions; and that on or about November 14, 1905, he had notified the said D. W. Grover and C. L. Littlefield that all negotiations with reference to the contract were at an end. The case was tried, and among the findings in the plaintiff's favor was one that the alleged agreement set out in the answer between plaintiff and M. A. Littlefield and E. S. Grover was never executed nor delivered. It is not necessary to review the alleged contract, which is quite lengthy, as we agree with the finding that it was not duly executed nor delivered. Suffice it to say that it was drawn with the design of permitting the parties of the second part, under certain restrictions as to time and obligations with reference to building a saw-mill and constructing a dam, to enter upon Woodard's property for the purpose of cutting a large amount of timber. In the latter part of 1904, Dwight W. Grover and C. L. Littlefield met plaintiff in Santa Cruz, and, after some preliminary conversation, Woodard submitted to them a proposition in writing, setting forth the terms upon which he would contract to sell them the timber on the land in question. Several drafts of the proposed contract were drawn, and according to Woodard's testimony it was agreed that, owing to certain litigation in which Grover and Littlefield were engaged, the contract should be executed by their wives. Their testimony differed from his in one radical respect. They stated that Woodard expressed a willingness for them to insert in the contract the names of any persons whose power of attorney they might obtain. Acting upon this theory, they caused the name of Mr. Grover's daughter, E. S. Grover, to be substituted for that of her mother who had refused to sign the agreement. Defendants Hammer and Armstrong are parties to the action by reason of their purchase of an interest in this alleged contract.

Appellants make but two points in their brief: (1) That the change in name is not a "material" alteration in the agreement; (2) that such modification was ratified by plaintiff.

We cannot agree with appellants on the first point, unless we determine that their version of the conversation between plaintiff and Messrs. Grover and Littlefield is the correct one. The court below resolved the conflict of evidence in favor of Woodard, who testified emphatically that he consented only to the wives of the real parties in interest signing the instrument which he executed in duplicate. It is idle to say that, because he knew them to be the real parties in interest, Woodard could not complain if Grover and Littlefield substituted any person for the wife of either of them. Our law with reference to community property alone might furnish a reason why one contracting would wish the wife of a real party in interest to sign an agreement rather than any one else. At any rate, there must be something other than the mere fact that real parties are to be represented by others to justify the sort of mutilation of a contract which was here practiced.

With reference to the other point, it may be said that, although from the voluminous correspondence introduced in evidence some expressions wrenched from their context might be taken as admissions of the existence of a contract, the sum of all of the negotiations seems to have been such as to justify the court's conclusion. Plaintiff seems to have been ready to enter into a contract with Grover and Littlefield if they could get proper financial backing and suitable offers for the timber to be taken from his land. Appellants lay great stress upon certain expressions contained in letters, particularly in one written to the Ocean Shore Railroad Company dated at Madison, Wis., August 31, 1905. In this the following language is used: "I am in receipt of a letter from Messrs. Grover and Littlefield of Pescadero, Cal., in which they say they have a prospect of closing a large contract with you for R. R. ties. In case they close the deal with you I shall furnish the timber. I am expecting to come to Cal. the first of the coming Dec. If for any reason the contract might depend on my personal presence, I would be willing to come at any time. * * * Would be pleased to learn as to the prospects of Mess. G. & L. securing this contract I have mentioned. Also if consistent would like to know the price these people are to furnish the ties for." The mere statement that Woodard would furnish the timber would as well comport with the negotiations pending as with a completed, admittedly binding contract; while the reference to the possible necessity for his personal presence would indicate that he at least did not consider the negotiations between himself and Grover and Littlefield finally settled. So with the expression in one of Woodard's letters to his agent Hovey: "If they are ready with the money to put in the plant, I am ready to furnish the timber as per the contract." This language was used in a communication with which plaintiff returned the unexecuted duplicate agreement that had been sent east, and the letter also contained the following: "When you are satisfied that the condition of things will warrant it, you can deposit the contracts with the First National Bank, as they provide, but I want to be sure that something is going to be done before making myself any more trouble: * * * P. S. If matters are satisfactory, see that the contracts are properly executed." Appellants Grover and Littlefield, on the other hand, wrote letters from which the court might well conclude that they did not consider their contract to be so settled that they could proceed under it. For example, under date of October 30, 1905, Mr. Littlefield, writing for himself and his associate, expressed the hope that plaintiff would "allow" them "to go to work" while the weather was fine. But, whatever may have been their interpretation of the instrument set forth in their pleading, certain it is that the court was justified in concluding that there was no such unqualified ratification by plaintiff of the mutilated instrument as gave it validity and made it his contract.

The order from which this appeal is taken is affirmed.

WARDLOW v. MIDDLETON et al. (L. A. 2,437.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 29, 1909.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 452*)—FORECLOSURE—SUBSEQUENT LIENORS—COMPLAINT.

A complaint to foreclose a mortgage alleging that the defendants, other than the mortgagors, had or claimed some interest in or claim on the mortgaged premises, but that the same was subsequent and subject to plaintiff's mortgage, was sufficient on demurrer to show that defendants were proper parties to the suit in order to subject their alleged interests to plaintiff's prior lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1316; Dec. Dig. § 452.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 377*)—FACTS NOT DENIED—FINDINGS.

Where an allegation of a complaint to foreclose a mortgage that certain of the defendants claimed an interest in or claimed the mortgaged premises, but that it was subsequent and subject to plaintiff's mortgage, was not denied, no proof thereof was necessary in order to make such claim subject to the mortgage nor could the court's findings add to or detract from the force of such admission.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 588*)—FORECLOSURE—ADMISSIONS—FORECLOSURE JUDGMENT—EFFECT.

Where an allegation in a complaint to foreclose a mortgage that certain of the defendants claimed some interest in or claim to the mortgaged premises which was subsequent and subject to plaintiff's mortgage was not denied, and no prior claim was presented by such defendants by cross-complaint or otherwise, the foreclosure decree and sale would bar all liens, rights, and interest acquired from the mortgagor after, but not prior, to the execution of the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1686; Dec. Dig. § 588.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 740*)—DECREE—FINDINGS—RECITALS WITHOUT THE ISSUES.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, the complaint alleged that certain of the defendants claimed an interest in the mortgaged premises but that it was subsequent to the mortgage, and such allegation was not denied, findings that the interest of two of the defendants was acquired after the giving of the mortgage and a recital in the decree to the same effect were without the issues, and surplusage; and hence were neither conclusive against the defendants nor competent evidence against them in another action.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by R. B. Wardlow against Martha T. Middleton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson and G. C. De Garmo, for appellants. R. Y. Williams, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage against Martha T. Middleton, as the mortgagor, and J. W. and Carrie V. Tucker, as subsequent incumbrancers. The complaint, as against the Tuckers, made the usual allegation that they had or claimed some interest in or claim to the mortgaged premises, but that the same was subsequent and subject to the plaintiff's mortgage. The defendant Middleton made default. The other defendants, appellants here, filed a general demurrer to the complaint; which demurrer being overruled they filed an answer denying, for want of information and belief, the allegation of nonpayment of the mortgage debt, but not denying the aforesaid allegation in regard to their own claims and interests. There was a trial by the court, findings in favor of the plaintiff and judgment of foreclosure. The appeal is from the judgment; the evidence being presented by bill of exceptions.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The allegation above mentioned has been held sufficient in an action to foreclose liens in numerous decisions. Poett v. Stearns, 28 Cal. 228; Himmelmann v. Spanagel, 39 Cal. 391; Anthony v. Nye, 30 Cal. 401; Harmon v. Ashmead, 68 Cal. 323, 9 Pac. 183; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 608, 29 Pac. 220. It was sufficient to show that the said defendants were proper parties to the suit. No other objection is made to the sufficiency of the complaint.

The findings state that the interest of the two Tuckers in the property was acquired after the giving of the mortgage to the plaintiff. The decree also contains recitals which are the equivalent of findings, but which have no proper place in the decree, which repeat the statement that their interests in the premises were acquired after the giving of the plaintiff's mortgage. It is objected that this finding and recital is not sustained by any evidence. There is no evidence on the subject. None was necessary; the allegation of the complaint thereon being admitted by the pleadings. The finding could neither add to nor detract from its force. The effect of such an admission, where the party by cross-complaint or otherwise does not present any prior claim, is that the foreclosure judgment and sale will bar all liens, rights, and interests acquired from the mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage, but will not bar rights or claims prior and superior to the mortgage. McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 424, 12 Pac. 347; Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 431, 23 Pac. 705; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 608, 29 Pac. 220. The finding and recital, being outside the issues, are surplusage, and are not only not conclusive upon the appellants, but are not competent evidence against them in any other action. Collins v. Gray, 154 Cal. 135, 97 Pac. 142; Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 402, 81 Pac. 542. There is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. DAMAGES (§ 159*)—PERSONAL INJURY—FINANCIAL LOSS.

Under Civ. Code, § 3333, providing that plaintiff may recover all the damages proximately caused by the injury, a person injured as the result of defendant's negligence was entitled to recover, not only the damage directly sustained as a result of the pain and suffering, but also for the financial loss to his business from his inability to attend thereto, without separately alleging the amount of the loss caused by each element.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by G. Castino against J. W. Ritzman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ingall W. Bull, for appellant. F. McD. Spencer, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

Plaintiff recovered damages for injuries to his person caused by the negligence of the defendant. He was thrown against a pile of lumber so violently that his arm was broken and sprained, and his body bruised. The complaint alleged that, by reason of these injuries, his arm was for a long time useless, he was made to suffer, he could not sleep, was not able to work, and could not attend to his business; that because of this inability to attend to his business "great waste and damage has resulted and will result to plaintiff's said business and the plaintiff financially"; and that by said injuries he had been damaged in the sum of $3,000. The defendant demurred on the ground that the complaint improperly joined an action for injuries to the person with an action for an injury to property, and that it was uncertain because it did not state how much of the damage was caused by loss of business and how much by the injury to the plaintiff's person.

The sole objection here urged is that this demurrer was improperly overruled. The objection is without merit. The whole of the damage was caused by the bodily injury, and it is so alleged. A bodily injury may cause financial loss by reason of the party being thereby made unable to work, or to attend to business, as well as by the pain and distress he suffers therefrom. The injury to the person causes all the damage. It may all be recovered in one action, and there is but one cause of action. All the elements of damage must be measured by the financial loss and stated in terms of money. This is the only reparation the law can make. The plaintiff may recover all the damages proximately caused by the injury (Civ. Code, § 3333). It is not necessary in such a case to state separately the amount of the loss that is caused by each element of damage. A general statement of the whole amount of damage will suffice when all the damage claimed is the natural and ordinary effect of the injuries alleged. Sloane v. Southern C. R. Co., 111 Cal. 685, 44 Pac. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193; Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 580, 22 Pac. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175. There was no claim made for special damage to the plaintiff's property, by reason of his inability to attend to his business. Conceding, but not deciding, that such damage might constitute an injury to property, although caused by an injury to the person, it was not here alleged and there was no misjoinder.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by William Finnell against John Finnell, Jr., as Administrator of John Finnell, Sr., deceased, and another. From a part of the judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant the Finnell Land Company appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Slack, W. P. Johnson, and Garrett W. McEnerney, for appellants. Theodore A. Bell and Bell, York & Bell, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought by plaintiff on October 14, 1904, to enforce an alleged vendor's lien upon 4,250 acres of land in Tehama county, sold by plaintiff to John Finnell, Sr., his father, on October 15, 1890, the amount due on account of the purchase price being $92,000, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from October 15, 1902, evidenced by a promissory note given by John Finnell, Sr., to plaintiff October 15, 1890, which by its terms was payable October 15, 1900. John Finnell, Sr., having died prior to judgment, the defendant John Finnell, Jr., administrator of his estate, was substituted in his place as defendant. Defendant Finnell Land Company, a corporation, the present owner of the land, was alleged to have acquired it from John Finnell, Sr., with full knowledge that he had not paid to plaintiff the amount due on account of the purchase price. Judgment went for plaintiff, directing the sale of the land and the application of the proceeds to the payment of plaintiff's claim, aggregating with interest $121,180.95 and costs, and also in favor of the Finnell Land Company to the extent of providing that, if it pay the amount due plaintiff, or if the land be sold under the judgment, it be subrogated as a judgment creditor of the administrator of the said John Finnell, Sr., its judgment being payable in due course of administration, for the amount so paid, or for which said land may be sold. This is an appeal by the Finnell Land Company from those portions of the judgment which make the amount found due plaintiff a lien on said premises, and require the sale thereof to satisfy the same, and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

On October 15, 1900, plaintiff was the absolute owner in fee of the land involved, being tracts I, J, K, and L of the Rancho de los Saucos, according to a survey and map thereof made by L. V. Healey and E. N. Eager. This land constituted a part of 15,839.37 acres which had previously been acquired by John Finnell, Sr. The 4,250 acres had been conveyed to plaintiff by John Finnell, Sr., by deed dated September 17, 1882, and acknowledged January 17, 1883. On October 15, 1890, plaintiff, by a good and sufficient grant, bargain, and sale deed, sold and conveyed this land to John Finnell, Sr., for a consideration of $127,500, and also the stock thereon for $4,000. John Finnell, Sr., gave to plaintiff his check on the James H. Goodman & Co. Bank of Napa for the $4,000 for the stock, and also a check on account of the purchase price of the land for $3,412.80, both of which checks were indorsed over to the bank by plaintiff to satisfy an indebtedness due from him. He further gave plaintiff personal property of sufficient value to make the amount actually paid by him on account of said purchase price $3,500. Plaintiff then owed John Finnell, Sr., $32,000, evidenced by his notes, and these notes had been transferred by John Finnell, Sr., to the bank, and this indebtedness was assumed solely by John Finnell, Sr. This left $92,000 due on account of the agreed purchase price; and, as the findings sufficiently supported by testimony establish, not in payment for the land, but purely to evidence the amount still owing, John Finnell, Sr., gave to plaintiff his note of October 15, 1890, payable October 15, 1900, said note providing for interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually. The interest was paid annually up to October 15, 1902. No part of the principal sum of $92,000 has ever been paid, and no part of the interest accruing since October 15, 1902. At the time of the transaction plaintiff asked John Finnell, Sr., if he would not give him a mortgage to secure the payment of the note; but John Finnell, Sr., after consultation with Mr. George E. Goodman, president of the bank, and following his advice, refused to do so, and plaintiff never received any security of any kind for the payment of the note. The evidence amply supports the conclusion of the trial court to the effect that the conveyance by plaintiff to John Finnell, Sr., was not made as a part of a family settlement and compromise, but that it was an out and out sale, as fully so as one made to a stranger would have been. The evidence shows that plaintiff had concluded to sell this land, and communicated his intention to Mr. Goodman and Mr. Noyes, another officer of the bank. The bank and Mr. Goodman were creditors of Finnell, Sr., in large amounts, and Mr.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

Goodman suggested that plaintiff had better sell to his father, and not "to any one else in their way," so he told Goodman and Noyes he would do so if they arranged it but he would not go to his father himself about the matter. "They went ahead and made the trade," acting as his agents, it may be conceded, for the purpose of effecting a sale. Plaintiff actually paid Noyes a commission of over $2,000 for arranging the sale. There was nothing to compel the conclusion that in thus dealing with his father he was simply surrendering to him something that had been previously given to him by way of a family settlement or advance, in return for the promise of his father that he should receive certain money in lieu thereof.

Unless plaintiff waived his rights in that behalf, he acquired at the time of this sale to his father a vendor's lien on the property so conveyed by him, for so much of the price as remained unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer, which lien was valid against every one claiming under the buyer except a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for value. Civ. Code, §§ 3046, 3048. Whatever may be said against the policy of allowing such a secret lien, not evidenced by any writing or public record, our Legislature has seen fit to look with favor upon it, and to continue in force the old equity rules in regard thereto. As was said in Fisher v. Shropshire, 147 U. S. 133, 143, 13 Sup. Ct. 201, 37 L. Ed. 109, the principle on which such a lien rests has been held to be that one who gets the estate of another ought not in conscience to be allowed to keep it without paying the consideration. Our law, recognizing this as a just principle, gives to every vendor, in the vendor's lien declared by section 3046, security for, and a means of enforcing, payment of the consideration, so far as it can do so without injury to the rights of bona fide purchasers or incumbrancers for value. The right thus afforded of enforcing payment of the consideration against the property conveyed is a personal one, and it may be waived and relinquished without consideration, and without a writing (see Claiborne v. Castle, 98 Cal. 30, 33, 32 Pac. 807), and, when once waived, is gone forever. It is thoroughly settled that, if the vendor do any act manifesting an intention on his part not to rely on the lien thus given by law for the payment of the purchase money, such as taking security therefor, without an express agreement that he may still have his vendor's lien, the lien will not exist. Fisher v. Shropshire, supra; Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619, 625, 25 Pac. 919, 22 Am. St. Rep. 272; Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 Pac. 549, 955. But the lien is presumed to exist, and is an incident of the transaction of sale, in all cases unless the intention of the vendor that it shall not exist be clearly manifested by his acts or declarations, and the burden of proof is on the vendee or his successors to show such intention. See 2 Jones on Liens, § 1064; Selna v. Selna, 125 Cal. 357, 360, 58 Pac. 16, 73 Am. St. Rep. 47. The act manifesting such an intention must be one substantially inconsistent with the continued existence of the lien, and cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the parties may not have contemplated the assertion of the lien in the first instance. Fisher v. Shropshire, supra.

The trial court found that it is not true that at the time of the conveyance, and up to shortly before the commencement of the action, plaintiff relied wholly for the payment of the consideration on the personal responsibility of his father, John Finnell, Sr. This finding is attacked as not being supported by the evidence; but, in view of what we have said, we do not regard it as a material finding. The question in this connection is not what were the secret thoughts or expectations of plaintiff as to where he was to get this purchase money, but whether he had done any act or made any statement that manifested his intention to abandon any right given him by law to enforce his claim against the land, and to look solely to his father personally for payment; in other words, had done or said anything that was inconsistent with the retention of a lien, and amounted to a waiver thereof. As was said in Moshier v. Meek, 80 Ill. 79, speaking of such a lien, "this lien, in equity, is created without the express agreement of the parties, and even when they do not know that such a lien exists or is created by operation of law." In Houston v. Dickson, 66 Tex. 79, 1 S. W. 375, the court, after saying that the lien may be waived by such facts as show that the vendor relies on other security, or relinquishes his right to the security which the law gives him, said: "But the absence of knowledge that the law gives him such a security, or a mere secret intention not to claim it, does not affect the right." See, also, 2 Jones on Liens, § 1064.

It was further found, substantially, that it is not true that at the time of the conveyance it was understood and agreed that no lien existed or was reserved, and it is not true that plaintiff ever waived all liens against said land or any part thereof. If this finding, which is attacked by appellant, is sufficiently supported by evidence, it effectually disposes of all claims to the effect, either that a vendor's lien never existed in favor of plaintiff, or that there had been a waiver of any right to a lien. We are satisfied that it cannot be held here that the finding is not sufficiently sustained by the evidence. Admittedly there was nothing to indicate any express agreement of the parties, written or parol, relative to the matter, and appellant is compelled to rely upon the circumstances of the transaction as showing an agreement or understanding that no vendor's lien should exist, and that all right to such a lien should be waived. As we have already said, the trial court was fully justified in finding that the transaction of October 15, 1890, between plaintiff and his father was not one in the nature of a family settlement and compromise, and also that the note was not taken as a substitute for the purchase money, so that whatever force might properly be given to such a circumstance, if found, is a matter of no concern here.

It is claimed that the evidence shows that plaintiff knew that his father intended to mortgage the land to the James H. Goodman & Co. Bank in order to take up plaintiff's notes to him, which he had transferred to such bank, which mortgage was in fact executed by the father about six months afterward, and that this knowledge put him on notice that the intended use of the property by the father was such as was absolutely inconsistent with the creation of a vendor's lien on the property. Plaintiff had no actual knowledge of his father's intention to mortgage this land, but it is claimed that the knowledge of Mr. Goodman and Mr. Noyes in this behalf must be imputed to him by reason of the fact that they were his agents. We do not consider this claim well based under the circumstances. They were his agents for a very limited purpose, simply that of inducing Mr. Finnell to purchase the land from his son, and they appear to have been interested in accomplishing this, not alone on account of plaintiff, but principally on account of the bank, whose agents they also were, so that this property should not go into the hands of a stranger, but should be, with the other portions of the rancho, a part of the property of Finnell, Sr., with whom the dealings of the bank were very extensive, and involved very large sums of money. The understanding between them and Finnell, Sr., "that the land should be holden for the amount of money that he [plaintiff] owed," evidence by the mortgage subsequently given, was one urged and assented to by them solely as agents of the bank, and had no connection whatever with the subject-matter of their agency for plaintiff. The matter of obtaining the necessary funds wherewith to make the purchase from plaintiff was a transaction wholly between the purchaser and the bank, with which plaintiff had nothing whatever to do. We are satisfied that the knowledge of Goodman and Noyes as to the means by which the indebtedness due the bank from the purchaser was to be secured cannot be held to indicate any assent, on the part of plaintiff, to a waiver of any of his rights in the matter of the enforcement of his claim for the balance of the purchase money. The fact that plaintiff asked his father to give a mortgage as security for the balance of the purchase money, and that his father declined to do so, certainly does not show any disposition on plaintiff's part to waive any security given him by the law. It shows, to the contrary, that he did desire to obtain, if possible, a written contract of security, and the utmost shown by his subsequent willingness to convey without obtaining this is that he withdrew his demand for such a contract, not that he waived anything given him by the law. The appellant, Finnell Land Company, acquired the property from John Finnell, Sr., by a deed dated May 29, 1900, and has ever since been the owner thereof. The trial court found that it purchased the land and took the deed therefor "with the full knowledge that the said John Finnell, deceased, had not paid plaintiff the residue of said purchase money."

The Finnell Land Company was organized as a corporation under the laws of this state on May 24, 1900, with a capital stock of $650,000, divided into 6,500 shares of the par value of $100 each. The evidence quite clearly establishes that it was formed at the instance of Mr. Goodman and the other officers of the J. H. Goodman & Co. Bank, to which Finnell, Sr., owed very large amounts of money, aggregating several hundred thousand dollars, to enable him and them to more readily control the real property of Mr. Finnell, of which the land involved here constituted a part, with a view to its sale and the settlement of the claims of the bank and Goodman. The original directors were John Finnell, who was president of the corporation, and four of his sons, not including the plaintiff. On May 29, 1900, Finnell, Sr., proposed in writing to the directors to convey to the company, free of incumbrance, all of his land, being about 15,841 acres, in consideration of the issuance of all of the stock, 6,500 shares, as follows: To John Finnell, Jr., 10 shares; to James Finnell, 10 shares; to Simpson Finnell, 10 shares; to Bush Finnell, 10 shares; to George E. Goodman, 2,000 shares; and to John Finnell, Sr., 4,460 shares. This offer was accepted by the directors, and the deed was thereupon delivered and the stock issued. It is found, in accord with an allegation of appellant's answer, that "all of said persons to whom the said shares were issued other than John Finnell, were nominal owners thereof, but the beneficial and equitable owner, and the only person having any interest in said shares, was the said John Finnell, who owned the entire capital stock of said corporation, to wit, 6,500 shares, from May 29, 1900, until October 26, 1900, when he transferred said 6,500 shares as hereinafter found." The transfers of October 26, 1900, here referred to, were specifically described in subsequent findings, being one of 4,500 shares, together with certain personal property, to the James H. Goodman & Co. Bank in satisfaction of an indebtedness of $447,742.80 due said bank from him, and one of 2,000 shares and certain personal property to said George E. Goodman, in satisfaction of an indebtedness of over $350,000. On September 8, 1902, said

George E. Goodman transferred his 2,000 shares to Simpson Finnell, a brother of plaintiff, who has ever since been the owner thereof, and the Goodman Bank still owns the other 4,500 shares. The evidence shows that each of the directors of appellant other than John Finnell, Sr., including said Simpson Finnell, knew, at the time of the transaction by which it acquired the land, that plaintiff had not been paid the balance of the purchase price, and that he held the note of John Finnell, Sr., therefor. The evidence further shows that both George E. Goodman, individually, and the James H. Goodman & Co. Bank, through its president and other officers, had the same knowledge through all the proceedings in relation to the formation of the corporation and the transaction by which this property was conveyed to appellant, and ever since. Under these circumstances we do not see how it can be doubted that the Finnell Land Company took the land from Finnell, Sr., with full knowledge that John Finnell, Sr., had not paid the plaintiff the residue of the purchase money. It is obvious that, if at the time of the conveyance the corporation was practically simply John Finnell, Sr., as the finding in regard to the ownership of the stock establishes, and that no other person had any interest in the property of the corporation, it necessarily had all the knowledge in regard to the right of plaintiff that Finnell had. This was recognized in Bang v. Brett, 62 Minn. 4, 63 N. W. 1067, cited by appellant, the court saying: "Or, if the members of the corporation consisted wholly of the Merritts and others having notice of the existence of plaintiff's lien, it might be that their notice would be notice to the corporation." But it is unnecessary to cite authorities to sustain this proposition. John Finnell, Sr., with the aid of dummy directors and stockholders, incorporated himself, and conveyed the land to himself so incorporated. If, by reason of the fact that it was then understood by him, Goodman, and the Goodman Bank that the stock was subsequently to be transferred to Goodman and the Goodman Bank in satisfaction of his indebtedness, Goodman and the Goodman Bank could be held to have then had any interest in the corporation, the latter, as has been said, had the same knowledge in regard to plaintiff's claim as had Finnell. Although under these circumstances it was not essential to notice to the corporation that the dummy directors of appellant should have had knowledge, they nevertheless did have it. We know of no theory upon which it may be held that the Finnell Land Company, constituted as it was, did not take with notice of plaintiff's right.

The trial court found against appellant's claim that plaintiff had been guilty of laches in failing to assert his lien and bring an action to enforce the same prior to October 14, 1904, the date of the commencement of this action. We cannot hold that this finding is not sufficiently sustained by the evidence. The right of a vendor to enforce his lien continues, unless waived, so long as an action can be commenced for the purchase money (2 Jones on Liens, § 1064); and, where a note for the purchase money is given, payable at a future day, an action to enforce the lien may be commenced at any time before the lapse of the period within which an action can be brought on the note (California Savings Bank v. Parrish, 116 Cal. 254, 259, 48 Pac. 73). This action was commenced within that period. "Where an express statute of limitations applies to a suit in equity, mere delay to commence the suit for a period less than that of the statute of limitations is never a reason for dismissing the proceeding." Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 267, 10 Pac. 676. "There must appear, in addition to mere lapse of time, some circumstances from which the defendant or some other person may be prejudiced, or there must be such lapse of time that it may be reasonably supposed that such prejudice will occur if the remedy is allowed." Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 47, 78 Pac. 467, 469. In this case it was affirmatively made to appear that there could have been no prejudice resulting to any person by reason of the failure of plaintiff to commence his proceeding to enforce the lien until the period prescribed by the statute of limitations was about to expire. It may be assumed, purely for the purposes of this decision, that, as against a corporation whose stock is transferable in the open market and likely to pass into the hands of innocent purchasers, a person having a mere vendor's lien against property held by the corporation must assert his claim promptly, and that any unreasonable delay in asserting it will foreclose his right if stock of the corporation has been transferred to purchasers in good faith and without notice. But no such condition confronts us here. All those who have acquired the stock of Finnell, Sr., had full knowledge of the facts under which plaintiff's right to a lien exists.

It is claimed that the trial court erred in several rulings on the admissibility of evidence. The alleged error principally relied on was the exclusion by the court of certain evidence attempted to be elicited from plaintiff relative to a conversation between him and his brother Bush Finnell in July or August, 1904, which was two or three months before the commencement of this action. The proposed evidence was contained in the deposition of plaintiff, which had been taken for the purposes of the trial, and, so far as necessary to be stated here, is as follows: "Q. Now, what was it precisely that your brother Bush told you at that time? A. Well, Bush and I were talking, and I told Bush it looked to me like everything was getting muddled up, and if we did not get it settled up pretty soon, there would be nothing left, and I told Bush about this note.

In fact, I guess he knew it; I think all the Finnell family knew it, notwithstanding I never said anything to them about it. I asked Bush if there was any way for me to make myself whole or part whole. He said he knew no other way except I might bring a vendor's lien against the land, and that was about all there was said. Q. Up to that time did you know there was such a thing as a vendor's lien? A. No, sir; knew nothing about it. Q. That was new to you? A. That was a new trick to me; I did not know it." The sum and substance of this was that plaintiff did not know that there was such a thing as a vendor's lien at the time of the conveyance to his father, or until shortly before the commencement of this proceeding. We have already seen that the mere fact that a vendor does not know that the law gives him such security cannot affect his right. But it is urged that the proposed evidence was "very material additional evidence upon the question of the intent of William Finnell in taking the $92,000 note from his father, to the effect that he relied entirely upon the financial responsibility of his father as security for it, and that the reconveyance was in fact a family settlement and compromise," and that it went to show that no vendor's lien was ever created. To our minds this evidence was in no way material on the question of family settlement and compromise. We have already stated our views to the effect that it was not material what were the secret thoughts or expectations of plaintiff as to how he could or would collect this purchase money, or whether he believed that he could collect it only from his father personally, and so, in his own mind, relied entirely on his father's financial responsibility. The law, not any contract of the parties, gave him the lien if the transfer of the land to his father was an ordinary sale, and we do not think that the proposed evidence as to his ignorance of the law relative to a vendor's lien was such as to throw any light upon the question whether it was a sale, or upon the question whether he did or said anything which might tend to show an understanding between the parties for a waiver of any right given him by the law. We cannot see that this evidence could have affected in any degree the conclusion of the trial court upon any material issue.

It is urged that it was error for the court to exclude the testimony showing how plaintiff became indebted to his father for the $32,000 which he claimed to owe him at the time of his conveyance on October 15, 1890. As to this claim, it is sufficient to say that we are unable to find that the trial court excluded any evidence that would have had any material bearing upon this question.

Mr. F. E. Johnston, an attorney, was allowed, over the objection of appellant "that it is a privileged communication," under subdivision 2, § 1881, of the Code of Civil Procedure, to testify that at a conversation that occurred between himself and Finnell, Sr., and Mr. Goodman at the Palace Hotel in San Francisco, shortly prior to the formation of the Finnell Land Company, in which the matter of forming a corporation was "simply mentioned by one or the other," he was asked whether it could be done, and he said it could be done. He further said that he was not anybody's attorney in the matter. It is clear that the objection made to this evidence was properly overruled.

The evidence showing knowledge on the part of the officers of the James H. Goodman & Co. Bank of the facts giving plaintiff a right to enforce against the land his claim for the residue of the purchase money was admissible, if for no other reason, for the purpose of showing that no prejudice could have resulted from the delay of plaintiff in commencing his proceeding to enforce his lien, and thus meeting the defense of laches.

In view of our conclusion upon the matters already discussed, there is no other point suggested in the briefs that requires attention.

Those portions of the judgment that are appealed from, and the order denying a new trial, are affirmed.

GROGAN v. CHAFFEE. (L. A. 2,054.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1909.)

1. MONOPOLIES (§ 8*)—NATURE OF "MONOPOLY."

A "monopoly" exists where all, or so nearly all, of an article of trade or commerce within a district, is brought within the hands of one man, or set of men, as to practically bring the handling or production of the commodity or thing within such control to the exclusion of the competition of free traffic therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Monopolies, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4570-4573.]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 5*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—MATTERS OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE.

The court must assume as a matter of common knowledge that persons may and do manufacture pure olive oil in considerable quantities.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

3. MONOPOLIES (§ 17*)—CONTRACTS CREATING MONOPOLY.

A manufacturer of olive oil may require a retailer buying the same to maintain a standard selling price as a means of securing the legitimate benefits of the reputation which the product of the manufacturer may have attained, and such a contract is not invalid as tending to create a monopoly, in the absence of anything to show that the oil comprises the whole or any large proportion of the oil in the market supplied by the manufacturer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Monopolies, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. MONOPOLIES (§ 17*)—RESTRAINT OF TRADE—SALE OF GOODS.

A contract between a manufacturer of olive oil, having a secret process, and a retail dealer therein, stipulating that the latter will not sell the oil for less than the price fixed by the manufacturer, is not invalid as in restraint of trade, notwithstanding Civ. Code, §§ 1673-1675, providing that every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful business shall be void, etc., since the Code must be construed in the light of the rule that not every limitation on absolute freedom of dealing is prohibited, and that the question is whether, under the particular circumstances and the particular contract, it is or is not unreasonable.

5. MONOPOLIES (§ 10*)—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Where a contract is not obnoxious to St. 1907, p. 984, c. 530, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593, c. 362, defining "trusts," the court will not determine the question whether the contract made prior to the amendment is obnoxious to the act as originally enacted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Monopolies, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Grogan against H. G. Chaffee. From a judgment for defendant on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

See, also, 6 Cal. App. 566, 92 Pac. 653.

Powers & Holland, for appellant. Porter, Sutton & Cruickshank and Thomas, Gerstle, Frick & Beedy, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A judgment of reversal having been heretofore rendered herein, a rehearing was ordered. The opinion originally filed was prepared by Sloss, J., and read, in part, as follows:

"The plaintiff appeals from a judgment against him, following an order sustaining a demurrer to his amended complaint. The demurrer is based upon both general and special grounds. On this appeal, however, the respondent limits his argument in support of the ruling on the demurrer to the ground that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We are satisfied that there is no merit in any of the other specifications, and shall address ourselves to the single proposition discussed by counsel.

"The case stated by the complaint is this: The plaintiff has for 10 years been engaged in the manufacture and production of pure olive oil by a process of his own discovery. The oil so produced is sold and used for food, medical and commercial purposes, and plaintiff has extensively advertised to the public the fact that he manufactures a pure olive oil, and that such oil is guaranteed to be pure and wholesome. In his advertising the plaintiff has used certain designs copyrighted by him, and these designs are placed on every bottle or package of oil manufactured and sold by him, as a trade-mark. By reason of these methods of advertising and dealing, the plaintiff's oil has become well known, and a large quantity thereof is sold throughout the United States, and more particularly in the city of Pasadena, and elsewhere in the county of Los Angeles. The plaintiff has affixed to every bottle or package of his oil a notice stating that the article 'is sold upon the condition that the purchaser, if he retails these goods, will maintain my fixed retail selling price on them; and that, if he wholesales them, he will sell them subject to this same condition.' This notice specifies the fixed retail selling price as $1.35 per half gallon can and $2.50 per gallon can. All persons buying said olive oil agree not to sell or deliver any of it at a price less than that provided for in the notice.

"The defendant is a retail grocer, engaged in business in the city of Pasadena. He has bought of plaintiff olive oil under the express contract and condition that the same should not be sold at a price or prices less than those fixed by plaintiff. He has, however, refused to comply with his contract, and sells and offers for sale said oil at the price of $1.20 per half gallon, and has advertised such offer by publication in a newspaper and by posters and notices posted in the windows of his store. This conduct has been continued by defendant notwithstanding plaintiff's demand that he comply with his contract. The complaint alleges that plaintiff has sustained irreparable damage, that it is impossible to ascertain the damage sustained and to be sustained, and that there is no adequate remedy at law. The prayer is for an injunction restraining defendant from advertising, selling, or offering for sale the oil at prices less than those fixed by the contract, and for damages. In support of the ruling sustaining the demurrer it is urged that the contract relied on by plaintiff is unenforceable as being in restraint of trade.

"We have here no question of an attempted monopoly. 'A monopoly exists where all, or so nearly all, of an article of trade or commerce within a community or district, is brought within the hands of one man or set of men, as to practically bring the handling or production of the commodity or thing within such control to the exclusion of competition of free traffic therein. Herрман v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81. It was the tendency to create a monopoly, thus defined, that was the objectionable feature of the agreements declared invalid in such cases as Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 117, 27 Pac. 36, 25 Am. St. Rep. 102; Mill, etc., Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387, 18 Pac. 391, 9 Am. St. Rep. 211; Vulcan Powder Co. v. Hercules Powder Co., 96 Cal. 510, 31 Pac. 581, 31 Am. St. Rep. 242. See, also, Cummings v. Union Blue Stone Co., 164 N. Y. 1, 58 N. E. 1, 79 Am. St. Rep. 620; Cohen v. Envelope Co., 166 N. Y. 292, 59 N. E. 906. The contract here relied on does not relate to any olive oil except that manufactured by plaintiff. There is no suggestion that this comprises all, or any large proportion, of the olive oil manufactured or sold in the market supplied by plaintiff. While plaintiff alleges that he manufactures oil by a process of his own discovery, there is nothing exclusive in the product resulting from this process. All that he claims for his oil is that it is pure and wholesome. The court must assume, as a matter of common knowledge, that others may and do manufacture pure olive oil in considerable quantities.

"Under these circumstances we see no reason why the contract alleged by plaintiff should not, as between the parties to it, be held to be valid. It violates no canon of public policy. By its terms the buyer is not precluded from engaging in any lawful trade. He may sell other olive oil at any price and on any conditions satisfactory to him. The producer was, in the first instance, under no obligation to sell his oil, and when he did sell it had the right to exact, as part of the consideration for the sale, a promise by the purchaser that he would not sell it at less than a stipulated price. There is nothing either unreasonable or unlawful in the effort by a manufacturer to maintain a standard price for his goods. It is simply a means of securing the legitimate benefits of the reputation which his product may have attained. Contracts similar to the one under discussion have been considered in a number of cases, and have generally been upheld where, as here, they had no tendency to create a monopoly. Fowle v. Park, 131 U. S. 88, 9 Sup. Ct. 658, 33 L. Ed. 67; Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70, 22 Sup. Ct. 747, 46 L. Ed. 1058; Park & Sons Co. v. National Druggists' Association, 175 N. Y. 1, 67 N. E. 136, 62 L. R. A. 632, 96 Am. St. Rep. 578; Garst v. Harris, 177 Mass. 72, 58 N. E. 174; Dr. Miles Med. Co. v. Goldthwaite (C. C.) 133 Fed. 794; Dr. Miles Med. Co. v. Platt (C. C.) 142 Fed. 606; Dr. Miles Med. Co. v. Jaynes Drug Co. (C. C.) 149 Fed. 838; Walsh v. Dwight, 40 App. Div. 513, 58 N. Y. Supp. 91. Many of these decisions, it is true, deal with contracts concerning the sale of patented or proprietary articles, and are based, to some extent, upon the principle that a monopoly right is inherent in a patent or in an article produced according to a formula known only to its manufacturer. It has been questioned whether the fact that an article is produced under a secret formula is of any importance in determining the validity of contracts regulating its sale. Hartman v. John D. Park & Sons Co. (C. C.) 145 Fed. 358; s. c., on appeal, John D. Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, 153 Fed. 24, 82 C. C. A. 158, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 135. However this may be, we are cited to no case which holds that a contract like the one at bar is invalid as between the parties to it, whether it deals with an article produced under patent or secret formula or one that may be produced by any one. The tendency of the modern decisions has been to view with greater liberality contracts claimed to be in restraint of trade. It is not every limitation on absolute freedom of dealing that is prohibited. As is said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co., 130 U. S. 396, 409, 9 Sup. Ct. 553, 557, 32 L. Ed. 979: 'Public welfare is first considered, and if it be not involved, and the restraint upon one party is not greater than protection to the other requires, the contract may be sustained. The question is whether, under the particular circumstances of the case, and the nature of the particular contract involved in it, the contract is, or is not, unreasonable.' So in People's Gaslight Co. v. Chicago Gaslight Co., 20 Ill. App. 492, the court says: 'The tendency of the courts is to regard contracts in partial restraint of competition with less disfavor than formerly, and the strictness of the ancient rule has been greatly modified by the modern decisions.' Many decisions announcing views similar to those declared in these quotations are cited with approval by this court in Herriman v. Menzies, supra, and it must be taken to be settled that the sections of Civ. Code, §§ 1673, 1674, 1675, relating to contracts in restraint of trade, are to be construed in the light of these principles. Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81. In Smith v. S. F. & N. P. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 584, 604, 47 Pac. 582, 589, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, this court said: 'The rule invalidating contracts in restraint of trade does not include every contract of an individual by which his right to dispose of his property is limited or restrained. Section 1673 of the Civil Code makes void every contract by which one is restrained from "exercising a lawful profession, trade or business," except in certain instances. But this is far different from a contract limiting his right to dispose of a particular piece of property, except upon certain conditions. As the owner of property has the right to withhold it from sale, he can also, at the time of its sale, impose conditions upon its use without violating any rule of public policy. * * *

"The necessary result of what we have said is that the complaint must be held sufficient. It is alleged that the defendant bought oil under an express agreement that he would not sell it at less than given prices, and that he had sold and threatened to sell it at less than such prices. This is a violation of plaintiff's rights under his contract. Whether this contract could be enforced against persons who might come into possession of plaintiff's oil, with notice of the restriction imposed by him on its sale, but without having made any direct agreement to respect such restriction, is a question not here presented. See Garst v. Hall & Lyon Co., 179 Mass. 589, 61 N. E. 219, 55 L. R. A. 631."

The rehearing was ordered to enable the court to give further consideration to the views of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, as declared in Park & Sons Co. v. Hartman, 153 Fed. 24, 82 C. C. A. 158, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 135, and restated in Miles Med. Co. v. Park & Sons Co., 164 Fed. 803, 90 C. C. A. 579. Judge Lurton was the author of each of these opinions. The first contains a very elaborate and learned discussion of the law governing some of the questions involved. It may be said that neither of these cases involved the question here presented; i e., the enforceability, as between the parties, of a contract of the kind here shown. The corporation complainant in each instance sought to obtain relief against persons who had entered into no contractual relation with it. It must, however, be confessed that the views there expressed upon the general question of the validity of a system of contracts like that here involved is opposed to what was declared by us in our opinion. Most of the cases cited by us in our opinion heretofore filed are reviewed by Judge Lurton in Park v. Hartman and are either disapproved or sought to be distinguished. It does not appear to us, however, that the attempt to distinguish has in all instances been entirely successful, and, notwithstanding the great respect entertained by us for so able and learned a court as that which decided the cases of Park v. Hartman and Miles v. Park, we must remain of the opinion that the conclusion there reached, so far as it is applicable to the case before us, is contrary to the weight of authority.

In our former opinion something was said about the effect upon this litigation of the so-called Cartwright act (St. 1907, p. 984, c. 530), which had been enacted after the date of this appeal. That statute has recently been amended. St. 1909, p. 593, c. 362. The constitutionality of the amending act is not here questioned, nor is it suggested that the contract relied on appears, on the face of the complaint, to be obnoxious to the terms of the law as it now stands. Whether or not a defense to the action could be based on the Cartwright act is a question not now before us. At the present time, and on the record and argument here presented, there is no occasion to discuss the construction or applicability of the statute.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to overrule the demurrer, granting leave to the defendant to answer.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent.

HUDSON et al. v. DAILEY et al. (L. A. 2,234.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1909.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 155*)—
PARTITION OF LAND—WATER RIGHTS—RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS.

The owners of a ranch executed a partition deed containing a covenant that, notwithstanding the partition, the rights to use of the water of a creek flowing into the ranch or rising thereon should remain as theretofore held, in equal shares. Held, that such covenant was ineffective between purchasers of different tracts from the same original owner, but was only available as between purchasers claiming title from the different original holders.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 155*)—
WATER RIGHTS—COVENANTS—NONCONTIGUOUS LANDS.

A covenant in a partition deed that the owners of the entire property should continue to use the waters of a stream in equal shares, as theretofore, did not necessarily secure any riparian rights to subsequent grantees of the land not contiguous to the stream.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 155*)—
RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DIVISION OF LAND.

A subsequent conveyance by one of the original owners of riparian land of a part thereof not abutting on the creek would not convey any riparian rights, unless so provided in the conveyance, or unless the circumstances were such as to show that the parties so intended, or such as to raise an estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 155*)—
NONRIPARIAN LAND.

Where a tract of land conveyed was not contiguous to a stream and had never received water therefrom, and there were no ditches leading to it from the stream at the time of the conveyance, nor other conditions indicating an intention that it should continue to have riparian rights, notwithstanding its want of access to the stream, the fact that it was part of a ranch to which riparian rights had extended while the ownership was continuous from it to the banks of the stream would not preserve such right to the severed tract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 101*)—
PERCOLATING WATERS—RIGHTS OF LAND-OWNERS—REASONABLE USE.

Where two or more persons own different tracts underlaid by porous material extending to and communicating with them all, which is

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes saturated with water moving with more or less freedom therein, each has a common and correlative right to the water on his land to the full extent of his needs, if the common supply is sufficient, and to the extent of a reasonable share, if the supply is insufficient for all.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—PERCOLATING WATERS—UNREASONABLE USE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where defendants drew percolating waters for use on their own land from underlying porous material, to plaintiff's alleged injury, the burden was on plaintiff to show that the amount taken by defendants exceeds their reasonable share of the waters available.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 116, 117; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 101*)—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS—WATERS FEEDING A STREAM—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

Where waters in an underground stratum are in such immediate connection with the surface stream as to make them part of the stream, defendants' land overlying the water is riparian to the stream and entitled to riparian rights with reference to such water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 151*)—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS—ADVERSE USE.

Where subterranean waters constituted part of a stream, the owners of land overlying such waters would not lose their right to a reasonable share thereof by mere nonuser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 155; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 146*)—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS—WATERS OF STREAM—ADVERSE USE.

Where subterranean waters constituted part of a stream, plaintiff's use of the water, after it had passed through defendant's lands overlying the water and had become part of the surface stream, would not constitute a trespass on defendant's property, and hence would not be adverse to them so as to constitute the foundation of a title by prescription.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 153; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 105*)—PERCOLATING WATERS—RIGHTS OF LAND-OWNERS.

A landowner is entitled to a reasonable use of percolating waters therein, though it may be moving through his land into that of his neighbor, and though his use may prevent it from entering his neighbor's land, or draw it therefrom; and this whether the percolating waters feed a stream or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

11. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 137*)—RIGHT TO USE—ADVERSE USE.

Defendant, having diverted the waters of a creek adversely to plaintiff under claim of right, and used the same on his land for many years, more than five years before action, sunk several wells in the bed of the stream, from three of which water, to the quantity to which he had previously obtained the right of adverse use, was obtained. Plaintiff had knowledge of such use, and knew that the flow in the creek immediately decreased, and by reasonable inquiry could have ascertained that the decrease was caused by the wells. Held, that plaintiff's right to object to defendant's use of the wells was barred by limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

12. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 107*)—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS—INJUNCTION—NATURE OF INJURY.

Where complainant introduced no evidence as to the quantity of water discharged from a single well claimed to have been sunk in a stream by defendant without right, she was not entitled to an injunction, under the rule that to obtain such relief complainant must show a substantial injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 117; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

13. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 146*)—DIVERSION—WELLS—LACHES.

Where defendants had been in the use of wells alleged to constitute a diversion of the waters of a stream, to a part of which complainant was entitled, for more than five years, complainant's suit to restrain the maintenance of the wells was barred by laches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 153; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

14. NUISANCE (§ 73*)—UNCAPPED ARTESIAN WELLS—PRIVATE INJURY—PUBLIC NUISANCE—LIMITATIONS.

Where plaintiff's right to restrain the maintenance of certain artesian wells in a water course alleged to constitute a diversion of the flow, to which plaintiff was entitled, was barred by limitations, the fact that defendant left the wells uncapped, in violation of St. 1877-78, p. 195, c. 153, and thereby created a common nuisance, did not relieve plaintiff of the bar of the statute; plaintiff's right of action for special injury caused by a public nuisance being barred in the same manner as similar actions, though the public's right to abate the nuisance was not barred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

15. NUISANCE (§ 72*)—SPECIAL INJURY—ARTESIAN WELLS—UNCAPPED WELLS—WASTE.

That certain artesian wells in a water course were left uncapped, in violation of St. 1877-78, p. 195, c. 153, did not constitute a special injury to plaintiff entitled to water from the stream, where the water from the wells did not go to waste during the irrigation season.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 164-169; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

16. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 146*)—DIVERSION—LIMITATIONS.

Where the effect of certain artesian wells in a water course was perceptible at a dam near plaintiff's point of diversion immediately after the wells were constructed, and plaintiff had knowledge of the flow and use of the wells by the owner from the beginning, limitations started to run against her from that time.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Victoria Hudson and others against Ella M. Dailey and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Hass, Garrett & Dunnigan, for appellants. Hunsaker & Britt, John D. Pope, and Ward Chapman, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff Victoria Hudson alleges: That she is the owner of 760 acres of land in the Rancho de la Puente, that said land is riparian to a stream of water known as "San Jose creek" and is entitled to riparian rights therein, and to receive of its waters for use thereon a flow of 250 miner's inches of water; that the water of said stream is directly supplied to it from the saturated soils and gravels of the valley through which it runs; that the defendants have bored a number of wells in said valley from which, some by artesian pressure and some by pumps, but all without right, they obtain large quantities of the waters which feed said creek and appropriate the same to their own use, thereby depleting the stream flowing in the creek to the extent of 300 miner's inches, and depriving the plaintiff of the waters thereof; and that they claim the right to continue this use of the waters lying beneath their lands. She prays for a decree quieting her title to 250 miner's inches of water of the creek, and enjoining the defendants from pumping and using the water of said wells to an extent that will prevent a sufficient flow of water in said creek to supply her with said quantity therefrom. The plaintiff J. W. Hudson is the husband of Victoria, and has no interest in the suit. In this opinion, when we mention the plaintiff, we refer to Victoria. The answer denies many of the material allegations of the complaint. Defendant Currier answers separately, making the additional defense that the plaintiffs' action is barred by the statute of limitations. The action was begun on November 30, 1904. The findings are very full and elaborate. The conclusion of law and judgment was that the plaintiffs take nothing by the suit. A motion for a new trial was denied. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and order.

The appellant urges that the findings of the court are, in many particulars, contrary to the evidence. We do not find it necessary to consider all of these specifications in detail. We are of the opinion that, upon a proper view of the case as presented in the court below, all the findings that are necessary to support the judgment are sustained by the evidence.

San Jose creek, in its original natural state, had its origin in the Sierra Madre mountains, from whence it then flowed on the surface of the ground through the plain upon which the city of Pomona is now situated and to and through the San Jose valley. For many years, however, owing to the diversion and use of the water in Pomona and vicinity, there has been no surface stream in the channel from its embouchure from the mountains down to the upper part of the San Jose valley, at which point the stream again appeared on the surface and flowed down to the lands of the parties here concerned. It is the theory of the plaintiff that the greater part of the water of the stream, thus rising in the valley, is composed of water which comes from the mountain streams and sinks into the underlying porous strata extending from the foot of the mountains to and into the San Jose valley and under the lands of the defendants, and which, owing to the narrowing of said valley at its upper end and the consequent elevation of the water plane at that point, rises to the surface and flows in the depression constituting the channel of the creek. Accepting this as correct, the defendants claim that the plaintiff has shown no legal injury, no invasion of her rights, and no ground for relief. The evidence shows that her theory is correct in the main. Some of the water, thus percolating through the underlying strata, comes from rainfall upon the adjacent hills and upon the valley itself and the plain above in the vicinity of Pomona; but this fact does not affect the relative rights of the parties to the water.

There is a finding to the effect that the soils and material of the earth intervening between the respective pumping plants and the creek, "or a considerable portion thereof, are impervious and do not permit the water to pass through them to the creek," that there are different and distinct water-bearing strata underneath the valley surface, between which lie other strata containing no water, and that a part of the water obtained by the defendant's wells is drawn from lower strata which do not feed the creek at the point where the plaintiff obtains her water from it. The plaintiff contends that these findings are not sustained by the evidence. The finding that the waters of the lower strata do not feed the creek, flowing at the plaintiff's dam, is based on the qualified and conditional opinion of certain witnesses that these lower strata were overlaid by a blanket of impervious material, throughout the entire portion of the valley above the dam, through which no water could rise into the creek, and into which no water could sink from the strata which do feed the creek. It assumes that there were no breaks or interruptions in this impervious stratum or blanket, through which the waters could pass from it to the strata above or below, or from the upper strata through it. There was no evidence of these facts. If there was in the valley a single acre where this supposed blanket did not exist, the opening would be equivalent to an immense well through which the water would pass from the upper strata into the lower one, if the water in the latter was extracted, or would rise into the upper strata if the water in the upper strata was diminished and there was pressure below, thus depleting or replenishing, as the case might be, the upper strata from which the creek water was directly obtained, and to that extent affecting the flow in the creek. But as the findings also, in substance, declare that the pumping of the defendants does, to a material extent, decrease the amount of water which the plaintiff is able to divert from the creek and which she needs for the irrigation of her land, the findings as to the lower strata is immaterial. If the pumping by the defendants constituted an unlawful diversion of water to which plaintiff was entitled, it would be no defense that they also took other water from another source. Each defendant owns a separate tract of land in severalty. All of these lands, except those of Currier, lie within the valley and over the underground porous strata from which the creek issues. Each of these defendants, by means of wells and pumps, takes water from the strata and uses it upon his tract of overlying land. These are the diversions complained of and shown by the evidence. These, coupled with other similar diversions and uses in Pomona and vicinity and a series of 10 unusually dry years immediately preceding the action, have caused the stream flowing upon the surface in the creek to diminish to such an extent that, at the plaintiff's place of diversion from the creek, the flow is much less than it was formerly, and she is thereby deprived of the use of the quantity of water which, for 30 years previously, she had been accustomed to use.

The court found that none of these defendants takes or uses more water in this way than is necessary for irrigation and domestic use on his particular tract of land. In her briefs the plaintiff practically concedes that this finding is correct. There is no direct evidence to show whether or not the underground supply is insufficient for all demands upon it. If we concede that the circumstances show that it is not sufficient for all, we are then met by the proposition that there was no evidence to prove that said defendants, or any of them, have ever taken more than a reasonable share of such water. The plaintiff tendered no issue of that character. The complaint asserts a paramount right in the plaintiff, superior to that of the defendants. There is no attempt to present a case of excessive use by a defendant entitled to share in a common supply, or to obtain a decree apportioning the waters of the valley among the parties. The evidence does not supply the data necessary to apportion the water to which each party is entitled. If these defendants are entitled to a reasonable share of this underground water, the plaintiff has shown no case against them.

The lands of the plaintiff and of all of the defendants, except Currier and Ybarra, were originally a part of the Rancho de la Puente. This ranch consisted of about 49,000 acres of land, included practically the whole of the San Jose valley, and was granted by the Mexican government to John Rowland and William Workman. In 1868 these two owners made a mutual deed of partition thereof containing the following covenant: "And it is mutually agreed and covenanted that, notwithstanding this partition hereby made, the rights to use and benefits of the waters of the San Jose creek flowing into said Rancho de la Puente or rising thereon, whether for water power, irrigation or other purposes, shall continue and remain as heretofore to be had, held, possessed and enjoyed by the parties in equal shares and to their heirs and assigns." The plaintiff's land and all the lands in said rancho belonging to the respective parties are held by title derived from the parties to this deed and covenant. At the time the Rowland-Workman deed was executed, the ditch and dam which the plaintiff now uses was in use, and by means thereof the water of the creek was carried to the plaintiff's land. It is contended that the effect of the covenant aforesaid was to bind each of the parties and their successors in interest to maintain his land in such condition and make only such use thereof as would enable her to continue to obtain from the stream by said dam and ditch the same amount of water that was then taken therefrom and used on her land, and that the extraction of the underground water and consequent diminution of the flow in the creek is a violation of the covenant. We do not think it was intended to have that effect, but that it merely divided the rights to the water into equal shares between them, regardless of frontage on the stream or other circumstances affecting the amount to which each would have been entitled; but, conceding that it would have the effect as contended, between the successors of Rowland as against the successors of Workman, it would have no effect whatever between purchasers of different tracts from the same original owner. Purchasers from Rowland of different parts of the land allotted to him could not claim the benefit of this covenant, as against each other. The plaintiff claims under Rowland. She does not show that the defendants owning parts of the Puente ranch do not also claim under him.

We cannot determine from the findings or evidence whether the tracts of land in this rancho, now owned by the several defendants and not contiguous to the surface flow of the creek, are entitled to riparian rights in the surface stream or not. The covenant above mentioned does not necessarily secure it to them. A subsequent conveyance by one of the original owners, of a part of the tract not abutting upon the creek, would not carry any riparian or other right in the creek, unless it was so provided in the conveyance, or unless the circumstances were such as to show that parties so intended, or such as to raise an estoppel. If the tract conveyed was not contiguous, had never received water from the creek, and there were no ditches leading from the creek to it at the time of the conveyance, nor other conditions indicating an intention that it should continue to have the riparian right, notwithstanding its want of access to the stream, the mere fact that it was a part of the rancho to which riparian right had extended while the ownership was continuous from it to the banks of the stream would not preserve that right to the severed tract. The severance, under such circumstances, would cut off such tract from the riparian right. Anaheim U. W. Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 331, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062. The record does not show where these lands lie with respect to the stream, nor what were the covenants in the deeds by which they were segregated from the entire tract, nor the conditions then existing with respect to the use of the water. The court finds that each of said defendants, before he resorted to the use of wells and pumps, had been accustomed to receive and use on his land some of the water from the creek, and that they each resorted to pumps and wells because of the diminution of the surface flow; but the conditions of such use, and the nature of the right under which it was had, are not shown except by the statement that it was water "which they had appropriated and used for many years." How long the use had continued does not appear. The court finds that the wells of Currier, Persons, Dailey, and Howell were bored and had been in operation more than five years before the action was begun. This defense will be considered hereafter. The other defendants cannot justify their taking of the underground water as a continuation of the riparian use recognized by the covenant in the Rowland-Workman deed, nor as an indirect exercise of a prescriptive right previously acquired by them in the flow of the creek, for they do not appear to have acquired a right of either character.

It appears, however, that the lands of all defendants except Currier are situated over the strata from which they obtain water and from which the creek is also supplied. The irrigated lands of the plaintiff are over the same strata. Defendants' lands are far above the plaintiff's place of diversion from the surface stream, and they use the water only upon their overlying lands. The general rule, as now established by the decisions of this court, undoubtedly is that, where two or more persons own different tracts of land, underlaid by porous material extending to and communicating with them all, which is saturated with water moving with more or less freedom therein, each has a common and correlative right to the use of this water upon his land, to the full extent of his needs if the common supply is sufficient, and to the extent of a reasonable share thereof if the supply is so scant that the use by one will affect the supply of the others. Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 134, 144, 150, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; McClintock v. Hudson, 141 Cal. 281, 74 Pac. 849; Cohen v. La Canada, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 439, 76 Pac. 47; Montecito, etc., Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 585, 77 Pac. 1113; Burr v. Maclay, 154 Cal. 434, 98 Pac. 260; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. —, 101 Pac. 790. Applying this rule, and assuming for the present that the right of the plaintiff is not paramount to that of the others, there can be no doubt that the taking of a part of the underground waters by the defendants is not unlawful, unless they take an unreasonable share thereof. As there is no presumption that the part so taken by any defendant exceeds his reasonable share, it would be incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove it, and, as she had made no attempt to do so, she cannot prevail against them. She insists, however, that her right is paramount to that of the defendants to the use of these underground waters. Her land, or the part of it upon which she uses the water, is riparian to the creek. She, and her predecessors in interest, by means of a dam and open ditch, have diverted the water from the creek at a point below any of the lands of the defendants, and have used it upon her land ever since the year 1868, under claim of right, to the extent of about 250 miner's inches, whenever the stream was large enough to furnish that amount. The diversions of the defendants by their wells have materially contributed to the diminution of the surface stream, and have, to that extent, deprived her of the water to which she is entitled, if her right is superior to theirs. The question is thus presented whether or not the rights of a riparian proprietor, to the waters of a stream, extend to the subterranean waters above from which the stream proceeds, and are paramount to that of the owners of the lands which overlie those subterranean waters.

If the water in the underground strata is in such immediate connection with the surface stream as to make it a part of the stream, as the plaintiff seems to contend, then the defendants' lands overlying such water must be considered as also riparian to the stream, and, under the law of riparian rights, they have a common right with the plaintiff to the use of the water. In that case her use would not be adverse to them. They would not lose their right by disuse, and their taking of a reasonable share would be lawful. Coleman v. Le Franc, 137 Cal. 217, 69 Pac. 1011. In Verdugo, etc., Co. v. Verdugo, 152 Cal. 664, 93 Pac. 1021, a different rule was applied because in that case the right of the party taking the surface stream was paramount to the right of the other riparian owners along its course. It was made paramount by the force of a decree in partition setting apart the surface stream to the use of a particular tract of the land, exclusively, and consequently divesting the other lands of all right to the stream and giving the person owning the land to which it was assigned the right to have its flow preserved undiminished. The rule which in that case was declared to apply to such of the underground waters as might prove to be unnecessary to the preservation of the surface stream—that is, that all the parties having access to it would have the right to share reasonably in its use—is the rule applicable to the case at bar, if plaintiff has no paramount right. But the plaintiff insists that, by continuous use since 1868, she had gained a prescriptive right to the water of the stream, which, she claims, is paramount to said rights of the defendants, at least to the extent that they may not extract the underground water in such quantities as to deplete the surface stream to her injury. If this water is a part of the stream, this claim is also untenable. The defendants, as riparian owners, would not lose their rights by disuse. Her use of the water, after it had passed through their lands and become part of the surface stream, would not injure them, nor constitute a trespass upon their property, and hence it would not be adverse to them and could not be the foundation of a title by prescription as against them. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 78, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 140, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Cave v. Tyler, 133 Cal. 568, 65 Pac. 1089.

There is also a claim that this underground water, as to a great part of the lands, has not the characteristics of a stream, but must be classed as percolating water. There will always be great difficulty in fixing a line, beyond which the water in the sands and gravels over which a stream flows, and which supply or uphold the stream, ceases to be a part thereof and becomes what is called "percolating water." Undoubtedly, the water in the lands of many of the defendants would be of the class ordinarily designated as percolating water. It is therefore important to determine the relative rights of the owner of the nonriparian land containing percolating water, which feeds a surface stream, and those who have acquired riparian or prescriptive rights in said stream, where the pumping of such percolating water and its use on the land in which it is found will diminish the surface stream, to the injury of those having such riparian or prescriptive rights therein. The owner of land has a natural right to the reasonable use of the waters percolating therein, although it may be moving through his land into the land of his neighbor, and although his use may prevent it from entering his neighbor's land or draw it therefrom. This right arises from the fact that the water is then in his land so that he may take it without trespassing upon his neighbor. His ownership of the land carries with it all the natural advantages of its situation, and the right to a reasonable use of the land and everything it contains, limited only by the operation of the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas." It is upon this principle that the law of riparian rights is founded, giving to each owner the right to use the waters of the stream upon his riparian land, but limiting him to a reasonable share thereof, as against other riparian owners thereon. We think the same application of the principle should be made to the case of percolating waters feeding the stream and necessary to its continued flow. There is no rational ground for any distinction between such percolating waters and the waters in the gravels immediately beneath and directly supporting the surface flow, and no reason for applying a different rule to the two classes, with respect to such rights, if, indeed, the two classes can be distinguished at all. Such waters, together with the surface stream supplied by them, should be considered a common supply, in which all who by their natural situation have access to it have a common right, and of which they may each make a reasonable use upon the land so situated, taking it either from the surface flow, or directly from the percolations beneath their lands. The natural rights of these defendants and the plaintiff in this common supply of water would therefore be coequal, except as to quantity, and correlative.

There is nothing in the facts alleged or proven giving to the plaintiff any paramount or superior rights in these waters. There is no evidence that she had ever used or diverted the water in such a manner as to interfere in any way with the use of the percolating water by the defendants or so as to make her use adverse to them and give her a prescriptive right against them for the amount she was accustomed to use. She and they alike must depend solely on their natural rights for the determination of the quantity they may take from this common supply. As she has failed to allege that they have taken or threaten to take more than a reasonable proportion of the water, and as she had no right superior to theirs, she has not established a cause of action against them with respect thereto.

The brief of the plaintiff presents numerous details wherein it is claimed that the findings are to some extent unsupported by the evidence. None of them, however, go to the merits of the case, except those we have discussed, and those as to which we have assumed that the facts are as the plaintiff contends they should have been found. It is unnecessary to consider them further. None of them in any wise affect the conclusions we have stated.

The lands of the defendants Ybarra and McClintock are not within the Rancho de la Puente, but are within the San Jose valley, and are situated over the same underground strata as the other lands hereinbefore mentioned. All that has been said with regard to the natural rights belonging to the lands of the other defendants applies with equal force to these lands. The facts are the same, and the plaintiff has failed to establish a cause of action as to them.

The case against the defendant Currier stands upon different grounds. He pleaded the statute of limitations, and the finding of the court is that the action was barred as against him. This finding is sustained by the evidence. He had diverted the water of the creek continuously and adversely to the plaintiff, under claim of right, and used it on his land for many years before the suit was begun, by means of a dam and ditch. The flow of the creek decreased, and, being unable to obtain therefrom the waters he needed, he put down seven wells in the bed of the creek, from three of which he obtained water equal to the quantity to which he had previously obtained the right by such adverse use. These wells were sunk more than five years before the action was begun. The evidence shows that the plaintiff knew of such use and knew that the flow in the creek immediately decreased. By reasonable inquiry she could have ascertained that the decrease was caused by the wells. Under these circumstances the action is clearly barred. Another well was bored by him within the five-year period. The court finds that the water flowing from it was very small. In order to make a case for an injunction, it was necessary for the plaintiff to show substantial injury. She introduced no evidence of the quantity discharged from this well, resting it upon the testimony of the defendant that it was very small, as the court found. In support of the finding and judgment, we will presume that the quantity was negligible, and the injury to the plaintiff therefrom too slight to justify an injunction.

The wells of Dailey, Persons, and Howell having been also in use for more than five years, the action as against them would be barred by laches. The facts as to them were alleged in defense; but there was no plea of the statute of limitations on their behalf.

The evidence shows that Currier left his artesian wells uncapped and permitted the water therefrom to flow down the creek channel unused, so far as he was concerned, during the winters, when it was not needed. Plaintiff claims that this was a violation of the statute of 1878 (St. 1877-78, p. 195, c. 153), declaring any uncapped artesian well from which water was permitted to flow and run to waste to be a public nuisance, and making it a misdemeanor in the owner of such well to permit such waste, and that, as the right to maintain a public nuisance cannot be gained by adverse use, the finding that the plaintiff's action, as against Currier, is barred by limitation, is erroneous. We cannot say that a private prescriptive right to private property may not be obtained by means of acts which may also constitute or cause a public nuisance. The private owner who is injured has a right of action in case of special injury, and such right is barred in the same manner as other actions of like nature. A private owner, so injured, cannot invoke the protection of the public right to abate the nuisance, which is not barred, and thus avoid the effect of the statute of limitations upon his private right of action. A further sufficient answer to this point is that the water from these wells did not go to waste during the irrigating season. The fact that it was allowed to flow without use during the winter, when it was not needed for use by any one, might make the uncapped wells a public nuisance during that season; but it would not have that effect during the time when the water was used, nor would it prevent Currier from acquiring, by adverse use during the regularly recurring irrigating seasons, the right to divert the water by the wells during that season.

It may be that the effect of allowing the water to flow from said wells during the winter is to unnecessarily lower the water and decrease the pressure in the underground strata, and thereby reduce the creek flow during the ensuing irrigating season, or part of it, and possibly the plaintiff may have a cause of action to prevent such diminution from that cause; but the complaint does not allege such waste, and without such allegation it does not state a cause of action of that character.

There is no foundation for the proposition that the statute of limitations would not begin to run in favor of Currier, with respect to his right to maintain wells, until the extraction of water by his wells had begun to diminish the flow at the plaintiff's dam. The evidence shows that the effect was perceptible at the dam immediately, and that the plaintiff had knowledge of the flow from the wells and the use thereof by Currier from the beginning. This was sufficient to charge her with notice that the tendency of the diversion of the flow at those wells would be to reduce the amount in the stream below and to start the statute of limitations running.

There are no other points deserving of consideration.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. HUNTER et al.
 SAME v. BUFFINGTON et al.
 (L. A. 2,140.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1909.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 99*)—
 "PERCOLATING WATER."

"Percolating waters," in the common-law sense of the term, are those that are vagrant, wandering drops moving by gravity in any and every direction along the line of least resistance. The term does not include waters percolating only in the sense that they form a vast mass of water confined in a basin filled with detritus, always slowly moving downward to the outlet in conformity with the physical law to attain a uniform level.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 108; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, p. 5287; vol. 8, p. 7750.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 106*)—
 PERCOLATING WATER—RIPARIAN LAND—IN-TERCEPTION OF WATER.

It is unlawful for one owning land bordering on a stream to intercept percolating waters therein and apply it to any use other than its reasonable use on the land from which it is taken, if he thereby diminishes the stream to the damage of those having rights therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 115; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 209*)—
 WATERS OF STREAM—USE—SUBTERRANEAN WATERS FEEDING STREAM.

The city of Los Angeles having a prior right to the use of all of the supply of the Los Angeles river for domestic and municipal purposes, and all of such supply being required for legitimate use within the limits of the old pueblo, the city was entitled to restrain the abstraction of the waters underlying the San Fernando valley, which are confined in a basin filled with detritus, always moving downward to the outlet, which is the Los Angeles river.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. § 209.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 209*)—
 WATERS OF STREAM—PARAMOUNT RIGHTS—ENFORCEMENT—COMPLAINT.

Where a city claimed a paramount right to all the waters of a stream, it was not necessary that the complaint should allege that any particular quantity of the water was necessary for the city's use, nor was it necessary that the city's complaint should give the boundaries and location of the irrigable land, nor the number and location of homes, hotels, and factories, etc., for the use of which water was required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. § 209.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 209*)—
 MUNICIPAL SUPPLY—DIVERSION—DECREE.

Where a city was entitled to the entire surface flow of a stream for municipal and domestic purposes, it was not necessary for the court, in a decree restraining defendants from diverting water from the stream at any time, to define the amount of water which would be required by the city from October 1st of each year to May 1st of the following year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. § 209.*]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 105*)—
 RIVERS—SUBTERRANEAN FLOW—ARTESIAN
 WELLS.

Where a surface stream under normal conditions was proportionate to the contributions of water from rainfall and underground storage, and defendant's artesian wells drew from the underground supply, with the effect of appreciably diminishing the surface flow, the court properly found that the waters developed in the wells were part of the subterranean flow of the water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 113; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 553*)—EXPERTS—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION—ASSUMPTION OF RECOLLECTION.

An hypothetical question asking witness to assume what another witness had testified with reference to the character of the geological formation of a valley, and to base thereon an opinion as to where the water plane of a valley extended, was objectionable, in that it permitted the witness to assume a recollection of all of the matters testified to by the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2371; Dec. Dig. § 553.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—PREJUDICE—EVIDENCE.

An objection that an hypothetical question permitted the witness to assume a recollection of all of the matters testified to by another witness was not such an irregularity as to call for a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1048.*]

9. EVIDENCE (§ 508*)—EXPERTS—FORMATION OF RIVER.

In a suit to restrain the alleged unlawful diversion of the waters of a river to which plaintiff city claimed the entire paramount right, the court did not err in permitting experts to testify as to the manner in which the river was created.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2311; Dec. Dig. § 508.*]

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 209*)—
 PARAMOUNT RIGHTS—QUIETING TITLE—PARTIES.

In a suit by a city claiming a paramount right to the entire waters of a stream to quiet title thereto, as against the defendants, the court being able to fully determine the controversy as between the parties litigant, others similarly situated to those who were defendants in the action were not necessary parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. § 209.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. A. Gibbs, Judge.

Suit by the City of Los Angeles against Jesse D. Hunter and others to quiet title in the plaintiff to an asserted paramount right in the waters of the Los Angeles River, and by the City against Thomas D. Buffington and others to quiet the same title and to obtain an injunction restraining defendants from making any diversion of the water when required by the city for municipal and domestic purposes. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

McNutt & Hannon, Stephens & Stephens, Warren E. Lloyd, T. R. Archer, and Munson & Barclay, for appellants. W. B. Mathews, Leslie R. Hewitt, City Atty., H. T. Lee, and J. R. Scott, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The suit of the City of Los Angeles v. Hunter et al. is an action against 47 owners of land in the San Fernando valley, to quiet title in the plaintiff to its asserted paramount right to the use of the waters of the Los Angeles river. The case of the City of Los Angeles v. Buffington et al. is an action against 160 owners or tenants of land in the same valley, brought for the same purpose, and also to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from making any diversion of water from the river when it is required by the city for supplying its municipal and domestic needs. The actions were tried together, and, from the judgments which followed in favor of the city, the defendants appeal. The legal propositions presented upon all appeals are substantially identical.

Saving certain minor objections going to the introduction or rejection of evidence, the principal contentions of appellants are: First, that the waters which they were taking by means of wells were not waters of the Los Angeles river; and, second, if they were waters of the Los Angeles river, the city of Los Angeles had no superior right to the use of them. The lands of these defendants, embracing in all about 5,000 acres, are situated in the southeastern portion of the San Fernando valley, where the surrounding mountains draw together and form what is called the "Narrows." A description of the San Fernando valley, adequate for all the purposes of this consideration, will be found in City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy et al., 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585. The cases of Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, and McClintock v. Hudson, 141 Cal. 275, 74 Pac. 849, together with the Pomeroy Case, above cited, give so full and satisfactory an account of the water conditions existing, not alone generally in the arid portions of this state, but particularly of the conditions existing and controlling the considerations of the questions here presented, that a reference to them renders unnecessary any detailed description.

The defendants were using water pumped from wells of various depth, which wells were situated at an average distance of about 1,000 feet from the surface border of the Los Angeles river, though in instances the distances of certain wells were two or three miles. The contention of the city is that these wells abstracted water belonging to the Los Angeles river, to the use of all of which water it has a paramount right. The court so found. The defendants' contention is twofold: First, that the waters are strictly percolating waters, not belonging to the subterranean flow of the stream, but if con-cededly on the way to join and swell such flow, still percolating waters, to the use of which, as owners of the land, they have an absolute indefeasible right; second that over all the San Fernando valley extends a clay blanket, impervious to water, underlying which blanket are water-bearing gravels, that the waters above this blanket feed the Los Angeles river, while the waters below this blanket do not; that they draw their well waters from the gravels below the blanket, and therefore, conceding that the city of Los Angeles has a paramount right to the use of the waters of the river, they are not trespassing upon this right. The court rejected both of these contentions in the following findings: "That the waters of said river, in its course through said valley, penetrate into and completely fill the voids of said permeable material, down to bed rock, under the surface channel of said river, and on both sides of said channel, throughout the whole width of said valley, from a point at or above the level of the surface stream of said river down to bed rock. It is not true, as alleged in the answers herein, that none of the underground waters in any of the lands of the defendants, described in the amended complaint herein, are part of the Los Angeles river, mentioned in the said amended complaint, or of the waters thereof, but are waters percolating in said lands, and form a part of the soil thereof, so as not to constitute a stream or water course; but, on the contrary, the court finds that all of the underground waters in all of said lands, from the surface of the ground down to bed rock, are flowing waters, and are part of the subterranean stream of said Los Angeles river." By these findings the court adopts the theory which is supported by the evidence of certain of the experts, that the waters of the Los Angeles river proper entering the valley sink to bed rock and spread out laterally, filling all the voids of the soil, and so moved slowly down to the Narrows, where the Los Angeles river, owing to the declension in that direction of the land surface, appears as a visible stream. It is earnestly contended against this finding: That it takes no account of proved conditions; that it treats this great valley as being all a part of the Los Angeles river; that in so doing it stultifies physical and geological facts; that it eliminates from consideration the rainfall upon the surface of the valley; the water from all the surrounding mountains which not following well-defined channels, still by gravity is carried down and sinks into the valley lands; and the fact that the water flowing into the valley by numerous channels itself sinks into the lands of the valley miles distant from the thread of the river, yet this water also is treated as part of the stream long before, in the course of nature, it can have reached the true subterranean flow thereof. So it is insisted by appellants that these waters are strictly percolating waters, and that of them they have the common-law right of absolute ownership, as modified in this state only by the doctrine of Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra, namely, that the quantum of water which they use shall be in reasonable proportion to the whole thereof, and that the water so taken shall be used upon the surface soil of the basin, or, at least, not carried away for exterior use, to the injury of any owners of the land within the basin.

But in the view which we take, it is immaterial whether the San Fernando valley be considered a great basin, saturated by water from the inflow of the Los Angeles river and its tributaries, or saturated as a result of all the causes which appellants assign. In passing, it will suffice to say that the court was justified, upon a conflict in the evidence, in rejecting the theory of the clay blanket covering the valley at a varying depth. Unquestionably the San Fernando valley is the great natural reservoir and supply of the Los Angeles river. Unquestionably the cutting off of this supply would as completely destroy the Los Angeles river as would the cutting off of the Great Lakes destroy the St. Lawrence. San Fernando valley may indeed be regarded as a great lake filled with loose detritus, into which the drainage from the neighboring mountains flows, and the outlet of which is the Los Angeles river. Impeded by the soils, these waters, of course, move more slowly than they would in an open lake; but unquestionably the general movement of practically all is southeasterly to the Narrows, through and out of which flows the Los Angeles river proper. Unquestionably, also, a serious interruption of or interference with this supply would as certainly impair the volume of water carried by the Los Angeles river as though the interruption and interference were with a surface flowing tributary thereof. The waters of the San Fernando valley therefore are not "percolating waters" in the common-law sense of the term—vagrant, wandering drops moving by gravity in any and every direction along the line of least resistance. These waters percolate, it is true, but only in the sense that they form a vast mass of water confined in a basin filled with detritus, always slowly moving downward to the outlet, in the effort, in conformity with physical law, to attain a uniform level. If it be here conceded that the city of Los Angeles has the paramount right to the use of the waters of the Los Angeles river, then the abstraction of waters from this valley is as clearly an interference with that right as it would be if the valley, instead of being filled with debris, were an open lake from which the river drew its whole supply. The doctrine of percolating waters as applied by the common law has of necessity been modified to meet the conditions existing in this state, conditions which never confronted the authors of that body of laws, and of the existence of which it is safe to say they never conceived the possibility. Not only has that doctrine been modified in Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra, but it has further received necessary and just modification in McClintock v. Hudson, supra, where, quoting from the syllabus, which correctly epitomizes the view of this court, it is said: "Under the rule established in Katz v. Walkinshaw with respect to percolating waters, it is not lawful for one owning land bordering on a stream to excavate in his land, intercept percolating waters therein, and apply it to any use other than its reasonable use upon the land from which it is taken, if he thereby diminishes the stream to the damage of others having rights therein." If, as here contended and found, the city of Los Angeles has paramount right to the use of all the waters of the river, then, under the doctrine thus enunciated, none of these so-called percolating waters may be withdrawn to the invasion and injury of such right. See Hudson v. Dailey (L. A. 2,234, filed Dec. 1, 1909) 105 Pac. 748.

To this proposition we now come. The decisions of this court in Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Vernon Irrigation Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762; City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585; City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Farming & Milling Co., 152 Cal. 645, 93 Pac. 869, 1135; taken with the cases of Hooker v. City of Los Angeles, 188 U. S. 314, 23 Sup. Ct. 395, 47 L. Ed. 487, 63 L. R. A. 471, and Devine v. City of Los Angeles, 202 U. S. 313, 26 Sup. Ct. 652, 50 L. Ed. 1046—must be regarded as a definitive determination of the city's right. Collectively, these cases present the same arguments as are here advanced by appellants, and the decisions denying validity to these arguments must be considered as closing the contention. The right to use the water upon annexed territory not within the limits of the original pueblo is distinctly declared in City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, supra. Moreover, with the extraordinary growth of the city of Los Angeles within the original pueblo limits of four square leagues, this question becomes of no practical importance, since it is fairly well established that all of the supply of the Los Angeles river is required for legitimate uses within the limits of the old pueblo. We have thus considered the principal contentions advanced by appellants. Certain minor propositions may be disposed of with brief review.

The demurrer to the complaint for uncertainty was properly overruled. The city was contending that it had a paramount right to all of the waters of the river, and it was not required to aver that any particular quantity of the water was necessary for its use. Nor was it necessary that the city's complaint should give the boundaries and locations of the irrigable land any more than it would have been required to give the number and location of homes, hotels, factories, or the like for the use of which the water was required.

It was both impracticable and unnecessary for the trial court to attempt to define the amount of water which would be required by the city from October 1st of each year to May 1st of the following year. The court having properly decreed that the paramount right to the use of the water was in the city, by its injunction restraining the defendants from diverting water from the river at any time when the city was taking the entire surface flow for the purposes for which the city and its inhabitants were required to use the water, said all that was necessary upon this matter. Vernon Irrigation Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762; City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 Pac. 585. The finding that the waters developed in the wells of the appellants are part of the subterranean flow of the Los Angeles river was, as above discussed, abundantly sustained by the evidence. It was shown that the surface stream under normal conditions is proportionate to the contributions of water from rainfall and underground storage. The wells indisputably drew from this underground supply, with the effect of appreciably diminishing the surface flow.

Appellants objected to the following question asked of the expert Koebig: "Then, assuming what Mr. Mulholland testified to with regard to the character of the material and the manner of the upbuilding of the valley is true, where, in your opinion, does the water plane of the San Fernando valley extend?" It is urged that this was permitting the expert Koebig to construe the testimony of the expert Mulholland and to draw inferences therefrom; but the trial court, before overruling the objection, called attention to the fact that the witness had heard the testimony of Mulholland, and that his opinion was to be based, not upon the opinion of Mulholland, but upon the facts testified to by him. The only objection to the question that remains is that it permitted the witness to assume a recollection of all of the matters testified to by Mulholland. For the reasons given in People v. Le Doux, 102 Pac. 517, this method of framing what is in effect a hypothetical question is not favored; but for the reasons also there given the irregularity was not such as to call for a reversal of the case. The court did not err in permitting the expert witnesses to give their views as to the manner in which the Los Angeles river was created. While it is true, as said in Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, supra, that "what a subterranean stream must be in order to bring it within the law of riparian rights is a question of law," for experts learned in geology to give their theories as to the manner in which nature has created or developed a given physical condition is not an invasion of the domain of the law.

The trial court did not err in denying the motion of appellants to bring in other parties or their motions that their suits abate until these parties were brought in. The suit being one to quiet title, based upon the plaintiff's asserted paramount right to the waters of the stream, the presence or absence of such defendants, even if situated similarly to those in the action, could not have benefited or injured the latter. It is not pretended that the court in the action actually brought could not and did not fully determine the controversy between the parties litigant.

No other matters call for special attention, and for the foregoing reasons the judgments and orders appealed from are affirmed.

11 Cal. App. 497

VICTOR POWER & MINING CO. v. COLE.
(Civ. 651.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 13, 1909.)

1. EJECTMENT (§ 63*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

A complaint in ejectment, alleging that on or about a stated date defendants, without title or right, and without consent of plaintiff and its grantors, unlawfully entered into possession of, and ousted plaintiff and its grantors of the possession of, a part of certain described property, and have withheld, and are now wrongfully withholding, from plaintiff the possession of such premises, is sufficient, since it avers the estate of plaintiff, possession by defendant at the time of the commencement of the action, and his wrongful withholding of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 154-157; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 66*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

The averment that defendant's entry was without the consent of "plaintiff and its grantors" would not render the complaint subject to general demurrer; it being merely superfluous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—DEFAULT—VACATION—GROUNDS.

That one of a firm of attorneys representing defendant obtained an extension of time in which to answer, and by inadvertence neglected to make a record of the extension upon the office calendar of the firm, and left town without notifying his partner thereof, returning when it was too late to file an answer, would not warrant vacation of the default judgment for excusable neglect; it appearing that his partner knew when the time originally granted would expire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 161*)—DEFAULT—VACATION—PLEADING FILED AFTER DEFAULT TAKEN.

An answer, served on plaintiff's attorneys after judgment by default for failure to answer, and after the denial of a first motion to set aside the judgment and default, but prior to the hearing of the second motion for the same purpose, was no ground for granting the motion, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 182, providing that unless motions are refused for informality, or with liberty to renew them, after an application for an order made to a judge of a court in which the action or proceeding is pending is refused, or granted conditionally, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made, except to a judge of a higher court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; W. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by the Victor Power & Mining Company against C. L. Cole. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion to set aside the default upon which the judgment was entered, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, for appellant. W. F. Aram and P. H. Coffman, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and an order denying his motion to vacate and set aside the default upon which said judgment was entered.

The action is in ejectment; the complaint averring, among other facts, that "on or about the 5th day of October, 1907, the said defendants, without title, without right, and without the consent of the plaintiff and its grantors, wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon and into possession of, and ousted the plaintiff and its grantors of the possession of, a part of the said Bonanza mining claim, lands, and premises (all of which are in a preceding paragraph of the complaint specifically described), and ever since on or about the said 5th day of October, 1907, they have withheld, and are now wrongfully and unlawfully withholding, from the plaintiff, the possession of the same, to wit, that lot and part of the said Bonanza mining claim, lands, and premises known as the 'Cole house, barn, and buildings,' on the east side of the wagon road and creek running through the said Bonanza mining claim and premises, being the most southerly building on said Bonanza mining claim, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $60." The prayer is for judgment for the recovery of the possession of the demanded premises and for damages for withholding the same, etc. It will be convenient to here narrate the facts essential to an understanding of the point made by appellant that the court below erred in making the order denying his motion to set aside and vacate the judgment and the default.

The complaint was filed on the 6th day of January, 1908. Summons was served on the defendant in the county of Shasta on the 17th day of January, 1908, and the same, with proof of service thereof, was returned and filed on the 30th day of January, 1908. On the 24th day of February, 1908, default of defendant and judgment thereupon were entered, and a writ of possession issued.

On the 28th of February, 1908, the defendant filed a motion to set aside the judgment and vacate the default on the grounds of excusable neglect. This motion was supported by the affidavits of one G. Zerr and C. H. Braynard, one of the attorneys of the defendant, and upon the showing thus made the court, on the 25th day of March, 1908, made an order setting aside the judgment and the default, and allowed the defendant to answer or demur to the complaint. On the 9th day of April, 1908, the defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint, and on the 31st day of July, 1908, the court made an order overruling said demurrer, and allowing the defendant 30 days within which to file an answer. It is stated by counsel for respondent in their brief that on the 31st day of August, 1908, an order of the court was filed extending the time to answer to 10 days from August 29, 1908. This last-mentioned order does not appear in the judgment roll; but it does therein appear that on September 11, 1908, the default of the defendant for failure to answer was again entered by the clerk of the court. On the 21st day of September, 1908, the court rendered judgment against the defendant upon his default. On the 28th day of September, 1908, the attorneys for the defendant served and filed a notice of motion to set aside the said second default. Said motion was heard by the court on the 16th day of October, 1908, and on the 6th day of November, 1908, the court, by Hon. G. W. Bush, presiding judge thereof, denied the same. The judgment on the second default was entered on the 4th day of November, 1908. On the 7th day of December, 1908, the attorneys for the defendant served and filed a notice of a second motion to set aside and vacate the second default and judgment; the time for hearing said motion being fixed in said notice for the 15th day of January, 1909. On March 5, 1909, the court, Hon. Wm. M. Finch, judge of the superior court of Glenn county, presiding, made an order denying said second or last-mentioned motion. The appeal here, other than that from the judgment, is from the order made and entered by Judge Finch on the 5th day of March, 1909.

1. The claim for a reversal of the judgment is founded on the contention that the complaint does not state a cause of action. But the demurrer was properly overruled. The complaint contains all the averments essential to a statement of a cause of action in ejectment, to wit: The estate of plaintiff, possession by the defendant at the time of the commencement of the action, and his wrongful withholding the same. Haggin v. Kelly, 136 Cal. 483, 69 Pac. 140; Hihn Co. v. Fleckner, 106 Cal. 97, 39 Pac. 214; Hihn v. Mangenberg, 89 Cal. 263, 26 Pac. 968; Rego v. Van Pelt, 65 Cal. 254, 3 Pac. 867; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 246; McFar- land v. Matthal et al., 7 Cal. App. 599, 95 Pac. 179. The averment that defendant's entry was without the consent of "plaintiff and its grantors" was superfluous; but it has never been, nor will it ever be, held that, because a complaint sets out more facts than are necessary to a statement of a cause of action, the pleading is for that reason alone obnoxious to the objections of a general demurrer.

2. We perceive no reason which would justify a disturbance of the court's order refusing to set aside and vacate the default and judgment of which complaint is here urged. The most important of the several affidavits upon which the motion was pressed was that of C. F. Kimball, member of the law firm of Braynard & Kimball, attorneys for the appellant. In that affidavit it is alleged that the affiant "obtained an extension of time, by order of court, for said defendants to answer the complaint herein, which said extension of time expired on September 8, 1908, as shown by said order on file herein. By inadvertence I neglected to make a record of such extension of time upon the office calendar of the law firm of Braynard & Kimball, attorneys for said defendants. Said extension of time was obtained on August 29, 1908, and was for 10 days from such date." The affiant proceeds to aver that, on the 2d day of September, 1908, he departed from Redding, Shasta county, for the city of Stockton, to attend the Democratic state convention as a delegate to that body; that after the adjournment of said convention he visited Sacramento and San Francisco, and did not return to Redding until the 11th day of September, 1908, arriving there in the nighttime, and from the time of his departure from Redding he had no consultation with Mr. Braynard, his partner concerning business, until the morning of the 12th of September. The affidavit of Charles H. Braynard, of the law firm of Braynard & Kimball, corroborates Mr. Kimball, and, among other things, declares that affiant was unaware of the order made by the court on the 29th day of August, 1908, granting to the appellant further time within which to answer the complaint, until the morning of September 12, 1908, at which time he was informed of said order by his law partner. There can be no doubt that counsel for appellant signally failed to make such showing as would have warranted the court, in the exercise of its discretion, in vacating the judgment and setting aside the default entered against their client.

In order to justify the vacating of a judgment and the setting aside of a default, the party claiming to be thus aggrieved must show excusable neglect, or present a reasonable excuse for his default. Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 483, 39 Pac. 863; Edwards v. Hellings, 103 Cal. 204, 37 Pac. 218; Heine v. Treadwell, 72 Cal. 217, 13 Pac. 503; Reilly v. Ruddock, 41 Cal. 312. As is said in Shearman v. Jorgensen, supra, "It is only in exceptional cases that orders of this kind will be reversed by this court." But the facts here do not bring this case within the exception. One of the attorneys of the defendant was certainly aware of the extension of 10 days granted by the court to the defendant to answer the complaint, and the fact that said attorney failed to make a note of that order of the court on the office calendar of the law firm of which he was a member, and that by reason thereof his partner failed to become apprised of such order, is no reason at all for excusing their default. In other words, we fail to see the force of the argument that the plaintiff should be compelled to suffer the consequences of the neglect of Mr. Kimball to give his partner timely information of the order made by the court granting them additional time in which to file an answer. It is not denied that Mr. Braynard knew that the 30 days' time allowed the defendant for answering the complaint granted by the court upon overruling the demurrer would expire on the 31st day of August, 1908, and that he must have believed that, so far as he was advised, the plaintiff would be entitled to a default judgment after the expiration of that time. Personally he made no effort to secure further time beyond the 30 days originally granted to his client, and knew nothing of the order allowing additional time until the return of his partner to Redding, and after the additional time secured by the latter had expired. We do not think that proper, or any, diligence was shown by the defendant in the matter. To the contrary, it would rather appear that, having suffered two defaults to be entered against him, he was inexcusably negligent. The entry of the default and judgment in the first instance ought to have been sufficient to put the defendant on his guard, so that he would have avoided a repetition of the same difficulty. As stated, the facts do not justify interference with the ruling of the court below on the order appealed from.

The fact that the appellant, after the second default and judgment were entered, served upon the attorneys for the plaintiff an answer, of which "due service" was admitted by said last-mentioned attorneys, furnished no reason for allowing the motion. The alleged answer was served on the plaintiff's attorneys on February 18, 1909, after the denial of the first motion to set aside the judgment and default, but prior to the hearing of the second motion for the same purpose. The case had gone to judgment, and certainly, after that event, an answer or other pleading could avail nothing to the party offering it. Particularly is this true here, since it is manifest that, under the terms of section 182 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant was, so far as the facts disclosed here show, without authority or right to institute the second motion. That section provides that, save in cases where motions are refused for informality in the papers or proceedings necessary to obtain the order, or to motions refused with liberty to renew the same, an application for an order made to a judge of a court in which the action or proceeding is pending is refused in whole or in part, or is granted conditionally, no subsequent application for the same order shall be made to any court commissioner, or any other judge, except of a higher court. There is no showing here that the first motion was refused because of "informality in the papers or proceedings necessary to obtain the order," nor does it appear that liberty to renew the motion was granted.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

VICTOR POWER & MINING CO. v. ZERR.
(Civ. 652.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 18, 1909.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; W. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by the Victor Power & Mining Company against G. Zerr. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion to vacate the judgment and set aside the default upon which it was entered, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, for appellant. W. F. Aram and P. H. Coffman, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action, ejectment in form, and the appeal is from the judgment and an order refusing to grant the motion of the defendant to set aside the default entered against him for failure to answer the complaint within the time allowed by the court upon overruling the demurrer to said complaint, and to vacate the judgment entered upon said default. The facts and the law pertinent thereto are, confessedly, similar to those in the case of the plaintiff herein against C. L. Cole (No. 651, an opinion in which has this day been filed) 105 Pac. 758.

It therefore follows that, upon the authority of said case (No. 651), the judgment and the order appealed from herein must be affirmed; and such is the order.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

VICTOR POWER & MINING CO. v. ALVARES. (Civ. 653.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 18, 1909.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; W. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by the Victor Power & Mining Company against Manuel Alvares. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion to set aside the default upon which it was entered and vacate the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, for appellant. W. F. Aram and P. H. Coffman, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal from the judgment, and an order denying defendant's motion to set aside the default for failure to answer the complaint and to vacate the judgment thereupon entered against the appellant. The facts and the law applicable thereto are admittedly the same as those in the case of Victor Power & Mining Co. v. C. L. Cole (No. 651, this day decided) 105 Pac. 758.

Therefore, upon the authority of said case, the judgment and the order herein appealed from are affirmed.

GREEN et al. v. GAVIN et al. (Civ. 648.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 18, 1909. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 16, 1909.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 19*)—LOCATING CLAIMS—POSTING NOTICES—TIME.

Where defendants did all acts required for the valid location of a mining claim by recording notice of location in the county recorder's office, staking and developing the claim and posting notice of location on the claim, it was immaterial as against subsequent locators that the only valid notice of location was posted after the notice was recorded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 22*)—LOCATION OF CLAIMS—RECORDING NOTICE OF LOCATION.

The recorded notice of a mining claim need only be similar to that posted upon the ground and show that claimant claims the land described and identified therein, so that, where the notice recorded was a copy of a posted notice which was insufficient because not posted within the claim, that the valid notice subsequently posted, which differed from the first notice only in omitting the name of a witness, was not again recorded, was immaterial as against subsequent claimants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-50; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1041*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT—AMENDMENT.

In an action to quiet title to a mining location, the case was tried on defendants' allegation that their location notice was posted on February 29, 1905, and a copy thereof recorded on the 13th of that month. After trial, but before judgment, an amendment was allowed alleging that a notice was posted near and upon the claim on February 13th, and that on February 29th defendants again posted on the claim a copy of the notice of location, except that it omitted the name of a witness, containing the date of the location as of the 13th, locator's name, etc. The facts alleged in the amendment were admitted in evidence without objection. Held, that the amendment could not have injured plaintiffs, though it was probably unnecessary, since the ineffectual posting of February 13th need not have been alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4106-4109; Dec. Dig. § 1041.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENTS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The court should liberally exercise its discretion in allowing amendments, so that the cause may be decided on the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 601; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

5. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 38*)—CLAIMS—ACTIONS—PROOF—IMMATERIAL FACTS.

In an action to quiet title to a mining claim, the fact that the first notice of claim posted by defendants was near the land, and not upon it as alleged in the answer, was immaterial where sufficient facts were alleged and proved to show a valid location, and sustain the judgment for defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by F. H. Green and others against James Gavin and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Tuttle & Tuttle, for appellants. W. H. Slade and J. M. Fulweiler, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action is to quiet title, and the vital question in the case involves the validity of a mining location made by respondents. The facts are substantially without controversy, and may be stated as follows: On February 12, 1905, the respondents discovered mineral in paying quantities on the claim in dispute, and on the following day posted a notice of location on a tree plainly visible thought to be on or near the west line of the claim, but which a subsequent survey showed to be some 258 feet west of said line. An identical copy of this notice was recorded in the county recorder's office on the 23d day of February, 1905. These two instruments were in proper form, were signed by the locators, witnessed by one George Adams, and dated February 13, 1905. On this latter date respondents went around the claim, placed stakes at what they believed to be the four corners, marked trees, and brushed out the lines so that the boundaries could be readily traced, and immediately began the work of development of the mine which had not ceased at the time of the trial of the action. On the 29th day of February, 1905, one of the respondents posted near a trail on the easterly side and actually on the claim an additional notice sufficient in all respects and exactly like the first notice, with the single exception that it did not contain the name of Adams as a witness. On the 19th day of December, 1905, while respondents were in possession of the claim and engaged in developing it, appellants with knowledge of the foregoing facts, posted on the same claim their notice of location, and, as respondents would not yield possession, this action was begun.

The claim is located in what is known as the "Brushy Mining District" in the county of Placer, and it was stipulated that the custom of miners in said district at all the times mentioned required the posting of a location notice upon the mining ground claimed or attempted to be located, and the recording of a copy thereof with the county recorder of the county. It does not appear from the stipulation in what order these acts were required to be performed but there was evidence to the effect—and it would seem natural and reasonable to conclude—that the practice was first to post and afterwards to record the notice. But in the case at bar we consider this circumstance entirely immaterial as all the acts required for a valid location of a mining claim had been performed by respondents long before appellants entered upon the ground and the aforesaid departure from the usual order of procedure was absolutely without prejudice to any one, and could not inure to the benefit of the subsequent locators.

A statement of the foregoing facts would seem to be sufficiently confirmatory of the lower court's decision, but there is abundant authority for its support. In Thompson v. Spray, 72 Cal. 333, 14 Pac. 185, it is said: "Does the fact that the notice was recorded before it was posted render it invalid? We think not. No record is necessary in the absence of a custom requiring it. * * * But, if such a custom were shown, we do not think the mere order in which the acts are done of sufficient importance to render them of no effect." The following statement in Kern Oil Co. v. Crawford, 143 Cal. 302, 76 Pac. 1112 (3 L. R. A. [N. S.] 993), in reference to the marking of the boundaries, is applicable also to the acts required by custom: "Technical accuracy, either in the location of the stakes or in the wording of the notice, is not required. If a third party, intending to locate, can readily ascertain from what has been done by the prior locator the extent and boundaries of the claim so located, then the object of the statute has been accomplished." The matter could hardly be stated more clearly than in Dwinnell v. Dyer, 145 Cal. 21, 78 Pac. 253 (71 L. R. A. [N. S.] 763), wherein, through Chief Justice Beatty, the court declares: "Under the law of Congress, under the laws of this state, and under every code of district laws adopted by miners that has come to my notice, the prescribed order of the acts necessary to a valid location is, first, the discovery of mineral bearing rock in place; second, the posting of notice at or near the point where the ledge is exposed; next, the recording of notice; and, finally, the work of development. But, although this is the natural and proper order of procedure, it is not obligatory in the absence of intervening rights. It is indeed universally held that, when every act necessary to complete a location has been done before an adverse claim has accrued, the order in which such acts have been performed is immaterial. If, for instance, a locator before the discovery of any lode begins by first marking out a surface claim, his location is perfected if he develops a lode within his boundaries, before a good location is made by an adverse claimant." No one would deny that respondents, having made a mistake in posting the first notice without the boundaries of their claim, could supply the omission by posting the notice properly. But appellants insist that thereafter the notice should have been recorded. But what purpose could have been accomplished by repeating an act already performed? As far as the constructive notice required by the custom is concerned, it had been fully given and its object accomplished. Neither the law nor custom requires an idle act. Appellants state that "the first notice was invalid because posted without the claim and the second or additional notice was invalid because the same was never recorded, prior to the time of our location." But the argument is based upon a misconception of the notice required to be recorded. All that is contemplated is that the claimant shall post upon the ground a written statement signed by him and properly dated containing the information that he claims the land as a mining claim with a description of it sufficient for identification and that he shall record a similar notice in the recorder's office. The posted and the recorded notices are not required to be identical. They should, of course, be substantially alike. The only difference here relating to the name of a witness is entirely immaterial. As under the admitted facts the trial court could have reached no different conclusion, it is necessary to consider only one ruling, which relates to an amendment to the answer. It seems that the cause went to trial upon the averment by defendants that the location notice was posted on the 29th of February, 1905, and that a copy of said notice was recorded on the 13th day of said month.

After trial, but before judgment, upon due notice given, the court allowed an amendment to the effect that on February 13th a notice was posted near and upon said land, and that thereafter "on or about the 29th day of February, 1905, the said James Gavin, acting for himself and for his said co-locators of said mining claim, again posted on said mining claim, a full, true and correct copy of said notice of location of said claim, containing the names of said locators, the date of said location, to wit, the 13th day of February, 1905, and a correct description thereof, except, that the name of the witness, George Adams, to said location was omitted therefrom." The amendment was probably unnecessary, as the ineffectual posting of February 13th need not have been alleged, but the facts were received in evidence without objection, and it is impossible to conceive how appellants could be injured by the allowance of the amendment. The rule is well established that the court should liberally exercise its discretion in allowing amendments so that the cause may be determined upon its merits. Bean v. Stoneman, 104 Cal.

49, 37 Pac. 777, 38 Pac. 39; Carter v. Lothian, 133 Cal. 451, 65 Pac. 962.

It may be remarked that the court found in accordance with the evidence that the first notice was posted "near to said mining claim" and not "near and upon said land," as alleged in the amendment. But this circumstance is of no moment, as all the material facts are alleged in the answer and found by the court that are required to support the judgment.

The decision of the trial court is clearly right and the judgment and order are affirmed.

LEWIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF BUTTE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 674.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 6, 1909.)

1. PROHIBITION (§ 17*)—DEMAND—JUDGES.

The applicant for a writ of prohibition must make a demand on defendant that he accede to the course sought to be enforced, and therefore prohibition against the superior court and the judge thereof cannot, after the death of the judge, be maintained against his successor without such demand first being made upon him.

2. PROHIBITION (§ 20*)—JUDGES—THREAT TO DO ACT—DENIAL OF INTENT.

Before a judge should be prohibited from doing an act, it should appear that he is about to proceed or threatens to do the act, and, where he denies in his return that he will do the act complained of unless prohibited, the peremptory writ should not issue.

Petition for writ of prohibition by S. Lewis against the Superior Court of Butte County and others. Writ denied.

Bond & Hays, for petitioner.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is brought to prohibit the defendants from proceeding to try the case de novo in which H. S. Parker is plaintiff and the petitioner here is defendant. It appears that the action last above referred to was commenced in the justice court of Chico township. It came on for trial. The plaintiff submitted his evidence and rested, whereupon defendant moved for a judgment of nonsuit and dismissal of the action on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove his alleged cause of action and the facts were insufficient to constitute a cause of action. The motion was granted and judgment of nonsuit and dismissal of the action duly entered. Plaintiff thereupon served notice of appeal to the superior court "on questions of both law and fact." The appeal was perfected and "certified copy of the justice's docket, together with the pleadings, all notices, motions, and all other papers filed in the cause, the notice of appeal and undertaking, was filed in the clerk's office of the superior court." It further appears that "said H. S. Parker, plaintiff, did not prepare a statement of the case and file the same with the said justice or judge, nor was any such statement prepared or filed or prepared or filed, or at all." Some time after the said appeal was perfected and the said papers filed with the clerk of the superior court, as aforesaid, defendant moved the court, after due notice of the motion to plaintiff Parker, to dismiss the appeal "upon the ground that the said appeal was taken upon questions of law, and that no statement of the case was made or filed in the justice's court from which the appeal was taken," and that "an involuntary judgment of nonsuit is a question of law, and that the appeal was not perfected * * * because of there having been no statement of the case filed in the said justice's court." The motion came on for hearing and was denied by the court, "and the court thereupon set the case down for trial de novo in the said superior court," to which defendant objected on the grounds above stated, and that the "said superior court was without jurisdiction to do otherwise than to dismiss the said appeal, which said objection of the defendant was overruled by the said superior court and defendant excepted thereto." The writ of this court is prayed for to prohibit the said superior court from trying said case de novo. Before the alternative writ was served defendant, the Honorable Warren Sexton, died; the Honorable John C. Gray was duly appointed to fill the vacancy; and an order was made duly substituting him as defendant, and service was made upon him. Judge Gray makes return that the matter set forth in the petition has never been brought before him for hearing, and denies that he will unless prohibited by this court proceed to try the said case de novo, and prays that before any writ issue he be given an opportunity to hear the said matter.

While the superior court is made a party defendant, the motive power of its machinery resides in the judge of that court. It speaks only through its presiding officer, through whom alone service can be made upon it. We cannot know but that the successor of Judge Sexton would, upon motion, set aside the order overruling defendant's motion to dismiss the action and the order setting the case down for trial de novo, and, upon a renewal by defendant of his motion to dismiss the appeal, grant the relief prayed for. The writ of prohibition is the counterpart of the writ of mandate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102; and we held, in Ferguson v. Board of Education, 7 Cal. App. 568, 95 Pac. 165, that the applicant must make a demand upon the defendants to perform the act sought to be enforced by the writ. It would seem reasonable to require that before a judge should be prohibited from doing an act it should appear that he is about to proceed or threatens to do the act. Respondent denies in his return that he will do the act complained of unless prohibited. We think therefore that the peremptory writ should not issue under the present circumstances.

It may not be out of place, however, to state the law as we understand it. Where a nonsuit is granted for insufficient facts, there has been no trial on the merits. Smith v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. App. 531, 84 Pac. 54. The ruling of the trial court on motion for a nonsuit presents a question of law. Hanna v. De Garmo, 140 Cal. 174, 73 Pac. 830. An action commenced in the justice's court cannot be tried anew in the superior court until the issues of fact have been tried in the justice's court. Null v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. App. 207, 210, 87 Pac. 392.

We suggest that petitioner should be permitted to move the court to set aside and vacate its order refusing to dismiss the appeal and setting the case for trial de novo, and to renew his motion to dismiss the appeal and his objections to try the case de novo. The present trial judge will then have an opportunity to rule upon the matter, and, should he adhere to the view of his predecessor, petitioner will have his remedy open to him.

The writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by Geneva C. Cahlan and another against the Bank of Lassen County and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants, executors and interveners, appeal. Affirmed.

Pardee & Pardee and W. H. Carlin, for appellants. W. M. Boardman (Grove C. Julian, of counsel), for intervenor. N. J. Barry and H. D. Burroughs, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The plaintiffs in their complaint allege the ownership and present possession each of ten shares of the capital stock of the defendant bank, evidenced by two certificates numbered, respectively, 113 and 114; that both said certificates were issued to W. W. Scholl on January 8, 1902, and were thereafter duly assigned and delivered to plaintiffs; that said Scholl died in December, 1907; that defendants, executors of the last will of said deceased, claim some interest in said shares as belonging to the estate of said deceased; that plaintiffs demanded of plaintiff bank to pay to them the dividend accruing on said shares, and the same was refused. The prayer of the complaint is that defendant bank be directed to transfer the said shares on its books to plaintiffs and to pay plaintiffs the dividend due thereon, and that the court decree that said Scholl at his death had no right, title, or interest in said stock or the dividend thereon. Defendant bank disclaims any interest in the controversy and seeks only to be directed by the court as to its obligations in the matter. Defendants, the executors, deny, on information and belief, the material allegations of the complaint, and pray the court to "ascertain the truth as to the matters of fact set forth in the pleadings herein." Certain residuary legatees under the will of deceased and heirs at law filed a complaint in intervention, claiming that the property belonged to the deceased at his death. The court made the following findings: "(3) That on the 8th day of January, 1902, said Bank of Lassen County, by its officers duly authorized so to do, issued in due form and delivered to said W. W. Scholl two certificates of its capital stock Nos. 113 and 114, for ten shares each. (4) That on the 14th day of January, 1902, said W. W. Scholl duly and legally assigned said certificates mentioned in finding 3 hereof, and each of them, by indorsement on the back thereof, to the plaintiffs. That said W. W. Scholl thereupon placed said two certificates in an envelope and sealed the same and placed the following indorsement in writing on the outside of said envelope, 'In case of my death to go to Neva and Lena Cahlan,' and he thereupon placed the same in a private box kept by him in the vault of the Bank of Lassen County. That thereafter and during the month of January, 1902, and at other times thereafter said W. W. Scholl stated that said certificates and the shares of capital stock of said bank represented thereby belonged to the plaintiffs in this action, and that he held the same in trust for them, subject to his right to have and receive the dividends accruing thereon during his lifetime. That said certificates remained in said private box up to the 31st day of December, 1907, and on said day last named Fred Hines, one of the defendant executors herein, delivered both of said certificates with the envelope in which said certificates were inclosed to the plaintiffs herein." Judgment passed for plaintiffs, from which defendants, the executors, and defendants, the interveners, appeal on bill of exceptions.

It appeared by the evidence: That Scholl was for several years a partner in business with plaintiffs' father; that he was unmarried and lived with the Cahlans as one of the family and was greatly attached to them; that by reason of this attachment he gave to a brother of plaintiffs $1,000 and frequently expressed an intention to do something for plaintiffs, the two daughters of his friend. He was the owner of 20 shares of the Lassen County Bank, having a par and actual value of $100 each. He left these shares under lock and key in a tin box which was deposited in the bank vault. They were evidenced by two certificates, numbered 113 and 114, of ten shares each, were dated January 8, 1902, and bore an assignment in blank signed by Scholl and witnessed by H. W. Meylert, who was cashier of the bank. The certificates were inclosed in an envelope which was indorsed in the handwriting of Meylert as follows: "In case of my death to go to Lena and Neva Cahlan." Mrs. Cahlan, plaintiffs' mother, was a witness. She testified: That she bought some shares of this bank at the same time Scholl purchased his. That he came to her shortly after and told her "that he had given the girls each ten shares of stock and had put it in his box at the bank. He wanted me to know that he had done this, was the reason that he came and told me. He wanted to give them something and he took this method of doing it. He said he had given them each ten shares of the bank stock, Lassen County Bank stock. This was in January, 1902. I had bought some stock myself that was issued at the same time. * * * The next conversation I had with him was down to the house, and I told him with reference to that stock, if he wanted them to have it,

* * * we wanted him to be sure and leave it so we wouldn't have trouble about getting it, and he said that was all fixed. He said you can ask Mr. Meylert, and he will tell you just the same." She was asked if Mr. Scholl said anything to her about retaining dividends, to which she answered: "Yes, at the time I asked him if he was sure it was all fixed so there would be no trouble in getting it. He said there would be no trouble in getting it. * * * He said this, 'As long as I am kicking,' he says, 'I will hold this and receive the dividends.'" She met Mr. Scholl at the bank a few days after the stock was issued and Mr. Meylert was present. She was asked on cross-examination to state the words or substance of the words used in the conversation that took place at that time to which she had testified in her examination in chief. She replied: "Well, when I got my own stock, Wallace (Mr. Scholl) said, 'You can put it in my box here.' He went into the vault and brought his box out. He says, 'You can put it in here with the girls' stock.' He picked that up in his hands at the time. He says, 'This is the girls' stock, and you can put this in the box with it.' I asked Mr. Meylert if this is fixed all right and there would be no trouble in getting it, and Wallace laughed and said, 'She is afraid she will have trouble with the heirs,' and Mr. Meylert said: 'No, the heirs have nothing to do with this. This was the girls' at the time of Wallace's death. This don't go into the will.' He says, 'This is the girls' property.' I remember his saying it just like that, and Wallace admitted everything there, I don't remember just what he said, yes or no. The Court: Do I understand you to say that he admitted as a fact that it was the girls' stock? A. Yes, I was talking to both men. Mr. Scholl said: 'Yes, this is the girls' stock, Mr. Meylert. This is all signed. There is nothing to do with this only transfer it on the books. This is the girls' property.' He said that at that conversation. He brought that box out, and picked that stock out of it, and he said, 'You can put it in here with the girls' stock.' I put my stock in the box. Well, he might have put the girls' stock in an envelope, but at the time he held it in his hand. He had the two pieces of stock, and Mr. Meylert said, 'You see here that he has signed it,' and I saw that it was signed. * * * The stock referred to as the girls' stock was then put back into the box, and he carried the box back into the vault. My stock is right there yet so far as I know." Mr. Scholl stated to other persons that he had given ten shares of this stock to each of these plaintiffs. The evidence leaves no doubt of his intention to do this, and that he did everything to accomplish it except to deliver the certificates to the donees, and the evidence was sufficient to warrant the inference that the indorsement on the envelope containing the certificates was made with his knowledge and by his direction; and, furthermore, that he retained possession for the donees and for the purpose only of collecting the dividends while he lived—in short, that he constituted himself their trustee for the purposes stated. Mr. Meylert died some time before the trial, and hence his testimony could not be taken. It appeared that upon the death of Mr. Scholl his executors opened his box under advice of counsel to ascertain the directions of his will known to have been made. They found the envelope heretofore mentioned, and, supposing it to be their duty to carry out the directions written thereon, they accordingly opened it and delivered the certificates to plaintiffs, which explains their possession.

All this evidence was admitted over the objection of defendants on the general grounds of irrelevancy and incompetency and particularly because not within the issues made by the pleadings. The point seems to be that as the complaint alleges ownership and possession of the bank stock, and does not allege the trust to establish which the evidence was admitted, it was not competent to prove ownership by this means. The facts present a somewhat peculiar case. The primary object of the action is to establish ownership of these certificates of stock which had been delivered to plaintiffs by the executors, but which stood on the books of the bank in the name of plaintiffs' donor. Ownership established, the bank was willing to issue certificates to the donees. Proof of ownership made necessary a disclosure of all the facts out of which was to appear the ultimate fact of ownership. The facts thus disclosed showed that Mr. Scholl held these certificates as trustee for plaintiffs. His only interest in the shares of stock was in the dividends paid during his lifetime. In the case of Booth v. Bank of Oakland, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, a case quite similar to this, the trusteeship in the bank was shown to establish ownership. The court said: "The ownership of the plaintiff is all that is material to be alleged." The ownership of real property is a material ultimate fact and may be pleaded as such (Garvin v. Swain, 113 Cal. 324, 45 Pac. 677), and the same is true generally of ownership of personal property (21 Am. & Eng. Pl. & Pr. p. 726). Here original ownership was alleged in Scholl and transfer by him and possession in plaintiffs. This was sufficient to admit the evidence in support thereof, although it showed a trust in Scholl. We think that this case falls clearly within the principles laid down in Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 Pac. 659, and Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370. It was competent for Scholl to become the trustee of the trust created by himself. Even a cestui que trust may be made trustee of the fund of which he is the beneficiary. Nellis v. Rickard, 133 Cal. 617, 66 Pac. 32, 85 Am. St. Rep. 227.

In the well-considered case of Otis v. Beckwith, 49 Ill. 121, the subject of the trust, an insurance policy, never left the possession of the trustor and was found among his other papers at his death. The court said: "In such cases, equity will look to the substance of the act alone, and the intention with which it was done, and, in the absence of fraud, carry out such intention and give it effect." One who owns property may so deal with it, while retaining the legal title, as to make himself a trustee for the benefit of another. Noble v. Learned, 153 Cal. 245, 94 Pac. 1047, and cases cited. Said the court in Booth v. Oakland Bank, supra: "It is well settled that a trust in personal property need not be in writing, and it is equally well settled that no set form of words are necessary to create a trust." Any words which indicate with sufficient certainty an intention or purpose to create a trust will be effective in so doing, without the use of the words "trust" or "trustee." Estate of Smith, 144 Pa. 428, 22 Atl. 916, 27 Am. St. Rep. 641. Nor is it necessary that the beneficiary shall be informed of the trust, or shall express an acceptance. Booth v. Oakland Bank, supra. "The mutual consent of a trustor and trustee creates a trust of which the beneficiary may take advantage at any time prior to its rescission." Civ. Code, § 2251. The trust here was not rescinded. The circumstance that Mr. Scholl retained the power to receive the dividends on the stock did not affect the validity of the trust. Id.

It is objected that there is no evidence that Mr. Scholl indorsed the certificates on the back thereof "to the plaintiffs," or that he stated in his lifetime that the certificates belonged to plaintiffs, "and that he held the same in trust for them," as found by the court. It does not appear that Scholl indorsed the certificates "to the plaintiffs," using that language. The indorsement was in blank; but the evidence clearly showed that his intention was to indorse them to plaintiffs, and his act had that effect. Nor did it appear that he ever said in words that "he held the same in trust for them"; but his declarations and acts showed beyond doubt that he did in fact so hold them and so intended. Otherwise the evidence shows that the findings are literally correct and are fully supported. If not literally supported in the particulars pointed out above, they were in those respects substantially supported. The evidence justified the court in finding that the indorsement in effect was to plaintiffs, and that he held the certificates in trust for them.

It is true, as claimed by appellants, that an ineffectual attempt to make a gift does not create a trust, and equity will not perfect an imperfect gift by establishing a trust where none was contemplated (Noble v. Learned, supra); but here the evidence is in every way consistent with the view taken by the trial court that a trust was contemplated, and its findings must stand (Noble v. Learned, supra).

It is urged that the directions on the envelope containing the certificates "are testamentary in character and as such are invalid and void in law, affecting any interest in the property," citing Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 429, 53 Pac. 931. As an attempt to effectuate a gift causa mortis, and nothing else, this may be so; but these directions are to be given effect in accordance with the purpose of the donor otherwise shown to have been his intention in making the indorsement.

We think that the judgment is correct and it is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CARANTAN. (Cr. 98.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 25, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 834*)—TRIAL—MODIFICATION OF INSTRUCTIONS — CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

A requested instruction that "a witness may be impeached by the party against whom he was called by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity is bad," may properly be modified by adding, "and the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 834.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 782*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court instructed that the jury, "subject to the control of the court," are the exclusive judges of the evidence, except when it is declared to be conclusive, and that their power of judging of the effect of evidence is to be exercised in subordination to the rules of evidence. Held, that the phrase "subject to the control of the court" did not render the instruction erroneous, as, though the phrase might well have been omitted, it must be assumed that the jury understood it to mean that, while they were to be the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence, they were to be guided by the principles of the law announced by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 782.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS.

In ascertaining whether defendant was prejudiced thereby, instructions must be considered as a whole by the review court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1900-1995, 3158; Dec. Dig. § 822.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the weight of the evidence and of the credibility of witnesses was submitted to the jury without any attempt to control their judgment, defendant was not prejudiced by the phrase in an instruction that the jury, "subject to the control of the court," are the judges of the effect and value of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS ON BURDEN OF PROOF.

An instruction that "the proof as to the defense of insanity is on defendant, and this insanity must be established by a preponderance of evidence," etc., is not subject to the objection that under it the evidence of insanity must come from defendant alone, and the jury could disregard the evidence of insanity brought out by the prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 778.*]

6. COURTS (§ 50*) — ORGANIZATION—DEPARTMENTS OF COURTS.

As the several departments of the superior court constitute but one court, the jurisdiction of a department to which a case has been assigned is not exclusive, but the case may be transferred to another department for trial, and such transfer does not affect previous orders in the case made in the department then having it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 175; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 938*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

Defendant did not testify on the trial, and after conviction he moved for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, and, in support thereof, presented his own affidavit, corroborated by affidavits of his counsel and physician, alleging that he was unable to remember the events leading up to the homicide, or what transpired at the time of the shooting until after the trial. He then gave the details of such events, disclosing a clear case of self-defense. Held, that the denial of the motion was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 938.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Charles M. Head, Judge.

Michael Carantan was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the State.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life in the penitentiary. The victim was his wife, and according to her dying statement the crime was strikingly atrocious. It is not, indeed, claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, but many points are made as to rulings of the court and certain instructions given and refused, some of which are not argued and only a few in our judgment can be the subject of candid disputation. Of these, in the order in which they are presented:

1. The defendant requested the following instruction: "A witness may be impeached by the party against whom he was called by contradictory evidence, or by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty or integrity is bad." The court gave it but added thereto this clause: "And the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility." Appellant claims that "this modification emasculates the instruction, deprives it of life, and in effect tells the jury that their province of determining the credibility of a witness is not to be invaded by any impeachment of a witness in accordance with law." We do not so understand the instruction. When fairly construed, it simply means that the jury were to be the exclusive judges of the weight and effect of the evidence as to the credibility of the witness. As a proposition of law this cannot be disputed. There is nothing in the language used from which the jury could infer that due regard should not be paid to the evidence received as to the credibility of any witness. In view of other instructions it was probably unnecessary for the court to add the said modification, but we can see in it no invasion of the province of the jury nor anything prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

2. On the request of the prosecution, this instruction was given: "The jury, subject to the control of the court, are the judges of the effect and value of evidence addressed to them, except when it is declared to be conclusive. Their power of judging of the effect of evidence is not arbitrary, but to be exercised with legal discretion and in subordination to the rules of evidence." Appellant had requested the same instruction with the exception of the phrase "subject to the control of the court." It was refused for the reason that it was covered by other instructions. Of this action of the court complaint is made, and it is contended that the jury are not subject to the control of the court in determining the effect and value of the evidence except when declared to be conclusive, and that the instruction as given is subject to this imputation of the court's interference with the jury's prerogative. It it to be observed that the said qualification is prescribed by the Code (section 2061, Code Civ. Proc.), and, while the expression is somewhat equivocal and might well have been omitted, we must assume that the jury understood it to mean that, while they were to be the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence, in their deliberations they were to be guided by the general principles of law announced by the court. At most, the expression is subject to criticism for uncertainty, but in the endeavor to ascertain whether defendant was prejudiced we must, of course, consider the whole charge. A conviction upon ample evidence is not to be reversed by reason of an inapt or uncertain phrase unless it be reasonable to conclude that the jurors were thereby misled to the damage of the defendant. In other instructions, as we have seen, the jury were told that they were the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and thereby any possible misunderstanding as to the full import of the phrase under consideration was rendered harmless. In fact, the whole body of the charge proceeds upon the assumption and clearly implies that the jury were to determine all the facts in issue, and that the duty of the judge of the court was to declare the law. The only rational inference from the instructions considered as a whole, is that the jury alone were to determine the effect of the evidence; that their action, however, was not to be arbitrary, but in subordination to the rules of evidence; and that in discharging this duty they were to be mindful of the law as declared by the court. Indeed, this technical instruction proposed by defendant means very little to the average juror, and to it he probably pays very little heed. The essential principle involved was presented more satisfactorily and in terms easily understood when the jury were plainly told that every material fact essential to a conviction must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and in the other instructions containing the doctrine of the law as to insanity and every phase of self-defense, and charging the jury as to the degree of proof required and the principles by which they must be governed in rendering a verdict. But a complete answer to appellant's criticism of the phrase is that the determination of the weight of the evidence and of the credibility of the witnesses as a matter of fact was left to the jury without any attempt on the part of the judge of the court to control or influence their judgment; and hence it is perfectly apparent that no harm was done by the use of said expression.

3. Appellant claims that "the court in effect told the jury that the evidence and proof of insanity must come from the defendant, and that they could wholly disregard the evidence of insanity brought out on the people's case." But the conclusion is wholly unwarranted. The contention is based upon the use of the word "proof" in the following instruction: "The proof as to the defense of insanity is on the defendant; and this insanity must be established by a preponderance of evidence; that is to say, before the defendant can be acquitted on the ground of insanity, it must appear by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time the homicide was committed there was such a disordered or deranged condition of his mental faculties as to render him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong in relation to the particular act with which he is charged." The context shows that the word "proof" was used for "burden of proof," and nowhere does it appear that the jury were directed to consider only the evidence offered by the defendant. If any doubt as to this might arise from the instruction standing alone, it was completely removed by another instruction as follows: "The defendant is entitled to the benefit of all evidence in his favor whether produced upon the people's case or upon his defense, and, if you believe that there is a preponderance of the evidence that defendant was insane at the time of the homicide, his act is excused, and it is your duty to acquit the defendant."

4. There are two departments of the superior court of Shasta county. It appears that the case was regularly set for trial in department No. 2 thereof for January 4, 1909. Prior to this time, and on September 21, 1908, the presiding judge of this department, the honorable George W. Bush, had regularly drawn a jury for the trial of the cause, but in the meantime, by election, Judge Barber succeeded to the position of judge of said department No. 2. He had represented the defendant at the preliminary examination, and being therefore disqualified in the matter, on December 12, 1908, he transferred the cause to department No. 1 for trial. Appellant claims that department No. 1 had no jurisdiction to try said case, and erred in proceeding with the trial of the same over the objections of defendant. It is also insisted that, where a case has been assigned from one department to another department of the superior court, all previous orders such as here under consideration are thereby vacated and set aside. We think neither position can be maintained on principle or by authority. The jurisdiction to try the cause was in the superior court of Shasta county and not in either department to the exclusion of the other.

It is aptly said in White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 67, 42 Pac. 482, that: "The jurisdiction of causes is vested by the Constitution in the court, not in any particular judge or department thereof. The Constitution, in fact, says nothing about departments. It provides that there may be as many sessions of the court at the same time as there are judges, but whether sitting separately or together the judges hold but one and the same court, and the jurisdiction they exercise in any cause is that of the court and not the individual. * * * Transferring a cause for trial or disposition from one of those departments to another does not effect a change or transfer of the jurisdiction of that cause. That remains at all times in the court as a single entity." "The entire procedure," as stated in Brown v. Campbell, 110 Cal. 648, 43 Pac. 13, "from the commencement of the action to the execution of the judgment, is in one court, and there is no opportunity for conflict of jurisdiction either in pronouncing a judgment or in its execution after it has been rendered." If it be true that the court is but a single entity, and that it is divided into departments simply for convenience and the expedition of business, it necessarily follows that department 1 had the same jurisdiction to try the cause as department 2, and that it must proceed with it just as it finds it when the transfer was made. Otherwise, it has not the same jurisdiction. The situation is exactly the same in principle as though the judge of department 1 had been called into department 2 to try the case. In that event, it would not be contended for a moment that the former proceedings must be set aside. There is nothing in the case of People v. Wong Bin, 139 Cal. 60, 72 Pac. 505, opposed to the foregoing. There, the objection was that the jury was not properly selected, having been taken from two different panels for different departments. The requirement of the statute was not observed, and the Supreme Court very properly held that the jury was not legally impaneled. It is, of course, true, as stated therein, that the departments of the court are distinct for the trial of causes, but this obvious circumstance does not affect the question here, as there was no change of judges during the actual trial of the cause.

5. There was no prejudicial error committed by the court in its rulings upon questions of evidence. We can see no necessity for a specific review of them, as they are all based upon elementary principles and amply supported by authority.

6. The only ground for a new trial concerning which any comment seems appropriate is that of "newly discovered evidence." The position of appellant in that regard is stated by him as follows: "Upon the trial of said case, defendant did not testify in his own behalf. Upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, defendant presented his own affidavit, corroborated by the affidavits of his attorneys, C. F. Kimball and C. H. Braynard, as well as by the affidavit of his physician, Dr. L. A. Bauter, showing that he was not able to remember the events leading up to the shooting or what transpired at the time of the shooting until after the trial of the case. Although Dr. J. D. Young and Dr. L. F. Dozier (witnesses subpoenaed by the prosecution) were in constant attendance upon defendant during the trial of the case, the prosecution made no counter showing upon the motion for a new trial. In his affidavit on motion for a new trial, the defendant details the facts and circumstances of the homicide and the events leading up to it disclosing a clear case of self-defense. In view of the fact that there were no eyewitnesses to the actual shooting, that deceased had made two previous murderous attacks upon defendant on the morning of the homicide, that the previous character of deceased for peace and quiet and truth was bad, that deceased had threatened in the presence of witness Rusconi to kill defendant, that defendant's previous character for peace and quiet was good, that defendant was so crippled in body and mind that he could not recall the circumstances of the homicide or the events leading up to it, it was an abuse of discretion to deny his motion for a new trial." Such affidavits, however, after conviction are presented under such circumstances of suspicion and discredit as to entitle them ordinarily to little weight. The trial court, considering the improbability of the sworn statement of appellant as to his mental condition and doubtless recalling the testimony of witnesses at the trial as to declarations of appellant regarding the homicide, which showed his distinct recollection of the occurrence, and probably having in mind the appearance and conduct of appellant at the time and the omission of his skillful counsel to offer the testimony of any alienist as to his mental sanity, no doubt concluded that his affidavit was an afterthought and utterly unworthy of credence. At any rate, we cannot say that the order denying the motion for a new trial was not entirely justified. We think it proper to add in conclusion that, if the same careful consideration for the rules of evidence and proper regard for the rights of the defendant were always shown as the record here discloses on the part of the district attorney and the trial judge, very few criminal cases would be reversed, and thereby much occasion for the criticism of our administration of the criminal law would be removed.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

BASS v. LEAVITT. (Civ. 629.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 26, 1909.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 286*)—CONTEST—ANSWER.

Though the Code of Civil Procedure does not require it, it is proper in an election contest for the contestee to answer the statement made by the contestant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

2. ELECTIONS (§ 293*)—CONTEST—REJECTED BALLOTS—IDENTIFICATION.

Ballots rejected by the canvassing board, marked on the back with the word "Rejected," and inclosed and returned in an envelope indorsed "Envelope for spoiled, canceled and unused ballots and stubs of ballots used," were properly admitted in evidence on a contest and counted, the clerk of the election board testifying that he recognized them, and wrote "Rejected" on them under direction of the board, after it had concluded to reject them, and that he placed them in the envelope as directed, and that they were in the same condition as when returned by the board; the only objection made to receiving them being that they were not identified by indorsement and signatures of the members of the board, as provided by Pol. Code, § 1257, and should have been returned with the voted ballots.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

3. ELECTIONS (§ 194*) — BALLOTS — DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

Under Pol. Code, § 1205, providing that, in case of a constitutional amendment submitted to vote, the ballot shall be marked by stamping in the appropriate voting square a cross opposite the answer desired to be given, the stamping is a distinguishing mark, requiring rejection of the ballot where the cross is stamped directly on the word "Yes" or "No," and not in the voting square after the square containing such word, in which the ballot clearly indicates the mark should be placed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 166, 167; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. ELECTIONS (§ 194*) — BALLOTS — DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

Under Pol. Code, § 1211, providing that any name written on a ballot in the "blank column" shall be counted for the office near which it is written, a name written in the blank column, not under any particular office, but below and outside of all spaces in which are the names of offices, and in which the name of a person to be voted for should be written, is a distinguishing mark, preventing counting of the ballot.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 166, 167; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

5. ELECTIONS (§ 194*) — BALLOTS — DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

Though Pol. Code, § 1211, provides that two or more impressions of the voting stamp in one square, or a cross made partly within and partly without a voting square or space, shall not make such ballot void, a ballot has a distinguishing mark, so that it cannot be counted; there being not only a cross in the voting space opposite the name of a candidate, but another wholly outside such space, and on the line below the name.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 166, 167; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

6. ELECTIONS (§ 194*) — BALLOTS — DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

A ballot is not void as having a distinguishing mark because of a large blotch of ink in the circle for a straight democratic ticket, and a similar blotch opposite the name of a Republican candidate; it being plain that the stamp was used, and the defacement being attributable to other causes as readily as to design.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 166, 167; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

7. ELECTIONS (§ 285*)—CONTEST—STATEMENT.

A statement of contest of an election, alleging that the boards of election rejected and failed to count certain legal ballots or votes which were given to, and should have been counted for, contestant, and counted and gave to respondent certain illegal ballots which should not have been counted, but for which contestant would have been shown to have received the highest number of votes, and entitled to be declared elected, states sufficient facts.

8. ELECTIONS (§ 285*)—CONTEST—DELIVERING LIST OF ILLEGAL VOTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1116, providing that contestant of an election shall deliver to the opposite party, before trial, a list of the illegal votes, and by whom given, which he intends to prove, applies to ballots illegal because cast by an illegal voter, but not to votes cast by a legal voter, illegal because of distinguishing marks, a fact impossible of ascertainment except by a recount.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

In the matter of the contest of election of supervisor for the second supervisor district, Lassen county. Statements of contest were filed first by S. S. Bass and then by G. B. Leavitt. From the judgment, G. B. Leavitt appeals. Reversed.

Pardee & Pardee and R. L. Shinn, for appellant. W. M. Boardman and Rankin & Julian, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. In the election for supervisor of the second supervisor district, Lassen county, the canvassing board returned a tie vote between the only two candidates, appellant and respondent. On November 14, 1908, S. S. Bass filed his statement of contest. The grounds of his contest were that in Janesville precinct there were two legal ballots legally cast for him which were rejected by the board of canvassers, which would have entitled him to the certificate had they been counted. On November 25, 1908, George B. Leavitt filed his statement of contest, in which he stated that the canvassing board declared the election in the three precincts—namely, Janesville, Johnstonville, and Secret Valley precincts—to have resulted in 88 votes having been cast for each contestant. The statement then sets forth as grounds for contest that the “boards of judges of election in said Janesville and Johnstonville precincts were guilty of malconduct in the following particulars, to wit: That said board of election, or board of judges of election, rejected and failed to count certain legal ballots or votes which were given to, and should have been counted for, contestant”—and “counted and gave to the respondent certain illegal ballots, which should not have been counted at all. That had all the legal votes in said precincts which were cast for contestant, been counted for him, he would have been shown to be entitled to be declared elected. That if only such votes as were legal and entitled to be counted had been counted for the respondent, contestant would have been shown to have received the highest number of votes, and entitled to receive a certificate of election. That had said legal ballots cast in said precincts been properly counted, contestant would have been shown to have received the highest number of votes, and entitled to be declared elected to said office of supervisor.” In other respects the statement complies with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure respecting the subject before us. The cause came on regularly for hearing on December 11, 1908, and by leave of court contestant Bass filed an answer to the statement of contestant Leavitt. The two contests were consolidated by consent of the parties, and at the close of the trial the court found that ballots numbered 1 and 2, cast in the Janesville precinct, which had been rejected by the election board, should be counted for Bass, and that ballots numbered 132 and 152, which had been counted for Bass, bore certain distinguishing marks, and should not be counted. This left the contestants still with an equal number of votes, and the court so found, overruling Leavitt's objection to certain other ballots which, in the recanvass by the court, were counted for Bass. The judgment was that “neither of said litigants is, or has been, elected to said office.” Contestant Leavitt alone appeals. The bill of exceptions discloses the matters in controversy. Contestant Leavitt will hereinafter be referred to in this opinion as appellant and contestant Bass as respondent.

The recount showed the following result: Each party was given 78 ballots without objection. Appellant was given 10 ballots in the Johnstonville precinct over the objection of respondent. These ballots, however, were not brought up, and the rulings on them, being presumably correct, must stand, making the vote for appellant 88. Respondent was given 10 ballots, 5 in the Janesville and 5 in the Johnstonville precinct, over the objection of appellant, making his total vote 88, and thus a tie vote was produced. These ballots are now before the court for review. Obviously, if any one of these 10 votes should have been rejected, the trial court erred, and contestant should have been awarded a certificate of election.

Appellant's objection to respondent's filing an answer to the former's statement was overruled. It seems to us quite proper for a contestee to answer the statement made by the contestant, although the Code of Civil Procedure does not require it. Usually the contestee sets forth in his answer, not only his denials of the contestant's statement, but also the facts or grounds on which he relies to support his claim to the office. It was held in Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 526, 27 Pac. 779, 13 L. R. A. 761, 25 Am. St. Rep. 212, that while an elector who was a candidate may institute a contest and defeat the election attacked, he may not have judgment that he was elected instead of the defendant, unless he alleges that he has the qualifications required by the Constitution to make him eligible to the office. The same result would follow, it seems to us, where the contestee answers by mere denials. Here, however, both parties file statements, and in fact both are contestants and both contestees. Appellant filed no answer to respondent's statement, but he filed his statement, thus presenting the issues as to his claim as effectively as he could have done in answer to respondent's statement.

Respondent offered ballots numbered 1 and 2, in his own favor, cast in Janesville precinct, which had been rejected, and the court admitted them over appellant's objection. It appeared that on the back of each of these two ballots was written the word “Rejected” and they were inclosed and returned in an envelope indorsed: “Envelope for spoiled, canceled and unused ballots and stubs of ballots used.” It is objected by appellant that if these two ballots “had been properly returned with the voted ballots, there would have been no trouble in identifying the ballots rejected. The indorsements and signatures of the members of the board would be sufficient identification. Pol. Code, § 1257.” But, “coming in as they do in the wrong envelope, and undorsed as required by law, they should not have been counted, and the court erred in admitting the evidence." The clerk of the election board testified that he recognized the two ballots, and that he wrote the word "Rejected" on them, and that it was placed there by him under the direction of the board, after the board had concluded to reject them. He placed the ballots in the envelope as directed, and he testified that the documents were in the same condition as when returned by the board. We fail to discover anything on the face of the ballots which warranted their rejection by the board. The court was justified in receiving the ballots in evidence, and, no objection to their being counted appearing, otherwise than as suggested above, they were properly counted for respondent.

Ballot No. 3, in the Janesville precinct, cast for respondent, shows that the voter stamped the cross directly upon the words "Yes" or "No" in voting upon the several constitutional amendments, and in no instance in the voting square after the square containing these words as the ballot plainly indicated should be the place for such mark. Section 1205, Pol. Code, provides as follows: "In case of a constitutional amendment, or other proposition submitted to a vote of the people, he shall mark his ballot by stamping in the appropriate voting square a cross (X) opposite the answer he desires to give." In Hannah v. Green, 143 Cal. 19, 23, 76 Pac. 708, 709, the court held that the stamp under the word "Yes" to a constitutional amendment, instead of after it, was not a distinguishing mark. But, as the court said: "At that time the law provided that the stamp should be 'against' the 'Yes' or 'No'." The statute has since been changed, and at the time of the election in the present case read as shown above. We think the stamping as shown was a distinguishing mark, and the ballot should have been rejected.

Ballot No. 4, cast in the Janesville precinct shows in the column entitled "Blank Column," and below and outside of all spaces in which are the names of officers to be voted for, the word "Bryan," written with a pencil. This cannot be accounted for otherwise than as a distinguishing mark. Section 1211, Pol. Code, provides: "Any name written upon a ballot shall be counted for the office near which it is written, provided it is written in the 'blank column.'" Here the name is not written under any particular office, but under all of them. The ballot was erroneously counted for respondent.

Ballot No. 68, cast in Johnstonville precinct, was counted for respondent over appellant's objection. In the column entitled "Independent Nominations" occurs printed "For Judge of the Superior Court, F. A. Kelley." Opposite his name in the voting space is a cross stamped, and outside of this space, and not on the border line of either of its sides, but on the line below the name, is stamped another cross. Section 1211, Pol. Code, provides that "two or more impressions of the voting stamp in one square, or a (X) made partly within and partly without a voting square or space shall not make such ballot void." Under the law prior to the amendment of 1903 the Supreme Court held that two crosses in one voting square made the ballot void; but that a ballot with a cross after the candidate's name, but not in the voting square, should be counted. The ballot in question was not even stamped in substantial compliance with the present law. It seems to us that it bore a distinguishing mark, and should not have been counted.

Ballot No. 102, cast in the Johnstonville precinct, counted for respondent, was objected to on account of a large blotch of indelible blue ink in the circle for a straight Democratic ticket and a similar blotch opposite the name of the Republican candidate for judge of the superior court. It is plain to be seen that the stamp was used, for the arms of the cross are discernible. The defacement may be traced to carelessness or nervousness—possibly from an overindulgence in intoxicating liquor—quite as readily as from design. The choice of the voter is clearly expressed, and we do not think he intended more.

The other ballots objected to by appellant were properly admitted in the recount.

Respondent makes no reply to these various objections. His only claim is that under the pleadings appellant did not so place himself before the court as to entitle him to the evidence offered, or to authorize the court to receive it; substantially that in his statement appellant failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of contest. The point is also made that appellant was required, under section 1116, Code Civ. Proc., "to furnish to respondent a written list of the number of illegal votes and by whom given which he intends to prove at such trial," and that this he failed to do. There is a distinction between a ballot cast by an illegal voter and an illegal ballot cast by a legal voter. Where a ballot is attacked as illegal because cast by an illegal voter, the contestant is required to give notice of his intention to show that such vote was cast and by whom cast. It is the eligibility of the voter that is the issue. But there may be illegal votes cast by a legal voter—for example, a ballot bearing a distinguishing mark—a fact impossible of ascertainment except by a recount. The voter himself remains unidentified, and only the ballot is considered as it appears on its face. In the case of the illegal voter the ballot is unidentified, but the evidence otherwise shows that he voted, and how he voted. In such cases a list of all such alleged illegal voters must be furnished the contestee. Code Civ. Proc. § 1116. The present case is not unlike that of Abbott v. Hartley, 143 Cal. 484, 77 Pac. 410, where it was said, as we think is true here: "There were sufficient grounds of contest here set forth to apprise the contestee of the nature of the attack which was made, and the proof was the usual proof in such cases—an inspection of the ballots and objections to certain of them as containing distinguishing marks. There was nothing in this line of proof that was not in strict accord with the allegations of the contestant, nothing that the contestee could not have anticipated and foreseen; and, even if such had been the case, upon his application time would have been granted him to meet the case on its merits”—citing Minor v. Kidder, 43 Cal. 229. We do not think the case is one where it would have been possible for either contestant to discover in advance of the trial the ballots which bore distinguishing marks, and the persons by whom they had been cast. Indeed, this latter fact did not appear at the trial, nor was it essential to a determination of the issues.

The contest was initiated in November, 1908, and was decided in December, 1908. The transcript on appeal was not filed here until July 2, 1909, and appellant's brief was filed July 30, 1909. Respondent's brief was not in when the case was placed on the October calendar. The law contemplates a speedy trial of such cases by the lower court, and gives precedence on appeal "next after the cases in which the people of the state are parties." Code Civ. Proc. § 57. The delay in reaching final judgment is not attributable to this court or the trial court and manifestly is greater than should have occurred.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte LEWIS. (Cr. 110.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 22, 1909.)

1. INSANE PERSONS (§ 49*)—COMMITMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PRESUMPTIONS AS TO REGULARITY.

Upon a collateral attack on a commitment to an insane asylum, where it is clear that the court had jurisdiction of a person adjudged insane, the presumptions are all in favor of the regularity of the proceedings leading to the judgment and the order of commitment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

2. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 92*)—SCOPE OF INQUIRY—COMMITMENT OF INSANE—DISCRETION OF COURT—ABUSE.

Under Pol. Code, § 2168, providing that persons being examined as to their sanity shall have a reasonable opportunity to produce witnesses to be examined in their behalf, what is a "reasonable opportunity" is left to the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised in view of the surrounding circumstances of each particular case, and, where it does not appear on the face of the proceedings that such discretion has been abused, the judgment of the court will not be disturbed on habeas corpus to review the commitment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

3. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 92*)—IRREGULAR COMMITMENT—QUESTIONS RAISED.

An application for a writ of habeas corpus, on the sole ground that the proceedings under which a person was committed to an insane asylum were irregular, does not raise the question whether he has recovered his sanity and is therefore entitled to be restored to competency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

Original application by Austin Lewis for a writ of habeas corpus for John R. Robinson, for his release from the State Hospital for the Insane. Writ discharged, and Robinson remanded.

Austin Lewis, for petitioner. R. L. Beardsly, G. M. Reynes, and Frank M. Silva, for respondent.

HART, J. On the 26th day of February, 1909, John R. Robinson was adjudged insane by the judge of the superior court in and for the county of Solano and ordered committed to the state hospital for the insane at Napa. Said Robinson has ever since been, and is now, detained in said hospital under said commitment, and it is now claimed by the petitioner, on behalf of said Robinson, that said insane patient is illegally restrained of his liberty for the alleged reason that the court by which he was committed never acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the charge of insanity preferred against him. The only point urged by the petitioner in support of his claim is that Robinson was not, prior to the trial resulting in his commitment to the hospital, accorded by the court the opportunity to prepare himself to meet and resist the charge to which he was entitled under the law.

The commitment upon which the authorities of the state hospital detain Robinson shows that a verified complaint in due form was, on the 25th day of February, 1909, filed in the justice's court of Suisun township, Solano county, charging Robinson with being insane; that a warrant was thereupon issued and on said 25th day of February placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county for execution; that, on the same day, the sheriff arrested Robinson and immediately took him before the judge of the superior court. On the following day—February 26th—Robinson was brought before the judge for examination as to his sanity. The judgment and commitment recite that the alleged insane patient was informed by the judge of the charge against him, of his right to make a defense to such charge, of his right to be represented by counsel, to produce witnesses on his behalf, and to have subpoenas issued to compel the attendance of witnesses, and that he was further informed that, "if at such hearing and examination he should be ordered committed, he might, within five days after the making of such order of commitment, demand that the question of his sanity be tried by a jury before said superior court." It further appears from the commitment that, upon placing Robinson under arrest, the sheriff delivered to him, personally, a copy of the warrant of arrest, together with a copy of the affidavit of insanity.

It will thus be seen that the commitment upon its face discloses that all the statutory requirements essential to a legal arrest, hearing, and commitment were observed, and that the court acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of Robinson's sanity (sections 2168-2174, Pol. Code, inclusive), unless it can be said that it appears from the face of the commitment itself that the court failed to accord to Robinson the "reasonable opportunity" for the production and examination of witnesses contemplated by the statute; but we cannot, from the commitment, say that the alleged insane person was not given a reasonable opportunity to produce witnesses for examination in his behalf. Upon a collateral attack, where it is clear that the court had jurisdiction of the person adjudged insane, the presumptions are all in favor of the regularity of the proceedings leading to the judgment and the order of commitment. Ex parte Clary, 149 Cal. 735, 87 Pac. 580; State Commission in Lunacy v. Eldridge, 7 Cal. App. 298, 94 Pac. 597, 600. Besides, the determination of what is "reasonable opportunity" is committed by the statute to the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised in view of the surrounding circumstances of each particular case, and, where it does not appear on the face of the proceedings that such discretion has been abused, the judgment of the court for the alleged reason that the person adjudged insane has not been given a reasonable opportunity to produce his witnesses and cause them to be examined touching his mental condition cannot be disturbed. There is nothing in the judgment and order of commitment from which we would be warranted in holding that the court abused its discretion in the respect complained of.

The question whether Robinson is now sane, and is therefore entitled to be restored to competency, does not, and obviously cannot, arise here. Section 2188, Pol. Code.

For the reasons herein stated, the writ is discharged, and Robinson remanded.

In special proceedings, the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction is limited by the terms under which the proceedings are authorized, and under Code Civ. Certiorari by W. F. Lay against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, to vacate an order for petitioner's arrest in a civil action. Order vacated.

Henry K. Norton, for petitioner. Chas. S. McKelvey, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an original proceeding in certiorari to vacate and annul an order made by the superior court of Los Angeles county for the arrest of petitioner in a civil action. The complaint is not before us. It appears, however, from the affidavit that on May 7, 1909, an action was commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles county against petitioner, wherein plaintiffs therein sought to obtain a money judgment against him. Upon the filing of the complaint therein, the court, upon an affidavit made and filed by one of the plaintiffs in the action, made an order for the arrest of defendant, who, pursuant to said order, was placed under arrest by the sheriff of San Diego county. Thereafter, petitioner moved the court to annul and vacate the order of arrest, upon the ground that the averments in the affidavit upon which the order of arrest was based were insufficient to warrant the making of the order, in that they failed to comply with the provisions of section 481, Code Civ. Proc. The court denied the motion. The purpose of this proceeding is to have this ruling of the court reviewed.

Conceding the case to be one of those specified in section 479, Code Civ. Proc., the question is whether the facts as stated in the affidavit were sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order. Section 481, Code Civ. Proc., provides that: "The affidavit must be either positive or upon information and belief; and when upon information and belief, it must state the facts upon which the information and belief are founded." As averred in the affidavit, the facts necessary to bring the case within the provisions of section 479 are all stated upon information and belief of the affiant; but the affidavit is wholly wanting in stating, or even attempting to state, the facts upon which such alleged information and belief is founded. In discussing a like question the Supreme Court in Ex parte Fkumoto, 120 Cal. 316, 52 Pac. 726, says: "There is another fatal defect common to the entire affidavit. Several of the statements of fact are made expressly upon information and belief, while many others, although not so stated in terms, are of a character which could in their nature only have been so made, whereas the facts upon which such information and belief are founded are in no instance given. In this the affidavit fails to comply with one of the express and most material requirements of the statute." The affidavit does not state the facts upon which affiant bases his information and belief, and "the warrant cannot be issued upon hearsay, nor upon any statement, however positive, founded upon hearsay." Proctor v. Prout, 17 Mich. 475; Neves v. Costa, 5 Cal. App. 111, 89 Pac. 860.

It appears that defendant (petitioner here) thereafter prosecuted another motion, filed at the same time as the first, which last motion was based upon the affidavit of defendant, and which the court also denied. Respondent contends that, admitting the insufficiency of the affidavit upon which the order of arrest was made, the evidence adduced upon the hearing of this second motion established facts sufficient to justify the making of the order. This evidence, other than the affidavit of defendant, is not before us. Conceding, however, all that respondent claims therefor, such facts thus established could not have a retroactive effect in conferring jurisdiction to make the order, where such power was wanting at the time of making it. "Jurisdiction of special proceedings is conferred by the Constitution upon the superior court; but, inasmuch as special proceedings are only such as are created and authorized by statute, the court, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, is limited by the terms and conditions under which the proceedings were authorized." Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 26 Pac. 206; Bates v. Gage, 40 Cal. 183. So here the power of the court, under the provisions of section 481, Code Civ. Proc., was limited to the facts and conditions which were made to appear to the judge by the affidavit pursuant to which the order was made, not to the fact that, at some subsequent stage of the proceedings, facts would be established justifying his action.

The affidavit upon which the order of arrest was made being insufficient in the particulars noted, it follows that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order, and the same is therefore vacated and annulled.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 70*)—JUDICIAL POWERS—ENCROACHMENT ON LEGISLATURE.

The court in determining the constitutionality of a statute will not deal with the policy of the act, which is exclusively for the Legislature, but can only examine whether the Legislature in a particular case has gone beyond or contrary to the prohibitions or mandates of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 131; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 43*)—STATUTES—VALIDITY—PRESUMPTION.

The Legislature is ordinarily the judge of the expediency of creating new crimes and of prescribing light or severe penalties for them, and much is left to the discretion of the Legislature, and the presumption is that such discretion has in each case been wisely exercised, and a statute will not be held unconstitutional unless it is clearly violative of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

3. GAMING (§ 63*)—LEGISLATIVE CONTROL—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

Since the Legislature may prohibit and punish any practice or business, the tendency of which, as shown by experience, is to weaken or corrupt the morals of those who follow it, or to encourage idleness, it may prohibit and punish gambling in its many forms.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 61*)—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER.

Pen. Code, § 337a, making poolselling punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state prison for not less than 30 days and not more than a year, enumerates the various acts which are made criminal, and does not make the question whether the act prohibited shall be a crime discretionary with the court, but merely confers on the trial judge discretion in imposing the punishment depending on the act done, the circumstances under which it was done, and the character and age of accused, and is not invalid as delegating legislative power within Const. art. 3, § 1, providing that the powers of government shall be divided into the legislative, executive, and judicial, and that no person charged with the exercise of powers of one department shall exercise any function of any of the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 103-107; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 61*)—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER—CRIMES—DEGREES—FELONY—LEGISLATIVE POWER.

The Legislature may leave much to the discretion of the jury and the trial judge as to the punishment for crime, and it makes no difference that the Legislature has designated certain crimes as felonies which at common law were offenses punishable by death, or to which forfeiture of property was attached, and certain other crimes as misdemeanors, or divided crimes into two classes based on the punishment imposed, as is done in Pen. Code, § 17.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1213*)—PUNISHMENT—"CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT."

Pen. Code, § 337a, making poolselling punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state prison for not less than 30 days and not more than a year, is not in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 6, prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments; imprisonment in the county jail or state prison not being cruel or unusual, which relate only to punishments of a barbarous character and unknown to the common law, such as by burning at the stake, breaking on the wheel, and the like.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 13*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 71*)—STATUTES—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a person of common understanding, by reading Pen. Code, § 337a, prohibiting pool-selling, and a complaint charging a violation thereof, will know that accused is charged with acts prohibited by the statute, the complaint and the statute are sufficiently certain within Pen. Code, § 4, requiring the provisions of the Penal Code to be construed according to the fair import of their terms.

Habeas corpus by Frank O'Shea for his discharge from imprisonment under a complaint charging a criminal offense. Petitioner remanded.

Carroll Cook (Henry Ach, of counsel), for petitioner. Attorney General Webb and Raymond Benjamin, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. Petitioner seeks to be discharged from imprisonment under a complaint charging him with violating section 337a of the Penal Code, commonly called the "Race track bill." The charge is that he committed the crime of a felony on the 5th day of July, 1909, in this: That he "did willfully and unlawfully engage in poolselling and bookmaking, and record and register a certain bet and wager and sell pools upon the result of a certain trial and contest of skill, to wit, dogs, at and upon those certain grounds known as Ingleside Coursing Park, situate on Ocean avenue near Lee street in the city and county of San Francisco and within the state of California, contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such case made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California." The section is entitled, "Pool-selling, bookmaking, bets and wagers. Penalty," and, so far as material to the case at bar, reads as follows: "Every person who engages in poolselling or bookmaking at any time or place; * * * or who records or registers bets or wagers or sells pools upon the result of any trial or contest of man or beast or between men or beasts, * * * is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or state prison for a period of not less than thirty days and not exceeding one year." It is not the province of the court to deal with the policy of the law, as that belongs exclusively to the Legislature, which is composed of the representatives of the people and which acts for the people, and within the limits imposed by the Constitution is vested under our system with the right to voice the will of the people in public enactments; and it is ordinarily the judge of the expediency of creating new crimes, and of prescribing penalties for them, light or severe. The courts can only examine the question as to whether or not the Legislature in any particular case has violated the Constitution by going beyond or contrary to its prohibitions or mandates. The rule is well established that in such case much is left to the discretion and judgment of the Legislature; and the presumption always is that such discretion has in each case been wisely and justly exercised, and the law will not be held unconstitutional unless it is clearly in violation of the fundamental law. It has long been the practice in this country for the Legislature of the state, or the legislative body of municipal corporations, to pass laws prohibiting and punishing any practice or business the tendency of which, as shown by experience, is to weaken or corrupt the morals of those who follow it, or to encourage idleness, instead of habits of industry, and to prohibit and punish gambling in the various forms in which it is practiced. Such regulations, when not in conflict with general laws, or with the constitution or charter under which they are enacted, are universally upheld by the courts. In fact, it has been said that gambling in its many forms may be rightfully suppressed and punished, and that the question is no longer open for discussion in this country. Harper v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky. 290, 19 S. W. 737; Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, 27 Pac. 933. In the case at bar it is contended on behalf of the prisoner that the section of the Penal Code is unconstitutional and void.

It is claimed, in the first place, that the act authorizing the trial judge in effect to make the crime either a felony or misdemeanor is an attempt to delegate legislative power to the trial judge, and hence is in violation of article 3, § 1, of the Constitution of the state, which reads as follows: "The powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments, the legislative, executive and judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any function pertaining to either of the others except as in this constitution expressly directed or permitted." The section does not delegate legislative power. It enumerates the various acts which are prohibited and made criminal, and such acts are made criminal by the express will of the Legislature. It prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. It does not attempt to make the question as to whether or not the act prohibited shall be a crime depend upon the will or discretion of the court or judge. It is the province of the court, through the machinery of a trial, to investigate and determine the question as to whether or not the defendant in the particular case has done the particular act charged as a violation of and prohibited by some particular part of the section. The Legislature has said the punishment shall be imprisonment not less than 30 days in the county jail or state prison and not exceeding one year. The minimum and maximum punishment is stated. The court cannot make it less, nor can it make it greater, than the statute prescribes. The places where the defendant is to be imprisoned are stated, and the court cannot send the defendant to any other place than the county jail or the state prison. It was evidently in the mind of the Legislature that there should be some power whereby mercy could be shown and discretion exercised in the severity of the punishment, depending upon the act done, the circumstances under which it was done, and the character and age of the person who committed the act. That discretion was left to the trial judge, who is selected by the people as the agent of the people for the purpose of seeing that the laws are applied according to their true spirit and intent. It was not the intention of the Legislature that a young person of previous good character for his first offense, whether intentional or not, should by an unbending rule receive the same punishment as the experienced bookmaker who has followed the race track for years. In most crimes the punishment is left to the discretion of the trial court within the limits prescribed by the legislative will, and in some cases with the jury; and it has never been held in any case to which our attention has been called that such power was a delegation of the power vested in the Legislature. In murder cases the jury, if it return a verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, may recommend that he be imprisoned in the state prison for life, evidently leaving the jury by its verdict to impose the death penalty or life imprisonment; and such power has never been questioned; and in such case, when the defendant pleads guilty of murder in the first degree, the judge may impose a sentence of imprisonment for life, or in his discretion impose the penalty of death. People v. Dabner, 153 Cal. 398, 95 Pac. 880. Where the defendant is charged with grand larceny, the jury may, in cases where the evidence would justify a verdict of either grand larceny or petty larceny, bring in a verdict for the lesser offense, which is in effect leaving it to the discretion of the jury to make the crime either a felony or misdemeanor, and yet such power has never been questioned. The punishment for the crime of assault with a deadly weapon is imprisonment in the state prison or in the county jail not to exceed two years, or a fine not to exceed $5,000, or both, thus leaving it to the trial judge to impose a fine of $1 or a fine of $5,000, or two years in the state prison. Pen. Code, § 245. While the section has been in force since the Codes were adopted in 1872, and has been before the courts in many cases, it has never been held to be unconstitutional as being a delegation of legislative power.

The Penal Code contains similar provisions as to many other crimes, the punishment imposed for which may make them either felonies or misdemeanors, a few instances of which selected from many are the crimes of seduction for the purpose of prostitution (section 262); receiving stolen property (section 496); forging telegraph or telephone messages (section 474); injuring highways or bridges (section 588); fraud in keeping accounts in books of corporations (section 563); bribing telephone or telegraph operators (section 641). In fact, our whole system in regard to crimes and punishments necessarily leaves much to the discretion of the jury and to the trial judge. It makes no difference that the Legislature has designated certain crimes as felonies, and certain other crimes as misdemeanors, or divided crimes into two classes. The crime is in many cases classified by the punishment under the express provisions of the Penal Code (section 17). It was said in People v. Gray, 137 Cal. 267, 70 Pac. 20, in speaking of the crime of seduction: "It may therefore be either a felony or a misdemeanor. Whether it is considered the one or the other depends upon the character of the judgment rendered by the trial court. If the judgment be imprisonment in the state prison, the crime is a felony. If a fine only, or imprisonment in the county jail, a misdemeanor. It is provided in section 17 of the Penal Code that in such case, if the judgment impose a punishment less than imprisonment in the state prison, the offense shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes; and that in such a case the offense shall be deemed to be a misdemeanor has been expressly held by this court in a number of cases. People v. Cornell, 16 Cal. 187; People v. Salorse, 62 Cal. 142; People v. Ayhens, 85 Cal. 88, 24 Pac. 635; People v. Perini, 94 Cal. 573, 29 Pac. 1027." In the last cases cited the defendant was prosecuted for receiving stolen goods, which offense is punishable by imprisonment either in the state prison or the county jail, and the court said: "Whether the person convicted of this offense has committed a felony or a misdemeanor can be ascertained by the nature of the judgment. If the defendant is sentenced to serve a term in the state prison, the crime is a felony; otherwise a misdemeanor." See People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77 Pac. 449; In re Sullivan, 3 Cal. App. 193, 84 Pac. 781.

A felony at common law was an offense punishable by death, or to which the old English law attached the total forfeiture of lands or goods; but the essential difference between a felony and a misdemeanor is now practically lost in England since the felony act of 1870, Bouvier's Law Dic.; Moz. & W. Law Dic. In this country it simply denotes the degree or class of crimes. Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 616. In fact, the distinction between a felony and a misdemeanor is for the Legislature, and our Legislature has expressly stated where a crime may be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and also by fine and imprisonment in the county jail in the discretion of the court, such crime shall be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes after a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison. The Legislature has designated the classification and the means whereby such classification shall be ascertained. The distinction between a judicial act and a legislative act has been defined by Judge Field as follows: "The one determines what the law is and what the rights of the parties are with reference to transactions already had. The other prescribes what the law shall be in future cases arising under it. Wherever an act undertakes to determine a question of right or obligation or of property as the foundation on which it proceeds, such act is to that extent a judicial one, and not the exercise of legislative functions." Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. Ed. 496. And our own Supreme Court has said: "Legislative power prescribes rules of conduct for the government of the citizen or subject, while judicial power punishes or redresses wrongs growing out of the violation of rules previously established. The distinction in short lies between a sentence and a rule." Ex parte Shrader, 33 Cal. 279. In the case at bar the court will be called upon to declare the law and impose the penalty under the section passed by the Legislature making the act a crime. The Legislature has vested discretion in the court, but has not authorized the court to determine as to whether or not certain acts would constitute a crime.

It is further claimed that the section violates article 1, § 6, of the Constitution of the state, which prohibits cruel and unusual punishments. It is hardly necessary to discuss this contention, even if it could be raised by the prisoner, who may never be convicted, and, even if he should be convicted, might receive a sentence of 30 days in the county jail. Imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison is not unusual; in fact, it is the most common mode of punishment in all civilized countries. It is not cruel in the sense used in the Constitution. Cruel and unusual punishments are punishments of a barbarous character and unknown to the common law. The word, when it first found place in the Bill of Rights, meant not a fine or imprisonment or both, but such punishment as that inflicted by the whipping post, the pillory, burning at the stake, breaking on the wheel, and the like; or quartering the culprit, cutting off his nose, ears or limbs, or strangling him to death. It was such severe, cruel, and unusual punishments as disgraced the civilization of former ages, and made one shudder with horror to read of them. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 471 et seq.; State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429; Whitten v. State, 47 Ga. 297; State v. Williams, 77 Mo. 310. The Legislature is ordinarily the judge of the expediency of creating new crimes, and prescribing the punishment, whether light or severe. Commonwealth v. Murphy, 165 Mass. 66, 42 N. E. 504, 30 L. R. A. 734, 52 Am. St. Rep. 496; Southern Express Co. v. Com., 92 Va. 59, 22 S. E. 809, 41 L. R. A. 436.

Counsel for petitioner have devoted many pages of their brief to an analysis of the grammatical construction of the section of the Penal Code in question, contending that it is a complex sentence of over 30 lines, and of such phraseology as to make it impossible to determine what particular acts are necessary to be grouped together to constitute the crime intended to be denounced by the section. It is sufficient to say that the complaint charges the prisoner with doing certain acts which are prohibited by the section, and which, if proven, will subject him to a punishment thereunder. A person of common understanding would be reading the section and reading the complaint know that the defendant was charged with certain acts prohibited by the section. The provisions of the Penal Code must be construed according to the fair import of their terms with a view to effecting their object and to promote justice (section 4). Of course, if the act charged is one which is not a crime under any section of the Code, the prisoner would have to be discharged, but this is not such case.

It is not necessary to discuss other questions, as we do not deem any of them of sufficient importance to justify us in discharging the prisoner.

We conclude that the section of the Penal Code is constitutional, and that the complaint states an offense thereunder.

Let the prisoner be remanded.

We concur: HALL, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. PINER. (Cr. 100.)(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 22, 1909.)1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 129*)—JOINDER OF OFFENSES—BURGLARY AND LARCENY.

An information may properly charge accused in one count with the crime of burglary, and, in another count, with the crime of grand larceny as a part of the same transaction, under Pen. Code, § 954, as amended by St. 1905, p. 772, c. 574, providing that "the indictment or information may charge different offenses or different statements of the same offense under separate counts, but they must all relate to the same act, transaction or event, and charges of offenses occurring at different and distinct times and places must not be joined."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 414-418; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

2. BURGLARY (§ 31*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The gist of the crime of burglary is in the entry of the building with the intent to commit any of the crimes mentioned in Pen. Code, § 459, and it is therefore immaterial whether the proof shows the actual commission of larceny or other felony, if the intent to do so is present; but proof that a larceny or felony had been committed in the building by the person making the entry is competent, not alone to show the intent, but also the fact of the entry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 519*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY OF CONFESSION.

After a store had been broken into and robbed of a large sum of money, accused, a cousin of the proprietor, came to him and told him that he had heard that he (accused) was under suspicion, and was told by the proprietor that such was a fact, that he was making an investigation and would like to have accused, if he was not guilty, help him to clear up the matter, and that if he was guilty that he would help him out of the trouble, but accused at that time protested his innocence. On the following day accused again called on the proprietor, telling him he was in trouble, whereupon the proprietor said that he would do all that he could to help him, and this was followed by confession by accused that he took the money. The two then made an arrangement by which the money could be restored. Held, that the confession was not open to the objection that it was involuntarily made, as accused knew that the proprietor was not an officer of the law and had no authority to guarantee him immunity from prosecution, and the promise made was simply to help him if he was in trouble.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 811*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE AS TO GOOD CHARACTER.

An instruction, in a prosecution for grand larceny, that evidence of previous good character should be considered with great caution, is erroneous, as evidence of good character is to be considered in the same manner as evidence of any other essential fact, being in aid of the presumption of innocence, and, while all evidence in a criminal case should be considered with that deliberation which will insure a just verdict, it is not within the province of the court to select a particular species of evidence for a special caution to the jury.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where guilt is conclusively proved, an instruction that evidence of previous good character should be considered with great caution, although erroneous, is harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 781*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF CONFESSION.

In a criminal prosecution, an instruction that a person's declaration or voluntary confession is always evidence against him, for the law presumes that a person will not say anything untrue against himself or his own interests, while true in itself, is improper, since, while the theory upon which voluntary confessions are admitted is of interest to the courts, there is danger in explaining it to the jury that the right of accused to a determination of all questions of fact by the jury may be violated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 781.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The instruction, although improper, was harmless; the evidence of defendant's guilt being uncontradicted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

William A. Piner was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Geary and Bond & Churchill, for appellant. C. M. Crawford, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of grand larceny, brings the cause to this court on an appeal from the judgment and from the order refusing to grant his motion for a new trial. The appellant claims a reversal for these reasons: (1) That the demurrer to the information should have been sustained because there are set out in the accusatory pleading two separate and distinct offenses; (2) that the court erred to his prejudice in allowing, over his objections, the testimony of the witness Robison purporting to give a confession of guilt by the defendant, the specific contention upon this point being that said alleged confession was not voluntarily made, and therefore, in law, was no confession at all; (3) that the court committed prejudicial error in giving certain instructions to the jury.

1. The information, in the first count thereof, charges the defendant with the crime of burglary, alleging that, on the 23d day of August, 1908, he burglariously entered the store of one P. Q. Robison, at Kelseyville, Lake county, with the intent, etc. The second count of the information charges the crime of grand larceny in the following language: "The said William A. Piner, as a part of the same act, transaction, or event, alleged in the first count of this information, aforesaid, on the 23d day of August, 1908, at the said county of Lake, and before the filing of this information, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously did take, steal, and carry away from the aforesaid store of P. Q. Robison, aforesaid, 25 $20 gold pieces, of the gold coin of the United States of America, the personal property of one Matt L. Rowden, of the value of $500, lawful money of the United States; contrary to the form," etc. The contention of the appellant is, as before suggested, that two distinct offenses cannot properly be charged in an indictment or information, and that, as two distinct offenses are charged in the information upon which the defendant was tried and convicted, the court erred in its order overruling the demurrer. The Attorney General insists that the information conforms to the provisions of section 954 of the Penal Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 772, c. 574), and that the demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

The section of the Penal Code just mentioned reads: "The indictment or information may charge different offenses, or different statements of the same offense, under separate counts, but they must all relate to the same act, transaction, or event, and charges of offenses occurring at different and distinct times and places must not be joined. The prosecution is not required to elect between the different offenses or counts set forth in the indictment or information, but the defendant can be convicted of but one of the offenses charged, and the same must be stated in the verdict." So far as we are advised to the contrary, this is the first occasion on which the foregoing section, in its amended form, has been before any of the reviewing courts. Prior to its amendment by the Legislature of 1905, the section read: "The indictment or information must charge but one offense, but the same offense may be set forth in different forms under different counts," etc. From a comparison of the section as it formerly read with the section as, under the amendment, it now reads, it would seem to be very clear that there has been, practically, no material change effected by the amendment except in that part of it authorizing the charging of different offenses in the same indictment or information where such offenses "relate to the same act, transaction or event." The other provisions of the section merely authorize, in perhaps a little different language, what the old section declared could be done, or, in other words, are only a re-enactment of the old section with some immaterial verbal changes.

We can perceive no reason for holding that the Legislature did not mean exactly what the language of the section very plainly and unambiguously declares. That it was intended, by the amendment, to authorize the statement in an indictment or information of two or more distinct offenses, where the same grow out of precisely the same act, transaction, or event, is a proposition which we think admits of no possible room for debate. If the language of the section with regard to this proposition were not itself so clear and unquestionable as that it would require the aid of construction in order to gather its true meaning, there would be no necessity for going further than that part of the section itself wherein it is expressly provided that "charges of offenses occurring at different and distinct times and places must not be joined." It will thus be observed that the Legislature, while recognizing the fact that no danger of violating any of the substantial rights of an accused person could result from charging in an indictment or information two different offenses which have arisen from exactly the same particular circumstances—that is, from the same act, transaction, or event—was careful to protect and safeguard such person against the harm which would inevitably follow the charging of two different offenses occurring at different times and places, and which, in the very nature of things, could have no possible bearing upon or relation to each other whatever. We can discern no distinction in principle between the provision authorizing the charging of two different offenses relating to the same act or event and those provisions of our criminal law which authorize a jury in a case where the offense charged embraces more than one crime—as, for instance, the crime of murder, within which is included manslaughter, or robbery, within which is included larceny, or assault with intent to murder, within which is included assault with a deadly weapon and often simple assault—to return a verdict of guilty of any one of the offenses comprehended within the one charged which the evidence justifies or warrants.

There is no claim put forward here that section 954 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1905, violates any provision of the Constitution, nor can we see how such a claim could be sustained if it were urged. As we have suggested, there is no ground for apprehending that any injury would result to a defendant from the method of criminal pleading authorized by section 954, for only one set of facts and circumstances, directed to a single act or event, could be proved, and, of course, it would not only be competent, but absolutely necessary, to prove those same facts and circumstances where but one offense was charged. Therefore we can think of no principle forbidding the Legislature to authorize the setting out of two distinct offenses in as many counts in cases where the circumstances under which a criminal act is committed are such as to inspire in the prosecuting officer serious doubt as to which of two offenses the evidence would show had been committed. Such a method, while, obviously, innocuous in its effect upon any of the rights of the accused, must result in a just administration of the criminal law, for, where as under the old method, the result of not proving the specific charge would be the acquittal of the accused and to cause another trial of the same facts with its attendant trouble and expense, assuming that once in jeopardy and former acquittal could not be successfully pleaded at the subsequent trial, under the present method the jury, under the court's instructions, could return a verdict of guilty of that offense of the two charged which the evidence disclosed had been committed, and thus there would be avoided, in a large measure, the mistrials which too often result from a want of correspondence between the proof and the allegations of the indictment or information.

But, while, as stated, the precise question here has never until now been before the higher courts of this state, we are not altogether without authority upon the proposition from other jurisdictions. The state of Wisconsin has a statute upon the subject of pleading criminal offenses similar in terms to section 954 of our Penal Code. In Porath v. State, 90 Wis. 527, 63 N. W. 1061, 48 Am. St. Rep. 954, the defendant was charged in the first count of the information with the crime of rape upon his daughter, and in the second count with the crime of incest, of which latter offense he was convicted. A plea in abatement was interposed to the first count on the ground that the defendant had not had a preliminary examination on the charge set out in said count, and the trial court overruled said plea. In sustaining said ruling, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has this to say: "The plea in abatement to the first count of the information was properly overruled. It appeared that both counts were founded upon the same transaction, and were introduced to meet the legal aspects of the evidence as it might be produced at the trial, and in order that the defendant might not escape conviction of any offense which it might be found the defendant had committed by the single transaction in question.

* * * Both counts were founded on the same transaction, and the defendant had in fact had a preliminary examination upon the charge of incest." In Korth v. State, 46 Neb. 631, 65 N. W. 792, the information contained four counts in which separate and distinct felonies were charged, and the Supreme Court, upholding the refusal of the trial court to compel the people to elect at the beginning of the trial to which of the counts the testimony would be addressed, says: "The offenses were all of the same general character, required for their proof the same quality of testimony, the same manner of trial and mode of punishment, and it was proper to try the plaintiff in error upon the several counts at the same time." See: Jackson v. State, 91 Wis. 263, 64 N. W. 838; Com. v. Drum, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 479; Com. v. McLaughlin, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 612; People v. Rynders, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 426.

So, in the case at bar, the offenses charged required for their proof the same quality of testimony and the same manner of trial and mode of punishment. It is true that the gist of the crime of burglary is in the entry of a building with the intent to commit any of the crimes mentioned in section 459 of the Penal Code, and it is therefore immaterial, in the proof of the consummation of said crime, whether a larceny or other felony is shown to have been actually committed or not, if the intent to do so is present; but it will not, of course, be denied that proof that a larceny or felony had been committed in the building by the party making the entry would be perfectly competent, not alone for the purpose of showing the intent, but also the fact of the entry. Interesting discussions of the principle at the bottom of section 954, as it now reads, may be found in the following cases, decided by the federal courts, where the rule as to joinder of offenses originating in the same act or transaction has long been recognized and applied: Pointer v. U. S., 151 U. S. 396, 14 Sup. Ct. 410, 38 L. Ed. 208; Potter v. U. S., 155 U. S. 438, 15 Sup. Ct. 144, 39 L. Ed. 214; Dunbar v. U. S., 156 U. S. 185, 15 Sup. Ct. 325, 39 L. Ed. 390; U. S. v. Jones (D. C.) 69 Fed. 973. Our conclusion upon this point is, as must be manifest from the foregoing discussion, that the court below properly overruled the demurrer. A motion was made, before the trial, to set aside the information on the ground that the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate for either of the offenses charged in the information, and the same was denied; but, as there is no point made on said motion other than the point raised by the demurrer and which we have discussed and disposed of, there is no necessity for giving the ruling special attention. There can be no doubt but that the defendant had a preliminary examination on both charges, since it is clear that the facts necessarily applied to both offenses.

2. The objection that the court erred in allowing the witness P. Q. Robison to testify to an alleged confession of guilt, for the asserted reason that said confession was not voluntarily made, will be better understood by a brief reference to the facts. It appears that the store of said P. Q. Robison, at Kelseyville, in Lake county, was, on the night of August 23, 1908, entered by some party, and a large sum of money abstracted from the safe in said store. The bulk of the money so taken, which exceeded the sum of $1,000 in amount, was the property of other parties than the proprietor of the store; it having been deposited with Robison for safe-keeping. Of said money, the sum of $500 belonged to one Rowden, and it is this particular money which formed the basis of the charge for which the defendant was tried and of which he was convicted. It appears that immediately after the theft suspicion was fastened upon both Robison, the proprietor of the store, and the defendant, as the guilty parties. Robison and Piner are related by blood, being first cousins. About six weeks prior to the larceny, Piner, according to the testimony of Robison, called at the latter's house at about 11 o'clock at night, and asked for a key to the store, explaining that he (defendant) had received a call to go to "Pieta and Hopland with his auto and was out of gasoline." Robison gave the defendant a key to the store door so that he could go to the gasoline tank, and told him to keep the key. From that time to the night the store was entered and the money taken the defendant retained the key in his possession. On the Saturday following the day upon which the money was stolen (the larceny was perpetrated on a Sunday night), the defendant went to the store and, addressing Robison, said: "I understand you suspicion me of taking the money," to which statement Robison replied, "Yes, that was a fact." Piner protested his innocence, declaring that he could not understand how anybody could suspect him, and asking Robison if he thought that he (defendant) took the money. Robison then said: "I did not think you took it until my suspicions were directed to you by others, and that I am making this investigation as much for your own good as for my own, as you know I am suspicious as well as yourself. If you are not guilty, why, I want you to help me clear this thing up, and, if you are, why, I will help you out of this trouble." On the succeeding day (Sunday), so Robison testified, the defendant called at the home of the former and, addressing Robison, said: "Perry, I am in trouble. I want you to help me." Robison answered, "Well, if there is anything I can do to help you, I will do it." Piner then said to Robison that the latter could help him, and, after Robison again promised to assist the defendant out of the trouble to which he referred, the latter said: "I took the money, and I want you to help me. Don't know why I took it, and I am very sorry that I took it." Piner exhibited a pistol during this conversation and threatened to take his own life unless he was assisted out of the trouble by Robison. It was subsequently arranged between Robison and the defendant, with the view and in the hope of stopping further investigation by the officers, and further effort to disclose the identity of the perpetrator of the crime, that Robison should get together a sufficient amount of money to cover the losses sustained by parties who had money on deposit with him on the night the larceny or burglary was committed, and that Piner should place said money in some spot where it could be found by the sheriff, aided by Robison, who was, previously to the search, to be apprised by Piner of the exact location of the money. In accordance with this arrangement, Robison procured the sum of $1,058.65 and placed it under the steps of a Mrs. Piner's house, and later informed the defendant where it could be found. Piner then secured and carried the money to a point not far distant from the town and cached it in the bed of a creek. The defendant later told Robison where the money had been left by him, and, subsequently, the latter and the sheriff found and recovered the money. Robison declared, on cross-examination, that the defendant did not admit having entered the store and taken the money until he (Robison) promised to assist him in "getting out of the trouble."

The facts as thus briefly detailed disclose the circumstances under which the alleged confession was made, and it is earnestly argued that it is thereby shown that said confession was not free and voluntary. It will be observed that there was nothing said by the defendant during the course of the first conversation between himself and Robison involving in the slightest degree a confession of guilt. On the contrary, the defendant at that time stoutly denied connection with the commission of the crime, and expressed surprise that he should be under suspicion. Nor was there on that occasion any inducement held out by Robison to Piner to make a confession, except upon the condition that he was actually guilty. Robison merely said, addressing Piner, "If you are not guilty, why, I want you to help me clear this thing up, and, if you are guilty, why, I will help you out of this trouble." As to the second conversation between Robison and the defendant, which occurred at the former's residence, and in which Piner admitted his guilt, it is clear from the testimony of Robison that the defendant called upon the former for no other purpose than to acknowledge his guilt. He called Robison out of the house and declared that he was in trouble. It was not, let it be noted, until after Piner stated that he was in trouble and besought Robison to help him out of it that he obtained from the latter a promise to so assist him. Piner well knew that Robison was not an officer of the law, and that he was clothed with no authority for guaranteeing him immunity from prosecution and punishment, and it is not at all probable, nor, in fact, is it a sensible assumption when all the circumstances of the case are considered in the light of reason and common sense, that Piner asked for Robison's promise of assistance with any other understanding that such promise meant or could mean anything more than what the latter in fact did do—undertake to conceal and keep from the authorities the identity of the guilty party. As was suggested by the court below, in ruling on the objection to the testimony of the declarations of the defendant, the promise of Robison does not appear to have been made in consideration of a confession, but merely involved an agreement upon his part to assist the defendant out of some trouble which the latter had, previously to exacting the promise, expressed a willingness to admit that he had either brought upon himself or had come to him in some other way. It becomes plainly manifest from an examination of Robison's testimony that, whatever may have been the circumstances of Piner's confession of guilt, the object the former had in view in securing it, and the latter's purpose in making it, were not that said confession should be used against the defendant in his prosecution for the crime, but that it should be kept from the authorities. The two men are closely related in blood, and, while Robison was anxious to get at the truth of the matter in order to remove suspicion from himself, there can be no possible doubt that, after Piner acknowledged his responsibility for the crime, the former exerted every effort before the arrest of the defendant and during his trial to exculpate the accused. Robison, it will be remembered, joined Piner before the latter's arrest in a scheme to mislead the authorities as to the identity of the party who had committed the crime, and at the trial, it is clearly apparent from the record, persistently sought to make it appear that Piner's admission of guilt to him was made under circumstances which would render his testimony upon the question of the confession incompetent and inadmissible.

Greenleaf, at section 219 of his treatise on Evidence, states the rule as to confessions in the language of Eyre, C. B., in Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. Cases, 209, that "a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope, or by the torture of fear, comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered as the evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it, and therefore it is rejected." The theory, of course, is that the prisoner, in making a confession obtained by the influence of hope or fear, applied by a third person to his mind, may be induced by such pressure to admit facts unfavorable to him, without regard to their truth, in order to secure the promised relief or avoid the threatened danger. Greenleaf on Evidence, § 219a. In the early case of People v. Smith, 15 Cal. 408, it is said that: "A distinction is made by many English cases between confessions induced by one having no authority or control over the prisoner and those induced by persons who have such authority, as constables, prosecutors, and the like; but the cases seem to hold the owner of goods stolen to stand in this relation."

We are in no doubt that if Robison had, in order to extort a confession from Piner, and by such means obtained it, represented to him that he (Robison) was in a position to insure him (defendant) either complete immunity from prosecution or lenient treatment in the matter of punishment, or had induced the defendant to confess by threats which inspired in Piner fear that his crime would be apprehended and he severely punished unless he admitted his guilt, testimony of the confession could not have been properly received; but, as seen, the hope held out by Robison was not that Piner might escape prosecution and punishment at the hands of the public authorities, but that Robison would do all in his power, as the evidence shows that he did do, to prevent the defendant's connection with the crime becoming known to the authorities. The court's ruling admitting the evidence of the confession was proper.

3. Instructions 7 and 12, given by the court, are assailed as being erroneous and prejudicial. Instruction 7 relates to the evidence of the previous good character of the defendant, and the specific complaint urged against it is that the court, in giving it, violated article 6, § 19, of the Constitution, in that it thus instructed upon the weight or effect of the evidence by declaring that evidence of good character should be considered "with great caution." Where the court found its authority for thus instructing the jury, we are not advised by the Attorney General. Evidence of good character is to be considered by the jury in the same manner as evidence addressed to any other essential fact in the case. The proof of good character is in aid of the general presumption of innocence, and, as the Supreme Court says in People v. Ashe, 44 Cal. 291, "is no more to be laid out of view by the jury in their deliberations than is the original presumption itself," notwithstanding the dictum to the contrary in the case of People v. Swift, 28 Cal. 397. Nor is there any more reason for an admonition by the court that evidence upon previous good character should be considered with "great caution" than there is for a similar instruction with regard to any other of the general class of evidence in criminal cases. The Legislature has not authorized such an instruction, and, if it could legally do so, we can see no reason upon principle why it should. As a matter of fact, all evidence of whatsoever nature in a criminal case should be considered with caution or with that deliberation which will insure a just verdict, but to select a particular species of evidence from the record as the theme for a special caution to the jury, thus disparaging the probative effect thereof is a function which is specially excluded from the province of trial courts, even in those few special cases where the Legislature has declared that it may be done. People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744. But we are of the opinion that the instruction could not have prejudiced the rights of the defendant for the reason that his guilt is conclusively proved by the evidence. Evidence of good character is, as a general proposition, important only where there may exist some doubt of the defendant's connection with or participation in the commission of the crime; but where, as here, there is and could be no doubt of any kind of the defendant's guilt under the evidence, there was no other just alternative left to the jury but to convict the accused, notwithstanding the evidence of good character. The jury could have found, consistently with a verdict of guilty, that the evidence conclusively established the previous good character of the accused. People v. Ashe, supra; People

v. Mitchell, 129 Cal. 585, 62 Pac. 187. The confession as proved stood before the jury uncontradicted, the defendant not testifying, and it would be extremely difficult, under this state of the record, to reconcile a verdict other than that of guilty with the testimony produced before the jury. There is practically no distinction between the situation here and where the defendant had entered a plea of guilty. Obviously, in the latter case, evidence of previous good character could not affect the question of the defendant's guilt, and it is equally as obvious that such evidence is unimportant where guilt is admitted and the admission proved and uncontradicted. Under the circumstances of the case as presented here, we are unable to understand how the instruction complained of could have exerted in the least degree any prejudicial influence on the determination of the verdict.

The other instruction to which objection is made reads as follows: "A person's declaration or voluntary confession is always admitted in evidence against him, for the law presumes that a person will not say anything untrue against himself, or his own interests." It is claimed that said instruction is also violative of section 19, art. 6, of the Constitution, in that it deals with the question of the weight which the jury should attach to the confession. The impropriety of giving such an instruction to a jury cannot for a moment be doubted; yet, there having been no denial that the confession was made, nor any attempt to impeach the testimony of Robison, who gave the testimony of the confession, the instruction could have resulted in no harm to the defendant. The first part of the instruction merely declares what the court had virtually already stated in the presence of the jury in its ruling on the admissibility of the confession, that the same was voluntarily made, and therefore competent to be received in evidence. This is followed by a statement of what the court conceived to be the reason or theory upon which a voluntary confession is admissible against an accused. The court does not say that the evidence of the confession is presumed to be true, which, in effect, it had a right to do (section 1847, Code Civ. Proc.), but only (in effect) that a confession voluntarily made by an accused becomes evidence admissible against him for the reason that it is not likely that a person will deliberately tell an untruth which would militate against his own interests. The proposition stated in the instruction cannot be gainsaid; but, as we have before declared, the giving of it to a jury in any case is manifestly improper. The theory upon which voluntary confessions are admissible in evidence is of interest to the courts; but in elucidating or attempting to explain such theory to a jury there is great danger that the constitutional right of the accused to a determination of all questions of fact by the jury may be violated, so far as are concerned the facts to which such an instruction is applicable. But, as stated, it would indeed be unreasonable to say, in view of the uncontradicted evidence of the defendant's guilt, that the instruction played a material part in influencing the verdict returned by the jury.

We have been shown no substantial reason which calls for the return of this cause to the court below for trial de novo.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

NEWMAN v. LESTER, County Auditor.
(Civ. 705.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Oct. 25, 1909.)

1. TAXATION (§ 316*) — DEPUTY ASSESSOR — RIGHT TO COMPENSATION — HOW DETERMINED.

The right of the additional deputy assessor in counties of the fifteenth class provided for by the amendment to Pol. Code, § 4244, by the act of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 727, c. 416) to compensation, must be determined on the theory that he is a deputy in the assessor's office doing the work of the assessor, and not the incumbent of a newly created office, though, unlike other deputies, he holds office for 12 months, and is required to keep an account of transfers in addition to assisting in assessing property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 523; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. OFFICERS (§ 100*)—INCREASE OF COMPENSATION DURING TERM OF OFFICE—ADDITIONAL DEPUTY.

Where a statute provides a fixed salary for an officer and a separate allowance for expenses of his office, or a fixed salary for the office and a fixed salary for a certain number of deputies or clerks, all payable out of the county treasury, an increase of such separate allowance for expenses or for deputies, whether in the number of the deputies or the amount paid to each, is not a violation of Const. art. 11, § 9, forbidding an increase of compensation during an officer's term, and the additional deputy provided for by the act of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 727, c. 416), amending Pol. Code, § 4244, giving assessors in counties of the fifteenth class a fixed salary and a fixed salary for a certain number of deputies, comes within the rule stated, and he is entitled to the salary allowed him.

deputy county assessor for the month of May, 1909.

In the classification of counties made by section 4006 of the Political Code in 1907, Orange county is a county of the fifteenth class, and by section 4244, as enacted in that year, the provision relating to salaries for the assessor's office was as follows: "(8) The assessor, thirty-five hundred dollars per annum; provided, that in counties of this class there shall be seven field deputy assessors, who shall be appointed by the assessor of said county, and who shall hold office from twelve o'clock meridian from the first Monday in March of each year up to twelve o'clock meridian of the first Monday of July of each year; the salaries of each of said seven deputy assessors herein provided for is fixed at the sum of one hundred dollars per month, to include horse hire and traveling expenses for each month during which they hold office as herein provided, which said salaries shall be paid by said county at the same time and in the same manner and out of the same fund as the salary of the assessor; provided, that all commissions shall be paid into the county treasury." This section, so far as it affects the matter before us, was but a re-enactment of section 172 of the county government act as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 430, c. 359). In 1909 this provision of section 4244 was amended by changing the number of deputies from "seven" to "eight," and further providing: "One of said deputy assessors shall hold office for twelve months of each year, at a salary of one hundred dollars per month, whose duty shall be to keep an account of all transfers of property in said county during the year, and to assist in the assessment of property." This amendatory act was made to take effect immediately (St. 1909, p. 730, c. 416), and petitioner was appointed by the assessor of Orange county as the deputy so provided for and demanded a warrant for his salary for the month of May, 1909, as such deputy, and his demand was refused by respondent.

In support of his refusal respondent contends that the payment of the demand would be a violation of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution, being an increase of compensation of the county assessor during his term of office. That the term of office for which the assessor was elected began January 7, 1907, and that the salaries and compensation for all official services rendered by that office are fixed and determined by the county government act as amended in 1905, and cannot be increased until the expiration of the four years for which the county assessor was elected. Petitioner meets this contention with two arguments: First, that the allowance for the additional deputy does not increase the compensation of the assessor, because his salary remains the same ($3,600); and, second, that it cannot be contended that the work to be done by the assessor is reduced as the statute provides other and additional services to be performed by the deputy created by the act of 1909 which are not necessarily within the general duties provided to be performed by the assessor. The brief of the amicus curiæ, presents chiefly an argument ab inconvenienti, etc., to support the position of petitioner; all parties agreeing that the exact question has never been directly passed upon by any of the appellate courts of the state.

The argument based upon the disastrous results which would follow a holding that the law was unconstitutional appears to be fully answered in the concurring opinion of Beatty, C. J., in the case of Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 607, 29 Pac. 1094, 16 L. R. A. 161, and we do not think much stress can be laid upon the contention that the provision for the additional deputy in effect created a new office with new duties. It is clear that the petitioner's right to any compensation must be determined upon the theory that he is a deputy in the assessor's office doing the work of the assessor. County offices are not created by special act fixing a salary for them, but by a general law enumerating the offices so designated. Pratt v. Browne, 135 Cal. 649, 67 Pac. 1082. The concurring opinion of Chief Justice Beatty, above referred to, approves a distinction drawn by the Supreme Court of Illinois in Daggett v. Ford County, 99 Ill. 334, between the rule applicable to statutes in which the principal in the office is allowed a lump sum to cover his own compensation and his expenses for clerk hire or deputies and that applied to statutes by which the officer is allowed a certain amount for his personal compensation and a certain amount for the expenses of his office. Under a constitutional provision that the compensation of no officer shall be increased or diminished during his term of office, it was held that, where the "lump sum" system existed to increase or diminish the allowance during the term would be a violation of the constitutional provision, while under the other system an increase of the allowance of the amount for expenses would not. Or, as said by Chief Justice Beatty: "In other words, the Supreme Court recognized this distinction between the allowance for compensation and for clerk hire, etc., when separately fixed—that the latter could, but the former could not, be increased or diminished during the officer's term." Holding to this view, the Chief Justice concurred in the decision in Dougherty v. Austin, from which, as well as the other mention of the statute then before the court, we conclude that the provision as to Marin county in the county government act of 1887 placed it among those counties as to the officers of which a lump sum allowance was made.

The distinction so adopted by the Chief Justice is not made a part of the leading opinion in bank, or the department opinion, which is approved by the court in bank in the Dougherty-Austin Case, but it is reasserted in Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 308, 50 Pac. 427, 429, and the constitutionality of an act containing both methods of compensation is declared. It is said in this case: "There are two rules for the compensation of deputies in the different counties of the state. In most of the classes a lump sum is allowed to the principal, out of which he is required to pay his deputies; in a smaller number of classes—including the eleventh—the principal is allowed a fixed salary, and certain deputies are allowed fixed salaries." In both cases the salaries are to be paid out of the county treasury. The exercise of the legislative power in so classifying the counties in this manner for the purpose of fixing the compensation of county officers is declared to be constitutional, because "under either rule a compensation proportionate to duties may be secured." In the case of Tulare County v. May it was held that where there was a provision in the statute for the appointment by a county officer of a clerk or deputy at a fixed salary upon the happening of a specified contingency, and the officer appointed such deputy upon the happening of the contingency, which was after the commencement of the term of office of the principal, this was not an increase of compensation of such officer in violation of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution. The court reviewed the opinions in Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 220, 33 Pac. 66, and Walser v. Austin, 104 Cal. 128, 37 Pac. 869, and says the latter rests upon the former, and declares that the portion of the former opinion in conflict with the views expressed in the Tulare County v. May opinion was not necessary to the decision in the Welsh v. Bramlet Case. The decision in Farnum v. Warner, 104 Cal. 677, 38 Pac. 421, which is distinguished from that in Welsh v. Bramlet, is accepted as authority. The reasoning in the Welsh-Bramlet opinion, which is distinguished and disapproved, related to a clause in the county government act of 1891 by which the district attorneys in counties of the twenty-sixth class were permitted to appoint an assistant and a deputy for each of whom the act provided a fixed salary. It was held that such a provision was violative of the constitutional prohibition against special legislation, and also of section 9 of article 11. We are of opinion that its weight as authority upon the point last mentioned is destroyed by the opinion in Tulare County v. May, and that the effect of the foregoing decisions and opinions is to adopt the distinction drawn by the Illinois Supreme Court as the rule of construction in this state; that is to say, that, where the statute provides a fixed salary for the officer and a separate allowance for expenses of his office (Kirkwood v. Soto, 87 Cal.

394, 25 Pac. 488), or a fixed salary for the officer and a fixed salary for a certain number of deputies or clerks, all payable out of the county treasury, an increase of such separate allowance for expenses or for deputies, whether in the number of deputies or the amount paid to each, is not a violation of the constitutional provision that "the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office." Const. art. 11, § 9.

The petitioner in this application comes within the rule stated and is entitled to the salary claimed by him. It is therefore ordered that a writ of mandate issue in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 262, 501*)—REVIEW—NONSUIT.

The improper granting of a nonsuit is an error of law, and, prior to the amendment of Code Civ. 3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 981*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The granting or refusing of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is so far within the discretion of a trial court that its decision will not be disturbed unless there is a clear abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County.

Action by Earl B. Smith against W. E. Hyer. Judgment of dismissal, and from an order granting a new trial defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. N. Myers, for appellant. Earl B. Smith, in pro. per.

ALLEN, P. J. The action is one upon a promissory note executed by defendant to the assignor of plaintiff. The latter is shown by the record to be an attorney at law and appearing in the action in propria persona. The note was admitted in evidence, together with evidence tending to show that the assignment to plaintiff was one for collection purposes only. Upon the conclusion of the evidence offered on behalf of plaintiff a motion for a nonsuit was granted, the effect of which was to grant a judgment of dismissal as against plaintiff. The trial court, as appears from the reasons assigned for granting such motion, was of opinion that an action brought by an attorney upon a note so assigned could not be maintained. This upon the theory that the policy of the law forbids such a transaction, and courts should not grant relief where such facts are made to appear. The plaintiff did not except to the ruling of the court in granting this motion, but thereafter in due time interposed a motion for a new trial based upon newly discovered evidence material for the party making the application which he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the trial, and supported such motion by an affidavit used upon the hearing. This affidavit was largely cumulative, but tended in a degree to establish the grounds of the motion, and was by the court held sufficient for the purposes intended. The court upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial granted the same, and from the order granting the new trial defendant appeals under the alternative method.

A motion to dismiss the appeal was, by stipulation, ordered submitted with the appeal upon the merits. Entertaining the views hereinafter expressed, we do not consider it necessary to discuss the matters involved in the motion to dismiss the appeal, which, even if sustained, would but have the effect to affirm the order, which result is attained by an affirmance upon the merits, which we think proper in the premises. It is settled law in this state that the improper granting of a nonsuit is an error of law, and, prior to the amendment of section 647, Code Civ. Proc., by Laws 1909, p. 586, c. 355, could be reviewed by an appellate court only where an exception was entered at the time of the ruling, and the same was specified in the motion as grounds for a new trial, or upon an appeal from the judgment based upon a bill of exceptions disclosing that such exception was taken at the time the order was made. But the motion for a new trial in this case was not entirely based upon the error of law involved in the nonsuit. The order granting the motion is general, and must be sustained, if good, on any of the grounds upon which the motion was based. The granting or refusing of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is so far within the discretion of the trial court that its determination will not be interfered with, unless there is a clear abuse of discretion. The determination of the effect of newly discovered evidence which is cumulative is peculiarly within the province of the trial court (Hubbell Oil Co. v. Morrison, 7 Cal. App. 459, 94 Pac. 589); and if, in the opinion of the trial court, the newly discovered evidence was such as, had it been considered in the first instance, would have changed the result, it was the duty of the court to grant a new trial. The action of the court in granting this new trial amounts to a declaration that such effect would have been given by the court to the newly discovered evidence had the same been actually produced upon the original hearing.

We see no error in the record sufficient to warrant a reversal, and the order is therefore affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; TAGGART, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Petition by Azro A. Coburn for the appointment of a guardian of Loren Coburn, an alleged incompetent. From an order appointing Charles A. Coburn guardian and from an order denying a new trial, Loren Coburn appeals. Reversed.

A. J. Treat and A. Kincaid (A. H. Jarman, of counsel), for appellant. Ross & Ross and Jordan, Rowe & Brann, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. In the month of February, 1908, a petition was filed by Azro A. Coburn, a resident of Massachusetts, to have Loren Coburn, his aged uncle, who resides in San Mateo county, adjudged incompetent, and to have a guardian appointed of his person and estate. The petition as amended alleges that the said Loren Coburn, by reason of old age, physical disability, and weakness of mind, is unable to take care of himself and manage his property. This allegation was denied, and upon the issue so made the case went to trial before the court without the jury. At the conclusion of the trial the court made an order adjudging Loren Coburn incompetent and unable to take care of himself and manage his affairs, and appointing Carl J. Coburn, another nephew, guardian of his person and estate. This appeal is from the order so made and from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the order, and, in view of the conclusion we have reached, that is the principal question that will be discussed. It is provided in the Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1763) that, when it is represented to the court upon a verified petition "that any person is insane or from any cause mentally incompetent to manage his property," the court or judge must cause notice to be given and hear the matter. It is further provided (section 1764): "If, after a full hearing and examination upon such petition, it appear to the court that the person in question is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property, such court must appoint a guardian of his person and estate, with the powers and duties in this chapter specified." It is evident from the provisions quoted that, in order to justify the appointment of a guardian, the court must find the party for whom the guardian is appointed mentally incompetent to take care of himself and manage his property.

It is a fundamental principle, based upon the plainest dictates of justice, that, before a person can be deprived of his liberty and his property on account of his mental incompetency, he must be brought clearly within the terms of the statute, and the evidence must show that his mind is so far gone and so weak and feeble that he does not realize and comprehend the value and prudent management of his property, and is not sufficiently normal to care for it in the usual acceptance of that term. A man whose mental capacity has been such that he has outstripped the great majority of mankind in business affairs, and has accumulated much of this world's goods, is not for light or trivial reasons, or even on account of hallucinations, to be deprived of his property and of his liberty. It must clearly appear to the court that he is mentally incompetent to manage his property; that his mind is affected to such a degree as to deprive him of sane and normal action.

It was the doctrine of the earlier cases in the English Court of Chancery not to deprive a person of his liberty or his property for mere imbecility of mind not amounting to idiocy or lunacy. It was not sufficient that he was weak, worn out with age, and incapable of managing his estate. Ex parte Banerley, 3 Atk. 168; 3 Eq. Cases Abr. 580; Lord Donegal's Case, 2 Ves. 407; Beaumont's Case, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 52, 29 Am. Dec. 33. The doctrine is not now so strict as formerly, and the jurisdiction of the courts has been held to extend to some cases where the party is not an idiot or a lunatic. In the Matter of Barker, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 232. It was there said by Chancellor Kent: "The object is to protect the helpless; and the imbecility of extreme old age, when the powers of memory and judgment have become extinct, seems, as much as the helplessness of infancy, to be within the reason and necessity of the trust. I am aware, however, that the inquiry must in many instances be peculiarly delicate, because it concerns the character of the party, and his natural rights, and because of the difficulty there is in ascertaining the extent of the decay of the mind necessary to form a proper case for the interference of the court."

In Woerner on American Law of Guardianship, § 113, many cases are cited, and the history of the law and the modern doctrine given. It is thus stated: "It is sufficient that he be mentally incompetent to govern himself or to manage his own affairs, from whatever cause this incapacity may arise. Hence permanent mental weakness amounting to such incapacity, arising from advanced age, sickness, habitual drunkenness, or imbecility, constitutes in law 'unsoundness of mind,' and as such becomes tantamount in its effects to those produced by idiocy or lunacy, for such conditions all equally express mental incapacity for the government of one's affairs. Such a person is in legal intendment non compos mentis.

* * * It is to be observed, however, that the unsoundness of mind which will justify the appointment of a guardian must be more than mere debility or impairment of memory; it must be such as to deprive the person affected of ability to manage his estate. If the defendant is capable of transacting the ordinary business involved in taking care of his property, and if he understands the nature of his business and the effect of what he does, and can exercise his will with reference to such business with discretion, notwithstanding the influence of others, he is not of unsound mind within the meaning of the statute, and should not be deprived of the control of his property." And it has been held that the mental imbecility (in the language of the Code) must be such as to make the incompetent incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property. In re Lindsley, 44 N. J. Eq. 564, 15 Atl. 1, 6 Am. St. Rep. 913.

In the Matter of Sarah Collins, 18 N. J. Eq. 253, it appeared that the alleged incompetent was in the hundredth year of her age. Her sight was very much impaired and her hearing somewhat; but the court held that a commission de lunatico inquirendo should not issue. The court said: "Her sight is very much impaired and her hearing somewhat. At her age the presumption of law is not against her soundness of mind, however great the probability in fact may be that she is not sound. * * * The facts proved, while they show that her senses and physical powers are much impaired, and that her mental faculties are somewhat weakened, fail to show anything that would amount to unsoundness so as to make her incapable of managing her affairs. She may be so weak and infirm as to be easily influenced and imposed upon, which would be a reason for setting aside any instruments or transactions executed under the effect of such influence; but this does not amount to unsoundness, such as to take from her the control of herself and her property."

In Re Storick, 64 Mich. 685, 31 N. W. 582, it was said by the Supreme Court of Michigan, in an opinion written by the chief justice: "The statute does not say merely 'incompetent' but 'mentally incompetent.' It does not refer to persons who are sane, but not perhaps as wise or intelligent as some other persons. It applies to those whose mind is so affected as to have lost control of itself to such a degree as to deprive the person affected of sane and normal action. Unless the petition either follows the words of the statute, or uses language and states facts fully equivalent, it cannot give jurisdiction. This is a class of cases in which the citizen is sought to be deprived of both liberty and property; and those who seek to accomplish such a result must do so upon statements that, if true, leave no doubt that the case falls within the statute. * * * One may be so weak or crippled as to be compelled to leave his affairs in the hands of servants or agents, and is no more incompetent for that reason than a very wealthy man is who cannot possibly look after all the details of his business. Neither is there any legal standard of business wisdom. Men may be unwisely speculative or unwisely penurious; but this is not insanity. A jury of merchants might very easily approve or disapprove where a jury of persons unaccustomed to commercial ventures and expenditures would think the reverse. Every man may spend or save as he chooses, as long as he does not come within the prohibitions of the law. As long as he possesses a mind normally sound, he is entitled to free agency. It is as cruel and unlawful to interfere with the liberty of the old as of any one else, and the law cannot favor or permit this liberty to be diminished." See, further, In re Bassett, 68 Mich. 348, 36 N. W. 97.

In the case at bar the court found that appellant "is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property." In our opinion the evidence fails to sustain the finding. The appellant, at the time of the trial, was over 82 years of age, and was in the enjoyment of good health. The evidence shows without contradiction that he was active, attentive to business, and had not been confined to his bed for years. He is the owner of some 35,000 acres of grazing and farming lands situate in San Mateo county, Monterey, Merced, and Fresno counties. He is also the owner of timber lands, cattle, horses, and farming utensils. His property is stated to be worth over a million dollars. His life has been devoted to the accumulation of property. While he has been penurious, a close man to deal with, yet he has always been frugal and free from dissipation of any kind. His wife died about 13 years before the trial, and he has only one child living—a son about 52 years of age, who is helpless, and who has been nursed and cared for by appellant and Miss Upton, his sister-in-law, who has lived with him. There is no evidence of any physician or alienist as to any unsoundness of mind or mental incompetency. There is not a scintilla of evidence that the appellant has ever squandered any of his property, or that he has been imposed upon by any designing person. He has never, so far as the evidence shows, lost a dollar, an acre of land, or a cow through any mismanagement. The evidence relied upon to show mental incompetency is almost entirely that of two nephews, the most active of whom was appointed guardian of his person and estate. It may not be amiss to remark that it plainly appears that there was some fear in the minds of the nephews that the appellant might by will leave some portion of his estate to his wife's sister, Miss Upton. In any event, it appeared in evidence that the appellant had made no will, and, of course, if the order should stand, he could never hereafter make a will unless restored to competency by a decree of court.

The main acts which it is claimed show mental incompetency are certain deeds, alleged to be signed by appellant, to different pieces of property which he did not and never did own. There is some evidence tending to show that appellant believed that he owned more land in San Mateo county than he really did own, and this belief was founded upon the fact that the title to his ranch, the Punta del Ano Nuevo, which was a Mexican grant, was bounded on the north by the Gonzales ranch, and appellant claimed—whether founded upon sufficient reasons or not—that the northern boundary of the grant extended some three or more miles further north than the line up to which he had occupied. The claim of appellant is stated by Dr. Robertson, the experienced alienist, who examined him as to the matter, as follows: "I examined him and others in regard to that, and he went into the details with me, explained the long Spanish grant story, and the final answer he made to my last question was that the Pacific Ocean bound him on the west, and he could not go into the ocean; that his southern boundary was absolutely fixed, and he could not go beyond a certain point; that his eastern boundary was the mountain—he could not be certain of that because it had not been surveyed, but on the north he was bounded by the Gonzales ranch. Wherever that line ran his property stopped. He insisted he owned around the town of Pescadero, and he is a little bit garrulous. There is another evidence of old age, I forgot to mention, when I got him on the subject of his property, it was hard to divert his mind from it; but at the same time he said, when that survey was run, he would only claim what was his in this survey, and what the law said was his he would take; if the land happened to be two or three miles beyond his present property, that he was paying taxes on, he would accept that as the boundary, and certainly force his neighbors out of what belonged to him; but if it came back a half a mile or mile within the property he now claims, that he would at once vacate; that he did not want an acre of land belonging to anybody else, and whatever that survey showed to be the truth he would be absolutely willing to stand by it; that he wanted nothing but his own; but what was his own he absolutely wanted, irrespective of present possession. In other words, he realized that the property he now owns and now occupies and now pays taxes on belongs to him and will belong to him until that survey is made.

He hopes when the survey is made it will include two or three miles that belong to his neighbors." And the appellant says that Carl Coburn told him that he owned more land north of his grant, and he thus states the matter in his testimony: "Q. Has Carl Coburn ever said anything to you about the northern line of your property? A. He spoke to me about the northern boundary. I told him my northern boundary joined on what is called the Gonzales—I think that that is the name of the grant—the southern boundary of Gonzales was my northern boundary of the Punta del Ano Nuevo. That shows on the record. The west of my grant is the ocean. Q. Yes, sir. Now, without regard to the other boundaries, what did he tell you with regard to the northern boundary, where he thought that was? A. He said he had been looking the thing over, and it was north of Spanish Town about a mile. I said I didn't know that. I wasn't aware it ran so far north. Well, he said my grant called for so many thousand acres. He wanted to know how many acres there was, and I said I understood there were 7,700 and some odd acres in the Spanish grant—not American grant, but Spanish grant. Well, to come to reckon that, the American is four times that amount, and it comes close on to 30,000 acres in the grant. The grant of course was a Spanish grant. I don't know anything about the United States grants. I never had anything to do with the United States grants. My deed of the property came from Mexico. Q. Well, now, without regard to the history. I am not going into the history of the Mexican grant, but just what Carl Coburn told you. I understand that Carl Coburn told you that the northern line was far to the north of Pescadero? A. He said it was beyond Spanish Town. 'Well,' I said, 'I wasn't aware of that.' 'Well,' he said, 'It comes to the Gonzales southern boundary.' 'Well, I don't know exactly where the Gonzales southern boundary was, because I had never had that surveyed, and the grant has never been surveyed, only little portions of it—that is, the grant Punta del Ano Nuevo.'"

With these facts as a basis, let us examine and analyze the testimony as to incompetency. It appears that in the year 1907 the appellant had litigation with the Gazos Creek Mill Company, involving important rights as to a sale of growing timber and rights of way by the appellant to said company. The case had been decided against appellant in the superior court of San Mateo county, and Carl J. Coburn appeared to be very anxious to assist in appealing the case, and offered his services free to assist his uncle in any manner he could. At all events, Carl testified that he told the old man that he could not go ahead and assist in employing attorneys and attending to matters without some authority, and that he not only told his uncle this, but that he refused to do anything without a power of attorney; that on the 17th day of August, 1907, a general power of attorney was executed to him and signed by Loren Coburn. The power of attorney was introduced in evidence, and hence we may assume that thereafter Carl was the attorney in fact of his old uncle. Of course, as such it was his duty to act with the utmost good faith with his uncle who had imposed confidence in him. It appears that about the 15th day of January, 1908, Carl wrote to the other nephew, Azro Coburn, who resided in Holyoke, Mass., and in response to the letter Azro came to California. This letter was not shown, nor was it produced in evidence, although some reference was made to its contents. There is nothing to show that any deed had been made by appellant, or any property disposed of up to this time. In fact, the only thing that is stated by Carl as a reason why he wrote to Azro is the situation regarding the lawsuit with the Gazos Creek Mill Company, which he was trying to compromise, and of which one of the attorneys he had employed advised the compromise or settlement, by having appellant pay the company $23,000. This appellant refused to do, claiming that he was right, and would win the case on appeal. The result shows that the judgment of appellant was correct, for he did win the case on appeal. Gazos Creek Mill Co. v. Coburn, 8 Cal. App. 150, 96 Pac. 359. It is a significant fact that proceedings had been instituted to have appellant declared incompetent some eight or nine years before, in which proceedings Carl Coburn was a witness, and claimed at that time that his uncle was mentally incompetent. Those proceedings resulted in favor of appellant, and it is in evidence, and not contradicted, that since that time he has accumulated some $300,000. We have looked in vain for any evidence of any act tending to show mental incompetency up to the time that the letter was sent to Azro by Carl.

In response to the letter from Carl, Azro arrived in San Francisco on January 26, 1908, and it appears, by appointment, met his cousin Carl at the Hotel Jefferson in San Francisco. While there appellant called to see his nephew—whether by request or not does not appear. Azro describes the visit as follows: "We went upstairs into my room and visited there during the evening, and during the evening I had pleasant conversation with uncle, and talked some about his affairs, and I asked him about certain litigation he had got into, how he was coming out on it, and he told me he was coming out all right, and I told him I hoped he would. He made only a short call that evening." Carl describes this call of his uncle as follows: "He came to the Jefferson Hotel, where Mr. Azro Coburn and I were stopping, and he met us there. Azro Coburn took him up to his room, and they began to have a talk about the timber case. The timber case I believe was set for the 27th of this month. Mr. Azro Coburn and I had consulted Mr. Loren Coburn's attorneys. We knew—at least I knew—the case was in a very precarious condition; that there was danger of the case being decided against us. Mr. Azro Coburn asked his uncle, he says, 'How is everything?' and asked him about his cases and how they were going along; asked him if he had not better try and do something to settle the case before it was decided."

We will now review briefly what these two nephews did, according to their own testimony, in order to procure evidence as to the mental incompetency of appellant. The first thing, according to their testimony, was to procure a deed from appellant to one Richards of the city hall in San Francisco, which deed made no reference to the city hall by name. Both Azro and Carl testified that they saw the old man sign this deed. It is dated January 28, 1908, evidently showing that diligence was being used after Azro arrived in San Francisco. It does not appear that any explanation was made to appellant as to why they wanted the deed signed. Azro testified: "I did not read the deed to Loren Coburn. Nobody read it to him. I don't know that anybody called his attention particularly to the property described therein. I don't know what Carl said. I saw him sign it. That is all I saw about it. I saw him read it. That is all. I assume he did because his lips moved. I don't know whether or not he was told that this was some other document, a lease of a portion of his property in Pescadero. I did not hear any such remark." Carl testified that the deed was signed by appellant without any representations being made to him; that "he came to sign that document by me asking him to in my office at Pescadero." There were two deeds offered in evidence procured in substantially the same way, and some four or five leases. The leases were obtained by stating, or leaving appellant to infer, that they were of property claimed by him to be within the calls of his grant. These instruments were procured in nearly every case at the instance of Carl, without any explanation to the old man as to the description. We think it is sufficient to say that they were procured by one in whom appellant had confidence and who held his power of attorney. Azro testified that the papers, deeds, and leases were all procured for the purpose of being used in these proceedings. In his own language he said: "It was contemplated, if we could get sufficient evidence that he had done something that was detrimental to his own property, or liable to, then there might be grounds for this proceeding. It seems to me the power of attorney was almost sufficient; but at the same time I wanted to have sufficient evidence. I wanted to be sure, not that Mr. Coburn could escape these proceedings, but I wanted to be sure and prove to the court that he was incompetent; that he might be likely to be influenced by some designing person." And Carl testified to the same effect. He said:

"All of these papers were prepared in contemplation of proceedings of this character, just as testified to by Mr. Azro Coburn, and also to please Mr. Coburn. Mr. Coburn was not satisfied unless somebody would agree to take a lease, and acknowledge his authority over that grant, and I saw no harm in doing so; that is, so far as this lease to Dr. Banks and Mr. Perry were concerned—simply to satisfy him."

Not only was Carl Coburn the attorney in fact of the old man, but he admits that he was friendly with him, pretending to advise and assist, while in fact consulting with Azro and his attorneys in the initiation of proceedings hostile to him, and preparing the deeds and procuring the signatures thereto for evidence. He not only advised appellant, but assisted him in getting witnesses for the trial, not even intimating that he was using all his endeavors to have his uncle adjudged incompetent, and to be appointed guardian. If appellant was mentally incompetent, Carl should at least have been honest and fair with him, and not have resorted to deception for the purpose of procuring evidence. These deeds and leases were prepared from January 30 to February 6, 1908, at least seven of them within a period of seven days. The petition to have a guardian appointed was filed on the 8th day of February, 1908, and the trial commenced on the 15th. Azro Coburn thus procured sufficient evidence within a week to satisfy himself that his uncle was incompetent, not based upon evidence of what occurred before he came to California, but based upon evidence of acts done within the week. Surely if appellant was mentally insane on the 1st day of February, 1908, ample evidence could have been procured among his neighbors in the community where he had spent nearly all his life. In our opinion the mere signing of these deeds and leases, if true, is not sufficient to show mental incompetency; and it may further be remarked that appellant denies that he ever signed them. We do not attach any great importance to the testimony of Carl Coburn to the effect that appellant wanted him to raise quite a sum of money to be used in part in bribing certain judges. Appellant denies that he ever made such a request or even intimated it. It does not appear that such bribes were ever offered or attempted, and the fact, if true, would not of itself be sufficient to show mental unsoundness. Carl, according to his own evidence, agreed to take part in the contemplated bribing, and it does not appear that he ever protested or even suggested that it would be wrong.

We therefore may eliminate from the case the acts as to the Gazos Creek litigation, in which the appellant had the best judgment of them all; the signing of the deeds and leases without explanation to him by his attorney in fact, who had been a witness against him nine years ago in a similar proceeding, and who deceived him by pretending to be his friend; the claim to lands north of Pescadero, which claim, even if not well founded, was a harmless delusion. Then what is the evidence of the mental unsoundness of appellant? No physician or alienist was called by petitioner, nor did he have any medical examination made of appellant. Dr. Banks testified that in his opinion appellant was "not competent to manage his own business"; but he said nothing as to his "mental sanity," and not only this, but it appeared from his evidence that his acquaintance was what he called a "mere casual one." He further testified that his opinion was based to a great extent upon the signing of a lease by appellant to himself. Dr. Banks, upon consultation with Carl and Azro Coburn, paid appellant $5 for one month's rent, and agreed to continue to pay $5 per month for a lot which appellant claimed to be within his boundaries. In cross-examination he said: "I cannot recall one instance that I know of by observation in which Mr. Coburn has been gotten the best of."

E. B. Gayety, a witness for petitioner, when asked whether he regarded appellant as a man who is competent to manage his own affairs, replied: "Sometimes I do; sometimes I do not." In cross-examination he said, in speaking of appellant: "He gives his own personal attention to that, and makes his own leases with his tenants, and collects his own rents. * * * The conditions were very binding upon the tenants. I should judge they were what I used to term when I made leases an 'iron-clad lease.' Mr. Coburn in those leases has safeguarded his interests in every imaginable way. * * * In one sense of the word he is a very careful business man in his dealings there with his tenants and in other business transactions."

N. J. Perry testified that he had known appellant off and on for 12 years. He did not pretend to be an intimate acquaintance, or testify as to his mental sanity. In cross-examination he said: That he could not state that appellant is in such a condition physically that he is not able to take care of himself. That appellant "has a great deal of property over there, a great many tenants, makes a great many leases, has a great deal of rent to collect at different times. He drives around, sometimes the old man Upton with him, and at other times I think Miss Upton goes out with him. * * * I have said before, in the way that Mr. Coburn has expressed himself to me, I believe that he is lacking in vitality, that is all."

Manuel Goulart testified that he had known appellant since 1882, and in his opinion appellant was not competent to manage his property. In cross-examination he said, however: "All the business that I have done has been with Mr. Coburn. I have leased some land from him. I leased land last year from him, and had my dealings with him direct. I found him able at that time to transact the business with me. * * * The business was transacted satisfactorily to both sides; that is, I leased some land, and we agreed upon the rental, and Mr. Coburn agreed upon the amount I should pay. I rented a ranch for cash rent, and another piece of land I had on shares."

Gehiel Coburn, a brother 10 years younger than appellant, testified that in his opinion appellant was not competent to manage his business. It appeared, however, in cross-examination, that the witness had sawed wood for appellant; but evidently the alleged incompetent was the one who could pay the unsuccessful witness for sawing wood. This witness admitted that he took part in trying to have a guardian appointed for appellant some nine years ago. He further testified: "I then testified that Mr. Coburn was incompetent. The result was that he was proven not incompetent. * * * So far as Mr. Loren Coburn's ability to get about is concerned, he is about as active and spry now as he was eight or nine years ago. He appears to be around. I only see him occasionally you know, I notice no material difference so far as his being able to get about is concerned; only he goes a little lame more than he used to, bent over. * * * As to his habits of living, Mr. Coburn, I don't know that he dissipates. I don't think that he uses intoxicating liquors. * * * He does not use tobacco in any form. I think he leads a regular life so far as that is concerned. He has no bad habits of any kind that he needs the appointment of a guardian for."

This presents the substance of all the evidence offered by petitioner as to mental incompetency. There is nothing to show that appellant is incapable of taking care of himself. There is but the mere opinion of a few witnesses as to appellant being incompetent to take care of his property, and these opinions are worthless because not based upon any facts or reasons. On the other hand, appellant presented the evidence of many of his neighbors as to his mental and physical competency. We have not space to give even a synopsis of that testimony, but that of James Moffitt, the cashier of the First National Bank of San Francisco, is a sample. Mr. Moffitt testified: "I know Loren Coburn of Pescadero; have known him seven or eight years. He is a patron of our bank. He has been such for approximately that time, a little more or less. I have known him in connection with the bank during that time, during which time I have frequently met him in business. * * * I don't know his age exactly. I suppose generally he must be well over the 70-year term, and he always struck me as a man of remarkable physical strength. I have had business relations with him concerning his affairs and his relations to the bank, and have had an opportunity during those business operations of forming an opinion as to whether he was mentally competent. My opinion with reference to his competency or otherwise, as the management of his own affairs is, that he is absolutely competent. I think he is as well competent to manage his own affairs and look after his side of the bargain as any one I have come in contact with in the bank for the last 10 or 15 years; that is, that he can take care of his side of the bargain."

Dr. Robertson, a physician of standing and an alienist of experience, carefully examined appellant, and testified as to his health, both mental and physical, as follows: "Mr. Coburn, so far as I could judge, is an absolutely healthy man. * * * I could hardly believe that a man 82 years old could have the apparent physical vigor that this man does. For instance, upon handing him a paper to read, I found he didn't use glasses at all. I am barely turned 50, and yet I find glasses an absolute necessity. I find his hearing in good condition. I found his heart in normal position and condition. I found no evidence of any change of circulation in the brain such as we expect to find in a man over 50. As a matter of fact, in nothing that I examined, in no statement that he made to me, did I find anything other than a normal individual, either mentally or physically. * * * Mr. Coburn's whole life has been one of money, the acquisition of money, the handling of money and distribution of money, all in the world that he thinks of apparently—his one ambition in life is to acquire money, to hold property, and to fight for what he believes is right. He has a keen sense of justice apparently, at least justice so far as it relates to him and other people. He told me, for instance, if he was deprived of his rights, and had to go to any guardian, and wanted a four-bid meal, and he handed him two bits, and told him to get a dinner with that—the old man held out his hands in horror, expressing absolute disgust."

The appellant took the stand in his own behalf, and there is nothing in his long examination that even tends to show mental incompetency. No one could read the testimony without being impressed with his keen grasp of business details. Part of his testimony is as follows: "I pay my bills. I deal altogether in cash. No long tails about it. If I go to a man in Pescadero and get anything from the grocery, $2.50, 'here is your change, give me a receipt for it.' And if I have men working for me, I propose to pay them off every month, so as not to have any back arrangements, and, if there is any entanglement or anything, we have to refer back only one month. I haven't got no partners. I ain't in any stock because I have got all the stock in my corporation myself. * * * Well I go to bed from 8 to 9 o'clock. I have no chance—no use for this off to theaters and gambling places, and taking a drink and having a great time. I never do anything of that kind. When I get through my work at night, I go into my house. I have a fireplace, and build a fire, sit down, warm my feet, rest myself up, and about 8 or 9 o'clock I go to bed. Sometimes it overruns that, when I have something quite particular to attend to, and I don't get to bed until 10 or 8 or 9; but as a general rule I go to bed about half past 8 or 9, and get up in the morning from 6 to 7, and when I am up around I have something to attend to, and the folks that know me they know that I am out around attending to business." His description of meeting Azro Coburn at the Jefferson Hotel in San Francisco is as follows: "He wanted me to go up and see him. I went up there and saw him a few minutes, and he commenced to talk about my property, and I thought that was queer about his talking about my property. I thought he had better take care of his own property at home, and I was competent to take care of my own property—to come about 3,000 miles to take care of my property. I said, 'What is the matter with you?' 'Well,' he said, 'I will tell you, you are in litigation over some timber land here.' 'Well,' I said, 'what of it?' 'Well,' he said, 'don't you think you had better seek a compromise and settle up?' 'Well,' I said, 'I haven't got nothing to compromise.' 'Well,' he said, 'I think you had better. They may beat you,' and all that. I said: 'I don't know how they are going to beat me. They have no cause of action.'"

We are fully aware that an appellate court will not reverse a finding if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence; but the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion. The finding or verdict must have meritorious support in the evidence. A few general statements without substantial reasons are not sufficient to raise a conflict. Smith v. Belshaw, 89 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 834; Fleld v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 662, 34 Pac. 504. In the latter case it was sought to have a gift of personal property set aside at the suit of an administrator, on the ground that the decedent, at the time of making the transfer, was of unsound mind, and the jury found that the mind of the decedent was sound up to within three days of the making of the transfer, and from that time on was unsound. The court held that the finding of the jury as to unsoundness of mind at the date of the transfer was without sufficient support in the evidence, and therefore set the verdict aside.

The court erred in allowing several witnesses to testify, under the objections and exceptions of appellant, as to their opinions as to "the ability of appellant to manage his property," and "as to whether or not in their opinions he was likely to be imposed upon by designing parties." The opinions of the witnesses upon these questions and as to these matters were clearly inadmissible. The Code provides (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10) that evidence may be given upon the trial of the following facts: "The opinion of a subscribing witness to a writing, the validity of which is in dispute, respecting the mental sanity of the signer, and the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason for the opinion being given." And in such case the reasons upon which the opinion is based must be given, and the opinion itself can have no weight other than that which the reason brings to its support. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 Pac. 695.

The opinion as to the mental sanity of a person is one thing. His opinion as to whether or not he is competent to properly attend to his business, or whether he is likely to be imposed upon, is quite another and different thing. Shapter v. Pillar, 28 Colo. 209, 63 Pac. 302. It was there said: "Applying these rules, it is manifest that the opinions of the witnesses regarding the incapability of the plaintiff in error to manage and control his own business affairs should have been excluded. Those who had seen and conversed with him could properly give their opinion on the question of his insanity; but the vital one, i. e., the degree of his mental incapacity in that account, and the extent to which he may have been incapacitated thereby from managing his business, the jury should have determined from all the evidence on the subject. It was not a question which required peculiar skill or knowledge to comprehend. It was one which men of ordinary, average intelligence, after being acquainted with the hallucinations, if any, of plaintiff in error, his acts and thoughts prompted thereby, could ascertain for themselves, based upon their own experience and observations."

In the Estate of Taylor, 92 Cal. 564, 28 Pac. 603, it was held that the opinion of a witness as to the capacity of a testator to make a will was not admissible; the court holding that such opinion was quite different from an opinion as to mental sanity.

The orders are reversed.

HALL, J. I concur in the judgment, but am unable to agree with what is said in the opinion of the presiding justice as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that appellant "is incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property." The evidence upon this point is not as satisfactory as it might be, and if the members of this court were sitting as trial judges it is quite possible or even probable that we would not have come to the same conclusion as to the ultimate facts as that arrived at by the trial court; but this is not the test applied in this court upon an appeal. If the findings attacked are supported by any substantial evidence, the findings of the trial court are conclusive upon this court.

I agree with what the presiding justice has said in regard to the action of the trial court in allowing witnesses to give their opinions as to whether or not appellant had the ability to manage his property. By this testimony witnesses were allowed, in effect, to give their opinions upon the general merits of the case and as to the question directly in issue. This may not be done. Wilson v. Reedy, 33 Minn. 503, 24 N. W. 191; McDonald v. State, 127 N. Y. 18, 27 N. E. 358; Blum v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 1 Misc. Rep. 119, 20 N. Y. Supp. 722; Davis v. Fuller, 12 Vt. 178, 36 Am. MACLEOD v. MORAN. (Civ. 644.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Oct. 29, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1099*)—DETERMINATION—LAW OF CASE—DECISION OF FORMER APPEAL.

A decision of the Supreme Court on a former appeal as to the effect of a trust deed is binding upon the appellate court on a subsequent appeal of the case to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4373; Dec. Dig. § 1099.*]

2. PARTIES (§ 80*)—NONJOINER—PURPOSE—MANNER OF RAISING OBJECTION—DEMUR-BER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, permitting a defendant to demur to the complaint when it shows upon its face a defect in parties plaintiff, defendant should have objected to the non-joinder of the husband, in an action by a married woman, by demurrer to the complaint, and not by motion to make the husband a party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 123; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 221*)—ACTIONS BY WIFE—JOINER OF HUSBAND.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 370, requiring the husband to be joined with a married woman when she is a party, except when the action concerns her right or claim to the homestead property the wife could sue alone in an action to quiet title to property claimed as a homestead, and she need not establish a valid homestead right before suing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 802; Dec. Dig. § 221.*]

4. HOMESTEAD (§ 35*)—SELECTION BY WIFE—VALUE OF PROPERTY.

Civ. Code, § 1260, permits homesteads to be selected, not to exceed $5,000 in value by any head of a family, or not to exceed $1,000 in value by any other person. Section 1262 provides that, to select a homestead, the husband, or other head of a family, or, in case he has not made such selection, the wife, must execute and acknowledge a declaration of a homestead; and section 1263 requires that the declaration show that the one making it is the head of a family, or, when made by the wife, that her husband has not made such declaration, and that she makes it for their joint benefit. Held that, where the husband as head of a family has not selected a homestead, the wife may, for their joint benefit, make the same selection that he could have made, and hence could select property of the value of $5,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 448*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—EXPLAINING DEED—UNAMBIGUOUS DEED.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, authorizing other evidence of the circumstances under which a deed was made as defined in section 1860, or to explain an intrinsic ambiguity, and section 1860, permitting the circumstances under which an instrument, including a deed, was made to be shown to assist the judge in its proper construction, are not applicable to the construction of a trust deed where it was unambiguous, so that parol evidence to explain or contradict it would not be admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2068; Dec. Dig. § 448.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Emma J. MacLeod against Joe Moran. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 153 Cal. 97, 94 Pac. 604.

R. L. Beardslee and O. B. Parkinson, for appellant. J. A. Plummer, for respondent.

HART, J. The purpose of this action is to obtain a decree canceling and annulling certain deeds, together with the records thereof, purporting to convey certain real property situated in the county of San Joaquin, and to quiet plaintiff's title to said property. Plaintiff was given judgment, and this appeal is brought here by the defendant from said judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

This is the second trial of the cause, the judgment rendered and entered at the first trial having been reversed on appeal by the Supreme Court and the cause returned to the court below for retrial. McLeod v. Moran, 153 Cal. 97, 94 Pac. 604. In the language of the opinion of the Supreme Court on that appeal, written by Mr. Justice Angellotti, we present the facts as follows: "The real property involved was community property, having been acquired by plaintiff's husband, A. K. MacLeod, after their marriage and by their joint efforts, and was their family home. It was regularly selected as a homestead by plaintiff on May 3, 1902. In January, 1904, the deed of trust was executed and acknowledged by plaintiff and her husband, and recorded in the office of the county recorder. By this instrument, the husband and wife purported to grant, bargain, sell, etc., the land in question to M. L. Sims and C. L. Flack in trust, as security for the payment of $450 with interest to one Mary E. Sims. The trust deed was in the form ordinarily used for such instruments when given as security for the payment of a debt, authorizing the trustees, among other things, to sell the property at public auction in the event of default in the payment of principal or interest, to execute and deliver a deed on such sale, and to appropriate such portion of the proceeds of sale as was necessary to the payment of the debt and costs. It was provided therein that if the makers of the deed paid at maturity all sums secured thereby, the trustees 'shall reconvey all the estate in the premises aforesaid to them by this instrument granted unto the said A. K. MacLeod, or his assigns, at his request and cost.' Immediately following the description by metes and bounds of the property conveyed was the following: 'And also all the estate, interest, claim and demand, as well in law as in equity, which the said parties of the first part may have or may hereafter acquire of, in and to the said premises, with the appurtenances, hereby expressly abandoning all right of homestead in and to said premises.' On March 23, 1904, there was executed and acknowledged by the trustees and recorded a reconveyance of the property to said A. K. MacLeod, it being recited therein that all the indebtedness secured by the deed of trust had been paid. On the same day said A. K. MacLeod executed and delivered a deed of conveyance purporting to convey the property to one Edward Studivan, but plaintiff did not join therein. Subsequently Studivan executed and delivered to defendant Joe Moran a quitclaim deed of the property."

The only point involved and decided in the first appeal was whether the trust deed referred to constituted an abandonment of the homestead regularly selected by plaintiff prior to the execution of said trust deed in accordance with the terms of the several sections of the Civil Code relating to the subject of the selection and abandonment of homesteads. The court held that the effect of said trust deed "amounted to nothing more than an express abandonment to the trustees, for the purposes of the trust, of all claim of homestead," and that upon the payment of the debt, to secure which the trust deed was executed, the trustors were restored to all the estate with which the property was impressed at the time of the execution of said deed. The decision of the point by the Supreme Court adversely to the contention of appellant with regard to the effect of the provisions of the trust deed upon the homestead declared and recorded by plaintiff before the execution of said deed, necessarily eliminates that question as a subject of discussion here. But there are some additional points presented on this appeal.

1. It is claimed that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant in refusing to grant his motion to restore A. K. MacLeod, husband of plaintiff, as a party defendant to the action. It appears that, at the first trial, MacLeod was made a defendant, but that the court dismissed the action as to him. There is nothing in the pleadings showing that MacLeod was and is a necessary party defendant.

But counsel for the defendant make the point here that the motion should have been granted because the plaintiff, as they contend, is without authority to sue without joining her husband as plaintiff. The complaint discloses the relationship between the plaintiff and MacLeod to be that of husband and wife, and if appellant desired to make the point here contended for in the court below he should have done so by demurrer. Code Civ. Proc. § 430. Assuming, however, that he could accomplish the same object by a motion, he failed to proceed properly, for he only asked that MacLeod be made a defendant. But the point is untenable in any event. Section 370 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "when a married woman is a party, her husband must be joined with her, except: (1) When the action concerns her separate property, or her right or claim to the homestead property, she may sue alone."

The contention of the appellant is that this is not an action involving a right or claim to the homestead; but that it is "an action to determine whether or not the property is impressed with a valid homestead." The suggested distinction is one without a difference, so far as plaintiff's right to sue alone is concerned. The action here is one to quiet plaintiff's homestead title to the property involved. The mere fact that the defendant tendered an issue challenging the validity of plaintiff's claim to a homestead title does not render the action any the less one concerning her "right or claim to homestead property." But counsel go so far as to declare that before the wife can sue alone it must first be "established that there is or was a valid homestead." There is nothing in the language of section 370 of the Code of Civil Procedure which furnishes the slightest ground for such a construction. Manifestly, it is essential, in an action of this character by the wife, that it be shown that the land involved is covered by a valid declaration of homestead, otherwise a cause of action is not stated. But in such case, while a demurrer to the complaint for want of sufficient facts would be sustained, it could not be doubted that the wife was authorized to sue alone, it appearing that the action concerned her right or claim to homestead property. The right of the wife to a homestead is given to her by the provisions of the Civil Code, while section 370 of the Code of Civil Procedure invests her with the right to sue alone in an action involving or concerning her homestead right or claim. In other words, the right to a homestead resides in her whether she exercises the right or not, but if she does exercise it, or, attempting to do so, fails because of the omission to observe some of the requirements and formalities prescribed by law and essential to a valid accomplishment of that purpose, she is, nevertheless, entitled to sue alone in an action concerning her right or claim to homestead property. As before stated, her complaint might be bad because of a failure to state a cause of action, but that fact cannot take from her or impair her right, given by the statute, to sue alone in such action. These views are not in conflict, but we think fully harmonize, with the cases in this state. See Tappendorff v. Moranda, 134 Cal. 421, 66 Pac. 491; Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 58 Pac. 910, 59 Pac. 296, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195; Prey v. Stanley, 110 Cal. 423, 42 Pac. 908; Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 390, 7 Pac. 804. But the complaint here states a cause of action, entitling plaintiff to the relief prayed for in the absence of a countershowing sufficient to overcome its claims.

2. Appellant makes the point that the homestead is invalid for the reason that it appears on the face of the declaration that the property sought to be so impressed exceeds in value the sum of $1,000. The point arises on the ruling of the court excluding as evidence the declaration of homestead, which was offered by appellant to show the value of the homestead to be in excess of $1,000. Section 1260 of the Civil Code provides: "Homesteads may be selected and claimed: (1) Of not exceeding five thousand dollars in value by any head of a family; (2) of not exceeding one thousand dollars in value by any other person." The value of the property involved here, as designated in the declaration of homestead, is $1,500. The argument is that the wife is not the "head of a family" within the meaning of that phrase as used by the code section; hence she was not authorized to cover property exceeding the sum of $1,000 in value with a homestead. The homestead declaration filed by the plaintiff states, as is required by the law, that the declaration is made "for the joint benefit of myself and husband," further declaring that plaintiff's husband has not made a declaration of homestead. We have been pointed to no case which holds that the wife, in exercising her homestead rights under such circumstances, is limited by the law to the appropriation for that purpose of property not exceeding in value the sum of $1,000. And we think that no such conclusion can be deduced from a reasonable construction of the code sections appertaining to the subject of homesteads.

Section 1262 of the Civil Code reads: "In order to select a homestead, the husband or other head of a family, or in case the husband has not made such selection, the wife must execute and acknowledge, in the same manner as a grant of real property is acknowledged, a declaration of homestead, and file the same for record."

Section 1263 of said Code provides that it must appear from the declaration of homestead that the person making it is the head of a family, or, when the declaration is made by the wife, it must contain a statement "showing that her husband has not made such declaration, and that she therefore makes the declaration for their joint benefit."

The language of the foregoing sections is not so obscure as to render their meaning doubtful or to becloud the evident object the Legislature had in view when enacting them. Section 1262, it seems to us, is very clear upon the proposition that the Legislature intended by said section to provide for the wife and children against the contingency which would arise by reason of the neglect or refusal of the husband, as the head of the family, to take advantage of the homestead laws, which were enacted as well for the benefit of the wife and children as of the husband. The distinction made by the Legislature between the two classes of persons entitled to homestead exemption is, it is very clear, based upon the fact that upon those of the one class there are others depending for support and maintenance, while those of the other class have no such responsibilities. But, aside from the reasons which give rise to homestead laws and to the division of those entitled to the benefits thereof into two classes, it may again be suggested that the language of section 1262 could hardly be made plainer, upon the proposition that it was the intention of the Legislature that where the husband, as the head of the family, has not made "such selection" the wife herself may make the very same selection. This obviously correct construction of said section is strengthened, if, indeed, the construction needs fortification, by the provision of section 1263, that where the wife makes the selection the declaration must contain a statement "showing that her husband has not made such declaration, and that she, therefore, makes the declaration for their joint benefit." In other words, the section in effect provides that, the husband having neglected or refused to make the selection which he was entitled to make as the head of the family, his wife may make the identical selection for him for their joint benefit. No reason can be suggested why the Legislature, in authorizing the wife to make a homestead selection where the husband fails or refuses to do so, intended to confine her, in the exercise of the right, to a homestead to which those only would be entitled who select, not for the protection of a family, but for their own individual benefit.

The case of Reid v. Englehart, 126 Cal. 527, 58 Pac. 1063, 77 Am. St. Rep. 206, cited by appellant in support of his position, does not hold that the homestead selected by the wife in lieu of a selection by the husband, where the latter fails to make such selection, must be limited in value to $1,000, nor is there even any intimation in the opinion in that case that such is the law. The declaration of homestead was there declared to be void because it did not appear on the face thereof that all the essential formalities and conditions had been complied with in the attempted exercise of the right to select a homestead. There was no statement in said declaration indicating or showing that the party filing it was the "head of a family."

The court, among other things, said: "Although it is stated that the claimant is married, it does not appear whether the person who made this statement is husband or wife. * * * If 'R. M. Reid' be the wife, the declaration is defective in not showing that her husband had not previously made the declaration. If that be the name of the husband, the declaration is defective in not 'showing' that he is the head of a family." The foregoing is the substance of all that is decided in that case, and if any inference may be drawn from the language as to the opinion of the court upon the question of the value of the homestead which the wife is entitled to select in the place of her husband, who has neglected or refused to make a selection, it is that the homestead thus selected may be of the value of $5,000. There is no claim here that all the essential requirements of the statute, apart from value, have not been observed. Nor could any such claim be sustained, for the declaration, as seen, shows that the plaintiff is a married woman; that her husband has not made a selection, and that her selection is made for the joint benefit of herself and husband. The ruling of the court against the admission of the declaration of homestead for the purpose stated was not erroneous.

3. It is next urged that the court erred by its refusal to permit the defendant to amend his answer during the course of the trial. The substance of the proposed amendments was (adopting the language of counsel for the appellant used in their brief) "that said plaintiff and her said husband then and there agree (at the time of the execution and delivery of the trust deed) in and by such instrument and the provisions therein contained, did intend to forever abandon said homestead." The manifest object of the proposed amendments was to open the door for the introduction of parol proof of the intention of the plaintiff and her husband with respect to the effect of the trust deed upon their homestead. In fact, counsel offered to prove that the party from whom was borrowed the money to secure repayment of which the deed was made and delivered, declared at the time of the execution of the instrument that she would not make the loan unless plaintiff and her husband abandoned for all time the homestead, and that, thereupon, the latter did declare their intention of so doing and executed said deed with that intention.

In support of their contention upon the point under consideration, counsel invoke sections 1856 and 1860 of the Code of Civil Procedure and certain sections of the Civil Code involving rules for the construction and interpretation of written instruments and contracts. These sections of the Codes have no application here. The deed of trust is unambiguous, and speaks plainly for itself. Besides, the opinion of the Supreme Court in this cause (McLeod v. Moran, 153 Cal. 97, 94 Pac. 604, supra) conclusively answers the contention. There, as we have shown, the court very clearly construes the effect of the instrument upon the homestead rights of the plaintiff, and holds that the deed of trust affected the homestead only to the extent that it expressly abandoned "all right of homestead in and to said premises" to the trustees, for the purposes of the trust, and that the purposes of the trust having been accomplished and the title of the trustees having ceased, upon the payment of the debt to secure which the trust was created, the whole title was thus left "in the grantor in whom it was vested at the execution of the trust deed." The court's ruling disallowing the proposed amendments to the answer was proper, as were also its rulings excluding testimony offered for the purpose of showing that, contemporaneously with the execution of the trust deed, the plaintiff declared, orally, to the party with whom she negotiated the loan, that, by the trust deed, she intended to forever abandon the homestead on the premises in dispute. Of course, the party from whom the money was borrowed naturally desired that the title to the entire estate should be conveyed to the trustees so that her security for the return of her money would in no degree be impaired, and this is exactly what they received under the deed. In other words, as to the trustees, the homestead was abandoned, and this was all that was required and effected for the purposes of the trust.

We have noticed all the points presented on this appeal, and are unable to discover any tenable reason for interfering with the conclusions reached upon the legal propositions involved by the trial court.

The judgment and order appealed from are accordingly affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

BERGEVIN et al. v. WOOD, Judge of the Superior Court, et al. (Civ. 675.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Nov. 1, 1909.)

1. CERTIORARI (§ 28*) — GROUNDS — JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS—WANT OF JURISDICTION.

If it appeared on the hearing of a motion to dismiss an appeal to the superior court that no sufficient appeal bond was filed, as required by statute, the court would have no jurisdiction of the appeal, and should dismiss it; and its refusal to do so would be reviewable by a writ of review, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1074, providing that review thereunder cannot extend further than to determine whether an inferior court has regularly pursued its authority.

2. CERTIORARI (§ 28*) — GROUNDS — WANT OF JURISDICTION — CONCLUSIVENESS OF PROCEEDINGS.

The inferior court's determination of its jurisdiction is only binding on review by writ of review, where it is based upon disputed facts, or a natural inference from the acts of the parties and proceedings taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 377*)—APPEAL BOND —SUFFICIENCY—SEVERAL APPELLANTS.

An undertaking on appeal to the superior court by a corporation and an individual defendant recited that, in consideration of the appeal and a stay of proceedings, the surety acknowledged itself bound in a certain sum, and promised, on the part of said appellant, that said appellant would pay the amount of any judgment and all costs recovered against him in the superior court. Held, that the surety only bound itself to answer for a judgment against the individual appellant so that the appeal was properly dismissed as to the corporation.

5. BONDS (§ 50*) — STATUTORY BONDS — CONSTRUCTION.

The meaning of an appeal bond should be determined from its language, and not by the application of Code Civ. Proc. § 17, relating to the meaning of words used in the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 391*)—APPEAL BOND —NEW UNDERTAKING.

Appellant could not file a new appeal bond in the superior court, after the appeal had been dismissed, because of the insufficiency of the appeal bond filed.

7. CERTIORARI (§ 69*)—PURPOSE OF WRIT.

Even if a writ of review could be used as a mandate, the appellate court could not thereby direct the lower court to act beyond its jurisdiction.

Application for writ of review by A. M. Bergevin and another against Fred V. Wood, as Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Amador, and said Superior Court. Writ denied.

M. C. Hassett, for petitioners. Wm. J. McGee, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is an application for a writ of review occasioned by the dismissal of the appeal of the said A. M. Bergevin & Co. from a certain judgment of the justice court of township No. 1 in said Amador county. The order of dismissal was based upon the ground of the insufficiency of the bond on appeal.

It is not claimed that the proceedings of the superior court up to the time of said dismissal were in any respect irregular, but the contention is that the court, in holding that the bond was insufficient, exceeded its jurisdiction, or, in other words, did not "regularly pursue" its authority within the meaning of section 1074 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that: "The review upon this writ cannot be extended further than to determine whether the inferior tribunal, board or officer has regularly pursued the authority of such tribunal, board or officer." What constitutes a departure by a court from the regular pursuit of its authority is often difficult to determine, although the decisions of our Supreme Court would seem to leave no doubt as to what should be the conclusion here.

In Buckley v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 120, 31 Pac. 8, it is said: "It will be noticed that the foundation of the writ is essentially and necessarily an excess of jurisdiction; for no act of tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions, done or made within its jurisdiction, can ever be the subject of attack by writ of review. In the matter now before us it is apparent that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the persons; all the parties were before the court; the appeal was regularly taken; and we are at a loss to understand why the court had not the same jurisdiction to hear a motion to dismiss the appeal as it had to proceed to a trial of the cause upon its merits. If it had jurisdiction to hear the motion, and as to that matter there can be no question, then its ruling upon the motion was simply an exercise of that jurisdiction, and, however erroneous such ruling might be, it would only be an error of law in no manner subject to review by an original proceeding in this court. In this case the court had jurisdiction to hear the matter, and it would be an absurdity to say that upon the submission of the matter the court had jurisdiction to deny the motion to dismiss the appeal, but no jurisdiction to grant it. As was said in Central Pacific R. R. Co. v. Placer County, 46 Cal. 670: 'It has been settled by a long series of decisions in this state that a writ of certiorari brings up for review only the question whether the inferior officer, court, or tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction, and cannot be used as a mere writ of error for the correction of mistakes, either in law or fact, committed by the inferior tribunal within the limits of its jurisdiction.'" The doctrine of the Buckley Case is undoubtedly liable to be pressed so far as to virtually destroy the operation of the writ of review in relation to the proceedings of the superior court. It seems to be held there that said court has the power to determine its own jurisdiction, at least in cases of appeal from the justice court. If so in a case where an appeal from the justice court is pending in the superior court, and a motion is regularly made to dismiss the appeal, and it appears on the hearing of the motion that no undertaking whatever has been given, since the court has the power to hold—erroneously, it may be admitted—that no undertaking is required, or contrary to the fact that a sufficient one has been furnished, it would be no excess of jurisdiction for the court to deny the motion to dismiss the appeal. But seemingly there is a marked distinction between the jurisdiction to hear a motion to dismiss an appeal and the jurisdiction to try the cause. If the motion is regularly made to dismiss, no doubt the court has jurisdiction to determine it; but, if it should appear upon the hearing of the motion that the court has no jurisdiction to try the cause, it is difficult to understand how it would have any authority to deny the motion and retain the case for trial.

Here there is no possible doubt that the superior court had authority to hear the motion, but its jurisdiction to try the case depends upon the question whether there was an undertaking on appeal. If there was no such undertaking as the statute provides, it had no jurisdiction of the case, and therefore in the lawful exercise of its authority the only course to pursue was to dismiss the appeal. If there was such an undertaking, it not only had complete jurisdiction of the cause, but it could not divest itself of said jurisdiction by dismissing the appeal. If the court has the power to determine its jurisdiction, it would follow that whether there is or is not an undertaking, the court may have jurisdiction either to try or not to try the cause. The truth is, undoubtedly, that where it is implied or expressly declared that the court determines its own jurisdiction beyond the reach of the writ of review, it must be accepted with the qualification that, where it is based upon disputed facts, or upon a rational inference from the acts of the parties and the proceedings taken, the court's determination of its jurisdiction is binding upon a reviewing tribunal in a proceeding of this kind.

In the case at bar, the court dismissed the appeal for the reason stated that the surety (the American Surety Company of New York) had bound itself to answer for only one of the appellants; "that as a surety was entitled to stand upon the precise terms of his contract, to hold that the surety company was liable for both defendants was to read something into the contract that had not been assented to by the surety." It appears also by the return of respondent that counsel for appellants at the argument of the motion to dismiss the appeal, expressed a grave doubt as to the sufficiency of the undertaking. This doubt is amply justified by the language used, which, as far as necessary to quote, is as follows: "Whereas, the said defendants are dissatisfied with the said judgment and are desirous of appealing therefrom to the superior court of the county of Amador, and pending such appeal, claim a stay of proceedings and are desirous of staying the execution of the said judgment so rendered as aforesaid; now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, of such appeal and of such stay of proceedings and execution, all as aforesaid, we, the undersigned American Surety Company of New York * * * as surety so hereby undertake and acknowledge ourselves bound in the sum of five hundred and thirty-four dollars (being twice the amount of the said judgment including costs) and promise on the part of said appellant that the said appellant will pay the amount of the said judgment so appealed from and all costs, if the appeal is withdrawn or dismissed, or the amount of any judgment and all costs that may be recovered against him in the action in the said superior court." It cannot be said to be an unwarranted construction of the foregoing instrument to hold that the surety bound itself to answer for a judgment against appellant Bergevin and not against Bergevin & Co. At least, the undertaking is so uncertain in that respect that the court did not exceed its jurisdiction in dismissing the appeal as to the appellant company.

In Commercial Bank v. Wells, 5 Cal. App. 474, 90 Pac. 981, the appeal was from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. As stated by the court: "The only undertaking filed was conditioned to 'pay all costs and damages which may be awarded on the appeal or on a dismissal thereof not exceeding three hundred dollars.' It is not possible to determine which appeal is referred to in the undertaking. 'It is so ambiguous that it must be regarded as if none had been filed.' People v. Center, 61 Cal. 191; Home & Loan Association v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. 799." This conclusion was reached notwithstanding that the time had elapsed within which one of the appeals should have been taken. In McAulay v. Tahoe Ice Co., 3 Cal. App. 642, 86 Pac. 912, it was held, as stated in the syllabus, that: "Where the notice of appeal properly designated the Supreme Court as having sole jurisdiction, * * * the undertaking on appeal should have conformed thereto; and, where it misdescribed this court as the one to which the appeal was taken as 'the appellate court for the third district of the state of California,' it was ineffectual for any purpose, and the appeal must be dismissed"—the court basing its decision on the familiar doctrine that the sureties may rely upon the strict terms of their obligation. Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty, § 106. It is apparent here that, according to the strict terms of the undertaking, the surety would not be liable for a judgment against one of the appellants. And indeed, on account of the uncertainty in said terms, it is at least doubtful whether the undertaking is sufficient as to either appellant.

In the case of Zane v. De Onativia, 135 Cal. 440, 67 Pac. 685, it is held that where an appeal is taken by only one party, and the undertaking thereon purports on its face to be given on appeal taken by several appellants, such undertaking is insufficient, and the appeal will be dismissed. It is said: "In this case only the defendant Lillie gave notice of appeal. The undertaking in terms is security for the appeal of the defendants. The sureties undertake upon the part of the appellants (when there is but one appellant) that the appellants will pay all costs and damages which may be awarded against the defendants on said appeal, when costs and damages could only be awarded against the one appealing defendant. Standing upon the strict letter of their contract, the sureties could never be liable for anything upon this undertaking." If that decision is right—and we do not question it—there can be no doubt that the court below was justified in dismissing the appeal of Bergevin & Co. The significance of the undertaking is to be determined from the language used, and not by the application of section 17 of the Code of Civil Procedure in reference to the meaning of words used in the Code.

We can see nothing in the cases cited by petitioners militating against the views herein expressed. Of these we notice Jones v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 589, 91 Pac. 505, and Pacific Window Glass Co. v. Smith, 8 Cal. App. 762, 97 Pac. 898. In the former it was simply held that the expression "all costs" used in the undertaking was broad enough to cover the costs on appeal. The court said: "It is quite evident that it was intended to be an undertaking on appeal, as well as for a stay, and the penal sum is more than twice the amount of the judgment and the hundred dollars in addition." It may be remarked that it might be plausibly contended here that there is no undertaking to pay the costs on appeal, as it purports to be an undertaking for a stay, and the penal sum is only twice the amount of the judgment, and does not include the $100 for costs on appeal, but we deem it unnecessary to decide that point, although it is determined in McConky v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 83, that when there is an undertaking for a stay, there must also be an undertaking for costs on appeal. In Pacific Window Glass Co. v. Smith, supra, the pivotal question was, as stated by the court and conceded by counsel, the intent and purpose with which a certain deposit in lieu of a bond was made by the petitioners with the justice of the peace. It was properly held that it was clearly their purpose to guarantee the payment of the costs of appeal.

Petitioner contends also that the court below should have allowed a new undertaking to be filed, and that upon this application an order to that effect should be made. We are bound, however, by the statement of respondent that no application was made to file said undertaking until after the appeal was dismissed. This was manifestly too late. Zane v. De Onativia, supra. Section 954 of the Code of Civil Procedure makes provision for the filing of a sufficient undertaking in the Supreme Court or the District Court of Appeal before the hearing of the motion to dismiss, where the undertaking already given is insufficient. There seems to be no similar provision in reference to appeals from the justice court, but it is at least too late for the superior court to allow an additional undertaking to be filed after the appeal is dismissed. The court would be without jurisdiction to make such an order. And if this application could subvert the purpose of a writ of mandate this court would have no authority to direct the lower court to do something in excess of its jurisdiction.

We think it cannot be held that the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction in dismissing the said appeal, and the order to show cause is discharged and the writ denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

William Hogan and others were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

A. A. Friedlander, Jno. Koch, and Frank J. Murphy, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, P. J. The defendants were jointly accused by the information of the crime of robbery. Defendant Hogan was also charged with two prior convictions of petty larceny, each under an alias; defendant Conwell with a prior conviction of petty larceny, and also with a prior conviction of burglary, each under an alias; defendant McLaughlin with a prior conviction of robbery; and defendant Purcell with a prior conviction of grand larceny, and also with a prior conviction of burglary under an alias. They each pleaded guilty to the prior convictions as charged, but not guilty to the charge of robbery as set forth in the information. They were each found guilty, and this appeal is from the judgment and the orders denying each of their motions for a new trial.

The sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is not attacked. No error is claimed as to the instructions in any respect. The only question raised is as to the ruling of the court on certain questions asked for the purpose of impeaching the prosecuting witness Felpes as to certain statements which it is claimed he made at other times contrary to his statement as a witness while on the stand. Felpes testified on behalf of the prosecution fully as to the circumstances and facts connected with the robbery. In cross-examination no question was asked him as to any statement made by him at any other time or place inconsistent with the testimony he had given. When the attorney for defendant offered evidence as to statements claimed to be inconsistent with the testimony of Felpes, the objection of the district attorney was sustained upon the ground that no proper foundation had been laid by calling the witness' attention to the circumstances of time, place, and persons present, as required by the Code. The defendants' attorney then called Felpes, not for the purpose of further cross-examination, but as his own witness; and, upon direct examination, as defendants' own witness, Felpes testified that after he returned to the house where he lived after he had been assaulted and robbed, he did not make "any loud statement in the hallway," and did not say, "I have been robbed in Oakland," nor "tried to wake up Mr. Andros"; nor "in a loud tone of voice ask for a doctor," nor "ask for a policeman." No questions were asked as to the persons present, nor as to any person present, nor was the time fixed in any other way than the question concerning when the witness returned to the house after the assault. One Skurs was then called by the defendants' counsel, and asked: "Did you hear Felpes make the statement on that morning, 'I have been robbed in Oakland'?" The court sustained the objection of the district attorney to this question on the ground that the defendant could not be allowed to impeach his own witness, and that no proper foundation had been laid, and that the question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. While the court might well have permitted the question in the spirit of liberality which should characterize the trial of one accused of crime, still in our opinion the ruling of the court was not erroneous. When we examine the record closely, we find that there is nothing to show that the statement sought to be proven was the same statement to which the attention of Felpes had been called. The only time referred to was "on that morning," and no place was fixed. It was incumbent on defendants, if they claim error as to the ruling, to show that the statement was the same one to which the attention of Felpes had been called. The matter is certainly not of such serious importance that we can be called upon to presume that the question related to the time to which Felpes referred when he spoke about making no statement in the house after having been assaulted.

No other ruling is assigned as error as to any question tending to impeach Felpes. The attorney for defendants stated that he desired to show, after the complaining witness arrived home on the night of the robbery, he "made several statements." Upon being asked by the court what he wished to show, the defendants' attorney said: "We desire to show by these witnesses that when this complaining witness arrived at his home at 11 o'clock that night, and not at 1 o'clock, as testified to by him, but at 11 o'clock, he rapped on the door of this man Andros, and he cried out, 'I have been robbed in Oakland,' and Andros replied, 'Where, on Pacific street?' and he said: 'No, in Oakland'—and that Andros said to him, 'Go away from my door, and don't bother me,' and then he tried another door, and he said to another man at the other door, 'My friend took me to Oakland and left me, and I got robbed in Oakland,' and this was not heard by one, but by various different witnesses. One witness Barrett we have made efforts to find, but could not find him." The court informed counsel for defendants that he would be compelled, under the rules of evidence, to sustain the objection of the district attorney to the offered evidence, for the reason, as stated by the court, that the witness was defendants' own witness, and that he would not be allowed to impeach his own witness.

Without basing our ruling upon the reason given by the court, we may support the ruling for other reasons. The offer included many matters to which the attention of Felpes had not been called. We look in vain for anything in the record showing that Felpes had had his attention called to rapping on the door of Andros' room, or to the reply of Andros, or to any statement of Andros, or to even the name of Andros; nor is there anything to show that the attention of Felpes was called to trying "another door," or to saying anything about "another man at the other door." It is not necessary to base our conclusion upon the ground that Felpes was called by defendants as their own witness. He could not in any event be impeached by showing that he had made at other times statements inconsistent with the testimony he had just given, unless the statements were first related to him, and the circumstances of time, place, and persons present stated. Not only is this true, but where an offer is made to prove several things grouped together, and the court refuses to hear the proof, the ruling must be sustained if the proof of any one of the things was inadmissible. An offer to prove, instead of calling the witness, is at best a very loose and unsatisfactory method of introducing evidence, and certainly, when the offer consists of several propositions, we must sustain the ruling if correct as to any one of the propositions. Bostwick v. Mahoney, 73 Cal. 238, 14 Pac. 832.

It is fundamental that a party relying upon the exclusion of evidence as constituting error, upon which he asks to have the case reversed, must clearly show and point out the offered evidence, and that it was competent and material.

The judgment and orders are affirmed.

Where the by-laws of a corporation provided that directors shall serve for one year from the "date of their election" and that a stockholder having less than 10 shares shall hold the office of director, a stockholder holding only 8 shares at time of his election as director could not oust the director declared elected in his stead, though he acquired 3 shares the day after the election, and this is the more so where, by Civ. Code, § 308, it is provided that immediately after their election the directors must organize by the election of president, etc., and there is nothing to show that they did not so organize on the day of the election, since there was no intervening time between his election and the beginning of his term within which he could qualify.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by G. W. Waterbury against the Temescal Water Company and others. From a judgment for defendant on a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. R. Freeman, for appellant. Purington & Adair, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. This is a proceeding under section 315 of the Civil Code to test the validity of an election of directors by the defendant corporation. Judgment was for the defendant upon a demurrer to the complaint. The appeal is from the judgment, and the record before us appears to consist of the original papers filed in the proceeding in the superior court, made up into, and certified to be, the judgment roll in the action, together with the original notice of appeal, which bears no acknowledgment of service. We, therefore, presume that the appeal is intended to be one taken from the judgment by the alternative method, and shall consider the questions presented upon this assumption, no objection being made by the respondents.

At the regular annual meeting of the stockholders of the defendant corporation, held on December 1, 1908, for the purpose of electing seven directors in accordance with the by-laws thereof, plaintiff received the highest number of votes cast for any person, and was therefore one of the seven receiving the highest number of votes. The board of election, however, after announcing the vote as stated, further reported that plaintiff was not qualified under the by-laws to act as a director, and declared seven other persons to be duly elected such directors. The disqualification of plaintiff was based upon the following provision of the by-laws: "Qualification:—No stockholder shall hold the office of director of this corporation unless he is a bona fide holder of at least ten shares of the capital stock of this corporation"—and the further showing that plaintiff was the owner of but 8 shares of stock of the company at the time of the election. On December 2, 1908, plaintiff became the owner of 3½ other and additional shares of the capital stock of the Temescal Water Company, and had them transferred to him upon the books of the corporation. It is then alleged that on December 2, 1908, there not being a quorum of the board of directors present, those present adjourned to December 7, 1908; that plaintiff presented himself, as a director ready and willing to act, to the directors in attendance at the meeting on December 2, 1908, and again on December 7, 1908, on which latter date the persons acting as a board of directors refused to recognize him as such. The minutes of the meeting on the last-mentioned date contain a recital that the meeting was held pursuant to adjournment of December 2, 1908, for the purpose of organizing. The minutes, however, do not show any election of officers to have taken place.

Appellant contends that by the acquisition of the additional shares of stock on December 2, 1908, he qualified prior to the meeting of the directors to organize, and therefore that he was the holder of the requisite number of shares of capital stock at the time of the organization of the board, and entitled to be declared elected, although admittedly he was not such holder at the time of the election. This contention cannot be sustained, as the by-laws provide that the directors "shall serve for one year from the date of their election and until their successors are elected," etc. There was then no intervening time between the election and the beginning of the term within which plaintiff could have qualified, and in this regard the case differs from those in which a distinction is drawn between eligibility for election and the qualification to hold the office. The plaintiff was not qualified to fill the office at the time the term began, and it cannot well be contended that by qualifying later he could oust the member who was qualified at the time of the election. Again, as section 308 of the Civil Code provides: "Immediately after their election, the directors must organize by the election of a president," etc., and as there is nothing in the complaint and petition to negative their having complied with the law in this respect, unless it be the recital from the minutes of December 7, 1908, above referred to, we may assume, until it be shown otherwise, that the organization of the board took place at the time provided by law, which was prior to the time the plaintiff claims to have become a bona fide holder of 10 shares of stock.

Appellant also contends that the Temescal Water Company, as disclosed by the purposes of its organization set out in the complaint and petition, is not a corporation for profit, and therefore the provision of the by-laws requiring a director to be the holder of a certain number of shares of capital stock is in conflict with the statute. Civ. Code, § 305. Accepting the first proposition that the corporation is not one for profit, because the water rights and other property it is authorized to acquire are to be devoted exclusively to furnishing water to its own stockholders, and to them within a limited area, and the expenses of operating and distributing the water is to be met by assessment on the stock (McFadden v. Los Angeles, 74 Cal. 571, 16 Pac. 397; McDermont v. Anaheim, 124 Cal. 114, 56 Pac. 779; Hildreth v. Montecito, 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395), we do not think it necessarily follows that the corporation may not by its by-laws provide a qualification for its directors.

Section 305, Civ. Code, provides some of the qualifications necessary to holding the office of director in a corporation organized in this state, as follows: "A majority of the directors must be, in all cases, residents of this state. Directors of corporations for profit must be holders of stock therein to an amount to be fixed by the by-laws of the corporation. Directors of all other corporations must be members thereof." The initial clause of this section provides that the corporate powers must be exercised "by a board of not less than three directors to be elected from among the holders of stock; or where there is no capital stock, then from the members of such corporations," etc. The term "members" is apparently used in the section to designate the members of corporations having no capital stock; and, if there were no other provision in the Code relating to this matter, it might be argued that corporations having capital stock, but which are not organized or operated for profit, are not provided for. The general provisions relating to the matters which may be provided for in the by-laws of a corporation are contained in section 303, Civ. Code, and among the matters authorized to be provided are "(4) The qualifications and duties of directors," etc., and by section 301 every corporation, regardless of its character, must adopt by-laws. It is apparent then that the by-laws of the corporation must control in the determination of plaintiff's rights. Not having the qualifications provided by the by-laws to act as a director at the time his term of office began, he is not entitled to the relief sought in this proceeding.

If, as is hereinabove suggested, the record before us consists of the original judgment roll and notice of appeal in this proceeding, the clerk of the superior court of Riverside county is the legal custodian of such papers, and they should have remained on file in his office. On account of the fact that the language of the statute providing for the sending up of the record on an alternative appeal has been somewhat misconstrued in this respect, and no rule placing a construction upon the statute has been adopted by the Supreme Court, we have acted upon the record as it was presented, but think it our duty to call the attention of the trial court to the language used in the sections of the Code relating to the alternative method of appeal. Section 953a, Code Civ. Proc., provides that any person desiring to appeal "may in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions," pursuant to section 650, do certain things in preparing a transcript to be used on the appeal. After the judge has certified the transcript which has been made, it is provided that the same shall "be and become a portion of the judgment roll and may be considered on appeal in lieu of the bill of exceptions now provided for by law." The transcript so allowed and certified becomes a part of the judgment roll only in the same sense that a bill of exceptions was made a part thereof by section 670, Code Civ. Proc.; that is, to serve as part of the record on appeal under section 950. (Since the amendment of section 670 in 1907 bills of exception are no longer made a part of the judgment roll.)

There is no express authority for the appellant being relieved from printing his transcript on appeal in any case except one in which the transcript has been settled and allowed by the trial court in accordance with section 953a. This is true whether it consists of a judgment roll only, or a record made up under the alternative method in lieu of a bill of exceptions; and, while the statute is open to the construction that the original of such a transcript—that is, the record prepared in accordance with sections 953a and 953b—may be sent up to the appellate court, it was clearly not intended to authorize the clerk of the trial court to send up his original files in the action, consisting of the pleadings, findings, judgment, and other papers made a part of the judgment roll by section 670. To do this would not only deprive the office of the papers and records which the law makes it the duty of the clerk of the superior court to preserve, but would render him unable to enter up the remittitur of this court sent down upon this proceeding. Section 958, Code Civ. Proc. If the papers on file in this court be the original records of the superior court, the clerk of that court is granted leave to withdraw the same, and within 20 days from the date of filing of this decision is directed to file with the clerk of this court a duly certified copy of such records in lieu of the originals so withdrawn.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by Joseph Bucher against W. D. F. Allen. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Haskell, for appellant. Byron Waters, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal by plaintiff upon bill of exceptions from judgment rendered against him and in favor of defendant.

The case is this: On December 24, 1906, one Hicks and wife owned certain real property in the city of San Bernardino, Cal., upon which was a house used as a lodging house. Hicks and wife sold the real property and the furniture and fixtures of the lodging house to plaintiff, who paid the full consideration therefor. The lodging house had been operated before the sale by the wife of Hicks, who was indebted to parties in San Bernardino. These creditors instituted a suit against Mrs. Hicks, and, on December 27, 1906, levied an attachment upon the lodging house, furniture, and fixtures. This writ was executed by defendant, a constable, and the personal property on that date reduced to possession by him. In order to recover possession from defendant this action in claim and delivery was brought by plaintiff. The right of possession to the personal property hinges upon the validity of its sale as affecting creditors of Mrs. Hicks. The court finds that such sale was not accompanied by immediate delivery, and followed by actual and continuous possession, as required by section 3440, Civ. Code. This finding appellant attacks as having no support in the evidence.

An examination of the record discloses that plaintiff testified that he took possession of the personal property through one Von Boven as his agent on the 24th of December, while Mrs. Hicks testified: "I offered the keys on the 24th to Mr. Bucher, and he asked me to look after the house for him in his interest until I went out on the 29th; and on the 26th I was called to Los Angeles on business, and I handed the keys to Charles Von Boven in the presence of Mr. Waldon, and told him to take care of these rooms and take care of the house for Mr. Bucher. * * * I delivered the keys to Mr. Von Boven for the reason that Mr. Bucher told me that Von Boven was in his employ, and that I should deliver the keys to him if I went away from the house." Von Boven testified that when he was handed the keys by Mrs. Hicks she said to him, "I may be back to-morrow." The evidence as to the change of possession was conflicting. It was a question of fact for the trial court to determine. We cannot say that there is no evidence in support of the finding of the court. Our Supreme Court in Goldstein v. Nunan, 66 Cal. 544, 6 Pac. 451, has said that the employment by the vendee of one of the vendors after the sale tended to prove that there had been no actual change of possession. There was, then, evidence introduced which tended to show that the vendor continued in possession, and the requirements of the section of the Code above referred to were unsatisfied. Without reference to other testimony, which was to the effect that Von Boven disclaimed any agency on behalf of plaintiff, and insisted that he was acting, while in charge of the property, for Mrs. Hicks, we think it cannot be said that the conclusion of the trial court is manifestly without sufficient support in the evidence. The judgment being thus supported by sufficient findings, we are relieved from the necessity of considering other questions presented in the record which relate to the construction which should be given to that portion of section 3440 requiring public recodation of intended sales in certain instances.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

1. SALES (§ 181*)—COMPLIANCE WITH CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action for refusal of defendant to comply with his contract of purchase of plaintiff's crop of pears to be cured by plaintiff held sufficient to sustain findings that plaintiff tendered the entire crop purchased, and that the pears were properly cured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

2. SALES (§ 332*)—REFUSAL OF PURCHASER TO ACCEPT—RESALE.

A seller complies with his duty, under Civ. Code, § 3353, as to estimating damages, where, 13 days after the buyer refuses to accept, he sells the articles to another at the place of delivery at the highest price attainable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 915; Dec. Dig. § 332.*]

3. SALES (§ 384*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT BY BUYER—DAMAGES—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Defendant, under his contract of purchase, being required to accept only 16½ tons of dried fruit, though having an option on more, and all allegations in the complaint as to shrinkage between the time defendant refused to accept and the time plaintiff resold, being confined to the 16½ tons, this alone prevented recovery for shrinkage on any amount in excess of the 16½ tons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

4. WITNESSES (§ 269*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

A witness having merely testified that he purchased fruit of plaintiff at a certain price, and that this was the highest price attainable at the time and place, and not having been asked on direct examination as to any subsequent transaction concerning it, refusal to allow him to be asked on cross-examination as to when, where, and for how much he resold the fruit was not error, no statement as to what was expected to be shown by the question having been made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Any error in exclusion of evidence to show that the price obtained was the market price, or to discredit the witness who testified it was the market price, was harmless; it being admitted such price was obtained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Charles M. Head, Judge.

Action by S. H. Frisbie against Rosenberg Bros. & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

A. H. Hewitt and W. D. Tillotson, for appellant. T. W. H. Shanahan, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action is for damages for defendant's refusal to comply with its agreement to pay for certain dried fruit sold to it by plaintiff. On September 4, 1906, the parties entered into a written contract providing that "Rosenberg Bros. & Co. have this day bought of S. H. Frisbie and said seller has this day sold to said buyer the entire crop of pears estimated at fifteen tons now growing and grown on the orchard situate—Anderson—of which orchard ——— is the owner and of which said crop seller declares that he is owner and represents that he is duly authorized to sell the whole thereof. Prices and seller's estimate of quantity as follows, to wit: About 15 tons pears a 8c per lb. * * * It is expressly understood and agreed that buyer is not obliged to accept fruit in excess of amount approximated above by more than ten per cent., but may do so at his own option. Seller hereby agrees to cure said entire crop properly and to have said entire crop ready for delivery and to deliver the same at Anderson. * * * Seller hereby guarantees that all of the fruit hereinabove specified shall be choice, well cured, original condition, and free from damage. * * * Buyer hereby agrees to pay for said fruit upon completion of delivery."

Plaintiff claims to have performed all of the conditions required of him by said contract, and on October 10th to have notified defendant that he was ready and desired forthwith to deliver 33,000 pounds of cured pears under said contract. Defendant refused to accept any part of them, and plaintiff held them subject to defendant's order till October 25th. It is alleged "that at said time the said dried pears were losing weight through shrinkage, and additional costs of insurance and keeping the same were necessarily being incurred." It is further alleged that plaintiff sold them on October 25th for 6 cents per pound, the highest market price obtainable, and that he was damaged by defendant's refusal to carry out its contract in the sum of $925. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $921.

In support of its appeal from the judgment and order denying its motion for a new trial, appellant mainly relies upon two grounds: "First, plaintiff did not cure and deliver or offer to deliver his entire crop of pears; and, second, the pears that he did offer to deliver were not properly cured." We are not required, probably, to do more than to say that the findings of the court as to these material matters are amply supported by the evidence, but as appellant appears to be serious in these contentions, and that our declaration may be shown not to be arbitrary, some of the testimony upon each of these points is presented.

1. The plaintiff testified: "Mr. Luyster went with me that day and examined all of those pears before we signed the contract. * * * On the trees in the orchard and the orchard which I had leased there was a little over a hundred tons I am sure, all of which I was the sole owner of. The 110 tons of pears on the trees, in the boxes and windrows and on the ground were the pears I had in mind and intended to convey under the contract. They were all the pears I owned on that day. I didn't sell a pear of this lot green. I dried every one of them. The amount I secured from that lot—eighteen and one-half tons were what they turned out to be. When the pears were dried I took them to the Earl Fruit Company's packing shed. That is the lot of pears I notified Rosenberg Bros. & Company that I was ready to deliver and make a tender of; and is the same lot I afterwards sold to the Sanitary Fruit Company." He is corroborated by Mr. Luyster, who testified that when he entered into the contract he had in mind the entire crop of pears of Mr. Frisbie. The evidence, indeed, shows without any conflict that the entire crop purchased was tendered by plaintiff.

2. While there is evidence to the contrary on the part of appellant, yet six witnesses testified for respondent that the pears were up to the standard fixed by the contract.

The character of their testimony may be illustrated by the following statement of Earl Downing, an experienced fruit man: "The seventeen tons of cured fruit, the S. H. Frisbie fruit, in the Earl warehouse, which were inspected between the 12th and 15th days of October, 1906, I would call properly cured, well cured, choice, in original condition, free from damage, dried pears or cured pears." There are a few additional considerations inviting brief attention.

As to the contention of appellant that there is no allegation of shrinkage, the portion of the complaint heretofore set out is a sufficient answer, if indeed such an allegation were necessary. Appellant must have forgotten that in its amended answer this language is used: "And it denies that said dried pears were losing weight through shrinkage, or that they did lose weight by shrinkage." As appellant, on October 12th, refused to accept the pears, it was the duty of respondent to dispose of them in accordance with section 3353 of the Civil Code, providing that, "In estimating damages, the value of property to a seller thereof is deemed to be the price which he could have obtained therefor in the market nearest to the place at which it should have been accepted by the buyer, and at such time after the breach of the contract as would have sufficed, with reasonable diligence, for the seller to effect a resale." They were sold at Anderson, the place where they were to be delivered, 13 days after appellant rejected them, and there is testimony of witnesses that they were sold for the highest price obtainable therefor. Respondent seems thus to have done all that the statute requires as to the disposition of the property.

Appellant complains because the court charged defendant with shrinkage on 36,264 pounds, whereas, under the contract, there was no obligation to accept more than 33,000 pounds. Respondent's answer to this contention is that he "resold the fruit all of which appellant had an option on for the best obtainable price at the nearest market. Appellant would not exercise its option by taking the entire crop nor would it examine or take the part or any portion of the part it was obligated to take, 33,000 pounds, when the same was ready for delivery. If appellant had accepted the 33,000 pounds on October 12, 1906, and no more, there would have been no shrinkage for which appellant would have been liable, and respondent would have been free of the option on the 'entire crop' and free to dispose of the balance. As it was, respondent was held by appellant for the 'entire crop,' none of which it would accept." Respondent's argument seems plausible, but there is no allegation in the complaint as to this element of damage—the allegation of shrinkage being confined to the 33,000 pounds. Hence the finding as to the excess of 3,264 pounds is outside of the issues. Besides, the evidence would hardly justify the conclusion that more than 16½ tons of the fruit was of good quality. No allowance could properly be made for the shrinkage of this excess, which the evidence does not satisfactorily show was of any value. The result is that the judgment should be reduced by the small amount of $23.50. This appears from the finding itself. It is only a matter of simple calculation, and the error does not require a new trial.

The only other point suggested by appellant is that the court erred in sustaining an objection to questions asked on cross-examination of Mr. Stice as to when and where he sold the fruit and what price he received. He purchased the fruit from plaintiff, and had testified that 6 cents per pound was the highest price obtainable at Anderson at that time. If he obtained a higher price at a different place and at a different time it would have no tendency to discredit his testimony as to the price at Anderson. It does appear that he shipped the fruit, but to what point is not disclosed. Since the witness had not been asked in the direct examination as to any subsequent transaction concerning the fruit, appellant, in the absence of any statement as to what was expected to be shown by the questions, cannot complain of the ruling of the court. Indeed, if error was thereby committed by the court, it was absolutely without prejudice, in view of the admission of appellant in its brief that "defendant does not contend that the price for which the pears were so sold was not the full market value of the same." If Stice paid the full market value of the pears it is, of course, entirely immaterial where he sold them or what price he received.

Twenty-three dollars and fifty cents should be subtracted from the amount of the judgment, leaving a balance of $897.62, and, as thus modified, the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Reuben Hoover against Joseph Wasson and another. From a judgment for defendant John L. Wasson, who appeared and answered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wall, for appellant. J. W. P. Laird and Rowan Irwin, for respondent.

HART, J. This is a suit to quiet title to certain timber land situate in Mariposa county to which plaintiff claims title under and by virtue of a sheriff's deed; said land having been sold by that officer to plaintiff at a pretended sale under an execution issued upon a judgment for the sum of $1,676.88, rendered and entered by the superior court of Tulare county in favor of said plaintiff and against the defendant, Joseph Wasson. The defendant John L. Wasson answered the complaint herein, specifically denying the material averments thereof, and particularly that Joseph L. Wasson was, at the time of the levy of said execution and the sale thereunder, the owner of the land as to which title is sought to be quieted, and alleging title to and ownership of said land in himself. Joseph Wasson made no reply to the complaint and, as to him judgment by default was entered. The court below awarded judgment to John L. Wasson that he is the owner of the land described in the complaint, and that the plaintiff "has no right, title, or interest in or to said land," etc. The appeal here is by the plaintiff from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The appellant contends that the evidence does not support certain findings of fact, and upon this contention insists that the judgment and order should be reversed. It appears from the evidence that on the 15th day of January, 1902, a written agreement was executed by the plaintiff and the defendant Joseph Wasson, whereby the first-named agreed to sell, and said Wasson agreed to purchase, for the sum of $8,000 a certain tract of land situated in the county of Tulare. The agreement stipulated that Wasson was to pay the principal sum in installments as follows: Fifteen hundred dollars on the day on which the agreement was executed; $500 on or before the 1st day of January, 1905, and $1,000 on each succeeding 1st day of January until the principal, together with interest on the deferred payments, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, was fully paid. The title to the land was to remain in plaintiff until the principal and all interest accruing thereon was paid. The land described in the agreement was devoted by Wasson to orange growing, to which, it is admitted, it is peculiarly adapted. Joseph Wasson was, at the time of the making of said contract, the owner of the land involved in this litigation. On the 30th day of April, 1904, Joseph Wasson conveyed, by deed, said land to his brother, the respondent herein, and said deed was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Mariposa county on the 2d day of May, 1904. The plaintiff, in the year 1905, instituted an action against the defendant Joseph Wasson for the purpose of recovering the sum of $500, the first installment of principal due on the contract between himself and said Joseph for the sale and purchase of the orange land, together with unpaid interest. In this action plaintiff obtained a judgment, on the 12th day of June, 1905, for the sum of $1,676.88. As before stated, execution was issued on said judgment, and the same sought to be levied on the land in dispute here, which, as seen, had been conveyed in the year 1904 by Joseph Wasson to his brother, the respondent. The land was, as seen, sold under said execution and purchased at said sale by the plaintiff himself.

The good faith of the transaction between the Wassons by which the respondent became the owner of the land in controversy is challenged by the complaint. It is therein alleged that the conveyance of the land by Joseph to his brother, the respondent, resulted from a transaction conceived in fraud and was executed by said Joseph "with a view to conceal his said property from plaintiff and to hinder, delay, and defraud plaintiff in his collection of his said demand now included in the judgment heretofore described"; but we observe no reason for doubting that the evidence sufficiently supports the finding of the trial court against that claim. In the first place, it may be noted, the conveyance of the land concerned here was executed in the year 1904, approximately a year before there was anything due the plaintiff from Joseph Wasson under the terms of their contract. It appears that, at the time of the execution of said deed by Joseph, the note which was the consideration moving Joseph to so convey said property was "outlawed," or, in other words, action thereon was barred by the statute of limitations. It further appears that in the year 1904 Joseph Wasson sold the orange crop gathered from the land which constituted the subject of the contract between himself and plaintiff for the sum of $1,000. In the month of December of that year plaintiff went to the "orange ranch" and made a demand on Joseph for the money then due under their contract. After some discussion of the matter, in the course of which Wasson declared that he desired to make some improvements on the land, the plaintiff was accompanied by Wasson to the Porterville Bank, where plaintiff was paid by Wasson on account of their contract the sum of $150. The bulk of the money remaining of the $1,000 received for the orange crop was used by Joseph, with the consent of plaintiff, in constructing flumes on and otherwise improving the land for orange growing purposes. The plaintiff testified: "A short time after the improvements were completed, I then sued him (Joseph) for the moneys that became due on the 1st day of January, 1905. I afterwards received possession of all the orange land with the improvements thereon and have since sold the same." Plaintiff admitted that the first time he ever talked with the respondent John L. Wasson about the land in controversy was during the harvest time of the year 1905—more than a year after the deed had been made by Joseph Wasson to John L. Wasson, conveying to the last named said land.

The respondent explained the transaction by which his brother conveyed to him the land in controversy as follows: "When he let go of the ranch down there, which I sold him, the man who bought the place assumed the mortgage on the ranch and gave this timber land in payment. After I came back from Los Angeles a few years later, Joe told me that when he sold the timber land he would pay me the balance due. We talked over either buying the ranch and his selling to get my money out of it, at different times. In the fall of 1903 I was talking about buying the timber land from him, and so Joe and I and my boy drove from where we lived in Delano up into Mariposa county, distance of 200 miles or so, to look at the timber land. After we looked the timber land over, I at that time told him I would take the timber land for what he owed me, and he said that he would deed it to me when he got back. It was agreed between us then that he was to go before some attorney or notary when he got back and make out a deed to me. That was in the fall of 1903, and ran along then until April 30, 1904, when Joe had this deed made out and had the same sent over and recorded, as he had agreed with me to do. * * * I did not tell him (plaintiff) to go to my brother Joe, and tell Joe that I said for him to sign the deed, and that I would sign it afterwards. * * * Joe did not have anything left after he gave me the deed to the timber land, excepting the orange contract on the land of Mr. Hoover. I was perfectly willing to give the timber land to Hoover on condition that the debt owing him by my brother Joe be reduced and I have an interest in the orange grove. I did not have any contract or understanding with my brother Joe wherein or whereby I was to hold the land in trust. There was no arrangement, secret or otherwise, by which Joe was to have any interest in this timber land, either directly or indirectly, after he deeded the same to me. * * * I bought that timber land for myself, and, when he gave me the deed, I gave him back his note and canceled his indebtedness to me for the deed, and I did not know at that time anything about the business relation between Joe and Mr. Hoover except in a general way. I did know that Joe bought this orange land from Mr. Hoover, and naturally was trying to improve the same; but as to how much he owed Hoover, or when the payment was due, or how much Joe was behind, if any, I did not know." Joseph Wasson corroborated his brother as to the good faith of the transaction resulting in the conveyance of the timber land by him to the respondent.

We think that it must be clearly manifest, from the brief résumé of the evidence which we have here presented, that the assailed findings are sustained by the proofs. These findings are, briefly: That defendant Joseph Wasson was not the owner of the land in dispute subsequently to April 30, 1904; that the deed from Joseph to John L. Wasson, dated April 30, 1904, was for a valuable consideration and not made either on the part of Joseph Wasson or the grantee "to delay or defraud plaintiff in the collection of his demand included in the judgment secured by appellant against Joseph Wasson"; that said conveyance was not voluntary, sham, or fictitious, but was for a valuable consideration; that the respondent "has not held, and does not now hold, said lands in secret trust, but holds said lands by virtue of said conveyance in his own right and as the owner in fact"; that appellant did not become the owner of the lands by his sheriff's deed, and has no interest in or to the same; and that said conveyance "from Joseph to John L. Wasson was and is not fraudulent and void and does not operate as a cloud on the title of appellant."

Counsel for the appellant undertakes to make much of the fact that plaintiff's testimony, wherein he stated that Joseph Wasson said to him, referring to the land concerned here, that he (Joseph) "only made him (respondent) a deed to put it out of my name.

I own it all the same. I thought it would be a good thing to fall back on when I get through with the orange grove"—stands in the record without contradiction. While it is true that the record does not disclose a specific denial on the part of Joseph Wasson that he made the statement to which plaintiff testified, the record nevertheless shows that Joseph testified: "At the time I made the deed to my brother, I had no thought or idea of cheating or defrauding Hoover or anybody else. There was no understanding or agreement between me and my brother by which I was to have any interest in this timber land after I sold it to my brother. There was no understanding at that time, or is there now any understanding between us, secret or otherwise, whereby I am to receive one cent out of this timber land, nor any one else to receive any benefit out of the same for me or on my behalf." Thus it will be seen that, whether Joseph made the statement attributed to him by plaintiff or not, he testified to facts from which alone the trial court would have been justified in finding that the transaction involving the conveyance of the land to respondent was honest and executed in the best of faith and with no design to fraudulently interfere with any of plaintiff's rights; but, as before stated, the testimony of John L. Wasson bearing upon the question of the good faith and honesty of the transaction coincides in all important particulars with the testimony of Joseph, and there is therefore ample support of the challenged findings.

Considerable stress is laid upon the fact by appellant that the right to maintain an action on the promissory note which was surrendered and the indebtedness evidenced thereby canceled by respondent as the consideration for the conveyance of the timber land was barred by the statute at the time of such transfer; but that fact, as were all the other facts and circumstances in the case, was for the court, as the trier of the questions of fact, to consider and weigh in the determination of the ultimate fact. Whether such a circumstance is important as tending to show fraud or lack of good faith in a transaction must depend largely on other circumstances characterizing such transaction. It is not the contention, nor could it be, that the fact that the note was "outlawed" when the transfer of the timber land was made by Joseph to his brother constituted, in itself, evidence of fraud. At best it could only be a circumstance which might or might not tend to prove fraud, according to its effect as influenced by other proven facts and circumstances. The fact that a debt may be barred by the statute of limitations can affect the remedy only; but in no degree can it release the debtor of the moral duty of paying it, and it will therefore support a contract as consideration. "Although the note was barred by the statute of limitations, it constituted a good and valuable consideration." Chabot v. Tucker, 39 Cal. 434; Mull v. Van Trees, 50 Cal. 547; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 99 Cal. 188, 33 Pac. 862; Womack v. Womack, 8 Tex. 397, 58 Am. Dec. 123. In Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 480, 58 Pac. 913, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, it is said: "It is well settled in this state that the extinguishment or security of a pre-existing debt constitutes a valuable consideration for the sale or assignment of property"—citing Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335. But counsel for appellant himself concedes it to be the rule "that the extinguishment of an honest indebtedness is a good consideration for a transfer, even though the debt (the action) is barred by the statute of limitations," and it is therefore unnecessary to follow this discussion further.

It is pointed out by the appellant that there is no specific finding of a delivery of the deed from Joseph to the respondent. Both Joseph and John L. Wasson testified that the deed was delivered to the latter about two weeks after the execution of the instrument, and there was no contradiction of or attempt to contradict the testimony thus given upon this point. In Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 46, 11 Pac. 491, it is said: "It has been repeatedly held that, even when the court has omitted to find upon a material issue, a new trial may be denied if on the evidence the finding must have been adverse to the party asking the new trial." The evidence here would justify no other finding upon the question of delivery than one adverse to plaintiff.

As there is no other point presented here but the question whether the evidence sustains the findings of the court, we can perceive no reason for giving extended attention to the discussion in respondent's brief of the alleged bad faith of appellant with regard to the contract between himself and Joseph Wasson. We may, however, express the conviction, founded upon the evidence as disclosed before us, that the plaintiff, having been paid by Joseph Wasson the sum of over $1,600 under their contract, and having recovered back the land which he had agreed to sell Joseph for $8,000, after Joseph had expended three years' time, much labor, and considerable money in its improvement, thus putting it in a condition in which it became a profitable producer of oranges, has no ground, in equity, on which to base the complaint that injustice to him will follow the judgment against him in this action.

The judgment and the order appealed from are, for the reasons herein set forth, affirmed.

1. MORTGAGES (§ 581*) — FORECLOSURE — ATTORNEY'S FEE CHARGE AGAINST PROPERTY.
Where, on foreclosure of a mortgage, it appears that neither the mortgage nor the notes secured thereby provided for payment of an attorney's fee, and it is not alleged that such a fee, was ever agreed to, it is error to allow it and make it a charge against the property.

On foreclosure there was no error in refusing to allow any deduction from the debt on account of taxes levied against the property, as by Const. art. 13, § 4, it is only the tax "levied upon the security" that the owner may pay and have deducted from the amount of the security.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the John Brickell Company against Edgar Emanuel Sutro and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant Henrietta L. B. Sutro appeals. The order is affirmed, and the judgment is modified and affirmed.

J. C. McKinstry, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mortgage executed by Edgar Emanuel Sutro. The defendant Henrietta L. B. Sutro is the wife of said Edgar, and is interested in the property involved by reason of being a grantee of an undivided portion thereof under a conveyance executed by said Edgar subsequent to the execution of the mortgage. Edgar Emanuel Sutro defaulted, and judgment was taken against him by default. Henrietta L. B. Sutro appeared and answered, and after trial a judgment of foreclosure was entered. She moved for a new trial, and the motion was denied. She took separate appeals from the judgment and order; but both are presented to this court in one transcript.

Respondent insists that the appeal from the judgment should be dismissed because the notice of appeal was never served on Edgar Emanuel Sutro, appellant's codefendant. It is sufficient to say upon this point that under sections 941a and 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1907, such service is not required. The appeals were taken in 1908, and fully complied with said sections, the latter of which provides that the notice of appeal must be filed with the clerk of the trial court and "need not be served upon any of the parties to the action or the proceeding, or their representatives or attorneys." This court therefore has jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

The court allowed to plaintiff as and for its attorney fee in the foreclosure suit the sum of $2,500, and made the same a charge and lien against the property mortgaged. There is nothing in the complaint to support this part of the judgment. The instrument set up as a mortgage is in form an absolute conveyance, described in the complaint as an indenture of assignment. It is alleged in the complaint that this assignment, "though absolute in form on its face, was intended and agreed by and between them to be held as security for the payment of said promissory note, and any and all other sums of money to be thereafter loaned to defendant Edgar Emanuel Sutro by said John S. Brickell and evidenced by the promissory notes of said defendant Edgar Emanuel Sutro." The various notes sued on are set forth in the complaint, and none of them provide for the payment of any attorney's fee. The indenture of assignment is also made part of the complaint, and makes no provision for the payment of any attorney's fee on foreclosure, and it is nowhere alleged in the complaint that it was ever in any manner agreed that the mortgagor should upon foreclosure be liable for an attorney's fee, or that the property should be charged with a lien therefor. The only reference to an attorney's fee upon foreclosure in the complaint is a statement in the complaint as originally filed "that the sum of $2,500 is a reasonable sum to be allowed as attorney fee in this action for the services of plaintiff's attorney." This allegation upon motion was by the court stricken out. The court erred both in allowing an attorney's fee and in making the same a charge against the mortgaged property. Irvine v. Perry, 119 Cal. 357, 51 Pac. 544, 949, and cases there cited.

The only other error relied upon by appellant concerns the action of the court in refusing to allow any credit upon the amount found due, because of taxes assessed against the property mortgaged and paid by the estate of Adolph Sutro. These taxes were not assessed against the mortgage or the mortgagee's interest. The whole tax was levied against the property mortgaged without any deductions on account of the mortgage. The mortgage was not assessed at all. In such a case it has been decided that the owner is not entitled to deduct any such tax from the mortgage debt. "It is only the tax 'levied upon the security' that the owner may pay and have the amount deducted from the amount of the security (Const. art. 13, § 4); and, as there was no assessment of the security, the defendant was not authorized to have this payment deducted." Hibernia S. & L. Society v. Behnke, 121 Cal. 339, 53 Pac. 812. The court therefore did not err in refusing to allow any deduction from the mortgage debt on account of taxes levied against the property but not against the security.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the amount allowed for attorney's fees. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

JOHN BRICKELL CO. v. SUTRO et al.

(S. F. 5,288 [Civ. 685].)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1119*)—RELIEF TO PARTY NOT APPEALING.

A defendant who does not appeal is entitled to no relief or advantage from the appeal of his codefendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4415, 4416; Dec. Dig. § 1119.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the John Brickell Company against E. E. Sutro and others. Judgment for plaintiff was modified and affirmed by the District Court of Appeal (105 Pac. 948), and defendant named petitioned for transfer to the Supreme Court for a rehearing. Petition denied.

J. C. McKinstry, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition for transfer to the Supreme Court for a rehearing is denied.

As Edgar Emanuel Sutro did not appeal, he is not entitled to any relief or advantage from the appeal of his codefendant, Henrietta L. B. Sutro. Hence the order of the District Court of Appeal directing a modification of the judgment by striking out the amount allowed as attorney's fees is to be understood as applying in favor of Henrietta L. B. Sutro alone, and not as affecting in any way the relief given to the plaintiff against Edgar Emanuel Sutro. The effect is that if his interest in the property sells for enough to pay the debt, interest, and costs, without the attorney's fee, her interest will be exonerated; her interest can be sold only for what remains of such debt, interest, and costs, without the attorney's fee, after applying on such debt, interest, and costs, the proceeds of his interest; and plaintiff will be entitled to a deficiency judgment against Edgar Emanuel Sutro for whatever may remain unsatisfied of the whole judgment, including the attorney's fees, after applying the proceeds of the interests of both defendants thereon in the manner stated.

CHRISTENSEN v. CRAM. (S. F. 5,180.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1909.)

1. SALES (§ 353*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A statement that one has sold to another personal property for a stated sum implies that the price has been agreed on and that the buyer has promised to pay it, and a complaint containing such statement avers in substance a promise by the buyer to pay to the seller the sum sued for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1000; Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 433*)—DEFECTS—AIDER BY VERDICT.

The defects in a complaint alleging that plaintiff sold to defendant personal property for a specified sum, and that a part of the price remained unpaid, arising from the fact that it is not direct in alleging a promise by defendant to pay the money sued for, is cured by the verdict.

3. SALES (§ 353*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—COMPLAINT—"SOLD"—"SALE."

A complaint which alleges that plaintiff "sold" to defendant personal property for a specified sum, that defendant paid a part and that the balance was due, owing and unpaid, on account of the sale of the property, is an attempt to follow Code Civ. Proc. § 426, by stating the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary language, and sufficiently alleges, after verdict, that the unpaid price was due by alleging a completed sale, for the word "sold" describes a completely executed transaction, though the word is often used to indicate an executory agreement only, and the word "sale" does not necessarily, and in all connections, mean that title must pass.

4. SALES (§ 1*)—ELEMENTS.

To constitute a valid sale there must be parties competent to contract, mutual consent, a thing, the absolute or general property in which is transferred from the seller to the buyer, and a price in money paid or promised.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by S. Christensen against Benjamin M. Cram. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Weiler and A. B. Harris, for appellant. Jas. P. Sweeney, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The action is to recover $350 on contract. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. The only question presented is the sufficiency of the complaint. The complaint was not verified, the answer was a general denial, there was a trial by the court upon the merits, and a finding that all the allegations of the complaint were true.

The first contention of the appellant is that the complaint does not aver any promise on the part of the defendant to pay the money sued for, nor any facts from which such promise would be implied by law. There is no express formal allegation of a promise, but it is alleged that the plaintiff sold to the defendant a horse and buggy for the sum of $550, that the defendant paid $200 on account thereof, and that there is still due, owing and unpaid on account of said sale of said horse and buggy to said plaintiff by said defendant, the sum of $350. When it is said that one has sold to another certain property for a stated sum of money, the statement implies that the price was agreed upon, and that the buyer promised to pay it. This would be the ordinary meaning of the language. The complaint, therefore, does, in substance, aver a promise by the defendant to pay to plaintiff the money sued for. The averment is defective in that it is not direct, but it is sufficiently certain to the ordinary mind. It is of the class of defects which should be considered as cured by the verdict and as not sufficiently prejudicial to the other party to warrant a reversal on appeal.

The next objection is that there is no allegation that the price was due or presently payable, at or before the time the action was begun. In support of this objection the argument is that, in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary, the price of goods sold is not payable until delivery is made, or until the title passes, and that no delivery is alleged, and it is not shown that the title passed. It is alleged that the plaintiff "sold" the property to defendant at the price named. The word "sold" is often used to indicate an executory agreement for the sale of property. Instances of such use are exhibited in Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199, Eaton v. Richeri, 83 Cal. 185, 23 Pac. 286, Pettinger v. Fast, 87 Cal. 461, 25 Pac. 680, and Shainwald v. Cady, 92 Cal. 83, 28 Pac. 101, cited by the appellant. For example, if by contract an agent is to receive a commission upon a sale of property, or when property is sold, a valid executory agreement of sale will answer the condition. "The word 'sale' does not necessarily, and in all connections, mean that a conveyance must be made, or that the title must pass." Eaton v. Richeri, supra. But on the other hand, when nothing appears in the context or circumstances to control it, the word primarily means a consummated sale; that is, a sale and delivery, or a passing of the title. In 1 Benjamin on Sales, § 1, that author says: "To constitute a valid sale there must be a concurrence of the following elements, viz.: (1) Parties competent to contract; (2) mutual consent; (3) a thing, the absolute or general property in which is transferred from the seller to the buyer; and (4) a price in money paid or promised." See, also, 1 Mechem on Sales, § 1; 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1022. It is conceded that when the title passes, or when delivery is made, the price immediately becomes due. See, on this point, 2 Mechem on Sales, § 1406. There are decisions to the effect that, under the common-law system of pleading, a complaint in the form of a common count for the price of goods must aver that the goods were "sold and delivered," and that if the word "delivered" is omitted there is a fatal defect. Kilpatrick, etc., Co. v. Box, 13 Utah, 494, 45 Pac. 629; McEwen v. Morey, 60 Ill. 34. But in the case at bar there was no attempt to use the form known as the "common count," as established by the common law. The pleading is manifestly an attempt to follow the Code rule (Code Civ. Proc. § 426); that is, to state "the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language." When this is done, the words used should be given their ordinary meaning, unless modified by the context. The context in this complaint certainly does not alter the usual meaning of the word "sold," but rather strengthens the conclusion that it was used to describe a completely executed transaction.

The decisions to the effect that the expression "due and owing," in a complaint to recover money, is a mere conclusion of law, and is not sufficient as an averment of a breach of a promise to pay money, are not decisive of the case. As we have seen, the complaint in effect states a promise to pay money then presently payable. The allegation as to the breach is that "there is still due, owing and unpaid on account of said sale," the sum of $350, and "that no part of the same has been paid." The breach of such a promise is the failure to pay, and this is sufficiently alleged by the clauses quoted. If a witness had testified on behalf of plaintiff, using the exact words of the complaint, such evidence would have been sufficient to support a judgment for the plaintiff upon a common count for goods sold and delivered. There is absolutely nothing in the record to show or indicate that the defendant was in any way misled by the lack of a fuller or more technical statement of the facts, or that he was not by the complaint fully informed with respect to the case to be presented against him. Upon this appeal from the judgment, upon the judgment roll alone, after an issue and trial upon the merits, we think the complaint should be held to be sufficient, although it is not to be commended as a model, and although, if a demurrer thereto had been sustained, we might not have been disposed to reverse such a ruling.

The judgment is affirmed.

7. EVIDENCE (§ 222*)—ADMISSIONS MADE AFTER RECEIPT OF CONVEYANCE.

In an action to cancel a deed from brother to sister, it was alleged that the deed was made to enable the grantee to more easily settle a decedent's estate, in which both were interested, and that the grantor's interest was to be reconveyed after such settlement, and that grantee refused to make such reconveyance. On cross-examination defendant was asked whether, on a specified date, she was questioned as to whether she would have reconveyed the property to plaintiff if "he had asked you, and offered to pay his proportion of the debts and expenses," and if she answered: "I might if he paid his proportion. Of course, if he paid his proportion, I would"—and witness admitted making the statements. Held, that the court properly admitted the evidence on the express theory that the words "of course" might be taken as a recognition by defendant "that there was some other reason that would make it proper for her" to make the conveyance, and that the statement tended to show an admission in plaintiff's favor.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Thomas H. Fagan against Ellen T. Lentz and Charles W. Lentz. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

James M. Hanley, for appellants. Wm. S. Barnes, H. H. McCloskey, and C. S. Farquar, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action is one in equity to obtain a reconveyance of certain real property conveyed by plaintiff to Ellen T. Fagan, now defendant Ellen T. Lentz. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The real property in suit consists of undivided interests in two lots of land in the city and county of San Francisco; one being a lot on Jones street of considerable value, and the other being a lot on Sanchez street. On July 18, 1905, the Jones street lot was owned by plaintiff, Ellen T. Fagan and Mary J. Fagan, sisters of plaintiff, and one R. S. Browne, each owning an undivided one-fourth, and the Sanchez street lot was owned by plaintiff, Ellen T. Fagan, Mary J. Fagan, and Margaret A. Williams, all sisters of plaintiff, each owning an undivided one-fourth. On the last-named day, said Mary J. Fagan died intestate, leaving as sole heirs at law the plaintiff, Ellen T. Fagan, and Margaret A. Williams, by reason of which plaintiff succeeded to an additional undivided one-twelfth in each of said lots, making his undivided interest in each lot one-third. At the request of plaintiff and her surviving sister, Ellen T. Fagan was appointed administratrix of the estate of Mary J. Fagan; letters of administration issuing August 14, 1905. On July 29, 1905, Margaret A. Williams executed to Ellen T. Fagan a deed, purporting on its face to be a deed of gift, conveying all her right, title, and interest in the two lots, and all her right, title, and interest in and to the estate of said Mary J. Fagan and her distributive share thereunder. On August 24, 1905, plaintiff executed a similar deed to Ellen T. Fagan. No valuable consideration was given for either of these deeds. On January 17, 1906, a decree of distribution was duly made in the matter of the estate of Mary J. Fagan, whereby, by reason of said deeds, all of the interest of Mary J. Fagan in said lots was distributed to Ellen T. Fagan. Subsequent to April 18, 1906, and prior to June 12, 1906, Ellen T. Fagan and defendant Charles W. Lentz intermarried. On June 12, 1906, said Ellen executed to her husband a grant, bargain, and sale deed purporting to convey to him all her interest in both lots. This deed expressed a consideration of $10; but the trial court found upon evidence that is entirely satisfactory that the transfer was made and accepted wholly without consideration and not in good faith and for the purpose of preventing plaintiff from recovering any part of said property. R. S. Browne, who was one of the co-owners of the Jones street lot, and who claimed a specific portion thereof by reason of a certain deed made by Ellen T. Fagan after the conveyance to her by plaintiff, was a party defendant in this action; but the rights of his grantee have been secured by an agreement entered into by the parties to this action, and he has not appealed from the judgment or order denying a new trial. This action was commenced July 6, 1906.

The facts upon which plaintiff bases his action, as shown by the allegations of his complaint, are substantially as follows: About the time of the death of his sister Mary, and for a long time thereafter, including the date of the execution of the deed of gift by him to defendant Ellen, plaintiff, a man of 52 years of age, was sick, being confined to the house, and for a great portion of the time to his bed, and was weak both physically and mentally. This condition continued until about April 18, 1906. He at all times relied implicitly upon and had full faith and confidence in his sister Ellen, a woman of the age of about 44 years. So relying, and because of his supposed inability to act efficiently by reason of his sickness, he consented that she should act as administratrix of the estate of Mary, and waived his right to act in that capacity. Ellen had the two deeds of gift to herself, one from plaintiff and one from Margaret, prepared, and brought the deed from plaintiff to him for execution, soliciting him to execute the same for the expressed reason that it would simplify the settlement of the estate of Mary, hasten such settlement, and lessen the expense in such settlement, and promising that when such settlement was had plaintiff would get back his interest in said property, meaning thereby that she would then convey his share in the property to him. It was substantially alleged that it was then the secret design of Ellen to hold this property and not to reconvey to plaintiff; but the trial court found against these allegations, and to the effect that it was then her intention to reconvey to the plaintiff his interest immediately upon the settlement of Mary's estate, but that some time after the execution of the deed she abandoned such intention and refused to reconvey. At this time plaintiff had no property other than his interest in these lots, and he has not acquired any property since then. Plaintiff believed the statements made by Ellen to be true and relied upon the same, and so believing and relying signed and delivered the deed of gift, conveying to her "every dollar's worth of property that he possessed." On June 12, 1906, as has been said, Ellen conveyed the property to her husband, and both she and her husband repudiated plaintiff's claim as to the understanding upon which the property was conveyed to Ellen; their claim being, as set forth in their answer, that the deed of gift was executed and delivered by plaintiff as his free act and deed and while he was in full possession of his mental faculties, and by reason of the further fact that the property was so much involved in debt and so tangled with litigation that plaintiff desired Ellen to take the property and dispose of it for her own use and better maintenance and support.

The findings of the trial court were in accord with the allegations of the complaint, except in the one respect already noted, viz., as to the intention of defendant Ellen at the time of the making of the deed of gift.

The theory of counsel for plaintiff is that, notwithstanding the absence of any fraudulent intention on the part of Ellen at the time of the making and acceptance of such deed, the findings establish that the relation of the parties to each other at that time was confidential in fact, that the confidence which plaintiff had in his sister was the inducement which led him to execute the deed to her, and that the betrayal of that confidence—the violation of the promise to reconvey—was a constructive fraud, giving rise to a constructive trust, and entitling the plaintiff to the relief awarded by the judgment, under the rule declared in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, and Id., 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186, and subsequent decisions following that case. We are not here concerned with any question of the correctness of that theory as applied to the facts shown by the findings, for the reason that there is no appeal from the judgment, but only an appeal from the order denying a motion for a new trial. It is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of the well-settled rule that, upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, "the appellate court is limited in its review of the action of the trial court to the grounds upon which such a motion may be based (Code Civ. Proc. § 657)," and that questions relating to the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment cannot be considered. See Great Western Gold Co. v. Chambers, 153 Cal. 307, 310, 95 Pac. 151. We have stated the facts alleged and found solely with a view to a better understanding of the merits of various contentions of defendants in regard to the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain findings and the correctness of certain rulings in the matter of the admission and exclusion of evidence.

Upon the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain findings, learned counsel for defendants lay much stress on the well-settled rule that, in cases of this character, the presumption of absolute conveyance should prevail, unless the evidence to the contrary is entirely clear and convincing. As to this, the well-settled rule was stated in Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 637, 87 Pac. 93, 98, as follows: "This, however, does not mean that the evidence in the record on appeal must be entirely plain and convincing to an appellate court. This question of fact, like other questions of fact, is one for the trial court, and while, as said in Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 193, 58 Pac. 543, the appellate court will consider the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence in the light of that rule, it will not disturb the finding of the trial court to the effect that the deed is a mortgage, where there is substantial evidence warranting a clear and satisfactory conviction to that effect. All questions as to preponderance and conflict of evidence are for the trial court." See, also: Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 334, 27 Pac. 186; Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 30 Pac. 1020, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175; Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 375, 39 Pac. 797; Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 689, 96 Pac. 357. As was said in the last case cited: "If therefore the evidence offered by plaintiffs, taken by itself, was sufficiently clear, satisfactory, and convincing to satisfy the trial court, * * * the finding made thereon cannot be overthrown merely because numerous witnesses, whose character is not impeached, gave positive evidence to the contrary effect. * * * All questions as to preponderance and conflict of evidence are for the trial court." An examination of the record has satisfied us that there was substantial evidence warranting a clear and satisfactory conviction on the part of the trial court as to all the material matters embraced in such findings as are attacked on this appeal.

The claim that, admitting the truth of the evidence of plaintiff as to the facts surrounding the execution of the deed of gift, such evidence makes out at most an understanding for the reconveyance only of such interest in the lots as plaintiff succeeded to as heir of Mary J. Fagan, and not for the interest owned by him prior to the death of Mary, is without merit. There is nothing in the evidence warranting any inference of different understandings as to the different interests. Whatever promise was made by Ellen related to the whole of the property that she was acquiring by the deed. Defendant Ellen did not in terms say that she would reconvey the property to plaintiff after the estate was settled, but she did say, according to plaintiff's evidence, what was equivalent thereto, and the trial court was fully warranted in finding, as it did, that by the words used by her "she purposely intended to convey to plaintiff, and did convey to him, the idea, and that the same was a promise on her part, that immediately upon the settlement of said estate she would reconvey to him all the interest and title he conveyed to her by said deed of August 24, 1905." The evidence of plaintiff, if satisfactory to the trial court, was entirely sufficient under the circumstances of the case to warrant the findings as to the reasons for the execution by plaintiff of his deed by him to Ellen, and the manner in which and the promise upon which she obtained such execution. There was nothing improbable or absurd in the story told by him as to the reasons expressed by Ellen and accepted by him why such a conveyance was desirable. The interest of Mary J. Fagan was an undivided interest in lots in which plaintiff and his surviving sisters already held undivided interests, a stranger threatening partition proceedings held another undivided interest, and the more valuable lot was somewhat heavily incumbered by mortgage and tax liens. It is not difficult to believe that all of the Fagan heirs may have understood, especially when so advised by an attorney, that the settlement of these matters might be simplified by placing their title in the name of one of them. The evidence of plaintiff is corroborated by other evidence, and under all the circumstances of the case appears to us to be much more satisfactory than the theory advanced by defendants. It is difficult to conceive it to be true, as claimed by them, that this plaintiff, circumstanced as he was, had any intention of giving absolutely to Ellen, who had property of her own and stood in no need of assistance, this valuable property constituting all that he had in the world.

We are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the inference by the trial court that plaintiff was "weak mentally" on the 24th day of August, 1905, the day of the execution of the deed. He had then been confined to the house by sickness for a considerable time, was apparently very nervous and somewhat discouraged, and showed by his conduct considerable indecision. The finding does not import insanity or idiocy, but simply a weakness of mental capacity rendering him the more likely to be influenced by the statements of those around him. Assuming that there was no evidence to show that defendant Charles W. Lentz visited plaintiff prior to the execution of the deed of August 24, 1905, or was present at the time of its execution, we regard the finding in this particular as immaterial. A new trial will not be granted because of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding that is immaterial and that could not have affected the judgment. The same is true upon the question whether Ellen was present at the time of the interview between the attorney and plaintiff. The same is true as to the findings as to the exact value of the property conveyed. Admittedly it had a very substantial value of several thousand dollars. Exactly why plaintiff consented that Ellen should act as administratrix of the estate of Mary was also immaterial; it appearing by evidence sufficient to sustain the finding in that behalf that he did so relying implicitly upon her and believing that she could more expeditiously and efficiently handle the matter. The finding as to the intention of Ellen at the time of the execution of the deed of August 24, 1905, to reconvey upon the settlement of the estate, and the finding as to the transfer by her to her husband, and the reasons therefor, are sufficiently sustained by evidence.

What we have said practically disposes of all objections made to the findings on the ground of insufficiency of evidence. It was, of course, entirely proper to allow the plaintiff to testify that in making the deed of gift he relied upon "Ellen's promise that, when the estate was settled, he would get his share back." It was essential to his case that he had made the deed relying on and having confidence in his sister's promises, and his statement to that effect was competent evidence, the weight of which was a question for the trial court in the light of all the other circumstances. There was no error in allowing the plaintiff to testify that he had no legal advice regarding the execution of the deed of gift prior to its execution, except the advice given him by Ellen's attorney. The objection to the question asked Ellen on cross-examination, as to what her sister Mrs. Williams told her with reference to her reasons for transferring her interest in the property, was properly overruled. It was proper cross-examination concerning a matter fully gone into by her on her direct examination.

Mrs. Minnie Tucker was a witness for plaintiff, but was not questioned and did not give any testimony as to her feelings toward either of the defendants, or as to the making of any statement tending to show hostility or bias. On the direct examination of defendant Charles W. Lentz, he was asked whether Mrs. Tucker did not, after some difficulty between her husband and himself, shake her hand and fist at him and say, "I will give you all the court you want, before I get through with you." An objection to this question was sustained. It is settled in this state that the same foundation as must be laid for introducing prior contradictory statements of a witness is equally necessary to the introduction of evidence of declarations showing hostility or ill feeling on the part of the witness; in other words, that, before such evidence of hostile statements by the witness can be introduced, the witness so sought to be attacked must be asked as to the making of such statements. Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 173, 177; Silvey v. Hodgdon, 48 Cal. 185. See, also, note to Allen v.

State, 73 Am. Dec. 775; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 953. The ruling of the trial court sustaining the objection to the question asked Mr. Lentz relative to Mrs. Tucker was in accord with this rule.

It is urged that the court erred in sustaining an objection to a question asked Mr. Lentz as to whether Mr. Tucker, the husband of Minnie Tucker, who was not a witness, had some trouble with him. This question was answered in the affirmative by Lentz before any objection was interposed, and while, in response to the objection, the court said the question was improper, the objection was not formally sustained and the answer was not stricken out. If we assume that this amounted to an exclusion of the evidence, and that the court committed error in excluding it, we think nevertheless that it was of such slight importance that it should not be held to have prejudicially affected defendants' cause.

On her cross-examination Mrs. Lentz was asked whether on February 23, 1907, or about that time (which was subsequent to her conveyance of the property to her husband), she was not questioned as follows, referring to the reconveying of the property to plaintiff, "Would you have done it if he had asked you and offered to pay his proportion of the debts and expenses?" and answered: "I might if he paid his proportion. Of course, if he paid his proportion, I would." The question was objected to on the ground that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, in this, that the issue * * * is whether * * * the plaintiff * * * did, or did not, on the 24th day of August, deed the property in question, not what she may now say, or what she might have done provided any conditions existed. It is what she would legally be compelled by law to do; and upon the further ground that it is not cross-examination, and the proper foundation has not been laid." The court overruled the objection upon the expressed theory that the presence of the words "of course" might be taken as a recognition by the witness "that there was some other thing that would make it proper for her" to make the reconveyance, and that the statement was therefore proper evidence tending to show an admission by her in favor of plaintiffs' claim. The witness thereupon answered that she made the statement attributed to her. We are of the opinion that the views of the court as to the precise objection made were correct, and that the objection was untenable. It is claimed on this appeal that the testimony as to this statement was objectionable for the reason that "it is well settled that the declaration of a grantor made after the execution of his conveyance cannot be received to disparage his deed." No such objection was made or intimated in the trial court. Counsel for defendants say that where evidence objected to is absolutely irrelevant and incompetent for any purpose, and the objection to it cannot be removed, a general objection of incompetency and irrelevancy is sufficient; but there was no such general objection. Although the objection used the words "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," those words were carefully limited to the precise objection already discussed, which was substantially that the question was speculative and called simply for the present opinion of the witness as to "what she might have done" under certain circumstances. No objection, general or special, embracing the contention now presented, having been made in the trial court, the point cannot be made on this appeal. It is therefore unnecessary for us to consider whether the rule invoked by defendants as to declarations of a grantor after conveyance is available in favor of a grantee occupying the position of defendant Charles W. Lentz, who is found to have received his deed without consideration and not in good faith and for the purpose of preventing plaintiff from recovering any part of his property.

There is no other matter requiring notice. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

STEWART v. STEWART. (L. A. 2,444.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 867*)—QUESTIONS FOR REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING.

Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a new trial, only such matters can be considered as are made grounds upon which the trial court is authorized to grant or deny the motion, and neither the sufficiency of a pleading nor the action of the trial court upon a demurrer thereto, or upon a motion to strike can be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3476-3486; Dec. Dig. § 867.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 119*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—DENIAL OF APPLICATION FOR COSTS.

An order denying plaintiff's application for costs in a suit for divorce is appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 823-829; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

3. DIVORCE (§ 223*)—PROCEEDINGS—ALIMONY—COSTS.

The awarding of costs to a wife in an action for divorce rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, and, before any payment is ordered, the wife must show the necessity of the award; and, where she seeks, in addition to counsel fees which were allowed, an allowance to enable her to summon 25 or 30 witnesses and take the depositions of 17 others, it was not error to deny the motion, where it did not appear that the testimony was material, and her counsel declined to state what the character of the testimony was that he expected to procure, Civ. Code, § 137, providing for the payment of costs for the prosecution or defense of an action for divorce where the same is necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 645; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

4. DIVORCE (§ 139½*)—DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that an action may be dismissed when plaintiff abandons it or fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury, an action for divorce is properly dismissed upon refusal of plaintiff to offer any testimony in support of her complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 469; Dec. Dig. § 139½.*]

5. DIVORCE (§ 223*)—APPEAL—COSTS.

A wife, who has been defeated in an action for divorce, has no absolute right to prosecute an appeal at the expense of her husband, and whether the husband shall be required to pay the wife's expenses of appeal is a matter in the discretion of the trial court; and, if the court is satisfied that the proposed appeal is not undertaken in good faith, or with reasonable belief that it has a merit, the application should be denied.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Gertrude E. Stewart brought an action for divorce against Elmore Stewart, and defendant filed a cross-complaint, upon which an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of the cross-complainant was granted. Plaintiff appealed from an order denying a motion for new trial, and also from an order denying a motion for attorney's fees and costs on appeal. Orders affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, for appellant. Wadham & Pritchard, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action for divorce. The complaint, filed by the wife, was based on the ground of extreme cruelty. The husband answered, denying the charges, and filed a cross-complaint in which he set up three grounds for divorce—extreme cruelty, desertion, and adultery. Upon the trial the court found in favor of the charge of adultery, and granted an interlocutory decree of divorce in favor of the husband as cross-complainant. The wife's motion for a new trial was denied, and she appeals from the order denying her said motion. She also appeals from a subsequent order denying her motion for attorney's fees and costs on appeal. There is no appeal from the judgment.

The appellant seeks, on her appeal from the order denying a new trial, to have reviewed the action of the court below in overruling her demurrer to the cross-complaint. It is urged that the charge of adultery is not sufficiently specific in its designation of the person with whom the act was claimed to have been committed. We do not agree with this contention, but, even if we did, the point would not be available to appellant on an appeal from an order denying a new trial. "Upon an appeal from an order granting a new trial only such matters can be considered as are made grounds upon which the superior court is authorized to grant or deny the motion. Neither the sufficiency of a pleading nor the action of the superior court upon a demurrer thereto, or upon a motion to strike out the pleading or any portion thereof, can be considered." Green v. Duvergey, 146 Cal. 379, 384, 80 Pac. 234; Crescent, etc., Co. v. United Upholsterers' Union, 153 Cal. 433, 95 Pac. 871, and cases cited.

It appears that when the cause was called for trial, the plaintiff, through her attorney, objected to proceeding on the ground that she was without means to obtain witnesses, by reason of the refusal of the court, before the time of trial, to grant her applications for orders directing the defendant to furnish her with the necessary money with which to subpoena witnesses. The objection was overruled, and the plaintiff then made the point that the issues arising on the cross-complaint and the answer thereto should first be tried. The court ruled in favor of this contention, whereupon plaintiff objected to going to trial on the cross-complaint, on the ground that she was unable to make her defense for the same reasons as those which prevented her making out a case under her complaint. This objection was also overruled. Exceptions to both rulings were noted. The cross-complainant offered evidence in support of the charge of adultery, and the plaintiff and another witness testified in opposition. The court stated that it thought the defendant entitled to a divorce on the ground of adultery. The defendant abandoned the other grounds of his cross-complaint, and the court called upon plaintiff's counsel to proceed with his case on the original complaint. This he declined to do, standing upon the objections theretofore made. Although the plaintiff was present, and that fact emphasized by the court, the attorney refused to call her or to proceed. Thereupon the court, on motion of the defendant, dismissed plaintiff's action, and granted the defendant judgment on the third cause of action (i. e., adultery), set up in his cross-complaint.

The evidence in support of the defendant's cross-complaint is not set forth, and its sufficiency to sustain the finding is not questioned. The appellant relies for reversal upon the action of the court in refusing to postpone the trial upon her statement that she was unable, by reason of prior rulings of the court, to procure witnesses. This contention involves, necessarily, an inquiry into the correctness of those prior rulings. The orders denying the plaintiff's applications for costs were themselves appealable orders (Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709; White v. White, 86 Cal. 212, 24 Pac. 1030), and it is argued by respondent that the remedy for any error committed in making them was by direct appeal rather than by motion for new trial. The soundness of this position need not be passed upon at this time. Assuming, for the purposes of the present case, that the refusal to grant costs may be reviewed on this appeal from the order denying a new trial, we are satisfied that the record does not disclose error in such refusal. The proceedings on the applications for costs are set forth in a separate bill of exceptions. It appears that the first motion was for $1,000 additional attorney's fees, $500 costs, and $75 per month as maintenance and support. Affidavits of the parties were offered, and the court ordered that the defendant pay the plaintiff $100 as attorney's fees. The application for maintenance was denied, and it was ordered that "no allowance for costs at this time be granted." The denial of costs was not final, and the plaintiff subsequently renewed her motion, basing it, apparently, upon the affidavit first filed. This affidavit, made by the plaintiff herself, averred that she had a meritorious cause of action and a like defense to the cross-complaint; that she was without means; that she had given to her attorney a list of names of witnesses whose testimony would be necessary to enable her to prosecute her action and defend against that of her husband; that it would be necessary to take the depositions of certain other persons, and that without the said witnesses and depositions she could not safely go to trial. Her inability to pay the necessary expense and the financial resources of the defendant were set forth. The affidavit names 21 persons, "and some 5 or 6 other witnesses," as those whose testimony would be needed in addition to some 17 other persons whose depositions it would be necessary to take. The motion, upon its renewal, was denied for the reasons that "it did not appear what the testimony was that plaintiff's counsel desired to obtain, nor did it appear that any of the testimony sought to be obtained was material to any of the issues to be tried in the case, and for the further reason that plaintiff's counsel, upon being requested to do so, declined to advise the court or opposing counsel as to the character of the testimony which he expected to procure, or as to what facts any of said witnesses would testify to." These considerations fully justified the action of the court. The awarding of alimony or costs to the wife in an action for divorce is not a matter of right, but is one resting in the sound discretion of the trial court. White v. White, 73 Cal. 105, 14 Pac. 393; Langan v. Langan, 91 Cal. 654, 27 Pac. 1092. Where the marriage relation is admitted or shown by preponderating evidence (Hite v. Hite, 124 Cal. 389, 57 Pac. 227, 45 L. R. A. 793, 71 Am. St. Rep. 82), liberality in providing for the needs of the wife, both with regard to her support and the expenses of the litigation, will be exercised. But, before any payment is claimed, the wife must show the necessity of the award. White v. White, 86 Cal. 212, 24 Pac. 1030; Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 493, 35 Pac. 87. Here the plaintiff sought, in addition to counsel fees, which were allowed, an allowance to enable her to summon some 25 or 30 witnesses and to take the depositions of 17 others. Before she could call upon the defendant to pay the large expense involved, she was bound to show that such expense was "necessary to enable her to prosecute or defend the action." Civ. Code, § 137. Even after being called upon to state what these witnesses, or any of them, could establish, she declined to make any statement which might enlighten the court upon the question of the necessity of having these witnesses, or of her good faith in declaring that they were required. The court was not compelled to accept her conclusion that she needed these witnesses, and committed no abuse of discretion in refusing to make an award in the absence of a showing of the purposes for which they were to be called. No claim was made that such disclosure would have been prejudicial to her rights. It follows that the court acted properly in compelling the parties to go to trial, and in dismissing plaintiff's case upon her refusal to offer any testimony in support of her complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 581.

Of the appeal from the order refusing to require defendant to pay plaintiff's expenses of appeal, it is sufficient to say that this, too, is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the trial court (Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 79 Pac. 885), and that no abuse of discretion is shown. There is no absolute right in the defeated wife to prosecute an appeal at the expense of her husband. Where the trial court is satisfied, from the record before it, that the proposed appeal is not undertaken in good faith, or with reasonable belief that it has merit (Gay v. Gay, supra), the application should be denied. The record in this case fully justified an adverse finding on these points.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 184*)—PLEADING—AMENDMENT TO PLEAD STATUTE.

Refusal of leave to amend an answer to plead the bar of the statute is not an abuse of discretion, unless it is made to appear that the amendment will be in furtherance of justice, which is not done by a mere showing that defendant's counsel overlooked an amendment of the statute reducing the time for commencing such an action; liberality in allowing amendments being exercised only in furtherance of justice.

2. WEAPONS (§ 18*)—INJURY FROM NEGLIGENT USE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where plaintiff, defendant, and L. went hunting for deer, on the banks of a river thickly grown with brush, through which were deer crossings along which deer, when chased by dogs, would come into the water, and after it was agreed that they should station themselves at three crossings, defendant 200 yards above, and plaintiff 200 yards below L., plaintiff crossed the river, and, instead of going below L., went above him and opposite to defendant, and defendant, seeing the movement of brush caused by plaintiff, fired, thinking it was a deer, the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—QUESTION FOR COURT.

The question of negligence is for the jury only where the facts are undisputed, and but one inference can be drawn from them.

4. WEAPONS (§ 18*)—NEGLIGENT DISCHARGE.

One who, seeing an object moving in the brush, shoots without taking time to discover what it is, on the assumption that it is a deer, when it is a man, is guilty of negligence.

5. WEAPONS (§ 18*)—NEGLIGENT SHOOTING—CUSTOM.

The custom of hunters along coast rivers is not admissible on the question of negligence of one who, seeing bushes moving, shot on the assumption of its being caused by a deer.

6. WEAPONS (§ 18*)—NEGLIGENT SHOOTING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—KNOWLEDGE OF CUSTOM.

Even if failure of plaintiff, while hunting, to comply with a custom, was competent on the question of contributory negligence, he having been shot by a fellow hunter, mistaking him for a deer, his knowledge of the custom at the time would have to be shown.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Exclusion of evidence of a custom on the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was immaterial; he having admitted making an agreement, which went fully as far as the custom.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Paul Rudd against Ralph Byrnes. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

McNab & Hirsch, for appellant. Robert Duncan, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff, having been wounded by a bullet fired from defendant's rifle, brought this action to recover damages, alleging that his injuries were due to defendant's negligence. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $500. The defendant appeals from the judgment entered upon the verdict, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was commenced in December, 1906, about 14 months after the shooting. The defendant filed an answer, in which he denied the allegations of the complaint, and affirmatively pleaded facts intended to constitute a defense of contributory negligence. On the day set for the trial of the cause, he moved the court for leave to amend his answer by setting up the additional defense that the action was barred by subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The application was denied, and this ruling is assigned as error. This court, very early in its history, established the rule that the refusal of leave to plead the bar of the statute of limitations by way of amendment to an answer already filed will not be regarded as an abuse of discretion, unless it is made to appear that the amendment will be in furtherance of justice. Cook v. Spears, 2 Cal. 409, 56 Am. Dec. 348; Stuart v. Lander, 16 Cal. 372, 76 Am. Dec. 538. The principle underlying these decisions, viz., that, while great liberality should be exercised in allowing amendments to pleadings, that liberality should only be displayed in furtherance of justice, has often received recognition here. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 118, 24 Pac. 867; Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 122 Cal. 107, 54 Pac. 537, and cases cited. The bill of exceptions asserts, as the only reason for defendant's failure to rely on this plea in his original answer, the inadvertence of counsel in failing to note that the amendment of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 231, c. 258, § 2) to section 340 had reduced the time allowed for the commencement of actions of this character to one year. The fact that counsel had been guilty of this oversight had no tendency to show that permission to plead the statute would aid in producing a just result.

The main question arises on the instructions of the court, whereby it declared that plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, and that the only question for the jury was the amount of damages. Instructions requested by defendant, submitting to the jury the issue of contributory negligence, were refused. It appeared from plaintiff's testimony that on October 10, 1905, he, in company with the defendant and one Lima, went out along the Big river in Mendocino county to hunt deer. On the north bank of the river they parted company. Byrnes and Lima remained on the north side. The plaintiff, Rudd, crossed the stream, taking a dog with him. The dog started along a ridge and down through the brush into a flat across the river from Byrnes. Rudd thought the dog was after a deer, and ran in after. When he came out on the flat opposite Byrnes, he heard a shot and was struck by a bullet. There was no question of the fact that Byrnes fired this shot. His own testimony was that he saw an object moving in the brush, and fired at it, thinking it to be a deer. The testimony relating to the issue of contributory negligence, as relied on by defendant, differed in some particulars from the allegations of the answer. Since, however, the point of variance does not appear to have been made in the court below, and the differences have no important bearing on the points to be discussed, it will be sufficient to state the substance of the showing made by the witnesses. There was evidence which would have warranted the jury in finding that the banks of the river were thickly grown with brush; that along the river there were deer crossings "where deer come down when chased by dogs and run into water." It was testified that the three hunters had agreed that they were, respectively, to station themselves at three crossings; Byrnes' station being about 200 yards above, and Rudd's about the same distance below, that of Lima. When Byrnes fired he was at the point at which, under the agreement, he should have been. Rudd, instead of going down the river, as agreed, went up, and was opposite Byrnes' station when shot. We think the defendant was entitled to have the jury consider this evidence and determine from it whether Rudd had been guilty of negligence contributing directly and proximately to his injuries. That the defendant's conduct was negligent may well be conceded. "As firearms are extraordinarily dangerous, a person who handles such a weapon is bound to use extraordinary care to prevent injury to others, and is held to strict accountability for a want of such care." 12 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 518; Babel v. Manning, 112 Mich. 24, 70 N. W. 327, 36 L. R. A. 523, 67 Am. St. Rep. 381; Judd v. Ballard, 66 Vt. 668, 30 Atl. 96; Moebus v. Becker, 46 N. J. Law, 41; Morgan v. Cox, 22 Mo. 373, 66 Am. Dec. 623. One who causes injury to another by discharging a firearm must, in order to excuse himself from liability, show that he was absolutely without fault. 12 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 519; Babel v. Manning, supra; Morgan v. Cox, supra; Tally v. Ayers, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 677; Wright v. Clark, 50 Vt. 130, 28 Am. Rep. 496. While the question of negligence is ordinarily one to be determined by the jury, yet where the facts are undisputed, and no inference but that of negligence can be drawn from them, the court may determine that negligence is shown as matter of law. Studer v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 400, 53 Pac. 942, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39; Nagle v. Cal. S. R. Co., 88 Cal. 86, 25 Pac. 1106. It is plain, from defendant's own story, that he did not, in this instance, exercise the care required of one handling firearms. He saw an object moving in the underbrush, and fired at it without taking time to discover whether it was a deer, as he supposed it to be, or a human being. There can be no room for doubt that, in so doing, he acted without that regard for the safety of others which is to be expected of one handling dangerous implements or substances.

But the fact that defendant was negligent does not preclude the possibility that plaintiff may have been likewise guilty of negligence contributing to the injury. In Magar v. Hammond, 171 N. Y. 377, 64 N. E. 150, 59 L. R. A. 315, the owner of a fish preserve had employed a night watchman, who was in the habit of discharging firearms into the air to frighten off poachers. Plaintiff entered the premises on a dark night for the purpose of poaching, and was injured by a bullet fired by the watchman in the direction of the noise made by plaintiff. In an action against the owner and the watchman, the plaintiff had judgment for damages. On appeal it was held that the trial court had erred in refusing to charge that, if the plaintiff knew that the watchman was in the habit of discharging a gun, and went there after receiving such information, he could not recover, even if the defendants were negligent. "The defendants," said the court, "were entitled to have the jury instructed that, if the plaintiff voluntarily exposed himself to a known danger, he could not recover for the act of the watchman, though this act, in defense of the master's property, was without due care." In McCleary v. Frantz, 160 Pa. 535, 28 Atl. 929, where plaintiff and defendant were members of a hunting party, and the defendant, shooting at a rabbit, hit plaintiff, the court said the case was one "for the exclusive consideration of the jury on the questions of negligence and contributory negligence." Other decisions treating the contributory negligence of plaintiff as a material subject of inquiry in cases of this character are: Whitten v. Hartin, 163 Mass. 39, 39 N. E. 412; Babel v. Manning, supra; Winans v. Randolph, 169 Pa. 606, 32 Atl. 622. There is nothing to the contrary in Glueck v. Scheld, 125 Cal. 288, 57 Pac. 1003. All that was there decided was that, under the peculiar facts shown, the jury had a right to find that the alleged negligence of plaintiff did not contribute to his injury. In short, the rules of law governing actions for injuries caused by the discharge of firearms are not different from the rules governing actions for any injuries claimed to have been inflicted by the negligence of the defendant. By reason of the dangerous nature of such weapons, a person handling them is held to a high degree of care. If he has not used the degree of care appropriate to the circumstances, and injury result, he will be liable to the person injured, if the latter was without fault. If, however, the individual injured was himself acting without due care for his own safety, and his carelessness directly contributed to or caused the injury, he will be remediless.

As we have said, the question of negligence is ordinarily one for the jury, and this applies as well to contributory negligence as to that claimed to inhere to the conduct of defendant. The facts here shown were certainly not such as to preclude an inference that plaintiff had been guilty of negligence contributing directly to his injury. Whether or not there had been an agreement by which plaintiff was to station himself at a point several hundred yards away from defendant; whether plaintiff had departed from that agreement; whether such departure displayed a want of the care that would be exercised by a reasonably prudent person in plaintiff's position; and whether such departure was, in whole or in part, the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries—were all questions which might, under the evidence, have been answered favorably to defendant's contention. They should therefore have been submitted to the jury. It certainly cannot be said, as matter of law, that the presence of plaintiff in the brush, opposite the point where, as he knew, Byrnes had taken his stand for the purpose of shooting a deer which might come through the brush, was not negligent. Nor, in view of Byrnes' testimony that he was led to fire by movements seen in the brush, can it be said, as matter of law, that there was no causal connection between Rudd's actions and his being wounded by the shot.

For the purposes of a new trial, which is made necessary by what we have said, the other points made by appellant may be briefly mentioned. We think the court did not err in rejecting evidence of the custom of hunters along coast rivers. The standard of care required of persons under given circumstances is not to be established by proof that others have been in the habit of acting in a certain manner. Pulsifer v. Berry, 87 Me. 405, 32 Atl. 986. The failure of plaintiff to comply with a custom, departure from which would put him in danger, might be relevant on the issue of contributory negligence, if it appeared that the custom was known to him at the time of the transaction. No attempt was made to show such knowledge here. Furthermore, the excluded evidence could have no weight in this case, where the plaintiff admitted having made an express agreement which went fully as far as the alleged custom.

The court should have allowed evidence of plaintiff's statements to the effect that the injury resulted from his own fault. They were declarations of a party, against his interest. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 2. But here the facts were fully shown by plaintiff's own testimony, and the exclusion of his mere conclusion on the issue which was finally to be determined by the jury could not have been prejudicial to appellant.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

1. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 41*) —CONTRACTS—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

In a suit against a building and loan association to cancel plaintiffs' obligations, evidence held not to sustain a finding that plaintiffs were induced to execute them by fraudulent representations that their stock would be matured at the end of seven years, and that the obligations would then be satisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Building and Loan Associations, Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

2. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 8*) —AUTHORITY OF AGENT—REPRESENTATIONS.

Where printed circulars issued by defendant building and loan association, from which plaintiffs claimed to have gained their impression that the stock issued by defendant would mature and all their obligations under their contracts cease at the end of seven years, explicitly declared that local agents were without authority to make and conclude terms with prospective investors and borrowers on the amount to be loaned or the time the loan was to run, false representations by a local agent inducing plaintiffs to sign a note and mortgage to the association were not material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Building and Loan Associations, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 8*) —FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

Statements contained in the prospectuses of a building and loan association indicating that the stock would mature and plaintiffs' debt be extinguished at the end of seven years were merely speculative, or an expression of opinion of the association's officers, and could not be made the basis of alleged fraudulent representations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Building and Loan Associations, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

4. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 12*) —BORROWING MEMBERS—STOCK—MATURITY —AGREEMENT.

A borrowing member of a building and loan association cannot avail himself of an agreement as to the number of payments which will mature his stock, when such agreement is not contained in his bond and mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Building and Loan Associations, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

5. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 8*) —STATEMENTS BY OFFICERS OR AGENTS—ESTOPPEL.

Oral or printed statements by the officers or agents of a building and loan association as to the number of payments necessary to mature stock in contradiction of the plain language of a member's contract, whether relied on by the member or not, cannot be made the basis of an estoppel against the association.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Building and Loan Associations, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

6. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 34*) — BORROWING MEMBERS — RELATION TO AGENT.

A borrowing member of a building and loan association occupies to it the dual relation of borrower and stockholder, and hence is not entitled to have payments made on his stock account credited as payments on the debt under the rule that payments on account of collaterals are not payments on the debt they secure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Building and Loan Associations, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

7. FRAUD (§ 11*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—OPINIONS BASED ON FACTS KNOWN TO BE FALSE.

One inducing another to contract in reliance on estimates or opinions professedly based on alleged facts known to the person stating them to be nonexistent cannot escape responsibility on a plea that he was merely declaring an opinion.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Suit by Simon W. Henry and wife against the Continental Building & Loan Association. Decree for complainants, and, from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Reversed.

Gavin McNab and Everts & Ewing, for appellant. N. C. Coldwell, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appeal in this case was taken to the District Court of Appeal in and for the Third Appellate District. There the order appealed from was reversed. The opinion, prepared by Hart, J., reads in part as follows:

"The appellant, as its name implies, is a building and loan association, organized as a corporation under the laws of this state. The respondents became members of the association by buying a certain number of shares of stock therein, and thereafter borrowed two certain sums of money, to wit, $800 and $300, respectively, giving to appellant their two several promissory notes evidencing the two amounts so borrowed, and as security for the payment of said notes executed a mortgage on certain real estate situated in the city of Fresno, and, further, pledged as collateral the shares of stock referred to. The first of these notes in point of the time of their execution is for the larger amount, and bears date of February 1, 1898, and the other February 15, 1898. Both, as before stated, are secured by a mortgage on certain real estate of the respondents, and, as additional security, eight shares of the stock of the association are pledged on the larger note and three on the smaller. The respondents brought this action to compel the defendant to deliver up for cancellation said promissory notes, to compel satisfaction of record of the mortgages given to secure the same and for damages. The complaint contains two counts and sets out in detail the history of the transactions, alleging, among other things, that the respondents were induced to execute the notes and mortgages through the misrepresentation and fraud of the appellant, and that the respondents have paid in full the principal sums and interest accruing thereon of said notes. The defendant, by answer, specifically denies all the vital averments of the complaint, and by way of cross-complaint seeks affirmative relief in the nature of a decree foreclosing said mortgages and for a sale thereunder of the property to satisfy a total balance alleged to be due it from plaintiffs in the sum of $548.42. The plaintiffs, answering the cross-complaint, repeat the allegations of their complaint, alleging fraud, etc., thus meeting by avoidance the claim of the defendant to the right to a foreclosure of the mortgages and a sale of the mortgaged and pledged property. Upon the issues tendered by the cross-complaint and answer thereto the cause was tried, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiffs as prayed for in their complaint. This appeal is from the order denying the defendant a new trial.

"It is agreed between counsel for the respective parties that the law and the facts involved in both causes of action stated in the cross-complaint are practically the same, and that consequently whatever may be the conclusion reached in the one cause will necessarily be the conclusion arrived at in the other. We shall therefore confine the discussion principally to one of the causes of action only. The vital question presented is: Does the evidence support the finding that the plaintiffs (defendants in cross-complaint) were induced to execute the note and mortgage through such misrepresentation and fraud upon the part of the corporation as to entitle them to the relief asked for by them? The finding of the court upon the question of fraud is as follows: 'That, when the plaintiffs executed and delivered the promissory note and mortgage aforesaid, the defendant, through its authorized agents and officers, falsely and deceitfully represented to plaintiff that at the expiration of seven years from that date, upon the payment, during said period, of about $1,142.40, that the total indebtedness of plaintiffs to defendant, on said note and mortgage, would be paid and liquidated in full, and that it would then redeliver said note to him, and also fully discharge and satisfy said mortgage. And said defendant also then and there, through its authorized agents and officers, falsely and deceitfully represented to plaintiff that the payment of the amounts specified in said promissory note and mortgage, together with the dividends and accumulations which said eight shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation, then pledged with the defendant by the plaintiffs, would earn in said seven years, would, at the expiration of said seven years, fully pay and liquidate all indebtedness, under said note and mortgage, whereas, in truth and in fact, its agents and officers then and there knew that said shares of capital stock could not, and would not, within said seven years earn dividends and accumulations sufficient, together with the said monthly payments, to fully pay and liquidate said indebtedness, and said agents and officers of the defendant corporation thus falsely and deceitfully induced plaintiffs to execute and deliver to it said note and mortgage. That the plaintiffs relied upon said false and deceitful representations in making said note and mortgage, and had no means of then knowing that the same were false and deceitful.'

"The evidence which it is contended supports the foregoing finding may be briefly stated as follows: One F. J. Haber in February, 1898, was the local agent of the appellant in the city of Fresno. The negotiations for the loan were conducted through him. Prior to the execution of the first note and mortgage, the plaintiff, Simon Henry, had a conversation with Haber relative to the desired loan and the conditions upon which the same could be secured from appellant. Haber gave Henry some printed literature (called prospectuses) outlining in detail the plan upon which the appellant conducted its business. These prospectuses, among other statements, contained the following: 'If you are able by working one hour more per day, or by setting at work some grown-up child, or by practicing some self-denial, or by living a little more economically, to put aside a small amount per month, we want to have a little personal talk with you about the ways and means of home-getting. The small amounts set aside month after month, for about seven years will give you, at the end of that time, a home of your own, or a sufficient sum which could not otherwise be obtained to start you in a business of your own, and thus lay the foundation of your fortune and independence.' In addition to the foregoing, the prospectuses contained tables illustrating the result of investments made with the corporation, showing in each instance that upon the basis of a loan of $1,000 the monthly payment for 84 months (seven years) of interest and premium on the loan together with a certain installment on the value of the shares of stock required to be purchased by the borrower as a prerequisite to securing such loan the borrower would square himself with appellant, and thus become the owner of his house free from all incumbrances so far as appellant was concerned.

"After reading these circulars and securing such information from Haber as he was able to give them, the plaintiffs first purchased eight shares of stock in the corporation, valued at $100 per share, and then borrowed the sum of $800, executing their joint promissory note therefor, mortgaging their home in the city of Fresno and pledging their shares of stock in the corporation to secure the payment of the same.

"The note reads as follows: 'San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 1, 1898. Seven years after date, for value received, we promise to pay to the Continental Building and Loan Association (a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of California) or its order, at its office in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the sum of eight hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States of America, with interest thereon, in like gold coin from date hereof until paid, at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, interest payable monthly in advance on the 1st day of each and every month; and if said interest is not paid as it becomes due it shall become part of the principal, and thereafter, until paid, bear interest at the rate of two (2) per cent. per month, and in case said monthly interest or any part thereof, is not paid within one (1) month after it becomes due and payable, or in case the monthly installments due upon 8 shares of the capital stock of said corporation, pledged as security for the payment of this note, or any part thereof, are not paid when the same becomes due and payable, or in case the monthly premium due on said loan amounting to the sum of $4.80 per month for each and every month during said term of seven (7) years payable monthly in advance on the 1st day of each month, is not paid when due, then the whole of said principal sum of eight hundred dollars, and the interest thereon, shall become forthwith due and payable at the option of the holder hereof, and notice of the exercise of such option is hereby waived. This note is secured by a mortgage bearing even date herewith and the pledge by said mortgagors of 8 shares of the capital stock of said mortgagee, being certificate No. 13431.' The note, it will be noticed, very clearly states the conditions of the transaction. The mortgage likewise contains all the conditions upon which the loan was made.

"The evidence further shows and the court found that the plaintiff had paid to the corporation up to the time of the institution of this suit on the $800 transaction, for all purposes, the total sum of $1,136.80. It also appears that the dividends earned by the stock amounted approximately to $105. The first-mentioned sum includes all the payments made by the plaintiffs on the transaction—that is, all payments on account of the stock, of the premium and of the interest. I am of the opinion that the finding upon the question of fraud is not justified by the evidence. In the first place, it is to be said that the printed circulars, issued and published by the appellant, and from which the respondents claim to have gathered the impression that the stock would mature and all their obligations under their contracts cease by the end of seven years, explicitly declared that local agents were without authority to make and conclude terms with prospective investors and borrowers upon the amount to be loaned or the time during which such loan should run. Therefore, if, as appellant contends, there be a finding that the local agent of the defendant made false representations to the plaintiffs by which they were induced to sign the note and mortgage, the same may be disregarded as immaterial, and therefore altogether insufficient of itself to support the judgment. In the second place, I think the statements and tables contained in the prospectuses indicating that the stock would mature and the debt of the plaintiff thereupon become extinguished at the end of seven years must be construed to amount to nothing more than speculation or as involving a mere expression of opinion of the officers of the appellant upon the proposition. As the maturity of the stock must obviously depend to some extent upon its earnings, I cannot see how anything more than an approximation as to time could be made, and this proposition must be plainly apparent to one who gives the plan upon which building and loan associations conduct their business operations thoughtful consideration. The statement in the circular was to the effect that, assuming that the investor and borrower faithfully performed the terms of his contract, the stock would mature and all obligations under the contract cease in about seven years. The tables were manifestly intended as illustrations or exemplifications of the methods and results of the business operations of appellant, and, at most, involved only an opinion as to the period of time during which it was necessary that the relations between the parties should exist before the extinguishment of the obligations of the contract. In this view, it is plain that a finding of fraud could not be predicated of evidence showing such statements. Johnson v. Johnson, 134 Cal. 662, 66 Pac. 847. There is nothing in either the note or the mortgage (except that which may be inferred from the fact that the note is made to run for seven years—undoubtedly based upon an approximation) specifically providing that a certain, definite number of payments would result in the maturity of the stock. And 'a borrowing member cannot avail himself of an agreement as to the number of payments which will mature stock, when that agreement is not embodied in his bond and mortgage.' Noah v. American Building Ass'n, 31 Ind. App. 504, 68 N. E. 615. Nor is the association bound by a mere expression of opinion. Hammerslough v. Kansas City Bldg., etc., Ass'n, 79 Mo. 80; Gary v. Verity, 101 Mo. App. 586, 74 S. W. 161; 6 Ency. of Law, 122; Baltimore Bldg., etc., Ass'n v. Powhatan Imp. Co., 87 Md. 59, 39 Atl. 274. In Johnson v. Johnson, supra, it is said: 'An assertion of that which is not true in order to constitute a fraudulent representation cannot be held to include the opinion of the person, however erroneous it may be or however positively stated.' See, also, Lee v. McClelland, 120 Cal. 147, 52 Pac. 300; Lloyd v. Kehl, 132 Cal. 107, 64 Pac. 125; Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 398, 23 Pac. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137; Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 317, 75 Pac. 899.

"But, conceding that the language of the circulars involved an unqualified declaration of a fact and was reasonably susceptible of the interpretation which the respondents undertake to give it, and that they could well have conceived an understanding of its import which they claim to have received from it, the fact remains that the note and the mortgage, constituting the contract to whose terms they bound themselves, contain in detail in clear and unambiguous language the terms, conditions, and obligations which they assumed. The plaintiff, Simon Henry, testified that he read the mortgage before signing it, and presumably he understood its terms and conditions and well knew the full scope of the contract to which he made himself a party. It is, I think, well settled that oral or printed statements made by officers or agents of a building and loan association in contradiction of the plain language of the contract, whether relied upon by the person to whom made or not, cannot be made the basis of an estoppel. Noah v. Loan Association, 31 Ind. App. 504; 68 N. E. 615; McNamara v. Oakland, etc., Ass'n, 131 Cal. 337, 63 Pac. 670.

"There is as suggested, no obscurity in the language of either the note or mortgage. The latter, among other things, plainly provides that 60 cents per share shall be paid each month and 'until the said shares are fully paid by the said payments and the dividends and accumulations on said shares.' I am unable to comprehend how a person, capable of transacting business for himself, could well misapprehend this language. In fact, the language of both the note and mortgage prescribing the conditions and explaining the methods by which the business between the parties was to be conducted is so clear that even the plaintiffs must have understood that nothing more than an approximation could be made as to the length of time which would probably be required for the stock to mature and the debt to be liquidated.

"Under the law, no one can borrow money from a building and loan association without first becoming a stockholder therein. The investor and borrower, under the methods authorized by the law for carrying on the business of such concerns, must pay a certain installment each month on the value of the stock, a monthly premium for the privilege of securing the loan, and interest on the principal borrowed, payable in monthly installments; and all these payments must be made until the stock is fully paid for. The total sum found by the court to have been paid by the plaintiffs on the $800 transaction consisted not only of the interest on the note, but also the monthly payments on the premium and the monthly installments on the stock. In other words, the court below allowed as credits upon the note payments which the agreement into which plaintiffs entered expressly provided should be exclusively applied to the payment of the premium and to the extinguishment of the obligation arising by reason of the purchase of the eight shares of stock required to be bought as a prerequisite to the exercise by plaintiffs of the privilege of securing the $800 loan. Under the law of this state, the court erred in thus computing and crediting the payments made by respondents. McNamara v. Oakland, etc., Ass'n, supra; P. S. Savings & L. v. Green, 123 Fed. 47, 59 C. O. A. 167. In the first-mentioned case, somewhat similar in its facts to the case at bar, the Supreme Court with clearness explains the law applicable to building and loan concerns and their business operations as authorized by the statute. I make the following extended quotation therefrom:

"Appellant contends that, if payment of the note could be enforced, he had the correlative right to offset his payments and his earnings, and that, if he is granted this right, it will appear from the evidence that the debt is paid. Appellant is mistaken as to the nature of the agreement into which he entered. He occupied the dual relation to the corporation of borrower and stockholder, each of which was distinct from the other. Under the scheme he could not be borrower without becoming a stockholder, but he could be a stockholder without being a borrower.

* * * The mortgagor having ceased all payments and by suit having sought to compel the cancellation of his mortgage, the mortgagee is within its rights in asking a foreclosure of the mortgage and a decree for the sale of the shares, and presumably they will bring their cash value and plaintiff will have his credit therefor. That the relations of borrower and stockholder are separate and distinct in associations such as defendant's assignor seems to be well settled. Endlich on Bldg. & Loan Ass'ns (2d Ed.) §§ 123, 477. And it is general law that payments on account of collaterals are not payments on account of the debt they secure; the pledging of shares as collateral security for the payment of a debt is a recognition of the distinct standing of the member as a member and as a debtor. Endlich, § 477, and cases cited.

* * * He paid interest on the note and installments on the shares for several years and must have known for what he was paying. * * * This was part of the plan for creating funds, in which the plaintiff shared with other members, into which he entered with his eyes open. He testified that he would not have signed the note had he understood that he was to receive but $960, and it appeared that the money was not in fact paid until after the note and mortgage were delivered. * * * He made so many payments voluntarily, after he must have known the full effect of his contract, that his testimony that he would not have signed the note had he known the facts, cannot avail him. * * * It was proved by a witness, conceded by both sides to be an expert accountant and familiar with the workings of defendant and other like corporations, that plaintiff's shares had not matured September 15, 1896, when the action was brought. But the witness said it could not be ascertained certainly in advance when the series would mature for the obvious reason that the earnings were an unknown quantity for the future. We cannot see that there is anything in the plan upon which defendant and its assignor were operating that would permit a shareholder who was a mortgagor to default in payments of interest and principal of his notes and installments on his shares, and still entitle him to claim the full benefit of all his payments whenever he chose to default. We cannot find, however, either in the statute or in the by-laws or in the contracts entered into any authority for equity to interpose so as to aid the unfortunate borrower in the situation of plaintiff."

"So, in the case at bar, it is clear from the evidence that the stock of the respondents had not matured at the time of the commencement of this suit, and consequently the payments made on said stock could not, under the terms of the contract of the parties, be lumped with payments for other agreed purposes and the total sum thus produced made to extinguish the principal sum of the note. I have not taken the pains to make figures for the purpose of ascertaining whether the total amount which the appellant claims is still due it from the respondents on the two transactions is correct or not, but it is apparent, from a cursory examination of the figures presented in the record, that there is still an amount due on the two transactions approximating the total sum claimed by appellant. In any event, there being still something due from the respondents, the latter cannot claim the relief asked for.

"The findings of the court are founded entirely upon the issue of fraud, and it is upon this ground alone, as must be obvious from what has already been said, that the court held and found that there was nothing remaining due the appellant, as may be instanced by the following rather remarkably phrased finding: 'That plaintiffs and defendants in cross-complaint are not willing to pay defendant and cross-complainant such further sum as is just and equitable to satisfy said note and mortgage and to obtain discharge and satisfaction thereof, but, upon the contrary, plaintiffs and defendants in cross-complaint allege that said note and mortgage are utterly void and of no effect, by reason of the fraud, trick, and device of the defendants and cross-complainant, as in these findings set out.' As I have declared, the evidence does not warrant the finding of fraud, and there is absolutely no support for the judgment. It is true that the payments which plaintiffs have made to appellant, if on a straight loan at six per cent. per annum, would be sufficient to extinguish their obligation. But the law, as we have seen (sections 633 to 648, inclusive, Civ. Code), authorizes the very system to which plaintiffs bound themselves by their agreement in their relations with the appellant. Under that system, it is to be observed, while the borrower (who must have shares of stock equal in value to the extent of his loan) in effect reduces the principal each month through the payment of the required monthly installments on his stock, he, nevertheless, continues to pay interest on the full principal of the note until his stock (practically principal) has been paid for. But the money so paid in by the stockholder is invested or loaned out by the concern, and thus the dividends to which the investor is entitled on his stock are acquired. I suppose that it may be said that paying for a home by the installment plan at a rate equal only to what the borrower would ordinarily be compelled to pay as rent for the use and occupation of the premises is an advantage which would not be offered by the ordinary lender of money; that is, by one loaning money as a straight loan at a straight rate of interest. But, if there be unfairness in the scheme as practiced by these associations in their dealings with their patrons, the fundamental cause of the difficulty lies with the law as the Legislature has promulgated it."

Within due time, the respondents applied to this court for an order that the cause be heard and determined here. In their application they state that the opinion filed in the appellate court correctly states the facts, so far as it does state the facts. They expressly "accept as unquestioned and undoubted law every principle announced by that court in support of its judgment." Under these circumstances, we may well rest our disposition of the matters considered in the appellate court on the grounds there stated, and we accordingly approve and adopt the foregoing portions of the opinion of that court.

It is, however, contended by the respondents that the Court of Appeal overlooked a material fact, alleged by respondents and found in their favor by the trial court. The plaintiffs' answer to the cross-complaint averred that in its circulars and prospectuses the defendant represented that "the history of the previous operations of said cross-complainant corporation showed that the dividends and accumulations on the shares of the capital stock of the said corporation so purchased would be sufficient, together with said monthly payment of 60 cents per share, to make full and complete payment for all of said shares of stock so purchased within said seven years from the date of said purchase." It was further alleged that the defendant knew that this representation was false. The court found specifically that the defendant made this statement with knowledge of its falsity. The rule that mere expressions of opinion cannot constitute actionable fraud is no doubt subject to some qualification. A party inducing another to contract in reliance upon estimates or opinions professedly based upon alleged facts known to the party stating them to be nonexistent will not be permitted to escape responsibility by the plea that he was merely declaring his opinion. A statement that the history of the defendant showed that its stock would mature in seven years is clearly a statement of fact, and, if falsely made and relied on, would furnish ground for relief to the party misled by it.

But the most careful scrutiny of the record fails to disclose any evidence to support the finding that any such representation was made by the appellant. The claim is that the alleged statement of the defendant is to be found in the circular or prospectus brought to the attention of the plaintiff. Some of the contents of this pamphlet are set forth in the opinion filed in the District Court of Appeal. As is there said, the tables illustrating the result of an investment amount to nothing more than "speculation or as involving a mere expression of opinion of the officers of the appellant upon the proposition." The circular contains only two statements which refer in any way to past history or experience. Under the head "Its System," it is stated that: "The system of this association is the result of years of experience and is practical, not theoretical." This is followed by other paragraphs devoted to the subjects of "State Supervision," "Features," "Explanatory" (showing in detail the plan of investment), "Rent or Home Purchase," "Agreement Between the Shareholder and the Association," "Withdrawals," etc. Obviously the sentence quoted does not purport to refer to any stated period or time of maturity of shares. It deals solely with the "System" of the association, a system which, under the law and as shown on the face of the contract of the respondents, precludes the idea of stock maturing in a fixed number of years. The language cannot be construed to mean any more than that the defendant's plan of operation is not a new or untried one.

The other statement relating to experience falls equally short of supporting the finding. In a part of the circular devoted, in the main, to general maxims extolling the practice of thrift and economy, it is said that: "Experience has shown that some system is necessary to induce the majority of persons to lay aside a part of their income. The most efficient system will combine regularity, safety, and profit. The experience of the past 50 years shows that no system of investment has been so safe and so profitable as that adopted by this association." We find in this language nothing calculated to convey the impression that the experience of the defendant had shown that its stock had matured or would mature in seven years. Furthermore, under any construction that may be given to it, the declaration that the defendant's system was the safest and most profitable mode of investment could not have been understood as derived from its own experience. The conclusion is, as the prospectus declares, based on 50 years' experience, while the circular itself shows that the defendant association had been in existence for a much shorter period.

The statement on motion for new trial properly challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding under discussion. For the reasons stated, it must be held that the finding is not supported, and that it furnishes no ground for reaching a conclusion different from that announced by the appellate court.

The order denying a new trial is reversed.

FULKERSON et ux. v. STILES et al.
(L. A. 2,393.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1909.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 254*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—OWNERSHIP.

Property acquired after marriage with community funds is community property, the ownership of which the law places in the husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 901; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 270*)—CONVEYANCE TO MARRIED WOMAN—PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Civ. Code, § 164, which declares that, when property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, it is presumed to be her separate estate, an allegation in the complaint, in an action to quiet title in the husband to property purchased with community funds and conveyed to the wife, that although the title was taken in his wife's name, he did not intend to give it to her is an allegation of fact which negatives the presumption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 979; Dec. Dig. § 270.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 752*)—LIEN—NATURE.

A judgment plaintiff has a mere general lien upon the real property of the judgment defendant, and such lien is an incumbrance, but the original judgment plaintiff is not ordinarily an incumbrancer for a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1311; Dec. Dig. § 752.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 131*)—"INCUMBRANCERS IN GOOD FAITH AND FOR A VALUABLE CONSIDERATION."

The phrase "incumbrancers in good faith and for a valuable consideration," as used in Civ. Code, § 164, providing that when property is conveyed to a married woman, it is presumed to vest in her as her separate estate, which presumption is conclusive in favor of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, means persons who have taken or purchased a lien or the means of obtaining one, and who have parted with something of value in consideration thereof, and the payment of money or the parting with something of value is essential.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 131*)—VALUABLE CONSIDERATION—"PURCHASERS OR INCUMBRANCERS IN GOOD FAITH."

Though pre-existing debts are so far a valuable consideration that persons who release them or part with title to them are deemed to have parted with value, and to have given a valuable consideration so as to be protected as purchasers in good faith, where they did not release or transfer their debts, nor acquire them from third persons, the recovery of judgment thereon would not prejudice them, nor give them the status of "purchasers or incumbrancers in good faith" within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 164, which provides that when property is conveyed to a married woman, it is presumed to vest in her as her separate estate, which presumption is conclusive in favor of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3117-3121; vol. 8, p. 7672.]

6. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 254*)—CONVEYANCE TO WIFE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—GIFT—INTENTION.

Where property is purchased with community funds, and the conveyance made to the wife, where there was no intention that it was a gift to the wife, the conveyance to her would not invest it with that character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 901; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 151*)—CONVEYANCE TO WIFE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—GIFT—EVIDENCE OF INTENTION.

Where property was purchased with community funds, and the conveyance made to the wife, testimony of the husband and wife as to their intention with respect to the conveyance was competent.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Felix W. Ewing, Judge.

Action by James F. Fulkerson and wife against Theresia Stiles and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. T. Williams and Don. G. Bowker, for appellants. Barnes & Selby, Edward M. Selby, and Clark & Farrand, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The complaint purports to state a cause of action in favor of James F. Fulkerson to quiet title to land claimed as community property, but standing in the name of Fannie L. Fulkerson, who is the wife of James. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and this ruling is assigned as error. The complaint alleges that James F. Fulkerson is the owner of the land; that it was purchased by him in February, 1907, after his marriage with Fannie L. Fulkerson, that it was paid for with community funds; that the title thereto was taken in the name of his wife, but that he did not intend thereby to make a gift thereof to his wife, and did not in fact make such gift; and that the title was so placed "merely for the purpose of pleasing his wife." It appears from the complaint that the defendants held judgment liens against the property of the wife, upon one of which an execution had been issued, which, at the time the action was begun, had been levied upon the land in question. The defendants contend that the facts alleged, as above stated, show that the land was conveyed to the wife as a gift from the husband, and that it was her separate property. We do not think there is any ground for this contention. It is explicitly stated that James F. Fulkerson is the owner of the land. The fact that it was acquired after marriage with community funds makes it community property, the ownership of which the law places in the husband. The allegation that, although the title was taken in his wife's name, he did not intend to give it to her, is an allegation of fact which negatives the presumption that would otherwise arise under section 164 of the Civil Code that it was her separate estate.

Section 164, aforesaid, declares that when property is conveyed to a married woman by an instrument in writing, it is presumed to be vested in her as her separate estate, and that this presumption "is conclusive in favor of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration." It is claimed that the complaint shows that the defendants are incumbrancers in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and hence that the land is, in their favor, conclusively presumed to be the separate property of Fannie L. Fulkerson and subject to their judgment liens against her. The amended complaint, upon that point, alleges that the defendants recovered judgments in the superior court of the county against both of the plaintiffs, which judgments stand unsatisfied, and which would constitute liens upon their property in the county subject to execution, and that an execution upon one of the judgments had been levied upon this land, that the land had been advertised for sale thereon, and that shortly after the action was begun, it had been sold on said execution to one of the judgment plaintiffs, but that before said sale said purchaser was given actual notice that the land was not the separate property of Fannie L. Fulkerson, but was the community property of plaintiffs. It was further stated that James F. Fulkerson, in the meantime, had been adjudged a bankrupt, and that he had been discharged from these debts by the United States court in bankruptcy. This discharge disposed of the judgments, so far as he was concerned.

A judgment plaintiff has a mere general lien upon the real property of the judgment defendant. Such lien is an incumbrance, but the original judgment plaintiff is not ordinarily an incumbrancer for a valuable consideration. Whether or not one who purchases such judgment for a valuable consideration, or one who has purchased the debt for a valuable consideration, and then recovers judgment upon it, would be an incumbrancer in good faith and for a valuable consideration and as such entitled to the protection of the conclusive presumption prescribed by section 164, would be an interesting question, if it arose. But there is nothing here to show anything more than that the defendants were merely general creditors who had recovered judgments upon debts originally accruing to them. Their judgments were rendered before the land was purchased and before the deed to Fannie L. Fulkerson was made. It is obvious therefore that they did not part with anything of value upon the faith of the conveyance to her. The phrase "incumbrancers in good faith and for a valuable consideration," means persons who have taken or purchased a lien, or perhaps merely the means of obtaining one, and who have parted with something of value in consideration thereof. The payment of the money, or the parting with something of value, is essential. Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 191, 41 Pac. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29; Wilhoit v. Lyons, 98 Cal. 413, 33 Pac. 325; Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 167, 3 Pac. 641; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 45, 73 Pac. 803; California Ass'n v. Stelling, 141 Cal. 719, 75 Pac. 320. A pre-existing debt is so far a valuable consideration that one who releases it, or parts with title to it, is, in this state, deemed to have parted with value, and to have given a valuable consideration so as to be entitled to protection as a purchaser in good faith. But the cases so holding do not aid the defendants. They did not release or transfer their debts, nor acquire them from third persons. The recovery of judgment thereon did not prejudice them and did not give them the status of bona fide purchasers or incumbrancers within the meaning of this law.

Appellants claim that the evidence does not support the finding that the land was not conveyed to the wife as a gift. The husband and wife each testified that there was no intention or purpose to make a gift to her, or to make the property her separate estate. The wife testified that she did not understand that the property was to be hers. There is no evidence to the contrary. Without such intention to make a gift, mere conveyance to her would not invest it with that character. Fanning v. Green, 104 Pac. 308. There are some rulings which are assigned as error upon the admission of this testimony and other testimony of like character. We think that the testimony of the plaintiffs as to their intention with respect to the conveyance to the wife was competent testimony. We find no error in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MARSH v. LOTT. (L. A. 2418.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1900.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 6, 1910.)

1. PLEADING (§ 193*)—PLEADING—RAISING DEFENSE BY DEMURRER.

In an action for specific performance, the defense of laches may be raised by demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 432; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

2. EQUITY (§ 87*)—LACHES.

When a statute of limitation applies to a suit in equity, mere delay in commencing the suit for a period less than the statute is never a reason for dismissal, unless there are other circumstances which, in conjunction with the mere lapse of time, render such an action inequitable, and there is no rule as to the lapse of time or the circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches, but each case must be determined by its own circumstances.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 105*)—LACHES.

Plaintiff purchased for 25 cents an option, extending for more than three months, for the purchase of property worth $100,000, and before its acceptance the vendor, by written notice served on plaintiff, repudiated the option, and again repudiated it when notice was given of acceptance, and a tender was attempted of the first installment of the purchase price, after which more than three years elapsed before the purchaser attempted to enforce the contract, during all of which time the vendor had been in possession of the property, which had increased in value during that period nearly one-half. Held, that the contract could not be enforced.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 195*)—GROUNDS OF REVIEW—PRESERVATION IN LOWER COURT.

A refusal of the trial court to allow plaintiff to amend his amended complaint is not shown to be an abuse of discretion, where the record does not indicate that plaintiff asked leave to amend in any designated particular, or in any way specify the nature of the proposed amendment.

6. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 128*)—PLEADING—DAMAGES.

Under Civ. paring to enter on the land, where a complaint in an action for specific performance does not show that the value of the estate to be conveyed at the time of the breach was in excess of the agreed price, and there is no allegation showing any other damage, plaintiff will not be entitled to damages on his failure to show that he is entitled to specific performance.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Robert Marsh against M. A. Lott. A demurrer was sustained to the amended complaint without leave to amend, and plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; Sloss and Melvin, JJ., dissenting.

See, also, 8 Cal. App. 334, 97 Pac. 163.

Frank James, for appellant. J. Wiseman Macdonald, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint, without leave to amend. The action was one by the vendee for specific performance of an alleged contract for the sale of certain real estate in the city of Los Angeles.

The complaint shows the following facts:

Plaintiff was engaged in the real estate business in his own name, and also in the business name of "Robert Marsh & Co." On February 25, 1905, defendant executed and delivered to him an option for the purchase of the land, the same being as follows:

"For and in consideration of the sum of twenty-five cents to me in hand paid, I hereby give Robt. Marsh & Co., an option to purchase, at any time up to and including June 1, 1905, with privilege of 30 days' extension, from date hereof, the following described property, to wit: South ½ of lot nine and all of lot 8, block 101, Bellevue Terrace tract, and all of the property owned by myself in above block, for the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, payable thirty thousand cash balance on or before four years 4½ per cent. net.

"I agree to furnish an unlimited certificate of title showing said property to be free from all incumbrance, and to convey the same in such condition by deed of grant, bargain, and sale, and pay regular commission.

M. A. Lott [Seal.]

"Dated Feby. 25th, 1905.

"Property 90x165.

"Building 6 flats—2 cottages.

"Rents, $260.00."

On June 1, 1905, plaintiff notified defendant in writing, that he accepted the privilege of 30 days' extension, and elected to so extend the option. On June 2, 1905, defendant notified plaintiff in writing that she declared the agreement terminated and withdrew the property from sale under said agreement, and she has ever since claimed that plaintiff has no right to purchase the property under said agreement. This claim has been made "in bad faith," and solely because the property has increased in value. On June 29, 1905, plaintiff "notified the defendant * * * of his election to purchase said real estate, and duly tendered to and offered to pay her * * * in gold coin of the United States of America, said cash payment of $30,000, but she refused the same, and ever since has refused and now refuses the same." Plaintiff is and at all times has been able, willing and ready to pay defendant said $30,000. On February 25, 1905, and on June 29, 1905, the fair market and reasonable value of the property was not in excess of $100,000. Such value has gradually increased. In January, 1906, it was $115,000. Since January, 1906, it has increased in value at the rate of about $1,000 per month, being on August 5, 1908, $147,000. Ever since February 25, 1905, defendant has been in possession of the property, either in person or by her tenants, receiving all the rents and income thereof, which are $260 a month. Plaintiff "is and always has been, ready, willing, and able to fulfill the" terms of said option agreement. On August 5, 1908, plaintiff again tendered defendant $30,000 cash, and also the further sum of $70,000 cash as and for the balance of the purchase price, and also the further sum of $12,362.08 as and for interest thereon, and demanded that she execute and deliver to him a deed of conveyance of the property, and also an "unlimited certificate of title showing the said premises free from all incumbrance," but defendant refused to execute and deliver said deed or deliver said certificate of title. In the complaint, plaintiff again tenders all of said money, and offers to pay any other amount for which he may be obligated by the option agreement. This action was not commenced until August 5, 1908.

The demurrer was based on numerous grounds, but for the purposes of this appeal it will be unnecessary to consider more than one. It was specially alleged therein as ground of demurrer that it appears by said complaint that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches, and that he is not entitled to any relief in equity. It is settled in this state that this defense may be raised by demurrer (Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 250, 81 Pac. 516; Bell v. Hudson, 73 Cal. 285, 289, 14 Pac. 791, 2 Am. St. Rep. 791); such defense being, in substance, as said in the latter case, that the bill does not show equity, or, in the language of our statute, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The allegations of the complaint are clear and definite to the effect that on June 2, 1905, the defendant notified plaintiff in writing that she would not longer be bound by the option agreement, and has ever since claimed that plaintiff has not any right to purchase the property under said option agreement, and that she refused to accept the $30,000 when the same was tendered by him on June 29, 1905, and has ever since refused to accept it. Her absolute repudiation of the alleged agreement, and of any claim of plaintiff thereunder, at all times since June 2, 1905, could not be made to more clearly appear. So far as appears from the complaint, which is all we can look to in determining the question presented by the demurrer, plaintiff took no steps whatever to enforce any right possessed by him under the option agreement, notwithstanding the absolute repudiation thereof by defendant, until August 5, 1908, more than three years after such repudiation. Having made his tender of $30,000 on June 29, 1905, he rested, and until August 5, 1908, so far as any outward manifestation went, acquiesced in the position taken by defendant that the option agreement was at an end. At the last-named date, the property having increased in value since the refusal of his tender by $47,000, he concluded to attempt to enforce the alleged agreement, made a new tender of the full amount that he claimed would be due according to its terms, $112,362.98, and resorted to a court of equity for relief. It is apparent that he has been free all this time to rest on defendant's refusal to recognize the option agreement as further binding her and declining to purchase the property if for any reason he thought it advantageous to do so. This is the case made by the complaint.

It is undoubtedly true that when an express statute of limitation applies to a suit in equity, mere delay to commence the suit for a period less than that of the statute of limitations is never a reason for dismissing the proceeding. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 267, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674. There must be other circumstances which, taken in conjunction with the mere lapse of time, render it inequitable to enter into the investigation or give the relief sought. There is no artificial rule as to the lapse of time or the circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches, and each case as it arises must necessarily be determined by its own circumstances. See Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 46, 78 Pac. 467; Kleinclaus v. Dutard, supra. There is another material circumstance in the case at bar. For more than three years the plaintiff, so far as appearances went, quietly acquiesced in and assented to defendant's express refusal to consider the option as in any way binding. In his work on Specific Performance of Contracts, Mr. Pomeroy says: "Where one party, even without any just or sufficient reason for so doing, and as a mere act of arbitrary will, notifies the other that he shall not perform the contract—shall treat it as at an end—acquiescence by the party notified will cut off the latter's right of enforcement, and this acquiescence will be sufficiently shown by a delay in commencing a suit which would otherwise be too short to prejudice his rights." Sec. 412. The rule is stated in 26 American and English Encyclopedia of Law, at page 80, to be that where, after defendant's violation or express repudiation of his contract, the plaintiff delays to proceed for such a length of time as to constitute acquiescence in defendant's breach, or a presumption of abandonment of his right to specific performance, relief in equity will be denied. See, also, McDermid v. McGregor, 21 Minn. 111, 115; Harrigan v. Smith (N. J.) 40 Atl. 13; Gentry v. Rogers, 40 Ala. 442. Of course, notwithstanding the delay in moving to enforce the alleged contract, the circumstances may be such as to prevent any presumption of acquiescence or abandonment, as, for instance, where a vendee is in possession of the property under the alleged contract, and continues in such possession, claiming under the contract, notwithstanding the attempted repudiation. That the delay here shows such acquiescence seems to be very clear. A mere option, based upon the insignificant consideration of 25 cents, for the purchase of property worth $100,000, extending over a period of more than three months, and drawn in such a way as to give rise to the gravest questions as to its validity, is expressly repudiated by the vendor, by written notice served on the vendee, before there has been any acceptance by the vendee, and again when notice is given of acceptance and a tender is attempted to be made of the first installment of the purchase price. The vendee does absolutely nothing for more than three years from the refusal of such tender to indicate that he will oppose the claim of the vendor that the option is no longer binding, and it is only when, at the expiration of two years, the property has increased in value to the extent of $47,000, that he intimates any intention to oppose the claim of the vendor that the alleged option is not binding. It would be difficult to find a clearer case of apparent acquiescence than that shown by such circumstances, unexplained and unaffected by other circumstances. During this period of more than three years the plaintiff has been in no way obligated to make this purchase. In view of the great increase in the value of this property, it would be manifestly unfair and inequitable to allow him at this late day, after such acquiescence, to insist that the alleged option agreement shall now be enforced.

Learned counsel for plaintiff does not seriously contend that the absolute failure of plaintiff to take any step to enforce his alleged rights within three years after the repudiation of the contract would not, under the circumstances here stated, constitute laches barring the remedy of specific performance. He does insist, however, that either the court will take judicial notice of certain alleged facts stated by him in his brief, showing that the plaintiff did diligently proceed to enforce his claim, or that he should have been permitted to amend his complaint by inserting allegations showing such matters. The matter of which he desires us to take judicial notice is, as stated in his brief, a prior action brought by plaintiff against defendant to specifically enforce this option agreement. As to this, he substantially states in his brief the following: The action was tried in the superior court of Los Angeles county, and resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant. The plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court. The appeal was transferred to the District Court of Appeal. That court affirmed the judgment of the superior court on June 20, 1908. This action was commenced within a reasonable time thereafter. No authority is cited for the proposition that we can take judicial notice of these matters in determining the sufficiency of the complaint in this action, and we know of no rule warranting it. As to the refusal to allow plaintiff to amend his amended complaint, there is nothing in the record to indicate that he asked leave in the superior court to amend in any designated particular, or in any way specified therein the nature of any proposed amendment. We do not see how, under such circumstances, we could hold that the superior court abused its discretion in denying leave to amend. See Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 252, 81 Pac. 516, and cases there cited.

The reason for the failure of plaintiff to allege the former action for the purpose of avoiding the laches otherwise shown becomes apparent enough when we examine the opinion of the District Court of Appeal given June 20, 1908, in affirming the judgment against this plaintiff. See Marsh v. Lott, 8 Cal. App. 384, 97 Pac. 163. If by alleging the facts as to the former case he would have avoided the bar of laches, he would by the same facts have shown himself estopped by the judgment in that case to now seek specific performance of the option agreement. From the opinion it appears that such action was one by this plaintiff against this defendant for the specific enforcement of this very option, instituted after and because of the repudiation thereof by defendant and her refusal to comply in any way with its terms, which were alleged. Issues of fact were joined therein, and trial thereof had, resulting in a judgment on the merits in favor of the defendant. Manifestly, in view of the complete repudiation and disavowal of the alleged option by the defendant and the refusal to accept any tender thereunder, plaintiff was then entitled to some relief by way of specific performance if the option was binding on defendant, even if not then entitled to a deed. It cannot be held, therefore, that the former action was prematurely brought, and it was not decided on any such theory. The trial court found, not only that the consideration for the option was inadequate and insufficient, but also "that the said option contract was not just and reasonable to defendant." The District Court of Appeal, while disagreeing with the trial court on the question of the adequacy of consideration for the option, sustained the finding as to the contract not being just and reasonable, saying: "In our judgment the only construction of which the contract is susceptible renders it manifestly unjust and unreasonable as to the defendant." Under elementary principles the judgment on the merits denying plaintiff any relief by way of specific performance, based on this material finding of the invalidity of his alleged contract, precludes further litigation of that question between the parties. We have said this much on the question of estoppel, not for the purpose of justifying an affirmation of the refusal of the trial court to allow plaintiff to again amend his complaint, but simply to show that, had the complaint contained the allegations as to the prior action, it could not have availed plaintiff as against the defense of estoppel by judgment.

It is suggested that the complaint stated facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to damages, even if it did not show him entitled to specific performance. We cannot so hold. Section 3306 of the Civil Code provides that the detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon, but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, "at the time of the breach," and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land. There is absolutely nothing in the complaint tending to show the value of the estate to be conveyed at the time of the breach other than such allegations as tend to show that the fair market and reasonable value at that time did not exceed $100,000, which was the agreed price, and there is no allegation showing damage as to any other element prescribed in said section. It is therefore unnecessary to notice any other claim by plaintiff in response to this contention of defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEWLOVE v. MERCANTILE TRUST CO.
OF SAN FRANCISCO. (L. A. 2,389.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 602*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES DEVISED—"CONDITION SUBSEQUENT"—EXECUTORY DEVISE.

Where a testator devised all his real estate to his sons equally, and provided that none of the property should be sold until 10 years after his death, and that if any of his sons contracted habits of vice before the division he thereby forfeited his share, and if any of the sons died before division his share should go to the remaining heirs unless he left children, the devise vested in the sons the fee subject to divestiture or termination on any son contracting habits of vice before division, which is a "condition subsequent," defined by Civ. Code, § 1349, as where an estate is given so as to vest immediately, subject to be divested by some subsequent act or event, or on the death of any son before division; the gift over in such case being a mere executory devise, which takes effect on the happening of some contingent event in substitution for a fee previously devised.

2. WILLS (§ 742*)—ESTATES DEVISED—TRANSFERABLE INTERESTS.

A devise in fee of an undivided interest in real estate, which vests immediately at testator's death, subject to termination on the happening of a designated subsequent act or event, is an interest in realty which is transferable by the devisee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1900; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

3. INSOLVENCY (§ 82*)—SALES BY ASSIGNEE—EFFECT.

Insolvency Act (St. 1880, p. 87, c. 87), § 21, subd. 4, authorizing the assignee to sell all the real and personal estate vested in him as assignee which shall come to his possession and as ordered by the court, does not limit the power to sell any property of the insolvent, simply because it cannot be taken into actual physical possession, either by the insolvent or his assignee; but an insolvent's undivided interest in real estate, created by a will devising in fee to him an undivided interest in real estate, subject to be divested on the happening of a designated subsequent act or event, is a part of his estate, and the assignee may sell the same under order of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insolvency, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 518*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK—INSOLVENCY PROCEEDINGS.

An action to quiet title by an insolvent against a purchaser under a sale by the assignee in insolvency, on the ground of the invalidity of the insolvency proceedings, is a collateral attack on such proceedings, and hence only such matters may be considered as go to the jurisdiction of the court in insolvency.

5. INSOLVENCY (§ 21*)—PETITION—SCHEDULES—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the schedule annexed to a voluntary petition in insolvency gave the names of the creditors in a column, headed "Names of Creditors," and opposite each name in another column the residence of the creditor, and placed in another column, headed "Sum Due," sums as "70.00" "441.54" and so on, aggregating "2551.03," and the petition stated that the schedule contained the names of the creditors and the sum due to each, the omission of the dollar mark as a prefix to the figures in the schedule of debts to designate the amount of the debt did not render the petition and schedule insufficient to confer jurisdiction on the court under Insolvency Act (St. 1880, p. 82, c. 87), § 2, limiting the operation of the act to persons owing more than $300.

7. INSOLVENCY (§ 16*) — JURISDICTION OF COURT — PETITION AND SCHEDULES — SUFFICIENCY.

Where the original petition in insolvency and the schedules annexed thereto purported to contain a full, true, and perfect discovery of all the insolvent's real and personal estate, and on their face complied with the statute, the court acquired jurisdiction to proceed under Insolvency Act (St. 1880, p. 83, c. 87), § 4, providing that the inventory must contain an accurate description of the real and personal estate of the petitioner, though the inventory failed to include property subsequently inventoried in an amended schedule; the omission being due to the fact that the petitioner had been advised by his attorney that such property should be omitted.

8. INSOLVENCY (§ 21*) — JURISDICTION OF COURT — PETITION AND SCHEDULES — SUFFICIENCY.

The jurisdiction of the court in insolvency under the insolvency act (St. 1880, p. 82, c. 87) depends on the sufficiency of the averments in the petition and schedules annexed, and not on the truth of such averments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insolvency, Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

9. INSOLVENCY (§ 22*)—NOTICE OF TIME AND PLACE FOR MEETING OF CREDITORS—PUBLICATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Insolvency Act (St. 1880, p. 83, c. 87), §§ 6, 7, provide that the order adjudicating the insolvency and appointing a time and place for the meeting of creditors shall be published in a newspaper as often as the same is printed before the meeting of creditors, and that the day named shall not be less than 30 days after the making of the order. On Monday, February 4th, the court adjudged petitioner insolvent, and specified March 16th following as the time for the meeting of creditors. The affidavit of publication stated that the order was published in a newspaper for 36 days successively next before March 16th, and as often as the said paper was published, which was on every Saturday. Held that, as the 36 days described in the affidavit of publication included every publication day of the newspaper between the adjudication and time fixed for the meeting of creditors, the publication was sufficient.

10. INSOLVENCY (§ 22*)—ORDER ADJUDICATING INSOLVENCY AND APPOINTING TIME FOR MEETING OF CREDITORS—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY—"FORTHWITH"—"IMMEDIATE."

Under Insolvency Act (St. 1880, p. 83, c. 87), § 7, providing that a copy of the order adjudicating one insolvent and appointing a time and place for a meeting of creditors shall be served "forthwith" by mail on all creditors, proof that the order was mailed four days after its making, but prior to the first publication thereof in a newspaper, and more than 30 days before the time fixed for the creditors' meeting, shows a compliance with the statute; the term "forthwith," like the term "immediate," not being construed as a time immediately succeeding, without an interval.

11. WILLS (§ 560*)—ESTATES DEVISED—PROPERTY OF TESTATOR.

Testator, devising all of his real estate to his sons equally, was at the time of his death in possession of land under a contract for its purchase stipulating for payment in installments. On full payment, after testator's death, the vendor executed a conveyance to the executors in trust for the persons interested in the estate of testator. Held, that the conveyance to the executors vested a legal title to the property in the same manner as if the deed had been executed prior to testator's death, and the property was a part of the estate and passed under the will.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Newlove against the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. From an order denying a new trial after judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas (Henley C. Booth, of counsel), for appellant. Richards & Carrier and Heney & Cobb, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to quiet title to an undivided interest in certain real property in Santa Barbara county. The defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The real property in question is an undivided one-twelfth of what is called the "Newlove ranch." Plaintiff's claim is that he became the owner of this under the terms of the will of his father, John Newlove, who died January 29, 1889. By the fourth paragraph of his will John Newlove gave to his six sons, including plaintiff, all of his real estate, share and share alike; the words of the will in this respect being as follows: "I give to my sons, * * * all my real estate, share and share alike." All his property being community property, and his wife, the mother of plaintiff and his brothers, surviving and being entitled to one-half, the devise to the six sons was effectual only as to an undivided half of the real property. At the time of his death, John Newlove was in possession of said Newlove ranch under a contract for the purchase thereof dated December 28, 1880, from one Kaiser for $10,000, $2,000 of which was paid at the date of the contract, and the remainder of which, bearing interest, was payable in 10 equal annual installments commencing January 1, 1893, with the option to pay the whole purchase price and interest due at any time. Upon full payment being made, a conveyance of the property was to be executed to him. On June 16, 1891, the purchase money having been fully paid, Kaiser executed a conveyance of the property to Joseph H. Newlove and Charles W. Newlove, "as executors of the last will of said John Newlove, deceased, * * * in trust for all the persons interested in the estate of said John Newlove, deceased, according to their respective interests therein." The will of John Newlove provided that none of his real estate should be sold until 10 years after his decease, and it further provided, in the seventh paragraph thereof: "Should any of my sons, or either one of them, contract habits of vice, such as drinking, gambling, etc., before the division of my property, he thereby forfeits his share of the estate, and the same shall be divided among the balance of the heirs, share and share alike. My executor to be the sole judge of the matter. And should any one or more of my sons die before the division of the estate, then his share shall be divided among the remaining heirs, share and share alike, unless he or they should have sons or daughters, in which case it should be set apart for his children as the law provides." Administration of the estate of John Newlove is still pending, and no division of the property has ever been made. Nothing has occurred upon which could be based any claim of forfeiture under the provision of the will already quoted. The undivided one-twelfth of the property in controversy here is the undivided one-twelfth directly given plaintiff, by the devise already referred to. The defendant claims to be the owner of this undivided one-twelfth solely as the successor in interest of plaintiff, by virtue of a sale thereof made on February 24, 1896, by the assignee of his estate in insolvency proceedings had under the act of April 16, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 82, c. 87); it having acquired whatever interest therein was conveyed to the purchaser at the assignee's sale by the assignee's deed.

1. Assuming the validity of the insolvency proceedings to and including the assignee's deed, which deed purported to convey "all right, title and interest of whatsoever kind and nature, either in law or in equity of the said Frank H. Newlove, insolvent debtor, and of the said W. A. Haslam assignee as aforesaid, in and to" the said Newlove ranch, it was earnestly contended on the oral argument that the deed was ineffectual for any purpose for the reason that, under the terms of the will, plaintiff had no assignable interest in said land at the time of the assignee's sale; in other words, that he had only such an expectancy as the law denominates "a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest," which, as declared by section 1045 of the Civil Code, cannot be transferred. It is somewhat difficult to reconcile the position of plaintiff in making this claim with that occupied by him in maintaining this action. He has acquired no additional interest in the Newlove ranch since the insolvency proceedings and the assignee's deed. Whatever interest therein he has now he must have had then. He says in his complaint herein that he is the owner in fee simple of an undivided one-twelfth thereof; but, if his contention that we are discussing be well based, he has no vested interest whatever in the property, but simply "a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest," as, for instance, the expectancy of an heir apparent during the life of the ancestor.

However this may be, the claim is not well founded. In our opinion there can be no serious question as to the proper construction of the will of John Newlove in this regard. The devise to his six sons was absolute in terms, direct, and not by way of trust. There is nothing in the will purporting to limit the effect of this except such provisions as may be held to withhold actual possession and enjoyment of the property until "division" or "distribution," the provision in regard to forfeiture by any son of "his share," should he contract habits of vice, etc., before the "division" of the property, and the provision for a division among the remaining heirs of the share of any devisee dying without issue before the "division" of the estate. Of course, it is not claimed that a mere postponement of the time of enjoyment or possession of the property devised would prevent the vesting of the property devised in a devisee at the testator's death, and there is nothing in the language used that indicates any intent on the part of the testator that the estate given should not vest at his death. The provision as to forfeiture simply establishes a condition subsequent upon the happening of which the estate given shall be divested. The language is not "if" any of my sons abstain from contracting certain habits for a prescribed time, "then I give," etc., or language of similar import, upon which an argument might reasonably be made that the testator intended the estate given to vest only upon compliance by the devisee with the terms prescribed. He first gave the property absolutely to his sons, and then, in a succeeding paragraph, inserted the forfeiture provision: "Should any of my sons * * * contract habits * * * he thereby forfeits his share," etc. This clearly implies the loss of something already acquired by the person who suffers the penalty. As defined by the Standard Dictionary, the term "forfeit" in law means "to lose and surrender to an individual or the state (something that belongs to one) for misconduct, or breach of duty,—lose title to as a penalty." What is it that he is to forfeit if he does the forbidden thing? The testator expressly says that it is "his share of the estate." There can hardly be a clearer example of the "condition subsequent" defined by section 1349, Civ. Code, where it is declared: "A condition subsequent is where an estate or interest is so given as to vest immediately, subject only to be divested by some subsequent act or event." The provision for a division among others of the share of one dying before the division of the estate, commencing, "and should any one * * * of my sons die," etc., is an example of the creation of the most common kind of executory devise, one to take effect upon the happening of some contingent event, "in substitution for and in derogation of" a fee previously devised, and which has no effect upon the precedent estate in fee until the contingency happens upon which the executory devise vests and "terminates prematurely the interest which preceded it." See 2 Underhill, Law of Wills, p. 1329. Construed in the light of the well-established presumption in favor of the vesting of estates, it is very clear to us that plaintiff, by reason of the devise in the will, was vested at his father's death with the fee of an undivided one-twelfth of all his real estate, subject to divestiture or termination upon the happening of some subsequent act or event. We are satisfied that it must be held, in view of the deed made by Kaiser to the executors of the will of John Newlove subsequent to his death in execution of the agreement of sale, that the Newlove ranch must be treated as part of the property of deceased at the time of his death. In view of what we have said, it is clear that whatever may be said as to such interest as plaintiff may have in the shares of the other devisees by reason of the provisions for forfeiture and death before division, his interest in the one-twelfth share directly devised to him, the only property in issue here, was a vested interest which could be transferred by him.

2. It is claimed, assuming the insolvency proceedings to have been otherwise regular, that, in view of certain language of the insolvency act, the assignee had no power to sell any property of the insolvent that had not come into his actual physical possession, that the record shows that the assignee had no such possession of plaintiff's undivided interest, and that the attempted sale was therefore void. This claim is based on the language of subdivision 4 of section 21 of the insolvency act, the section defining the general powers of the assignee, where it is provided that he shall have power "from time to time to sell at public auction all the estate, real and personal, vested in him as such assignee, which shall come to his possession and as ordered by the court." It cannot be doubted that plaintiff's interest in the Newlove ranch was, in the contemplation of the insolvency act, a part of his estate and liable for his debts, and that the same, with all other property of every kind and nature, was vested in the assignee by the assignment made to him by the clerk of the court. Section 17, Insolvency Act. The character of property owned by an insolvent is such in many instances that it is impossible for an assignee to personally have actual physical possession thereof, as is well illustrated in the case of this particular property, an undivided interest in certain real property of deceased, the administration of whose estate is pending in the probate court and whose property is in the actual possession of the executors of the will of deceased for purposes of administration. Another illustration would be the situation existing where the insolvent owned valuable real property subject only to a life estate in another. Plaintiff's construction of subdivision 4 of section 21 would render it impossible to subject such property to the satisfaction of the insolvent's debts, even though it be the only property owned by him. That the Legislature intended any such inequitable result is not to be concluded, unless the terms of the statute necessarily require it. We are satisfied that the statute should not be construed as a limitation upon the power to sell, under order of the court, any property of the insolvent, simply because, in view of the nature of the estate of the insolvent therein, it cannot be taken into actual physical possession either of the insolvent or his assignee. Plaintiff's contention in this regard is based upon the refusal of the trial court to allow a question which, as we read it, went simply to the actual physical possession by the assignee of the Newlove ranch. There was no claim that the ranch was in the possession of any one claiming adversely to the estate of John Newlove or his devisees, or that plaintiff was entitled to possession thereof or any portion thereof as against the executors. We are of the opinion that the objection to the question was properly sustained. The other points made by plaintiff all relate to the validity of the insolvency proceedings. This being a collateral attack on such proceedings, it is manifest that only such matters may be considered as go to the jurisdiction of the court in insolvency.

3. It is claimed that the court never obtained jurisdiction in those proceedings for the reason that the voluntary petition in insolvency filed by plaintiff did not show that he owed debts exceeding in amount $300; the statute (section 2) limiting the operation of that act in cases of voluntary insolvency to persons owing more than that sum. The basis of this claim is the omission to place a dollar mark as a prefix to the figures used in the schedule of debts to designate the amount of debt or "sum due" each creditor named therein. The contention of plaintiff appears unworthy of serious discussion, when considered in the light of the petition and annexed schedules. The petition states that Schedule B thereto annexed contains the names, etc., of his creditors "and the sum due to each creditor," etc. Schedule B gives the names of the creditors in a column headed "Names of Creditors," and opposite each name in another column is given the residence of the creditor, and then in another column, headed "Sum Due," is placed the sum, as follows: "70.00," "441.54," "830.43," and so on, aggregating "2551.03." Other columns showing nature of indebtedness, cause thereof, etc., follow. In the connection in which they are used, these terms necessarily denote sums of money. The dollar is the legal unit of money in the United States, and, whenever figures are used to denote a sum of money, "such figures must, of course, be understood to represent 'dollars,' unless a different intention is clearly expressed." See Hunt v. Smith, 9 Kan. 137. As written here, no person of ordinary understanding could doubt that these amounts meant 70.00-100 dollars, 441.54-100 dollars, etc. In addition to this, Schedule C, containing a description of the property of the insolvent and its value, shows very clearly what was meant by such entries as "70.00," "441.54," etc.; the dollar mark being used in the column designated "Value" and as a prefix to the first item therein, "150.00," and also being used as a prefix to the items showing total valuation of personal property. Plaintiff relies on certain decisions in which it was held that mere numerical figures in a tax assessment roll do not express the value of the property as assessed; but as said of these in Dyke v. Bank of Orange, 90 Cal. 401, 27 Pac. 305: "While admitting that the strict rule applied to the assessment cases may be too firmly established to be overruled or disregarded by the courts in that class of cases, * * * there is no necessity for extending it to the class to which this case belongs." The distinction between voluntary proceedings in insolvency and proceedings in invitum for taxes is too obvious to require comment.

4. It is further claimed that the court failed to acquire jurisdiction of the proceedings by reason of the failure of plaintiff to include, in the inventory annexed to his petition, any mention of an interest in the Newlove ranch. The statute required (section 4) that said inventory must contain an accurate description of all the estate, both real and personal, of the petitioner. As appears from the amended schedule subsequently filed by the insolvent, including this property, the omission was due to the fact that he had been advised by his attorney that it should not be included. The original petition and schedules did purport to contain a full, true, and perfect discovery of all his real and personal estate, and, on their face, complied in all respects with the statute. This was all that was essential to give the court jurisdiction to proceed. The requirements as to jurisdiction are stated in Friedlander v. Loucks, 34 Cal. 24, to be: "First, a petition setting forth substantially such a state of facts as will bring the case within the provisions of the statute and show that the petitioner is entitled to the relief therein provided for; and, second, due publication of notice to creditors." See, also, Bennett v. His Creditors, 22 Cal. 42. Under elementary rules, the jurisdiction depends upon the sufficiency of the averments, and not upon the truth of those averments. La Point v. Boulware, 104 Cal. 264, 37 Pac. 927, cited by plaintiff, is not at all in point. There the petition filed by creditors failed to state facts which would sustain an adjudication that the debtor was an insolvent. It was held, in Rued v. Cooper, 109 Cal. 682, 34 Pac. 98, that property not included in the insolvent's schedule or known to the assignee until after his discharge passed to the assignee by virtue of his assignment. See, also, Poehlmann v. Kennedy, 48 Cal. 201. Of course, this could not be, if the mere failure to include the property in the inventory could affect the jurisdiction. As said in Friedlander v. Loucks, supra: "The questions made here relate to movements within the jurisdiction, rather than to the jurisdiction itself."

5. It is claimed that the order adjudicating plaintiff an insolvent and appointing a time and place for the meeting of creditors was not published for the full time required by law, or mailed to the creditors as required by law; the statute providing (section 7) that a copy of said order shall immediately be published by the clerk of the court in the newspaper designated therein as often as the newspaper is printed before the meeting of creditors, and be served by the clerk forthwith by mail upon all creditors. The day named shall not be less than 30 days after the making of said order. Section 6. The petition was filed February 4, 1895, and the adjudication of insolvency made on the same day; the order specifying March 16, 1895, at 10 a. m., as the time for the meeting of creditors and designating the Santa Maria Times, a weekly newspaper, as the paper in which the same should be published. The affidavit of publication stated that the order was published in said newspaper "for 36 days successively next before March 16, 1895, and as often during said period of 36 days as the said paper was published, to wit, on every Saturday." The point in regard to the publication is that, as there were 40 days between February 4th and March 16th, it was not made to appear that the order was published in every issue of the paper between the making of the order and the time fixed thereby for the meeting of creditors; but it was so made to appear. The affidavit fairly showed that the paper was published only on Saturday of each week, and an examination of the calendar for the year 1895 shows that February 4th of that year, the day on which the adjudication was made, was a Monday. The 36 days described in the affidavit of publication thus included every publication day of the Santa Maria Times between the adjudication and the time fixed thereby for the meeting of creditors. The publication was therefore in full accord with the statute. The affidavit of the clerk as to the service by mail of the notice on creditors shows that he did not mail the notice until February 8th, the fourth day after the making of the order, but prior to the first publication of the notice in the newspaper, and over 30 days before the time fixed for the creditors' meeting. Under the circumstances, this was a sufficient compliance with the statute. The term "forthwith," like the term "immediately," "is not in law to be necessarily construed as a time immediately succeeding without an interval." See Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 73, 13 Pac. 73, 1 Am. St. Rep. 34. "In every case the meaning depends upon the circumstances of the case and the act to be performed." Lewis v. Curry, 103 Pac. 496. We think that under the wording of this statute a mailing that is as early as the first possible publication in the newspaper designated by the court should be held to measure up to the requirement in this regard.

6. As we have before said, the effect of the conveyance of the Newlove ranch by Kaiser to the executors of the will of John Newlove was to vest a legal title to the property in the same manner as if the deed had been executed prior to the death of John Newlove. The property was thenceforth, if not before, a part of his estate, and plaintiff had a legal title to an undivided one-twelfth, subject to the possession of the executors for purposes of administration.

There is no other matter meriting discussion.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

■ In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Albert Pigeon against W. P. Fuller & Co. (a corporation). From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Franklin P. Bull and L. A. Wittenmyer, for appellant. Stanley Moore (Edw. A. Foley, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff had judgment for $5,000, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The amended complaint alleges that on July 8, 1903, and for some eight months previous thereto, plaintiff was in the employ of defendant and engaged in the melting of pig lead into buckles and assisting as a laborer in the manufacture of white lead at defendant's factory near the town of Baden, in San Mateo county. In consequence of such work, the plaintiff on said 8th day of July became lead poisoned, and thereby paralyzed on the right side of his body, including his right arm and leg, and seriously injured internally. Said employment was, as is averred, "an extremely dangerous one, as was well known to the defendant, and liable to cause lead poisoning and paralysis, but at all the times herein mentioned plaintiff was entirely in ignorance of such danger, and would not have assumed or engaged in such employment if he had been warned of such danger." The "defendant negligently failed at the time it employed this plaintiff to warn him or inform him in any way of the danger of said employment, and defendant at all times herein mentioned negligently omitted to warn plaintiff of said danger and carelessly allowed him to remain in ignorance of the same." There are further allegations to the effect that the defendant did not attempt to make the rooms in which plaintiff was working safe; that it negligently failed to equip them with any means of ventilation; and that it negligently failed to provide plaintiff with any muzzle or device to prevent the dust from said white lead, or the fumes and smoke arising from the melting of said buckles, from entering plaintiff's nostrils and mouth, as it was defendant's duty to do. It is alleged that the injuries sustained by plaintiff were permanent in their character. No demurrer was interposed to this pleading. The defendant filed an answer denying many of the material averments, and upon the issues so raised the case went to trial. It is now claimed that the amended complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that it does not allege that the defendant had knowledge that plaintiff was not cognizant of the danger incident to his work. We may assume, as is contended by appellant, that, in so far as plaintiff's case rested upon the failure to warn, it was necessary for him to allege and show that the defendant knew, or should in the exercise of reasonable care have known, that plaintiff was not fully informed of the dangerous character of the employment. But, granting this, the amended complaint under the rules of pleading frequently announced by this court sufficiently stated the necessary fact. It alleged the defendant's knowledge of the dangerous character of the employment, the plaintiff's ignorance of such danger, and the fact that the defendant negligently failed at the time it employed plaintiff or thereafter to warn or inform him of the danger of such employment. It is the settled rule in this state that it is sufficient to allege negligence in general terms, specifying, however, the particular act alleged to have been negligently done. Stephenson v. S. P. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407; House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308. In other jurisdictions in which the same rule applies, it has been held that an allegation that a defendant did a certain thing negligently carries with it the averment that he had, or was at fault in not having, the knowledge which was necessary to make his act a negligent one. Chicago R. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 55 Neb. 748, 76 N. W. 462; Crane v. Railway Co., 87 Mo. 588; Louisville, etc., Railroad Co. v. Utz, 133 Ind. 265, 32 N. E. 881; O'Connor v. I. C. Ry. Co., 83 Iowa, 105, 48 N. W. 1002. The allegation that defendant negligently failed to warn plaintiff was therefore an averment that defendant knew, or should have known, that plaintiff stood in need of warning.

A point most strongly urged by appellant is that a reversal must be ordered by reason of the action of the court and the jury with regard to certain special issues. Nine of such issues were, at appellant's request, submitted to the jury. A tenth the court declined to submit. Of the nine six were answered. No answer was returned to the other three. The three not answered were the following: "(6) Was plaintiff entirely in ignorance of such danger (i. e., the danger incident to the employment)?" "(8) Did defendant, W. P. Fuller & Co., make the rooms in which plaintiff was working safe and equip them with means of ventilation, and did they adopt and use the best methods and appliances known for the protection of their employes?" "(9) Did the defendant, W. P. Fuller & Co., in the construction of its white lead department where Albert Pigeon, the plaintiff, worked, exercise such care as men of ordinary intelligence ordinarily exercise under like circumstances and conditions, taking into consideration the character of the work?" The trial court, in acting upon appellant's request for the submission of special issues, made certain remarks which, it is claimed, the jury might well have interpreted as a direction that answers to the questions were not required. We may, for the purposes of this case, treat this action of the court as a refusal to submit such issues as were not in fact answered. At the time this case was tried (in October, 1905), section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure had recently been amended so as to take from the trial court the discretion which had been theretofore (St. 1905, p. 56, c. 62), and has now, by an amendment of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 193, c. 121), again been vested in it with respect to directing special findings. The provision then in force made it compulsory upon the court, upon written request of a party, to direct the jury to find in writing upon all or any of the issues. But even under this state of the law the court, although deprived of discretion in the matter of whether or not to submit special interrogatories to the jury at all, was still to determine whether or not a question propounded was proper for submission. The test of its propriety was stated by this court in Plyler v. Pacific Portland Cement Co., 152 Cal. 125, 92 Pac. 56, to depend "upon two conditions: (1) Is the question so framed as to admit of a plain and direct answer; and (2) would an answer favorable to the party preferring the request be inconsistent with a general verdict for his adversary?" If either of these queries can be answered in the negative, the court is justified in refusing to submit the issue. And, even if a special issue has been given to the jury, a failure to answer it will not be deemed prejudicial, if the answer does not comply with the second of the tests above mentioned. Clementson on Special Verdicts, 109; 20 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 30; Schneider v. C., etc., R. R. Co., 42 Minn. 68, 43 N. W. 783; C. & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Dunleavy, 129 Ill. 132, 22 N. E. 15; Town of Wakefield v. Wakefield Water Co., 182 Mass. 429, 65 N. E. 814. If therefore, there would have been no inconsistency between the general verdict in favor of plaintiff and an answer in favor of defendant to the sixth, eighth, and ninth interrogatories, the result will be the same whether it be said that the court declined to submit these interrogatories or that the jury failed to answer them. Taking, first, question 6: "Was plaintiff entirely in ignorance of such danger?" An answer to this question most favorable to the appellant would have been "No." A finding, however, that plaintiff was not entirely ignorant of the danger, would not have been inconsistent with the general verdict. A servant is not precluded from recovery against a master who, without proper warning or instruction, puts him to work in a dangerous place by the fact that he may have some degree of knowledge or comprehension of the danger. He will not be held to have consented to assume the risk unless there is "a thorough comprehension on his part of the danger and the risk and a voluntary undertaking by him of that risk and danger." Brooke v. Ramsden, 63 L. T. (N. S.) 287. In Thomas v. Quartermaine, L. R. 18, Q. B. Div. 685, the rule was thus stated: "It is plain that mere knowledge may not be a conclusive defense. There may be a perception of the existence of the danger, without comprehension of the risk, as, where the workman is of imperfect intelligence, or, though he knows the danger remains imperfectly informed as to its character or extent." So in Mundle v. Hill Mfg. Co., 86 Me. 400, 30 Atl. 16, the Supreme Court of Maine said: "One does not voluntarily assume a risk within the meaning of the rule that debars recovery when he merely knows there is some danger without appreciating the danger." See, also, Fitzgerald v. Paper Co., 155 Mass. 155, 29 N. E. 464, 31 Am. St. Rep. 537; Jarvis v. Coes Wrench Co., 177 Mass. 170, 58 N. E. 587; Labatt on Master and Servant, § 320. In Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 55 Pac. 425, an action by a laborer employed about a threshing machine to recover damages for injuries received by him through the explosion of the boiler, the court said that an instruction declaring that the plaintiff could not recover if he knew of the alleged defects of the machinery, or had equal opportunity with the defendants of knowing such defects, was rightfully refused. "The instruction," it was said, "omits the important element that the employé must not only know of the defects, but must know the dangers and risks attending the operation of the machinery by reason of the defects." Entire ignorance of the danger on the part of plaintiff was not therefore essential to a recovery. He was entitled to a verdict and judgment if he satisfied the jury that he had some degree of knowledge of the dangerous character of the employment, but did not understand or appreciate its full nature or extent. He may, for example, have observed that the melted pig lead gave off fumes, and that dust arose from the white lead in the process of manufacture, and that this involved the possibility of some degree of discomfort or injury, without realizing or understanding that the very serious disorders from which he claims to be suffering were a probable consequence. In the face of appellant's contention, strongly urged even on appeal, that there is no danger in the employment in question, it can hardly be claimed that the plaintiff must, as matter of law, be held to have known that the inhalation of the fumes and dust had a tendency to produce lead poisoning, with its accompaniments of loss of teeth, paralysis, and derangement of the digestive organs. This is not a fact of universal knowledge, nor was it necessarily apparent to one employed even for a long time, in defendant's works. The risks assumed by a servant are only the ordinary risks of the employment. He does not assume the risk of hidden dangers which are, to the knowledge of the master, not apparent to him. Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306, 25 Am. St. Rep. 138; Tedford v. L. A. Elec. Co., 134 Cal. 76, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85. There was ample evidence to warrant a finding that plaintiff, by reason of his prior experience, knew that some risk attached to work in a white lead factory, but that, until he was suddenly stricken down, he had no conception of the real character or extent of the danger which he incurred. Such partial knowledge on his part would have necessitated a negative answer to the question whether he was entirely ignorant of the danger.

There is no force in appellant's contention that, because plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he was entirely ignorant of the danger, he cannot now be heard to say that an issue framed in the precise words of his own pleading did not require an answer. The fact that plaintiff may have alleged more than was required of him does not impose upon him the obligation of proving anything beyond the facts essential to constitute his cause of action. If an immaterial issue is raised by the pleadings, the fact that it is so raised does not require a jury to specially find upon it.

Of special issues 8 and 9 it may be said that an affirmative answer to each would not have helped appellant's cause, in view of the general verdict and of the answers given by the jury to the six questions on which an agreement was reached. The eighth and ninth interrogatories dealt with the question of the care exercised by the defendant in making safe the rooms in which plaintiff worked, and the methods and appliances in use. The complaint alleged negligence in three respects: (1) The failure to warn plaintiff of the dangerous character of the work; (2) the failure to properly construct the shops; and (3) the failure to furnish proper appliances. If the business was a dangerous one, and the defendant, with actual or constructive notice of plaintiff's ignorance of its danger, put him to work without giving him proper warning, it is not relieved of responsibility because it has used the utmost care to reduce the danger as much as possible. The jury found, in answer to special interrogatories 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7 that the plaintiff was lead poisoned and thereby paralyzed; that these injuries were the result of plaintiff's working at defendant's factory in the manner described in his complaint; that this employment was an extremely dangerous one; that plaintiff's physical condition was in no degree caused by any prior employment; that the defendant knew that plaintiff's employment was an extremely dangerous one and liable to cause lead poisoning and paralysis; and that the defendant was not entitled to believe, nor did it believe, that the plaintiff had such a degree of intelligence and experience as to apprise him of the danger incident to the business in which he was engaged. A finding that plaintiff did not understand or appreciate the danger to which he was subjected was not necessary, because, as we have seen in discussing issue No. 6, this question was not put to the jury. A general verdict imports a finding in favor of the prevailing party on every material issue; that is to say, at the least, on every material issue not specially submitted or requested to be submitted to the jury. The jury, then, found every fact necessary to establish the defendant's negligence on the first ground asserted, viz., the failure to warn of danger not apparent. This is enough to sustain the judgment. An answer to questions 8 and 9 in favor of the defendant would merely have meant that it was not negligent in the two particulars of construction of the buildings and furnishing of appliances. This, of course, would not relieve it from responsibility for its negligence in failing to warn the plaintiff of the dangerous character of the employment. Regardless of other grounds urged by respondent, the failure to put or to answer questions 8 and 9 could not have been prejudicial.

As has been said, the defendant requested the submission of a tenth issue to the jury, and this was refused by the court. This interrogatory read as follows: "(10) Did W. P. Fuller & Co., the defendant, use ordinary care in the selection of its superintendent and the employes in charge of the factory who employed plaintiff?" This question was not addressed to any material issue in the case. It was not charged in the complaint that the defendant had failed to exercise proper care in the selection of its employes. If it be claimed that this question had a bearing on the issue of negligence in failing to warn plaintiff of the danger of his employment, the answer is that, where the duty to warn exists, it is a personal duty of the employer—one that cannot be delegated by it to subordinates. Tedford v. L. A. Elec. Co., 134 Cal. 76, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85, and cases cited.

We see no error in the instructions 7 and 8 given by the court at the request of plaintiff. Without quoting them, we may say simply that they give general definitions of negligence in terms which have frequently had the approval of courts. Indeed, the appellant advances no reason for its contention that they are erroneous. Of instructions Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, and 17 it is said by appellant that they assume that the defendant had been apprised of plaintiff's alleged ignorance of the dangers lurking in his employment. But an examination of the instructions discloses that they contain no such assumption. Instruction 10 states the obligation of the master where the servant is known to be without experience in such work, or without any knowledge of the danger connected therewith. There is no implication that this plaintiff was known to be ignorant or inexperienced. No. 11 deals with defendant's knowledge of the dangerous character of the employment, and declares that it is immaterial whether defendant actually knew of its dangerous character, provided the employment was in fact dangerous, and defendant could have become aware of such danger by the exercise of ordinary care—a proposition that is obviously correct. No. 12 and No. 13 contain no reference whatever to defendant's knowledge of plaintiff's ignorance of the dangers of the employment. No. 17 expressly conditions the master's obligation to warn upon his knowledge of the servant's ignorance or inexperience in the work.

Instruction 14 is also complained of. It instructs the jury that the exercise of due care by the defendant in ventilating the rooms would not relieve it from liability for negligence in failing to provide the plaintiff with proper appliances to protect his mouth and nose, if it was negligent in this regard, and such negligence caused plaintiff's injury, without fault on his part. No valid ground of objection to this instruction is stated.

There was no error in refusing instruction

2, requested by the defendant, to the effect that no duty rested on the defendant to give the plaintiff instructions in reference to the risk of possible injury as a consequence of his employment. Whether or not this duty rested on the defendant was under the evidence clearly a question for the jury, and it was submitted to the jury under proper instructions. It is asserted in the brief that the court erred in modifying instructions 3, 5, and 6, requested by defendant. No argument is advanced in support of this contention, and it is sufficient to say that an examination of the modifications does not make apparent any reason for holding that they were improper.

The point of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is very briefly presented by appellant. It will not be necessary to detail the evidence at length. There was abundant testimony tending to show that the process of the manufacture of white lead, as conducted by the defendant, was dangerous to those assisting in the work; the danger arising from the inhalation of fumes and vapor thrown off from the melted pig lead, and of particles of dust coming from the metal after it had been corroded in the process of converting it into white lead. The jury was fully warranted in finding that the plaintiff was ignorant of this danger when he entered defendant's employ. It is not pretended that the defendant ever gave him any warning or instruction with regard to the matter, nor that it ever made any inquiry as to whether or not he had had any prior experience which would give him any knowledge concerning the danger. As we have already suggested, it certainly cannot be said that the danger of lead poisoning arising from the melting of pig lead or handling of white lead is so obvious and apparent to the ordinary mind that the plaintiff must be held to have known of it, and, for this reason, the defendant was not justified in assuming that he had the requisite knowledge. There was some conflict of testimony as to whether plaintiff's injuries were in fact the result of lead poisoning or of disease to which he had been subject before entering the employ of the defendant, but this conflict was one for the jury to resolve.

The alleged errors of the court in admitting and excluding evidence are not argued; counsel merely calling attention to the exceptions reserved by the defendant at certain folios of the transcript. A point so presented to this court will not be considered. Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 76 Pac. 661; Bell v. S. P. R. R. Co., 144 Cal. 560, 573, 77 Pac. 1124.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

COOLEY v. MILLER & LUX et al.
(S. F. 4,950.)(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1909.
On Rehearing, Dec. 20, 1909.)1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 44*) — PAROL SALE OF LAND.

A parol sale of land without delivery of possession, though the price is fully paid, is void, and gives no right to specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 126; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 682*)—PERSONS BOUND BY DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—PURCHASER FROM HEIR.

A purchaser by a parol sale of an heir's interest in land should appear, and, under a power of attorney from the heir authorizing him to receive his interest, claim distribution on final settlement, and, failing to do so, he is bound by the decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1203; Dec. Dig. § 682.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 682*)—PERSONS BOUND BY DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION — SUBSEQUENT GRANTEEES.

A decree of distribution of a decedent's estate, made in proceedings initiated after a written grant by distributees of a part of their interests, does not bar the right of the successor of their grantee, if their grant is otherwise valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1203; Dec. Dig. § 682.*]

4. MORTGAGES (§ 32*)—CONSTRUCTION OF INSTRUMENT AS MORTGAGE OR ABSOLUTE CONVEYANCE.

Pursuant to Civ. Code, § 1652, requiring repugnancy in a contract to be reconciled, if possible, so as to give some effect to the repugnant clauses, subordinate to the general intent, in construing an instrument expressing on its face an absolute present grant to an attorney of a part of the interest of distributees in an estate, in consideration of "services already rendered and to be rendered" in the administration and also of a release by him of all interest held by him under a prior executory agreement for a grant, but containing a clause providing that whatever compensation should be allowed him by the court, as attorney for absent heirs, should first be applied to reimburse him for all his outlays, and the balance credited to the distributees in the final settlement, must be held to mean that the balance should be credited to them in final settlement to avoid double payment, and, so construed, the instrument was not a mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 60-64; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 382*)—EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE UNDER PLEADING—DENIAL OF ALLEGATION OF OWNERSHIP.

Where it is sufficient for plaintiff to allege merely that he is the owner of property, denial of this allegation authorizes admission of evidence that title under which he claims is absolutely void, and not voidable merely, or any evidence to show he had no title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1292; Dec. Dig. § 382.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 395*) — FINDING OF ULTIMATE FACT—TITLE OR OWNERSHIP.

Where it is sufficient for plaintiff to allege merely that he is the owner of property, a finding on the fact of title or ownership is good without a finding of particular facts on which title or want of title depends.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 931; Dec. Dig. § 395.*]

7. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 123*)—CONTRACTS BETWEEN ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—PRESUMPTION OF UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The relation of attorney and client is confidential, and in view of Civ. Code, § 2235, declaring that all transactions between trustee and beneficiary, while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage over his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence, any contract between an attorney and client while the relation continues, whereby the former obtains an advantage, is presumed to have been made under his undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 240; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

8. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 123*)—CONTRACTS BETWEEN ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—PRESUMPTION OF UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The presumption of an attorney's undue influence in case of a contract with his client does not apply where he openly assumes a hostile attitude to his client, nor to a contract creating the relation and fixing the attorney's compensation, as in the latter case the relation does not exist till the contract is made, and in agreeing on its terms the parties deal at arm's length.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 240; Dec. Dig. § 123.*]

9. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 53*) — FINDINGS TO SUPPORT JUDGMENT.

To lay a foundation for affirmative relief of cancellation of an instrument on which an action is based, asked for in connection with a separate defense of undue influence in procuring its execution, it is necessary that a finding be made on the facts therein averred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 111; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1071*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON EFFECT OF DECREE.

Where, in an action based on a grant to plaintiff for services as an attorney, cancellation of the grant was asked by defendants solely on the ground that it was a mortgage, and undue influence in procuring its execution, if averred as a defense, was in support of the claim that it was only a mortgage, which it is held not to be, and was apparently abandoned, as no finding was made in relation thereto, error in construing a decree as a bar to plaintiff's claim under such grant is harmless because a presumption of undue influence against the validity of the grant would arise from the relation of the parties shown on the face of the instrument.

Melvin, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Suit by Thomas Ross Cooley against Miller & Lux (a corporation) and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and John J. Barrett, for appellant. L. M. Hoefler, Loewy & Gutsch, Edward F. Treadwell, and W. B. Treadwell, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In the court below, after a trial upon the merits, judgment was given in favor of the defendants. Plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff sued to obtain partition of certain lands, alleging that he was the owner of an undivided three-hundredths thereof as tenant in common with the defendants, and that the respective interests of the defendants were unknown to him. The defendants divided into groups and filed five separate answers; each denying the interest of plaintiff and stating their respective interests. The land formerly belonged to Miller & Lux, a partnership of two persons, namely, Henry Miller and Charles Lux. Lux died testate on March 15, 1887. The corporation defendant is the successor in interest of Henry Miller and of a number of the devisees of Lux. The interest which the plaintiff claims in the land was obtained by his grantor, James H. Campbell, after the death of Lux and before distribution of his estate, under an instrument executed on July 14, 1890, by Campbell and certain of the defendants, or their predecessors in interest, who were devisees and legatees of Lux or successors of such devisees and legatees. These defendants will be here designated as the "German heirs." The instrument is called "Exhibit B." It was preceded by another instrument executed by the same parties on January 6, 1888, called "Exhibit A," which was expressly canceled by "Exhibit B." Plaintiff claims that Exhibit B was, in effect, a conveyance to Campbell of an undivided three-hundredths of the interests of the German heirs in the estate, real and personal, of Charles Lux. Campbell afterwards conveyed to John H. Campbell, who conveyed to the plaintiff. Under the terms of the will of Lux, the German heirs were given the entire residue of one-half of the estate of Charles Lux, after certain bequests were satisfied, all of which have been discharged. A one-half interest in Lux's share of the land in controversy is therefore to be disposed of according to the respective rights and interests of the plaintiff and the German heirs. Upon the trial the defendants, over plaintiff's objection, introduced in evidence the record of the proceedings in the superior court in the administration proceedings, distributing the estate of Charles Lux, including the decree of final distribution thereof, entered on July 3, 1890. Neither the petition, nor the decree, mentioned or referred to the conveyance of any interest in the estate to Campbell, nor disclosed any claim by him thereto. He did not appear in the proceeding or in any way assert therein that he had or claimed any such interest. He was not cited or summoned to appear, and only the usual general notice by posting was given of the hearing. The decree purported to distribute to the German heirs by name, to each his respective share, the whole of the interest given to them by the will, entirely ignoring the claim or share transferred to Campbell.

1. It is claimed by the defendants that, because the proceedings in distribution of the estate of Charles Lux were initiated after the execution of the alleged grant to Campbell, the decree constitutes a bar to his claim and operated to divest the plaintiff of any interest he may have had as grantee or successor of Campbell. We think the decree of distribution had no such effect as the defendants claim. The decisions of this court on the question of the effect of a decree of distribution of the estate of a decedent upon transfers by heirs or devisees of their shares or interests in the estate, made by them after the death of the ancestor and prior to such distribution, have not been entirely consistent. It is claimed that there are cases which hold that a decree distributing the share to an heir or devisee bars a grantee of such heir or devisee, although there was no express issue or contest involving such transfer, and the rights of grantee were never actually considered or passed on by the court. This the respondents assert to be the correct principle applicable to the present case.

The first case on the subject was Freeman v. Rahm, 58 Cal. 111. That case decided that a purchaser from an heir of his interest in the estate consisting of land, who has fully paid the purchase money, the sale being in parol, but who has not received a deed nor taken possession under his purchase, and who has no evidence of his purchase except a power of attorney from the heir authorizing him to receive distribution of the heir's interest on final settlement of the estate, is absolutely barred by a subsequent decree distributing such interest to the heir, and that a creditor who has attached the interest of the heir, after distribution and before the execution of a deed to the purchaser by the heir, has a lien on the land superior to any right of such purchaser. A parol sale of land, without delivery of possession, although the price is fully paid, is wholly void, gives no right to specific performance, and vests no right, title, or interest in the buyer. Forrester v. Flores, 64 Cal. 26, 28 Pac. 107; Edwards v. Estell, 48 Cal. 194; Fulton v. Jansen, 99 Cal. 590, 34 Pac. 331; Salfield v. Sutter, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 549, 29 Pac. 1105. The power of attorney did not purport to be, and was not, a transfer of any interest. The opinion correctly states the law when it declares that the purchaser should have appeared and claimed distribution upon final settlement, and that, having failed to do so, he was bound by the decree. He had no valid, legal or equitable claim to or transfer of the land, and his only right, if he had any right at all, was that given by the power of attorney, namely, the right to receive the share of the heir on distribution. There are some statements in the opinion to the effect that he would have been barred even if he had received a valid transfer from the heir; but they are mere dicta and have been ever since so regarded.

Justice Harrison, in Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 359, 70 Pac. 459, remarked that Justice Myrick's opinion in Freeman v. Rahm was not authority because it was concurred in by only two justices. From the fact that four judges participated in the decision he evidently supposed it was a decision by the court in bank. Investigation shows that the case was heard and decided in Department 2 at the May session of 1881, that Chief Justice Morrison sat with Department 2 at that session, and that he participated with the other justices in many of its decisions, so that four justices appear to have rendered the same. The case was never transferred to the court in bank, and it is really a department decision, and properly made by three justices. The reasoning of Justice Myrick on the point now involved was disapproved by the court in bank in Martinovich v. Marsicano, and also in Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081, and it cannot now be regarded as authority.

In Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 360, 11 Pac. 727, the court held that a decree of distribution, made in the usual way, does not in any manner affect the title of one who has held by adverse possession against the heirs a sufficient time to gain title by prescription. The court says: "It is the estate of the deceased upon which the probate court administers. It is the title which the deceased had in and to the real property at the time of his death, or which has inured to the estate after death and before distribution, which passes to the heirs and devisees." This language was quoted and approved in Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 517, 16 Pac. 307; but, as the right there in issue was an adverse claim against the ancestor, the latter case is not strictly applicable here.

The case of Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081, is precisely in point. A son conveyed to his mother his interest in remainder, as devisee, in the estate of his deceased father; the mother being the devisee of a life estate therein. Afterwards distribution was had of the father's estate. The mother was given the life estate, and the share in the remainder, which had been conveyed to the mother by the son, was distributed to the son, disregarding the conveyance. This decree became final, and the case before this court involved a collateral inquiry as to the effect and binding force of the decree of distribution. The contention was that "the subsequent decree of distribution entirely destroyed the effect of that deed and conclusively established the title in" the son, as of the date of the decree. The court held the contrary, saying that under section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure a decree of distribution "is conclusive as to the right of heirs, legatees, or devisees; but it is conclusive against them only as heirs, legatees, or devisees—only so far as they claim in such capacities. * * * Its determination of such matters does not create any new title.

It merely declares the title which accrued under the law of descents or under the provisions of the will. * * * An heir may contract about or convey the title which the law had cast upon him by the death of his ancestor, and the validity or force of such contract is not affected by the fact that a probate court afterwards, by its decree of distribution, declares his asserted heirship and title to be valid." The opinion expressly discredits Freeman v. Rahm and practically overrules it so far as it declares a contrary doctrine. It should be here remarked that, in approving the decision in the Chever Case as we do, it is not necessary to approve the intimation in the opinion that section 1678 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies only where partition of the lands is made under sections 1675 et seq., and not where a mere distribution is made under section 1665 of the same chapter. Section 1678 in terms authorizes distribution to a grantee, as well as partition. In the subsequent case of the Estate of Vaughn, 92 Cal. 192, 28 Pac. 221, written by the same justice, this intimation was stated to be dictum. In the latter case the heirs had granted all their interest in the entire estate to Martha A. Bradford. The petition for distribution alleged these grants and prayed for distribution of the entire estate to the grantee. No objection or opposition thereto was made in the lower court; but it nevertheless distributed the estate to the heirs, believing that the decision in Chever v. Ching Hong Poy required that course. The Supreme Court held that this was error and reversed the decree, saying: "In the Chever Case, the appellant, William J. Chever, had, pending the administration of the estate of his deceased father, conveyed to his mother all his interest in the real property of said estate. Upon final distribution, the claim of the mother as grantee of William J. for some reason was not set up, and was not before the court; and the court very properly, upon the facts before it, distributed the interest in question to the heir, William J., who was still apparently the owner of it. He afterwards claimed that the decree of distribution conclusively estopped the mother from setting up title under the prior conveyance; but this court held that such was not the law, and that was the only point decided in the case." In Estate of Burton, 93 Cal. 461, 29 Pac. 36, the court, referring to the Chever Case in argument, says: "In the ordinary mode of distribution, the grantee of the heir is not a party to the proceeding, and there is no issue as to his title presented for determination. This being so, of course, the court would have no jurisdiction to try or determine anything as to the title of the grantee." In Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 392, 44 Pac. 735, the court again, in the course of its argument, says: "The probate court, in the matter of the administration of estates, has jurisdiction of the estates of dead men and can distribute only to heirs, devisees, or legatees, or to those claiming through them, and the decree of distribution is conclusive as to the succession or testamentary rights." In Estate of Crooks, 125 Cal. 461, 58 Pac. 89, it is again declared that "the decree of distribution is only conclusive upon the matter of succession, or as to the rights under a will—at least, where the estate is distributed without an actual contest to the heirs, devisees, and legatees. The title dates back to the death of the testator, or of their ancestor, and a distribution directly to them does not affect rights acquired from them since it accrued." In this case the court held that distribution should not be made to a mortgagee of an heir.

These indorsements and approvals of the doctrine declared in Chever v. Ching Hong Poy would appear to be sufficient to settle the question as to the paramount authority of that case over Freeman v. Rahm, with which it is in apparent conflict, and which it expressly refused to follow. It is claimed, however, that the doctrine of Freeman v. Rahm was again adopted by the court in the case of William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323. It is this case upon which the respondent chiefly relies, and upon the authority of which it is said the court below based its ruling. The case expressly recognizes the soundness of the decision in the Chever Case; but there are some expressions in the opinion which, taken alone and without the proper consideration of the facts to which they relate, appear to be in conflict with the doctrine of the Chever Case. There is, however, a difference between the facts of the two cases which clearly distinguishes the latter from the former. In the Chever estate the son had conveyed to his mother, the interest so conveyed was distributed to the son, and the subsequent controversy arose directly between them over the title to the identical property. In the Lawler estate the mother had conveyed to one son, John, her undivided one-half interest in a certain described tract constituting a part of the father's estate. The decree of distribution did not give this tract, or a one-half interest therein, to the grantor, as happened in the Chever Case, but did give the entire interest in that tract, in severalty, to the two other sons, James and Patrick, giving to the mother other lands in severalty, and to her and the last-named sons still other tracts in undivided shares. The proceeding was a partial partition as well as a distribution. The grantees of James and Patrick sued John to quiet title to the tract conveyed to John by the mother. The mother was not a party to the suit. No appeal had been taken from the decree of distribution or partition, and it had become final. The court said: "As no appeal was taken from this decree, it became conclusive upon Bridget Lawler and upon her grantee, respondent herein. The question of an estoppel by virtue of her grant does not arise in the present case, as the property distributed to her is not the same as that which she conveyed to the respondent." (The italics are ours.) The court seems to have considered that the mother, in the distribution proceedings, was the representative of her grantee for the purpose of securing distribution of the granted property to feed the grant, and that as she failed to obtain this relief, in a proceeding wherein she was an actor and where the court had jurisdiction to give it, she was concluded by the decree, and that her grantee, claiming only under her, was likewise concluded. That this is the true ground of the decision is further demonstrated by reference to the briefs in the case, wherein counsel for the plaintiffs, in distinguishing it from the Chever Case, say: "If Bridget Lawler had received as distributee the land in controversy here, it would be the property of the defendant (John); but, when the land goes to another heir with whom the defendant does not connect himself, he is not in the position of Mrs. Chever." And in the opinion the court distinguishes it from the Chever Case in the same way, saying that what was decided in the Chever Case was that the grantor who receives in distribution the property granted by him to another "is estopped from claiming the property under the distribution, as against his grantee." The general statements in the opinion in the Lawler Case, to the effect that the decree of distribution binds all the world, that every person who may assert any interest in the estate is required to appear and claim it, and that a grantee of an heir is as fully bound by the decree as the heir himself, are to be understood in the light of the fact that, although the grantee did not appear in that case, the grantor did appear, and in view of the all-important fact that the land granted was not distributed to the grantor, but to third persons. So understood, the case is not in conflict with the Chever Case, nor contrary to sound principles of law. It must be conceded that if, upon distribution and partition, the court decides and decrees that a particular heir is not entitled to a particular part of the estate, the decree, if not reversed on direct appeal, is conclusive both upon the heir and all persons claiming under him by grant or otherwise. This is the result of the principles declared in the Chever Case and in all the other cases on the subject, and this appears to be all that was really decided in William Hill Co. v. Lawler. That this was the view taken of that decision by its author, Justice Harrison, is clear from his reference to it in the subsequent opinion of Martinovich v. Marsicano, supra, where he distinguishes the Lawler Case by saying that in that case the land which the widow had conveyed to John was, by the decree of distribution, assigned to others and not to the widow. The Lawler Case therefore has no application to the case at bar, for here the property assigned by the decree of distribution to the German heirs includes the property alleged to have been granted by them to Campbell.

The decision in Martinovich v. Marsicano, supra, holds that a decree of distribution to the grantee of a devisee does not affect the lien of a judgment rendered against the devisee before the grant and prior to the decree. It also approves the principle of the case of Chever v. Ohing Hong Poy, supra. The case of Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 149, 51 Pac. 33, has no bearing upon the precise question here involved. What was decided in that case was that a decree of distribution could not be disregarded or set aside upon the ground that it had erroneously declared and enforced a trust of a character which this court, in other cases, had held to be forbidden by law, and that such a judgment, although erroneous and reversible upon direct appeal, was conclusive upon all parties thereto after it became final; no appeal having been taken. Our conclusion is that the decree of distribution of the estate of Charles Lux, deceased, made in the manner we have stated, does not bar the right of the plaintiff, as successor of Campbell, to the property granted by the German heirs to Campbell before that decree was rendered, if that grant is otherwise valid.

2. Another question presented is that of the meaning and effect of the instrument referred to as "Exhibit B." It is claimed by the respondent that, when considered in connection with the previous agreement between the same parties, it is not a conveyance, and that, at most, it is only a mortgage by the German heirs to Campbell to secure to him the payment of his fees for the services which he agreed to render for them as attorney.

The first agreement, Exhibit A, was executed on January 6, 1888, nine months after the will of Lux was admitted to probate, and at a time when the estate could not have been ready for settlement or distribution. By its terms Campbell agreed that he would represent the German heirs and act as their legal adviser throughout the administration of the estate, that he would institute all actions and proceedings necessary for the enforcement of their rights and defend them against all suits and resist all measures likely to prove injurious to them, that he would hasten by all lawful means the close of the administration of the Lux estate and secure as beneficial a distribution to them as the will and the law would permit, and that he would do all other acts during said administration that might be deemed of benefit to their interests. In consideration of these covenants on his part, the German heirs agreed to grant to him three-hundredths of their respective shares of the estate, subject to the condition that if he should violate his part of the agreement, or neglect to perform the same fully and in good faith, the agreement should be immediately annulled, he should cease to be their attorney, and should at once release to them all benefits to be derived by him from the terms of the agreement. It is to be noted that this agreement does not purport to be a present grant of a three-hundredths interest in their shares of the estate, that it is in terms only an executory agreement for a grant, and that it was to be annulled upon the happening of the condition. It also provided that Campbell should bear his own traveling and other personal expenses in performing his duties.

The second agreement, Exhibit B, was made on July 14, 1890, two years and six months after the first agreement. In the ordinary course of administration, of an ordinary estate, the administration would have then advanced far toward final settlement. The decree of distribution was not made, however, until June 28, 1900, almost ten years thereafter. The terms of Exhibit B, omitting the formal parts and substituting "German heirs" for "parties of the first part," and "Campbell" for "party of the second part," are as follows: "The German heirs for and in consideration of the reconveyance and agreement hereinafter contained, and of the services already rendered and to be rendered by Campbell, hereby grant to said Campbell an undivided interest in all the property of the estate of Charles Lux, deceased, equal to three-hundredths ( $\frac{3}{100}$ ) of the shares and interests therein devised to the German heirs by said decedent in his last will and testament. In consideration of the foregoing grant to him, Campbell, the said Campbell hereby grants and reconveys to the German heirs all the interest in said estate held by him under any previous agreement or conveyance, and especially a certain agreement and conveyance dated January 6, 1888, which is hereby by agreement of all the parties hereto rescinded and annulled. It is agreed that whatever compensation shall be allowed to Campbell by the superior court of the county of San Mateo, as attorney for absent heirs, shall be first applied to reimburse him for all outlays made by him in rendering his services to the German heirs, and the balance shall be credited to the German heirs in final settlement. It is fully understood that the compensation herein provided for shall embrace all services rendered in the administration of said estate by Campbell up to and including the final distribution thereof."

This instrument, on its face, expresses an absolute, present grant to Campbell. There is certainly no presumption of law that such an instrument is to be construed as a mortgage rather than as a deed or assignment. There is no evidence in the record, aside from its terms, to indicate that the parties understood that the German heirs were to remain the debtors of Campbell for the value of the services he had rendered and should render. The terms of the instrument do not show or express such understanding or intention. To the contrary, it declares that it is made "in consideration" of "services already rendered and to be rendered," and that "the compensation herein provided for" embraced all services to be rendered up to final distribution, thus showing that it was considered as payment in advance for services rendered and to be rendered, and that such payment was made by the conveyance, not that it was merely secured thereby. The release by Campbell of all interest held by him under the previous agreement and the cancellation of that agreement show also that the intention was to make the second conveyance absolute and not conditional, as it would be in effect if it were held to be only a mortgage. The German heirs thereby accepted Campbell's promise to render the services specified and divested themselves of the right to annul or revoke the grant if he failed to do so.

It is claimed that the conveyance is shown to be a mortgage by the clause relating to the settlement of allowances to Campbell by the court as attorney for absent heirs. The grant is absolute in terms, and it clearly negatives the idea that any debt remained to be secured. To give the clause the effect claimed would, by mere construction, make it antagonistic to and destructive of the grant. "Repugnancy in a contract must be reconciled, if possible, by such an interpretation as will give some effect to the repugnant clauses, subordinate to the general intent and purpose of the whole contract." Civ. Code, § 1652. A repugnant clause will even sometimes be wholly rejected in order to accomplish the positive and obvious general purpose. Jackson v. Puget S. L. Co., 123 Cal. 100, 55 Pac. 788. This clause is capable of a reasonable explanation and interpretation not inconsistent with the other parts of the agreement. A payment of fees to an attorney for absent heirs is not made for the general benefit of the estate, but solely for that of the absent heirs. It is in the nature of a partial distribution in advance to them, and on final settlement such payments are charged to them as advancements on their shares. The grantors were evidently the absent heirs whom Campbell had been appointed to represent. The services for which the allowances were to be made were evidently the same services for which he was paid by the grant of three-hundredths of their shares by these same heirs. If no adjustment were made between them of the court allowance he would be twice paid for the same service. It was necessary that he should in some way turn over these allowances to them. The obvious and proper way would have been for him to do so as fast as he received them. Apparently for his benefit and convenience, another plan was adopted. This plan was that he should retain the allowances, pay therefrom his outlays, and adjust the balance on final settlement of the estate, by considering the same as an advancement solely upon the  $\frac{3}{100}$  going to him, or, as between him and them, "crediting" the same to them. As the grant included the personal property and money of a very large estate, this would seem entirely practicable. This is what is meant by the provision that these balances should "be credited to the German heirs in final settlement," and thus a double payment would be avoided. So understood, the clause carries out the main purpose of the agreement, and does not destroy the previous absolute grant, nor involve the absurdity that an obligation which the grant discharged was nevertheless to be kept alive.

3. It is further claimed that, at the time the agreement was made, Campbell was their attorney, that an agreement between them, made while this confidential relation existed, is presumed to have been obtained by undue influence on his part, that it is incumbent on him to rebut this presumption by evidence, and that, as no evidence was given on the subject, the court was justified in holding that the grant was void, and that the plaintiff had no title thereunder. On the other hand, the plaintiff claims that this was alleged in the answer as an affirmative defense, that the court made no finding on the issue, and that for that reason the decision is against law, and the motion for new trial should have been granted.

The rule seems to be that in cases where it is sufficient for the plaintiff, suing in regard to property, to allege merely that he is the owner thereof, a denial of this allegation is sufficient to authorize the admission of evidence that the title under which plaintiff claims was absolutely void and not voidable merely, or any evidence to show that plaintiff had no title, and that in such cases a finding upon the fact of title or ownership is good without a finding of the particular facts upon which such title or want of title depends. Cooper v. Miller, 113 Cal. 238, 45 Pac. 325; Montecito V. Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 594, 77 Pac. 1113; Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 499, 48 Pac. 488.

The rule is well established that the relation of attorney and client is confidential in character, and that any contract entered into between them while that relation continues, whereby the attorney obtains an advantage from the client, is presumed to have been made by the client under the undue influence of the attorney. Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 440, 91 Am. Dec. 644; Civ. Code § 2235; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 310, 311; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 390. In the section cited Mr. Pomeroy says: "The presumption always arises against the validity of a purchase or sale between the client and attorney made during the existence of the relation. The attorney must remove that presumption by showing affirmatively the most perfect good faith, the absence of undue influence, a fair price, knowledge, intention, and freedom of action by the client, and also that he gave his client full information and disinterested advice.

* * * If all these circumstances are proved, the contract will stand; if not, it will be defeated or set aside." The presumption does not apply to a transaction in which the attorney openly assumes a hostile attitude to his client. Johnson v. Fesemeyer, 3 DeG. & J. 22. Nor is it applicable to a contract by which the relation is originally created and the compensation of the attorney fixed. The confidential relation does not exist until such contract is made, and in agreeing upon its terms the parties deal at arm's length. Elmore v. Johnson, 143 Ill. 513, 32 N. E. 413, 21 L. R. A. 366, 36 Am. St. Rep. 401.

The record does not contain the answer in full, but merely states its substance. It recites: That a separate affirmative defense was presented averring that Campbell was attorney for the German heirs at the time of the execution of Exhibit B; that it "was without consideration and was obtained by said Campbell by the undue use of his influence as such attorney; that the same was intended only as a mortgage to secure the payment to said Campbell of his compensation as such attorney; that said compensation had been fully paid"; and that they offered in this separate defense to pay Campbell or the plaintiff any sums the court should find to be due from the German heirs for such compensation, and asked "that said mortgage be adjudged to be satisfied and that the same be delivered up and canceled." This is all that appears on the subject of undue influence. It is not claimed or asserted that the grant was void because obtained by undue influence. Its cancellation was not asked on that ground, but solely upon the ground that it was really a mortgage. Undue influence seems to have been averred in support of the claim that it was only a mortgage and as a fact tending to show the intention, rather than as a separate and independent defense. No evidence was given by the defendants in support of such a defense. They here rely wholly on the bare presumption aforesaid. The agreement of January 6, 1888, was introduced by the plaintiff. It created the relation of attorney and client between Campbell and the German heirs and fixed his compensation. It declared that for his services, when completed, he should receive the identical three-hundredths interest which the second agreement, Exhibit B, conveyed to him. It is admitted that all the services contracted for have been performed by him. The first agreement, to which no undue influence attaches, constitutes an admission by the German heirs that the value of the services to be performed equaled the value of the interest they afterwards granted to him, and it goes far to remove the presumption of undue influence in obtaining the grant. In order to lay a foundation for the affirmative relief of cancellation asked for in connection with this separate defense, it was necessary that a finding be made upon the facts therein averred. The fact that no such finding was made indicates that the defense was abandoned. In view of all these circumstances and this condition of the record, we do not think it would be fair to the plaintiff to hold that the error in considering the decree of distribution as a bar was harmless because a presumption against the validity of the grant would arise from the relations of the parties shown upon the face of the instrument, a presumption not pleaded as a cause for declaring the grant void. Justice requires that the case be remanded for a new trial so that the parties can intelligently state and meet the issue of undue influence if they so desire.

In view of the necessity of a new trial, it may be well to add that the part of the second agreement providing for the reimbursement to Campbell of his "outlays" did not materially change the obligations of the clients in respect to such outlays. The language should not be construed more liberally toward the attorney than its ordinary meaning requires. In the absence of a special agreement to the contrary, a client is bound to repay his attorney for all outlays made by him in the payment of the expenses of carrying on the litigation, and an attorney is bound to bear his own personal and traveling expenses. The word "outlays," when used in that connection, does not ordinarily mean the personal or traveling expenses of the attorney, but refers to costs of suit and other expenses paid to third persons for similar purposes. It should be so construed in this agreement.

The order denying a new trial is reversed.

MELVIN, J. I dissent from the second proposition advanced by Mr. Justice SHAW. I think the instrument Exhibit B was a mortgage.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petitions for a rehearing are denied. In response to the points urged therein, we will say: That the opinion in the case upon the question of the construction and effect of the instrument referred to as "Exhibit B," and upon the question of undue influence, is predicated upon the facts stated in the opinion; that it appears that the case was tried and decided in the court below upon the theory that the plaintiff was barred by the decree of distribution; and that the facts, aliunde, shown in the record, bearing upon the construction and effect of that instrument and undue influence in relation to it, are such facts only as were incidentally shown in the course of the trial of the other question. If the case is to finally rest upon the questions last mentioned, it is more in consonance with the correct administration of justice in a case involving, as this case does, large properties, that the questions be determined upon a new trial, devoted directly to the examination thereof. Upon such a trial all the evidence bearing upon such questions can be introduced, and new pleadings may be filed if necessary. The record now before us omits many facts which might be relevant to these propositions; at least we surmise that it does, from that which does appear. If upon such a trial it should be claimed that the aforesaid instrument should be construed as a grant of a share in value, only, of the estate, and not of the specific property, and that Campbell has already received all, or a large part of it, in money, thus satisfying the grant, or a due proportion of it, or if it should be asserted that he has elected to take the whole, or part of it, in money by retaining such sums as he may have received under the orders of the court as attorney for absent heirs, and, that the plaintiff is thereby estopped from now claiming any of it, or the ratable part of it, as a share of the real estate, or that the grant was obtained by undue influence, there is nothing in the opinion rendered which precludes such inquiries. No such questions have been heretofore presented, either here or in the court below, nor does the record here show that Campbell received any money as attorney for absent heirs.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

11 Cal. App. 556

PARMELEE et al. v. DIXON et al. (Civ. 647.) (Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1909.) Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; John F. Ellison, Judge. Action by Elmer E. Parmelee and others against Fred Dixon and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed. Tuttle & Tuttle and Tabor & Tabor, for appellants. John M. Fulwiler, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title to a certain ditch and the water flowing therein. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. The ditch in question, known as the "Bradford Ditch," taking its water from what is known as "Grouse Cañon," has been in use for over 40 years in operating the mines now owned by plaintiffs. Defendants allege the ownership of mines adjacent to the Bradford Ditch intermediate its head and plaintiff's mines. In September, 1904, defendants posted a notice of location of the waters of Grouse Cañon and appropriated and took possession of a portion of the Bradford Ditch, claiming that plaintiffs for more than 12 years immediately preceding said location "have failed and neglected to cause any water to run through the said Bradford Ditch as described in their complaint, and have failed and neglected, for said period, to keep said ditch in repair so that water could flow through the same, and have abandoned said water right and the said ditch." The court made findings in favor of plaintiffs and negating the averments of the answer. There was evidence of the use of the water of Grouse Cañon by means of the Bradford Ditch as early as 1860 by plaintiffs and their predecessors in estate, down to 1904, when defendants initiated their claim, took possession of the ditch, and deprived plaintiffs of the use of the water. There were years when all the water flowing in the cañon was used by plaintiffs, and other years when they did not use all of it. Some years the full flow at low water was all required for hydraulicking, and others only a part, when the mine was operated by drifting; but it was all claimed and used, and there was no evidence of abandonment or disuse for such period as would justify the inference that plaintiffs or their predecessors had surrendered their rights to the water or the ditch, or intended so to do. The case presents no question of law requiring notice. Upon some points there is conflict in the evidence; but a careful reading of the record discloses ample support for the findings. No useful purpose would be subserved by stating the evidence. The judgment and order are affirmed.
